

Publications of the Modern Language Association of America

EDITED BY PERCY WALDRON LONG

VOLUME L

VOLUME L OF PMLA IS DEDICATED TO PROFESSOR CARLETON BROWN, SECRETARY OF THE MODERN LANGUAGE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, 1920-1934,
AND FIRST VICE PRESIDENT 1935, ON THE OC-CASION OF HIS TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY AS PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH
(BY VOTE OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL)

CONTENTS

Carleton Brown. By EDWARD C. ARMSTRONG, KEMP MALONE, and EDUARD PROKOSCH. . . . .	iii
A Bibliography of Carleton Brown's Writings . . . . .	v
I.—The Conception of a Calling in the German Literature of the Middle Ages. By ARTHUR E. SOKOL . . . . .	1
II.—The Troubadours of Peire D'Alvernhe's Satire in Spain. By WALTER T. PATTISON . . . . .	14
III.—The Magic Chessboard in the Perlesvaus : An Example of Medieval Literary Borrowing. By BERNARD WEINBERG . . . . .	25
IV.—The Langland Myth. By OSCAR CARGILL . . . . .	36
V.—Bishop Brunton and the Fable of the Rats. By ELEANOR H. KELLOGG . . . . .	57
VI.—The Two Petros in the "Monkes Tale." By HALDEEN BRADY . . . . .	69
VII.—Satire in Sir Thopas . By WILLIAM W. LAWRENCE . . . . .	81
VIII.—The Source of Chaucer's Melibeus . By J. BURKE SEVERS . . . . .	92
IX.—The Canterbury Tales in 1400. By J. S. P. TATLOCK . . . . .	100
X.—E. K. is Spenser. By AGNES DUNCAN KUERSTEINER. . . . .	140
XI.—Milton's Debt to Wolleb's Compendium Theologiæ Christianæ . By MAURICE KELLEY . . . . .	156
XII.—The Development of the Rhetoric and Metre of the Heroic Couplet, especially in 1625–1645. By RUTH C. WALLERSTEIN. . . . .	166
XIII.—The Satiric Background of the Attack on the Puritans in Swift's A Tale of a Tub . By C. M. WEBSTER. . . . .	210
XIV.—The Relation of Coleridge's Ode on Dejection to Wordsworth's Ode on Intimations of Immortality . By FRED MANNING SMITH. . . . .	224
XV.—Scott's Theory and Practice Concerning the Use of the Supernatural in Prose Fiction in Relation to the Chronology of the Waverley Novels. By MORY C. BOATRIGHT. . . . .	235
XVI.—The Campaign of Periodicals after the War of 1812 for National American Literature. By JOHN C. McCLOSKEY. . . . .	262
XVII.—Lytton's Theories of Prose Fiction. By HAROLD H. WATTS. . . . .	274
XVIII.—The Costumbrista Movement in Mexico. By JEFFERSON REA SPELE. . . . .	290
XIX.—Irony in Hardy and Conrad. By RICHARD GORDON LILLARD. . . . .	316
XX.—Die Wahrscheinlichkeit des Kunstwerks. By MAX J. WOLFF . . . . .	323
XXI.—Irregular Hemistichs in the Milagros of Gonzalo de Berceo. By HARRISON HEIKES ARNOLD. . . . .	335
XXII.—Honoré Bonet: A Fourteenth-Century Critic of Chivalry. By RAYMOND L. KILGOUR. . . . .	352
XXIII.—"The Question of Halsam." By HELEN PENNOCK SOUTH. . . . .	362
XXIV.— Parole Identiche in the Sonnet and Other Verse Forms. By JOSEPH G. FUCILLA. . . . .	372
XXV.—Sidney's Astrophel and Stella Reconsidered. By THEODORE HOWARD BANKS. . . . .	403
XXVI.—Sidney's Astrophel and Stella and Greville's Calica . By J. M. PURCELL. . . . .	413

XXVII.—The Composition of the Shepherd's Calendar . By ROLAND B. BOTTING .....	423
XXVIII.—Notes on the Elizabethan Elegie . By FRANCIS WHITE WEITZMANN .....	435
XXIX.—Information Furnished by the Mercure Galant on the French Provincial Academies in the Seventeenth Century. By MARY ELIZABETH STORER .....	444
XXX.—Milton as a Historian. By J. MILTON FRENCH .....	469
XXXI.—The Latin Pastorals of Milton and Castiglione. By THOMAS PERRIN HARRISON, JR. ....	480
XXXII.— Gaudentio Di Lucca: A Forgotten Utopia . By LEE MONROE ELLISON.....	494
XXXIII.—Burns and the Smuggler Rosamond . By FRANKLIN BLISS SNYDER.....	510
XXXIV.—Ritson's Life of Robin Hood. By CARROLL COLLIER MORELAND .....	522
XXXV.—Tieck's Essay Über das Erhabene . By EDWIN H. ZEYDEL .....	537
XXXVI.—The Significance of Lamia . By JOHN HAWLEY ROBERTS .....	550
XXXVII.—A Note on Source Influences in Shelley's Cloud and Skylark . By IRVING T. RICHARDS .....	562
XXXVIII.—A "Lost" Poem by Arthur Hallam. By T. H. VAIL MOTTER .....	568
XXXIX.—Margaret Fuller and Ralph Waldo Emerson. By HARRY R. WARFEL .....	576
XL.—Grundtvig's Index B of English and Scottish Ballads. By S. B. HUSTVEDT .....	595
XLI.—R. M. Rilke und Christian Morgenstern. By ERICH HOFACHER.....	606
XLII.—An Introduction to the Æsthetics of Literary Portraiture. By CHRISTIAN N. WENGER .....	615
XLIII.—The Date of the Flourishing of the "Wakefield Master." By MENDAL G. FRAMPTON .....	631
XLIV.—Nathaniel Wood's Conflict of Conscience . By CELESTA WINE.....	661
XLV.—Thomas Deloney's Euphuistic Learning and The Forest . By HYDER E. ROLLINS.....	679
XLVI.—Elizabethan and Seventeenth-Century Play Manuscripts. By ALFRED HARBAGE .....	687
XLVII.—Exemplum Materials Underlying Macbeth . By BEATRICE DAW BROWN.....	700
XLVIII.—Is Shakespeare's Much Ado a Revised Earlier Play? By ALLISON GAW .....	715
XLIX.—The Public Repudiation of Hero. By NADINE PAGE .....	739
L.—2 and 3 Henry VI —Which Holinshed? By LUCILLE KING .....	745
LI.—Middleton's Acquaintance with the Merrie Conceited Jests of George Peele . By MILDRED GAYLOR CHRISTIAN .....	753
LII.—The Contemporary Significance of Middleton's Game at Chesse . By JOHN ROBERT MOORE .....	761
LIII.—Bishop Percy, Thomas Warton, and Chatterton's Rowley Poems (1773-1790). By A. WATKIN-JONES.....	769

LIV.—Notes on Keats's Reading. By DOUGLAS BUSH . . . . .	785
LV.—Carlyle and the German Philosophy Problem during the Year 1826–1827. By HILL SHINE . . . . .	807
LVI.— Un Joven de Provecho : An Unpublished Play by B. Pérez Galdós. By H. CHONON BERKOWITZ . . . . .	828
COMMENT AND CRITICISM: 1. The Three Daughters of Deorman. 2. Thomas Churchyard's Pension. 3. Theophrastus and Hall: A Correction. 4. Spenser or Anthony Munday?—A Note on the Axiochus . 5. Astery's Transformation in Muipotmos . 6. The Date of Spenser's Mutabilite Cantos. 7. Una and Duessa. 8. Henry VI and the Contention Plays. 9. An Elizabethan Tournament. 10. The Idea of Taste in the Eighteenth Century. 11. The Rambler , No. 191. 12. Johnson on the Sanctity of an Author's Text. 13. Marianela y De L'Intelligence de Taine . . . . .	899
LVII.—Heorot. By STEPHEN J. HERBEN, JR. . . . .	933
LVIII.—Some Irregular Uses of the Instrumental Case in Old English. By GEORGE KUMLER ANDERSON . . . . .	946
LIX.—The Address of the Soul to the Body. By RUDOLPH WILLARD . . . . .	957
LX.—The Date of the Eneas . By EDNA C. FREDRICK . . . . .	984
LXI.—Chaucer's Wreched Engendring . By CARLETON BROWN . . . . .	997
LXII.—Early Application of Latin Grammar to English. By SANFORD BROWN MEECH . . . . .	1012
LXIII.—Influence of Superstition on Vocabulary: Two Related Examples. By HOPE EMILY ALLEN . . . . .	1033
LXIV.—Spenser's Irish River Stories. By ROLAND M. SMITH . . . . .	1047
LXV.—The Authorship of the Anonymous Life of Milton. By EDWARD S. PARSONS . . . . .	1057
LXVI.—Dryden's Dedication for The Music of the Prophetesse , 1691. By ROSWELL G. HAM . . . . .	1065
LXVII.—Forged Letters of Laurence Sterne. By LEWIS P. CURTIS . . . . .	1076
LXVIII.—Voltaire's Reaction to Diderot. By NORMAN LEWIS TORREY . . . . .	1107
LXIX.—Zum Begriff des Jungen Goethe. By THEODORE SCHREIBER . . . . .	1144
LXX.—Goethe in American Periodicals 1860–1900. By JOHN PAUL VON GRUENINGEN . . . . .	1155
LXXI.—L'Ombre de Madame Bovary. By FRANCOIS DENOEU . . . . .	1165
LXXII.—A Source for Balzac's Determinism. By G. M. FESS . . . . .	1186
LXXIII.—Louis-Xavier de Ricard, Poet of Progress. By AARON SCHAFFER . . . . .	1191
LXXIV.—Die Herkunft der Palatalisierung und Mouillierung des L-Lautes in Deutschen Dialekten. By CARL SELMER . . . . .	1200
LXXV.—A Characteristic of Rime. By WILBUR LANG SCHRAMM . . . . .	1223
ACTS OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL . . . . .	1228

SUPPLEMENT

AMERICAN BIBLIOGRAPHY FOR 1935. By ARCHER TAYLOR, ALBERT C. BAUGH, GREGORY PAINE, H. CARRINGTON LANCASTER, EDWIN B. WILLIAMS, J. E. SHAW, H. W. NORDMEYER, A. P. COLEMAN . . . . .	1231
--	------

THE PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS: "Words." By PROFESSOR COLBERT SEARLES	1320
REPORTS: The reports of the SECRETARY, TREASURER, AUDITING COMMITTEE, TRUSTEES, ROTOGRAPH COMMITTEE, and DELEGATES TO THE AMERICAN COUNCIL OF LEARNED SOCIETIES	1328
PROCEEDINGS OF THE FIFTY-SECOND ANNUAL MEETING	1343
MEETINGS OF THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL	1365
BUDGET FOR 1936	1366
COMMITTEE ON RESEARCH ACTIVITIES: INFORMATION CONCERNING ITS SERVICES	1367
CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS	1368
MINUTES OF THE THIRTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL MEETING OF THE PHILOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION OF THE PACIFIC COAST	1373
LIST OF MEMBERS OF THE MODERN LANGUAGE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA	1375
LIBRARIES SUBSCRIBING TO PMLA	1467
M. L. A. BOOKS AND ROTOGRAPHS

Modern Language Association Books

(Published 1925-1935)

THE MONOGRAPH SERIES

A discount of one-third from the list-price is allowed to Members of the Association.

Orders from the U. S. and Canada should be addressed to D. C. Heath and Company, Boston. Orders from abroad should be addressed to Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, London, E C 4.

I. LES PROPHECIES DE MERLIN

Edited from MS 593 in the Bibliothèque Municipale of Rennes

By LUCY ALLEN PATON

Published 1926 and 1927.

Part one: Introduction and Text (xl+496 pp.). } Price $9.00.
Part Two: Studies in the Contents (iv+406 pp.). }

Wm. A. Nitze (Modern Philology, Aug. 1929). This is an important book not merely for Arthurians but especially for students of medieval history and of Franco-Italian literature. Essentially a piece of Venetian propaganda, the Prophecies de Merlin consists of historical and romantic prognostication, attributed to the Arthurian seer, and mingled with narratives of knightly adventure taken, in large part, from the Vulgate cycle, the Prose Tristan, and the Palamedes. One closes those two volumes with a sense of admiration and gratitude for their learned author, who promises further studies on the legend of Merlin, an event to which all Arthurian scholars will look forward with much interest.

II. DRAMATIC PUBLICATION IN ENGLAND, 1580-1640

A Study of Conditions Affecting Content and Form of Drama

By EVELYN MAY ALBRIGHT

Published 1927 (vi+442 pp.). Price $4 50

Sir Edmund Chambers (Mod. Lang. Review, Jan., 1928). Miss Albright has succeeded in collecting a great deal of interesting material on many topics relating to play publication; on the regulation of the stage; on the censorship both in its general and in its dramatic operation; on copyright and stage right; on the sources of dramatic copy; on the methods of the printing houses; on contemporary notions of typographic accuracy . . .

III. WRITINGS ASCRIBED TO RICHARD ROLLE HERMIT OF HAMPOLE AND MATERIALS FOR HIS BIOGRAPHY

By HOPE EMILY ALLEN

Published 1927 (xvi+568 pp.). Price $7 50

The British Academy awarded the Rose Mary Crawshay prize in English Literature to Miss Allen for this work.

Howard R. Patch (Speculum, October, 1929). For a number of years scholars have eagerly awaited the publication of this work. . . . And it is really an honor, not only to Miss Allen, but also to the scholars who initially guided her research, and to the foundation which is responsible for its publication. Every document ascribed to Rolle has been minutely examined and its claim to authenticity duly tested from every point of view. The editions and manuscripts are fully listed, and the evidence for the materials regarding the mystic's life properly scrutinized.

IV. THE CONSECUTIVE SUBJUNCTIVE IN OLD ENGLISH

By MORGAN CALLAWAY JR.

Published December, 1933 (110 pp.). Price $1 50.

George O. Curme (JEGP, July, 1934): This treatise on the use of the subjunctive in Old English in clauses of result . . . shows conclusively that the subjunctive here is due to the meaning of the subordinate clause itself.

J. R. Hulbert (Mod. Phil., August, 1934): This most recent publication of Professor Callaway shows the same painstaking care and thoroughness, the same impeccable technique as all its predecessors, and, like them, is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of Anglo-Saxon.

Modern Language Association Books

V. THE REAL WAR OF THE THEATRES

Shakespeare's Fellows in Rivalry with the Admiral's Men, 1594-1603
By ROBERT BOIES SHARPE

Published February, 1935 (viii+260 pp.) Price $2.50

The first chronological survey of the theatrical events of Queen Elizabeth's last decade, treating season by season the relations of stage and public happenings, especially with reference to the court factions. It clarifies the policies and specialties of the companies together with their influence on the literary as well as the stage qualities of the extant dramas of Shakespeare and his contemporaries during this period

VI. PETER IDLEY'S INSTRUCTIONS TO HIS SON

By CHARLOTTE D'EVELYN

Published May, 1935 (vii+240 pp.) $2.50.

This study establishes the identity of Peter Idley as an Oxfordshire gentleman, neighbor of the Stonors and office-holder in the court of Henry VI, and against the background of his public and private life, interprets his Instructions to His Son as a typical expression of fifteenth-century culture. The text of the Instructions is printed for the first time in full with variant MS readings and lineal references to the Handlyng Synne.

REVOLVING FUND SERIES

Address orders to D. Appleton-Century Co., 35 W 32d St., New York City.
Orders from abroad should be addressed to Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, London, E.C. 4.

I. THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE IN AMERICA

By GEORGE PHILIP KRAPP

Published 1925 (Vol. I, xvi+378 pp.; Vol. II, vi+356 pp.). Price $10.

J. H. G. Grattan (Rev. of Eng. Stud., III, April, 1927): Professor Krapp's work will take its place in this country [England] among the few great books on the English language

Morgan Callaway, Jr. (University of Texas Studies in English, No. 8): A work of which all Americans will be proud. . . . What impresses me most in this work is the catholicity of the judgments expressed. Professor Krapp's book moves in a region never touched by Mr. H. L. Mencken in his The American Language or by Mr. Gilbert M. Tucker in his American English.

II. PROBLEMS IN SHAKSPEARE'S PENMANSHIP

By SAMUEL A. TANNENBAUM, M.D.

Published 1927 (xvi+241 pp.). Price $4.

Fifty-seven illustrations in facsimile and a full size, half-tone reproduction on India paper of the three pages of Shakspeare's Will.

Tucker Brooke (The Yale Review, Jan., 1928): The subject is an important one, reaching far beyond the question of the authenticity of certain extant signatures. . . . Since Shakspeare did not use a typewriter, and cannot be supposed to have dictated his poetry or even to have carefully collated and corrected scribes' copies, it is evident that the ultimate source of all his works must have been manuscript in his own handwriting. It therefore greatly concerns all who seek to interpret the printed text to know what kind of hand he wrote and how legibly, whether he wrote fast or slow, carefully or otherwise. All these things, and many more, Dr. Tannenbaum deals with, and he shows cause for believing that Shakspeare's penmanship was considerably more adequate to his occasions than is commonly supposed.

III. KEATS AND MARY TIGHE

By EARLE VONARD WELLER

Published 1928 (xi+334 pp.) Price $3.50.

A page-for-page reprint of the 1811 ed. of the Poems of Mrs. Tighe, with phrases from the text of Keats arranged at the foot of the page, and an Index for convenient cross reference; also a Memorial Introduction.

A. J. in Modern Language Review, April, 1930; Mr. Weller brings with him some 400 parallel words and phrases; arranges them in footnotes, and cross indexes them in the Appendix.

Modern Language Association Books

Some, it is true, seem trivial, others controversial; but as a whole the editor has made an interesting, if not convincing, case. The volume, however, serves another purpose. It reintroduces to an inappreciative world the word of a sadly neglected poetess.

Edmund Blunden (Daily Telegraph, Aug. 14, 1928). He proves with chapter and verse the previously admitted but uncalculated theory that Mr. Tighe influenced Keats's epithets and peculiarities of diction.

IV. BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY NOVEL IN FRANCE

By RALPH COPLESTONE WILLIAMS

Published 1931 (xiv+356 pp.) Price $3.50.

Contains between twelve and thirteen hundred titles. Part I is a list of authors, Part II is a list of novels; Part III is an alphabetical list of titles with authors' names.

H. Carrington Lancaster in Mod Lang Notes, Jan., 1932: The obvious need for a history of the French novel in the seventeenth century gave Dr. Williams the excellent idea of preparing the way for such a book by publishing a bibliography of the genre. He went about the undertaking with unflagging industry, not discouraged by the fact that he was frequently limited in French libraries to the dole of a few books a day. His results have been most handsomely published by the M. L. A. . . . Nearly one hundred additional titles are given in an appendix, devoted to doubtful cases. . . . The project is one designed to be of assistance to investigators interested in the seventeenth-century novel, in individual novelists, or in the origins of the fiction of later centuries, both in France and abroad. . . . In short, the work is far from being definitive, but, despite its defects, it includes a great deal of information that is hard to obtain elsewhere, so that it should prove to be a useful starting-point for numerous monographs. Properly used, it will render much service and ought to be found in all libraries where advanced work is carried on in any modern European literature.

V. THE GYPSIES METAMORPHOSED, WRITTEN BY BEN JONSON

A variorum edition by George Watson Cole, L. H. D., Librarian Emeritus of the Henry E. Huntington Library and Art Gallery

Published 1931 (xviii+298 royal octavo pages) Price $5.00.

Contains a facsimile of the rare first edition and of a contemporary MS. never before printed. Also reproduces for the first time with the masque the chief pieces of accompanying music. With introduction, Notes, and bibliographical Appendices.

Leonard L. Mackall in New York Herald Tribune, May 22, 1932: Dr. Cole's introduction and appendices give all the results of a most minute and exhaustive careful study of every physical detail of the 1640 duodecimo and of all the variations in the various texts, and he uses ingenious diagrams and tables to show clearly the precise relationship to each other of all the original leaves (and pages) and those substituted for some of them.

For the following address orders to the Executive Offices

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF CRITICAL ARTHURIAN LITERATURE FOR THE YEARS 1922-1929

By JOHN J. PAREY

Published 1931 (iii+59 pp.). Price $7.50.

Edited for the Arthurian Group of the Modern Language Association. Contains 686 items arranged by authors, with ref. to reviews and book notes of them, and a subject index.

GENERAL SERIES

(Books recommended by the Committee on Research Activities with approval of the Executive Council. Published under aid from a grant made by the American Council of Learned Societies.)

THE SUBLIME: A STUDY OF CRITICAL THEORIES IN XVIII- CENTURY ENGLAND

By SAMUEL HOLT MONK

Published September, 1935 (vii+ 75 pp.). Price $2.50.

The chief English theories of the sublime between 1674 and 1800, with particular reference to changing tastes. Concepts of sublimity are shown to have been focal points for ideas and emotions that were inimical to neo-classic standards and that became dominant among romantic poets and critics. Later chapters were devoted to (1) critical theories of painting and (2) emergence of a taste for terror evoked by grandeur in external nature.

Rotographs of Manuscripts and Rare Printed Books

The following additions have been made to the Short Title List, published in the Supplement of Volume XLIX of the PMLA.

Users of our rotographs are requested by the Library of Congress to send to the European library of origin a copy of anything which they have printed from or concerning them, marked "material from or concerning MS.—."

Forms to be filled out by those who desire to make requests or suggestions for the procuring of new rotographs, may be obtained by applying to the chairman of the Committee on Selection, Professor Norman L. Torrey, Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pa.

301. Brit. Mus., 8008 a. 4: Andres Davila y Heredia, Tienda de anteojos politicos, Valencia, 1673 (119 sheets)
302. Vienna, Nazionalbibl., MS. Cod. lat. 9970: Boccalini, Ragguagli di Parnaso, in Span. trans. (122 sheets)
303. Vienna, Nazionalbibl., MS. Cod. lat. 10514: Boccalini, Pietra del Paragone Politico, in Span. trans. (202 sheets)
304. London, Univ. Coll. Lib., MS. Germ. 12: A middle high German translation of the Benedictine Rule of the 14th century, fols. 1-104 (98 sheets)
305. Milan, Bibl. Ambrosiana, MS. H. I. inf. 5: Tasso, Aminta, fols. 212-258. (94 sheets)
306. Brit. Mus., MS. Royal 19. c. ii: Frère Lorens, La Somme des Vices et des Vertus, fols. 1-107. (107 sheets)
307. Cambridge, University Lib. MS. Gg. IV. 27: Chaucer, ABC, Lenvoy de Chaucer à Scogan, Truth, Troilus and Cresside, and three other poems, fols. 5-026 (115 sheets)
308. Oxford, Bodleian, MS. Eng. Poet. d. 9: William Forrest, The Notable History of the Most Chaiste Innocent Ioseph, fols. 4-158. (155 sheets)
309. A. Cambridge Univ. Lib., MS. Dd. X, 30: Robert Davenport, Survey of the Sciences (25 sheets)
B. Welbeck Abbey Lib., Duke of Portland MS. Robert Davenport, A Valient Martyr. (9 sheets)
310. London, College of Arms, MS. Arundel XXII: Seege of Troye, O.E. trans. of Geoffrey of Monmouth's History by "Maister Gnaor"; fols. 1-82 (82 sheets)
311. Florence, Bibl. Laurenziana, MS. Dom. ed. Acquisti 325. Boccaccio, Treccide, fols. 1-141, 2 vol. (282 sheets)
312. Brit. Mus., Sloane MS. 2499: Juliana of Norwich, Revelations of Divine Love, fols. 1-57 (57 sheets)
313. Brussels, Bibl. Royale, MS. fr. 14864-65: Chroniques de Nicaise Ladam, 4 vol., fols. 1-383 (762 sheets)
314. Cambridge, Trinity Coll., MS. 0.9.34: Thomas, or Eustache, of Kent, Le Roman de toute Chevalerie (45 sheets)
315. Paris, Bibl. Nat., MS. ang. 40: Juliana of Norwich, Revelations of Divine Love, fols. 1-174. (174 sheets)
316. Brit. Mus., MS. Add. 37790. Juliana of Norwich, Revelations of Divine Love (and various Eng. trans. of theological works), fols. 1-237. (119 sheets)
317. Suffolk, Helmingham Hall, Tollemache MS.: John Trevisa, trans. of Bartholomaeus Anglicus, De Proprietatibus Rerum, fols. 9-340. (664 sheets) 2 vol.
318. Paris, Bibl. Nat.: Rondeaux au nombre de troys cent cinquante, Paris, 1527(?), 114 pp. (57 sheets)
319. Paris, Bibl. Nat., MS. Nouv. Acq. fr. 6368: Jean du Pin, Roman de Mandevie, 240 pp. (240 sheets) 2 vols.
320. Brit. Mus., Sloane MS. 3705: Juliana of Norwich, Revelations of Divine Love, fols. 1-142. (142 sheets)
321. Moritzburg, Schlossbibl., MS. Quart 117: Rondeaux d'Amour, fols. 1-136. (271 sheets)
422. Paris, Bibl. de l'Arsenal: Charles Sorel, Cleagenor et Doristée, s.l., 1621. (232 sheets)
323. Paris, Bibl. de l'Arsenal, MS. fr. 3167 (ancien 306), fols. 1-41. Mapemonde (mistitled for Image du Monde.) 41 sheets.
324. Paris, Bibl. Nat., MS. anc. fonds fr. 1110, entire. Brunetto Latini, Li Livres dou Tresor. 307 sheets.
325. Brit. Mus., MS. Cotton Nero C. IX, fols. 195-228. John of Hoveden, Philomela and other poems. 33 sheets.

326. Paris, Bibl de l'Arsenal, MS. fr. 5069 (ancien 19), entire. Chrestien Legouais de Sainte-More, Métamorphoses d'Ovide Moralisées. 490 sheets.
327. Paris, Bibl. Nat., MS. fr. 791, fols. 119-166. Jacques de Longuyon, Les Vœux dou Paon. 49 sheets.
328. Paris, Bibl. Nat., MS. fr. 24365, fols. 137-187. Jacques de Longuyon, Les Vœux du paon 52 sheets.

Under the extension of our rotograph service to other constituent societies of the American Council of Learned Societies 12 items have been added. Those presumably of interest to members of the Association are:

Add. 1. Gilbert de Thornton, Summa London, Lincoln's Inn Lib., MS. Hale 135.

Add. 5. St. Jerome, Lives of the Hermit Saints 2 vol.

Paris, Bibl Nat, MSS. lat 12596, nouv acq lat 2178	vol.	1.
Rome, Bibl Vallicellan, MSS Tomes 22, 17	vol.	1.
Milan, Bibl. Ambrosiana, MSS lat D 525, I 61	vol.	2.
Monte Cassina Lib., MS lat 463	vol.	2.
Florence, Med Laur Plut, 19 Cod lat. 16	vol.	2.

Add 6. St. Jerome, Malcus, Hilarion

Paris, Bibl. Nat., MSS gr. 1605, 1598, 1514, 1501A, 1540.

Add 7. Reginald of Canterbury, Poems

Oxford, Bodleian Lib, MSS Laud Misc. 40, 500; MS. Digby 65

Oxford, Merton Coll, MS. 241.

Brit Mus.. MS. Cotton Vesp E. III.

Munich, Bayerische Staatsbibl, MS. 18580

Add. 9 Geoffrey of Monmouth, 8 vol.

Cambridge, Corpus Christi, MS 292

vol. 1.

Cambridge, Trinity Coll, MSS 770, 744.

vols 2-3

Cambridge, Univ. Lib., MSS. 1814, 2096

vols 4-5.

Oxford, Bodleian Lib, Rawl. MS. B 168

vol. 6.

Aberystwyth, Nat. Lib, MSS. Peniarth 42, 43

vols. 7-8.

(Vol 1 contains also Historia Turpin Remensis)

Add 11. Thomas Watson Sophoclis Antigone, London, 1581; Amyntas, London, 1585.

British Museum, printed books

Add. 12. Peter of Poitiers, Allegoriae. 3 vol.

Cambridge, Pembroke Coll., MS. 96

vol 1.

Trier, Seminarbibl, MS. 90

vol. 2.

Paris, Bibl Mazarine, MS 1005.

vol. 3.

PMLA INDEX VOLS. I-L

An index to Volumes I-L of the PMLA is being prepared, totally superseding that of Volumes I-XXXIII. The copy has been assembled and publication provided for prior to the academic year of 1936-1937. The final price has not yet been determined, but advance subscriptions by members will be received by the Treasurer at $2.50. Subscribers to the former index may claim a reduction of 20 per cent.

PROVISIONAL TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. Printed papers:

1. Titles of Articles and Addresses, and references to discussions, with subject entries for literary and linguistic topics . . . . .	000
2. Lists of Texts and Documents . . . . .	000
3. Words treated, classified by languages . . . . .	111
4. Educational topics: subject entries . . . . .	222
5. Illustrations . . . . .	333
6. Contributors . . . . .	444

II. Papers read before the Association but not printed in PMLA:

1. Papers reported in extended abstracts (Vols. I-XXXIII) . . . . .	555
2. Papers read before the Association (Vols. XXXIV-L) . . . . .	666
3. Lists of Papers read by title . . . . .	888
(For titles of papers read before the Central Division, the Departmental Sections, and Discussion Groups, see references under Proceedings.)

III. Proceedings, Acts of the Council, and miscellaneous . . . . . 999

Criticism of this Table of Contents, if received prior to May 1, will be welcomed by the Editor. Important points still to be determined are the following:

- I. 5. This is confined to inserts. Is a classified list of diagrams and tables desirable?
- I. 6. Is it sufficient to supply here the references, or should the titles in I 1 be repeated?
- II. The Proceedings record where a small percentage of these papers were printed. Should this incomplete information be printed in the Index?
- II. Should a list of authors of these papers be supplied? If so, should it cover papers read before (1) the Central Division? (2) The Departmental Sections? (3) Discussion Groups? (4) Papers read by title?
- II. 3. Is it sufficient to supply references to pages of the Proceedings where lists of Papers Read by Title are printed, or should these titles appear in the Index?

INDEX STAFF OF SPECIALISTS

General Topics
Æsthetic	Profs. Carl E. W. Dahlström and C. N. Wenger	Univ. of Michigan
Educational	Prof. M. H. Nicolson	Smith College
Linguistic	Prof. J. W. Spargo	Northwestern Univ.
Metric	Prof. W. L. Schramm	Univ. of Iowa
Texts and Docu- ments	Prof. Carl Selmer	Hunter College
Foreign Languages
French -1800	Dr. H. H. Shapiro and Ferdinand Engel	Johns Hopkins Univ.
French 1800-	Mr. Bernard Weinberg	Univ. of Chicago
Germanic -1700	Mr. J. R. Beck	Univ. of Chicago
Germanic 1700-	Dr. C. O. Colditz	Wayne Univ. (Mich.)
Italian	Prof. Hilda Norman	Univ. of Chicago
Spanish	Prof. E. H. Hespelt	New York Univ.
English
Old English	Prof. A. H. Marckwardt	Univ. of Michigan
Middle English	Prof. W. P. Cumming	Davidson College
Ballads	Dr. Roy Lamson, Jr.	Harvard Univ.
Chaucer	Dr. James A. Work	Northwestern Univ.
Drama	Miss Mary H. Marshall	Colby College
Gawain and Pearl	.
Poet	Prof. Henry L. Savage	Princeton Univ.
Romances	Mr. Samuel K. Workman	Princeton Univ.
English 1500-1660	Prof. Leicester Bradner	Brown Univ.
Elizabethan Drama	Prof. R. B. Sharpe	Univ. of North Car.
Spenser	Prof. Raymond Jenkins	Catawba College
Shakespeare	Dr. C. A. Greer, 510 Atlanta St.	Austin, Texas
Milton	Prof. Harris Fletcher	Univ. of Illinois
Drama 1660-	Dr. W. W. Watt	Lafayette College
English 1660-1798 (and the Novel)	Prof. W. H. Rogers	Western Reserve Univ.
English 1798-Vic- toria	Prof. N. P. Stallknecht	Bowdoin College
Victorian and later American	Prof. W. D. Templeman Prof. Oscar Cargill	Univ. of Illinois New York Univ.

MODERN LANGUAGE ASSOCIATION BOOKS

(Published in 1936)

A discount of 10 per cent from the list price will be allowed to libraries on any of the books in these Series, and 33½ per cent to members of the Association on any of the Monographs

REVOLVING FUND SERIES

VI. TOPOGRAPHICAL POETRY IN XVIII-CENTURY ENGLAND. By Robert Arnold Aubin (xii+419 pp.). Price $3.50.

A study of poetry descriptive of real and definitely named places. Although attention is centered on eighteenth-century England, the classical, medieval, and Renaissance background and the development into modern place-poetry are also briefly described. There is reference to didactic in descriptive poetry and to eighteenth-century views concerning those types. Nearly a hundred pages are devoted to lists of English topographical poems published between 1640 and 1840.

GENERAL SERIES

VOLKSSPRACHE UND WORTSCHATZ DES BADISCHEN FRANKENLANDES, DARGESTELLT AUF GRUND DER MUNDART VON OBERSCHEFFLENZ. By Edwin Carl Roedder (vi+568 pp.). Price $5.00. [Now in proof.]

This book, of the Marburg school, combines the various aspects of research into regional and local utterance—sounds, forms, syntax, style, vocabulary, historical development, geographical influences—on the basis of a specific rural dialect. Its rich collection of texts, vocabulary, and phonetic transcriptions covers this dialect, with which thirteen other dialects are compared. It provides a pattern for dialect research.

THE MODERN LANGUAGE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA:
100 Washington Square East, New York, N.Y.

Please send me the books indicated by check marks:

- ☐ PMLA Index, Vols. I-L. Advance subscription, $2.50.
☐ R. A. Aubin, Topographical Poetry in XVII-Century England Price $3 50.
☐ E. C. Roedder, Volkssprache und Wortschatz des badischen Frankenlandes, dargestellt auf Grund der Mundart von Oberschefflenz. Price, $5.00.

Name . . . . .
Address . . . . .

DEPARTMENTAL MEETINGS, 1935

The Departmental Section Meetings will be held at Cincinnati on Tuesday, December 31, _____, presided over by the following respective officers

English Section: Chairman, Raymond D. Havens, The Johns Hopkins Univ.; Secretary, Franklin B. Snyder, Northwestern Univ.

Romance Section: Chairman, Hugo Thieme, Univ. of Michigan; Secretary, F. C. Tarr, Princeton Univ.

Germanic Section: Chairman, Bert J. Vos, Indiana Univ.; Secretary, Harold S. Jantz, Clark Univ.

PERCY W. LONG, Secretary

DISCUSSION GROUP MEETINGS, 1935

Officers of the Groups will please send to the Chairman of the Program Committee any corrections or any request for change in the schedule.

---

General Topics I, Poetic Form and General Aesthetics. Chairman, A. E. Zucker, Univ. of Maryland; Secretary, O. J. Campbell, Univ. of Michigan.

Comparative Literature IV, The Renaissance. Chairman, J. C. Lyons, Univ. of North Carolina; Secretary, Marcus S. Goldman, Univ. of Illinois.

English II, Middle English Language and Literature. Chairman, Archibald A. Hill, Univ. of Virginia; Secretary, Henning Larsen, Univ. of Iowa.

English VIII, Literary Tendencies during the Second Half of the XVIIIth Century. Chairman, Frederick Heidbrink, Northwestern Univ.; Secretary, Margery Bailey, Stanford Univ.

American Literature (Discussion Session). Chairman, Howard M. Jones, Univ. of Michigan; Secretary, Sculley Bradley, Univ. of Pennsylvania.

French I, Mediæval Literature and Linguistics. Chairman, Raphael Levy, Univ. of Baltimore; Secretary, Robert W. Linker, Univ. of North Carolina.

German II, Early New High German Language and Literature. Chairman, Philip M. Palmer, Univ. of Cincinnati; Secretary, Otto Springer, Wheaton College.

Slavonic I, Slavonic Language and Literature. Chairman, Clarence A. Manning, Columbia Univ.

---

General Topics II, Critical Study of Romanticism. Chairman, Alice D. Snyder, Vassar College; Secretary, Ernst Wilhelm Jockers, Univ. of Pennsylvania.

Comparative Literature V, Anglo-French Literary Relations. Chairman, Ira Wade, Princeton Univ.; Secretary, Edward D. Seeber, The Johns Hopkins Univ.

Comparative Literature VI, Anglo-German Literary Relations. Chairman, Walter A. Reichart, Univ. of Michigan; Secretary, Willis A. Chamberlin, Denison Univ.

English I, Old English. Chairman, Claude M. Lotspeich, Univ. of Cincinnati; Secretary, Stanley Rypins, Brooklyn College.

English VII, Philosophy and Literature of the Classical Period. Chairman, A. W. Secord, Univ. of Illinois; Secretary, Richmond P. Bond, Univ. of North Carolina.

English X, Victorian Literature. Chairman, Howard Mumford Jones, Univ. of Michigan; Secretary, William D. Templeman, Univ. of Illinois.

French III, French Literature of the XVIth and XVIIth Centuries. Chairman, C. D. Zdanowicz, Univ. of Wisconsin; Secretary, Josephine de Boer, Ferry Hall, Lake Forest, Ill.

Spanish I, Spanish Language and Mediæval Literature. Chairman, A. R. Nykl, Univ. of Chicago; Secretary, R. S. Boggs, Univ. of North Carolina.

German I, Historical Grammar. Chairman, Henry W. Nordmeyer, New York Univ.; Secretary, A. J. Friedrich Ziegelschmid, Northwestern Univ.

---

General Topics IV, Practical Phonetics.

English V, Shakespeare. Chairman, Alwin Thaler, Univ. of Tennessee; Secretary, Rupert Taylor, Clemson College.

English VI, The Seventeenth Century. Chairman, R. F. Jones, Washington Univ.; Secretary, W. Haller, Columbia Univ.

English XI, Contemporary Literature. Chairman, Bennett Weaver, Univ. of Michigan; Secretary, Homer E. Woodbridge, Wesleyan Univ.

French VI, French Literature of the XIXth and XXth Centuries. Chairman, Albert Schinz, Univ. of Pennsylvania; Secretary, Hélène Harvitt, Brooklyn College.
Spanish II, Spanish Literature of the Renaissance and Golden Age. Chairman, Claude E. Anibal, Ohio State Univ.; Secretary, E. H. Hespelt, New York Univ.
German IV, German Literature of the XIXth Century. Chairman, John C. Blankenagel, Wesleyan Univ.; Secretary, Mimi Jehle, Univ. of Illinois.
Scandinavian I, Scandinavian Language and Literature. Chairman, Jess H. Jackson, William and Mary College.
Celtic Languages and Literatures. Chairman, F. N. Robinson, Harvard Univ.; Secretary, Roland M. Smith, Wesleyan Univ.

---

General Topics V, Experimental Phonetics. Chairman, S. N. Treviño, Univ. of Chicago; Secretary, Jeanne Vidon-Varney, Barnard College.
Comparative Literature I, Prose Fiction. Chairman, Alpheus Smith, Northwestern Univ.; Secretary, Gerard E. Jensen, Connecticut College.
Comparative Literature II, Popular Literature. Chairman, Ralph S. Boggs, Univ. of North Carolina; Secretary, Edwin C. Kirkland, Univ. of Tennessee.
English III, Chaucer. Chairman, William F. Bryan, Northwestern Univ.; Secretary, Hope Emily Allen, Ann Arbor, Mich.
English IV, The Period of Spenser. Chairman, C. Bowie Millican, New York Univ.; Secretary, Raymond Jenkins, Catawba College.
French V, French Literature of the XVIIIth Century. Chairman, Edith Philips, Swarthmore College; Secretary, Frank J. Crowley, Univ. of California at Los Angeles.
Spanish III, Modern Spanish and Spanish-American Literature. Chairman, N. B. Adams, Univ. of North Carolina; Secretary, J. R. Spell, Univ. of Texas.
German V, Modern German Literature. Chairman, Otto Heller, Washington Univ.; Secretary, Walter Wadeuhl, West Virginia Univ.

---

Comparative Literature III, Arthurian Romances. Chairman, Roland M. Smith, Wesleyan Univ.; Secretary, J. J. Parry, Univ. of Illinois.
English IX, Wordsworth and His Contemporaries. Chairman, Walter J. Graham, Univ. of Illinois; Secretary, Floyd Stovall, North Texas State Teachers College.
English XIII, Present-Day English. Chairman, Atcheson L. Hench, Univ. of Virginia; Secretary, Albert H. Marckwardt, Univ. of Michigan.
English XIV, English Drama. Chairman, T. M. Parrott, Princeton Univ.; Secretary, William S. Clark, Univ. of Cincinnati.
American Literature (Research Session).
Italian II, Italian Literature. Chairman, W. L. Bullock, Univ. of Chicago; Secretary, Michele De Filippis, Univ. of California.
German III, Goethe. Chairman, Ernst Feise, The Johns Hopkins Univ.; Secretary, John Paul von Gruening, Univ. of Wisconsin.
Belgian Languages and Literatures. Chairman, G. L. van Roosbroeck, Columbia Univ.; Secretary, Rose-Marie Daele, Hunter College.

ERNST FEISE, The Johns Hopkins University
Chairman of the Program Committee

PMLA

PUBLICATIONS OF
THE MODERN LANGUAGE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA

Issued Quarterly

---

VOLUME L

MARCH, 1935

NUMBER I

---

I

THE CONCEPTION OF A CALLING IN THE GERMAN LITERATURE OF THE MIDDLE AGES

IT is not a matter of mere chance that the conception of a "calling" or "profession" is meeting with special interest in Germany. Several books have been written on the subject, some with the intention of showing that a better understanding of the idea of a "calling" would contribute considerably toward the building up of a new and improved social order. While thus practical and political interests are debating the problem, an attempt to reach the root of the question has been made by the German sociologist, Max Weber, who in his work Protestant Ethics and the Spirit of Capitalism,<sup>1</sup> undertook to answer the question, Why does Protestantism seem to be particularly congenial to the capitalistic type of civilization? According to him, it is the conception of a "calling" as a God-given task, developed by Luther and incorporated into Calvin's religious system, which is responsible for this fact. The word Beruf, English "calling," itself in its present meaning, originated, he asserts, in Luther's translation of the Bible, and from that source it spread throughout the Germanic world.

The definitions given by the sociologist, the economist, the philosopher or the theologian agree in only one respect, namely, that "calling" is something different from mere occupation or work. Most existing definitions contain also one or more of the following three factors: first, that calling involves a regular economic occupation; second, that it must be directed toward the welfare of society; and, finally, that it is based on some sort of urge outside of mere material considerations, such as natural inclination, personal satisfaction in the chosen occupation, or the will of God. While the first and second are found in about the same form in almost all definitions, the last one, the inner urge, varies considerably, or is even left out.

<sup>1</sup> Max Weber, Protestant Ethics and the Spirit of Capitalism, translated by T. Parsons (New York, 1930); German edition: "Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus," Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie (Tübingen, 1922).

Different historic periods and different social philosophies have also developed their own conceptions of a "calling," especially according to their interpretation of the last-mentioned constituent elements. It has even been asserted that the conception of a calling, as evolved by a certain age, can be made the touchstone of the civilization of that age.<sup>2</sup> A few examples may serve to show how far this is true.

In Greek and Roman antiquity the conception was not strongly developed.<sup>3</sup> The foundation of the conception as we know it now was laid by the new faith which grew out of Judaism and antiquity. The early Christians felt themselves called by God to the realization of the promised Kingdom of God. They formed a community in which each one, irrespective of his worldly occupation, had his share in contributing to the realization of God's Kingdom on earth. Although the Gospel did not aim at a social revolution or the propagation of some particular social theory, the new spirit which it preached brought with it a new appreciation of man; it ennobled him by tearing down the bars of class and caste, since before God all men are free and equal. Eventually, this attitude necessarily also had an ennobling effect on man's occupation. With the passing of time, after generations of early Christians, no longer did the individual feel himself personally called to become a Christian, he was now born into the faith, and he expected the Kingdom of God to be realized not here on earth but in heaven. The "calling" shifted from the individual to the Church as a whole, which now became the institution responsible for leading its members on to God. With this progressive extension of Christianity and its eventual participation in temporal affairs, worldly work gradually became of more importance to the later Christians. The Middle Ages took over these two tendencies and combined them with indigenous elements into a new system. It is this system, especially its standard form evolved during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, which constitutes the basis of the present article.

The dominant note of the Middle Ages is universalism. The "State of God," as conceived at that time, permeated all creation and connected earth with heaven. The whole universe was regarded as an organic unity, reaching from the lowest form of matter through humanity to the supernatural world, and on up to God, who was at once the culmination and the final goal of the universe. The connecting link between the earthly and the heavenly world was the Church, established by Christ as mediator between Christian humanity and heaven. It was the whole and only purpose of mankind, as organized in the Church, to lead all the universe back to God from whom it had emanated. Life as a whole had but this one purpose, and therefore, it was directed in all its reaches—political, social, economic, intellectual—towards the achievement of this supreme aim. This central idea gradually permeated or transformed all aspects of mediæval civilization, until they fitted into the conception of the organic unity, of the God-State, the Civitas Dei.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Karl Dunkmann, Die Lehre vom Beruf (Berlin, 1922), p. 17 ff.

<sup>3</sup> Work in general was scorned as fit only for slaves and as unworthy of a free citizen, who could occupy himself solely with affairs of government, war, or the arts. The slave naturally could not feel himself "called" into his forced labor. Neither was a strong community spirit possible on that basis, and thus another element of the definition as stated above was missing. Cf. Cicero, De officiis, I, 42, 110.

Considering now the mediæval doctrine of society, we notice that it had its prototype in the social organization of the mediæval city, but that it broadened the principles found there, and applied them to human society as a whole. There were, of course, strong tendencies prevalent in the earlier centuries for a division of mankind, not on the basis of work and usefulness to society, but on that of possession and power, a stratification which easily might have led to a permanent differentiation into master and slave, possessor and possessed. But these tendencies were halted when the mediæval city was accepted as a model for the social structure in the God-State. In the city, where one group is dependent on the other, and all have to coöperate with each other, Thomas Aquinas saw the pattern of Christian society.<sup>5</sup> Here the idea of the Amt, the office which each one has to perform for the advancement not only of himself but of the common good, is evolved; work and the income connected with it are given to him as a sort of fief or trust by the community. Division of labor was recognized by Thomas as the basis of social organization in general, since nature has made man able to perform only a limited task in life. Every man is needed by human society for his work, but he, too, needs his fellowmen for the services they can render to him. All useful activities are ordained by God, and therefore equally acceptable to Him, for no God-willed work can be base, and each kind of service is a valuable function, although the various services are not of equal importance to society, and therefore not equally remunerated. Only by fulfilling the obligations connected with the "office," in addition to a generally virtuous life, can man attain the supreme goal, which consists in his union with God.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Wilhelm Dilthey, Weltanschauung und Analyse des Menschen seit der Renaissance und Reformation, Leipzig und Berlin, 1914.—Karl Dunkmann, Die Lehre vom Beruf, Berlin, 1922.—W. Endemann, Die nationalökonomischen Grundsätze der canonistischen Lehre, Jena, 1863.—Max Maurenbrecher, Thomas von Aquino's Stellung zum Wirtschaftsleben seiner Zeit, Leipzig, 1898.—Otto Gierke, Das deutsche Genossenschaftsrecht, 3. Bd. (Berlin, 1881), part of which in English translation: Political Theories of the Middle Ages, translated by F. W. Maitland, Cambridge, 1900.—Ernst Troeltsch, "Die Bedeutung des Protestantismus für die Entstehung der modernen Welt," Historische Zeitschrift, Bd. 97 (München und Berlin, 1906), Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen, Gesammelte Schriften, 3. Aufl., Tübingen, 1923, English translation: The Social teachings of the Christian Churches, translated by Olive Wyon, 2 vols., London and New York, 1931.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. especially Maurenbrecher, Thomas von Aquino's Stellung, pp. 38 ff.

The facts outlined thus far have been known and established by previous investigations. Turning now to the analysis of the conception of a "calling," which prevailed at that time, we have to proceed along new roads. In the few existing accounts of the historical development of that conception, the authors have generally confined themselves to a discussion of its evidences in the writings of mediæval philosophers, and perhaps in the guild system. From here they pass directly to Luther and his contribution, either contrasting the two results, or trying to prove that these are essentially the same. They seem to have ignored the fact that even the Middle Ages were not static, but perpetually changing.

The following account attempts to fill in the gap by tracing the historical evolution of the conception of "calling" between the twelfth and the sixteenth centuries. Its conclusions are founded on an investigation of the German vernacular writings of the period. For this purpose it seems appropriate to combine the various components of mediæval Weltanschauung into a single picture, a metaphor, describing life in terms which not only the learned scholar, but also the peasant and the craftsman of the Middle Ages could understand. We then can imagine mediæval life as a pilgrimage toward the other world, a procession in which all humanity took part, and which had its final goal in God. Life on earth was considered as but a preparation for the everlasting happiness of the future life. Whatever helped toward the progress of the pilgrimage, toward the realization of the transcendental goal, was good and valuable; whatever hindered it was harmful and wrong.

With this symbol of wandering humanity in mind, the social and economic views of the Middle Ages become clear: society is organized in such a way as to facilitate progress in the desired direction. On the economic side it follows that earthly possessions are not wrong in themselves, but that they are to be subordinated to the needs of a migrating community; when they become too plentiful, they are a cumbersome burden rather than an asset to the individual; when they distract him from the real goal of life, they are a grave danger. Whatever he has, and whatever he does, should be an aid to the progress of the march.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>6</sup> This point of view is well illustrated in the following passage by the preacher David

The division of humanity into social groups was also to serve the same end. Leadership rested with the Church and its clergy who were to point the right way to God. Monasticism was to represent the way to God in its purest form, while other members of society often had to compromise with their own human weakness and with the facts of the surrounding world. The monk was supposed, however, to walk the narrower and steeper path not exclusively for his own benefit, but for the good of Christian society as a whole. The laity naturally also had their assigned duties, all of which were to serve the common purpose; knights and wordly lords protected the winding processions from the dangers of this world, they saw to it that peace and justice were maintained, and for their dangerous "office" they were here on earth compensated by a greater degree of power and wealth. In the same way, peasant and burgher had his important social task to perform, feeding and equipping the others. If, in the common pilgrimage of humanity to God, each pilgrim did his duty in his own "office," he would reach the final goal together with his fellowmen.

While from this picture the great importance of work in one's place in life is evident, it remains to be shown in what respect the vocational activity of the individual may be termed a "calling." For this purpose we have to answer the questions, What is the distributing factor in the mediæval system of distribution of labor? What or who is it that "calls" man into the place he occupies, into the "office" which he performs? Furthermore, in which way does this "call" reach man, and how does it affect him?

The answer to these questions is found in many of the literary works of the period under discussion. The problem received its most exhaustive and careful treatment, however, in the sermons of the greatest preacher of the thirteenth century, Berthold of Regensburg, who died in 1272.<sup>7</sup> According to him and to his fellow-writers, it is organized Christianity of Ausburg: "Wir sin uf dem wege des himelriches unde warten alle zit, wenne des weges ein ende si. Swer sich aber uf kurzen wec mit vil getreides ladet, der wirt e müede, e er den wec vol ge, unde muoz vil lichte under wegen beliben. Also wil du, daz din volgaere rincvertig sin uf dem wege und mit irdischen dingen niht überladen sin. Habent sie iht ze tragen, daz teilen mit ir geverten, die niht haben; so ist ir bürde ringer und sint sie selbe sneller unde koment deste vroelicher ze abende an die himelische herberge. . . ." Deutsche Mystiker des vierzehnten Jahrhunderts, edited by Franz Pfeiffer (Leipzig, 1845), I, 344, 25.

---

<sup>7</sup> Berthold von Regensburg, Vollständige Ausgabe seiner Predigten, 2 vols., edited by Franz Pfeiffer and Josef Strobl, Wien, 1862; Die Predigten des Franziskaners Berthold von Regensburg, 4th ed., edited by Franz Gobel, Regensburg, 1906. It may be noted here that Berthold was a contemporary of Thomas Aquinas, and died two years before the latter. The correspondence in the views of both men shows how generally and widely the views discussed here were held during the middle ages.

as a whole which is called by and to God. To be able to follow this call, to attain salvation, God's grace is essential. Yet God does not offer His grace to the individual directly, but to humanity at large through the Church as His representative on earth and as the embodiment of His "calling" to mankind. Similarly, He does not place each man in his office by direct commission or mandate, but gives him at birth the natural ability for a certain occupation, or creates him a member of a certain social group. At the same time, God endows man with free will; He does not, as a rule, interfere with the individual during his lifetime, but, having endowed him with grace, free will, and his talents, He lets him work out his own salvation. Knowing God's will through the teachings of the Church, and knowing also his social obligations, man should exercise his free will in obeying God's commands and, particularly, in the faithful performance of his vocational duties. In this way he will earn his own place in heaven, since each one is going to be judged according to the use he made of the talents which God gave him. Whatever the office is to which he is assigned,—whether it be that of king, priest, or laborer—only a careful execution of its duties, in connection with a virtuous life, will assure man eternal life in heaven. Passages such as the following occur repeatedly in the writings of Berthold:

Wan unser herre hat eime ieglichen menschen ein amt verlihen, er hat nieman ze müezekeit geschaffen, wir müezen uns alle eteswes underwinden, da mite wir genesen. . . . So hat er den geschaffen daz er babest si; so sol der ein keiser sin oder ein künic oder ein bischof oder ein ritter oder ein grave oder diz oder daz. Unde swelherleie amt du hast, ez si hoch oder nider, von dem muost du gote reiten [Rechenschaft ablegen] . . . <sup>8</sup>

Wan allez daz got ie geschuof daz hat er allez sament ze nutze geschaffen und ist ouch allez sament nütze unde guot. . . . Und ez dienet allez dem almehtigen gote. Der vogel in den luften, der visch in dem wage, die wurme in der erden und alle kreaturen und allez daz got ie geschuof daz dienet allez gote, ane der ubele mensche und ander übel engele: die dienen gote niht, wan die tuont im alle tage widerdriez unde leit; . . . Unde dar zuo hat ez allez got geschaffen, daz ez dem menschen nutze si, unde da mite dienet ez gote allez sament, ieglichez in der wise als ez got geschaffen hat. . . . Ez endienet aber niht von rechter liebe und von rechten minnen: ez dienet niwan von nature. . . . <sup>9</sup>

. . . wan der ohse unde der esel müezent den wagen unde den pfluoc ziehen unde den sac tragen, sie tuon es gerne oder ungerne. Also wolte uns unser herre niht twingen unde binden an unser willekur. Er hat uns ze wizzen geben übel unde guot, kalt unde warm, sur unde süeze an unsern fünf sinnen. . . . Sit er uns so genzlichen z'erkennen gegeben hat übel unde guot, so wil er, daz wir unser frien

<sup>8</sup> Pfeiffer, Predigten, II, 13, 36 ff.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid., xxiv, 374, 2 ff.

willekur selber binden zuo den guoten unde zuo den reinen gedenken, unde die unreinen lazen varn. . . .<sup>10</sup>

To the laity, work in one's vocation is, in fact, more important even than praying or going to church, for by serving humanity in his proper way, man serves God just as all creation serves Him.

So sullen dise gerne beten, die gerne fasten; so sullen dise gerne arbeiten mit triuwen unde mit eren, so sullen die got dienen, daz sie guote rihter sin; so sullen die got dienen, daz sie guote lere geben mit predigen unde mit bihte hoeren; so sullen dise guote liute sin. And also solte ein ieglich mensche gote dienen, alse erz geordent hat . . .<sup>11</sup>

Bruoder Berhtolt, nu han ich etewaz anders ze tuonne. Ich mac durchgenden tac niht alle zit gebeten unde zer kirche sin." Des muotet got niht von dir, wan daz du getriuwe unde gewære sist, mit swelher leie amte du umbe gest. Wan ez ist nieman, im habe got ein amt gegeben, da mit er gote dienen sol, einhalb ze dem libe und anderhalb ze der sele. Und swenne du din antwerk lazlichen uebest unde trügenlichen, so hast du der tugende niht unde tuost reht als ein niderlender. Ez si pfaffe oder leie, rihter oder ritter, koufman oder gebure, die sulnt alle ir amt mit triuwen üeben unde mit der warheit. Geistliche liute unde witewen, sie sin in kloestern oder niht, so sulnt sie vil gebeten unde geweinen unde sulnt aller guoten dinge vil durch got üeben an in selben. Des durfent die liute mit der e niht tuon: die mügent lihte gebeten, daz ez got benueget, sint sie eht anders ane toetliche sünde und üebent ir amt getriuwelichen. . . .<sup>12</sup>

But, as we have seen, the rest of the universe serves God by necessity; only man can serve or refuse to serve, according to his own free will. Therefore Berthold rejects predestination.

The same ideas are expressed with some variations by other writers of the thirteenth and the following centuries. A few examples may suffice. In one poem, the devil is speaking of the various vocations:

Got wil gaistlich und weltlich han,
Die wil er die welt lat stan.
Darumb tüg iederman dem sinen recht,
So haist er ain truer gotz knecht.<sup>13</sup>

Also verwüstends dik den segan
Den in got umb ir arbeit welt geben;
Wan selig ist der sich begat sinr hend,
An dem ist wol bewent,
Daz im got daz himelrich wil geben,
Darinn er besitzt daz ewig leben.
So muoz ain müssig genger in der segi [Netz] kleben.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., II, 13, 11 ff.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., XIII, 478, 28 ff.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., XVIII, 255, 18 ff.

<sup>13</sup> Des Teufels Netz, edited by K. A. Barack (Bibl. des Litt. Vereins in Stuttgart, LXX, Stuttgart, 1863), p. 364.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., p. 363.

Recapitulating, it may be said that in this system the conception of a "calling" is based on a pronounced community spirit, the idea of the social organism and of the institutional character of the Church. The principle of free will and of the meritoriousness of good works give the conception its particular quality. Work is recognized and praised, and receives a strong impulse, but only work in the interest of the eternal welfare of the individual and his fellowmen.

Returning now to the picture of life in the Middle Ages as a procession to heaven, it may readily be realized that leadership is one of the essential features. Whole-hearted coöperation of all is required, but leadership is of prime importance. Failure in this was, to a great extent, responsible for the gradual disintegration of the mediæval system. The failure of a large part of the priesthood to live up to their "calling" caused a lack of confidence in their leadership. Literature of that time is full of complaints in this respect, the priests being severely criticized for their failings, since they are responsible for all those souls who trust in their guidance and are misled by them.

Her babest, unde wæret ir hie, ich getorstez iu wol sagen: alle die sele die ir dem almehtigen gote verlieset oder verlorn werdent von iuwern schulden, als verre und irz erwenden soltet unde möhtet, ir müezet sie gote gelten mit iuwerm grozen schaden. . . .<sup>15</sup>

Swaz aller der kristenheit wirret
Und rehten glouben si verirret,
Daz ist der hohen prelaten schult,
Die mit grozer ungedult
Groz dinc wöllen überkumen,
Des lant und liute niht nement frumen.<sup>16</sup>

wenn ich den pfaffen numend gefach,
So lauffend die laigen selb hernach.<sup>17</sup>

This failure of the spiritual leaders of humanity resulted mainly in two conditions. On the one hand, many people lost their faith and interest in the heavenly goal of life, and began to busy themselves more and more with the things of this world, with its beauty and its pleasures. The other group, however, and the one which for our purpose is much more important, inferred from the failure of institutional leadership the necessity for a still more intense search for God, a personal search, not guided by external authority but rather by one's own inner self. In Germany this group is represented chiefly by the mystic writers of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, especially by Eckhart, Tauler, and Seuse. These German mystics accept the teachings of the Church as to the way to God; they believe in the function of the Church as mediator between God and humanity, and in the clergy as the ordained leaders of mankind; but they limit the validity of this doctrine to the mass of the unenlightened and stress the need of direct communication with God for the select.

<sup>15</sup> F. Pfeiffer, Predigten, xxiii, 361 ff.

<sup>16</sup> Der Kenner, von Hugo von Trimberg, edited by Gustav Ehrismann (Bibl. des Litt. Vereins in Stuttgart, ccxlvii, Tübingen, 1903), p. 92. <sup>17</sup> Des Teufels Netz, p. 46.

The main object of the mystic is the reunion of the soul with God in this life, the birth of God in man. According to the mystic doctrine, this state is achieved by turning all one's thoughts toward God and freeing oneself of all that is not God. "Sol got in gan, überein so muoz creature uz gan."<sup>18</sup> This mystic union, however, is not earned by good works, or by any kind of activity.

Die liute endörfen niemer vil gedenken, waz sie teten, sie solten aber gedenken, waz sie weren. Weren nu die liute guot und ir wise, so möhten ir werc sere liuchten. Bist du gereht, so sint ouch diniu werc gereht. Niht gedenke heilikeit ze setzen uf ein tuon: man sol heilikeit setzen uf ein sin. Wan die werc heiligen uns niht, sunder wir sullen diu werc heiligen.<sup>19</sup>

All that man can do, to prepare the way for God's entrance, is to resign his own will, and give himself up entirely to God. Even then the actual union with God depends exclusively on God's will, and it happens only to those whom God has chosen. "Diz engeschicht nieman dan den alleine, die got ewicliche dar zuo erwelt hat, die ir selbes und aller dinge ledic sint. Diz beginnet hie unde wert ewiclichen."<sup>20</sup> If this highest object of the mystic desire is realized, if God is in man's soul, he will hear the voice of God calling in him, and if he follows this inner calling, he is doing the will of God. Then all his doings will become a divine service, and whatever he does will be pleasing to God: "sie habent sich gote lazen ganz unde gar: des ist got sines werkes ungehindert in in."<sup>21</sup> For the rebirth of God in man a state of contemplation is, however, not essential; it may be achieved in any state, in any occupation. The mystic does not despise worldly work; on the contrary, he realizes that the union with God will enhance the value of his works, and will make them more beneficial. "Wanc mit Gotte enmag man niht versumen, und dis werk ist Gotz werk und niht des menschen."<sup>22</sup> Moreover, for the man enlightened by God, even wealth has lost its danger; he can become rich without thereby being distracted from God. "Etliche lute sint als nösselich das in Got die

<sup>18</sup> Meister Eckhart, edited by Franz Pfeiffer (Leipzig, 1857), p. 12.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., p. 546.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., p. 381.

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., p. 477.

<sup>22</sup> Die Predigten Taulers, edited by Ferdinand Vetter (Deutsche Texte des Mittelalters, hsgb. von der Preuss. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Bd. XI, Berlin, 1910), p. 189.

richeit benemen mus. Aber were der mensche gelossen, so enbeneme es im Got nut und neme in der richeit wol zu."<sup>23</sup> The man in whose soul God has been reborn has become, to use a favorite term of mysticism, "God's loom," His instrument, in whom only the will of his divine master is active. "Mag der mensche darzu werden, das er gote si als dem menschen sin hant ist, so lass er im benugen und suche nit furbas."<sup>24</sup>

It is evident from the above that the idea of a "calling" forms a very important element in mystic thought, but also that it differs essentially from Berthold's conception. The mystics represent an aristocratic philosophy, which concerns itself primarily with the individual. They stress the idea of "election"; that is, the selection by God of a limited number in whom neither natural tendencies nor their own free will is active, but only the calling voice of God Himself. Besides, for this selected group they reject good works as a means to achieve the highest form of union with God, reversing in this respect the former doctrine: good works do not bring about the union with God, but this union brings about good works, works pleasing to God and beneficial to humanity. A further characteristic of the mystic conception lies therein that the voice of God is heard in the soul even of the selected one only after the union has been achieved, that it is not granted to him as his birthright, but only after a conscious strife has overcome his naturally free will, and has thereby prepared the way for the unobstructed working of God's will in him. The difference in the two mediæval conceptions of the "calling" thus concerns both the second and the third elements of our former definition, community spirit and outside urge.

The word Ruf, English calling, itself is frequently used by the mystics, and it may be said that they first introduced it into German literature.

wer uns ruffet, das ist der himelsche vater; der rufft uns mit allem dem das er ist, hat und vermag. Das ladet und locket uns . . . das hat er alles dar umbe geton das er uns do mit wider ruffe und lade in unsern ursprung und wider brechte in sich. Und alles ist dis ein luter ruffen zu unserm beginne.<sup>25</sup>

They use it in a meaning in which both the divine urge and the temporal activity of man are in some measure blended, although the religious meaning predominates. It is obvious, however, that the conception evolved by this comparatively small and esoteric group could not have penetrated deep enough into the consciousness of the mass of the people to bring about a general recognition of the new term and its meaning. This was possible only on the basis of a popular movement such as the

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., p. 211.

<sup>24</sup> Theologia deutsch, edited by Franz Pfeiffer, 2nd ed. (Stuttgart, 1855), p. 232.

<sup>25</sup> Die Predigten Taulers, p. 240 ff.

Reformation and through the far-reaching influence of the translation of the Bible by Luther.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century the symbol of humanity marching in procession towards the heavenly goal had faded in the minds of the people. The type of civilization which the central period of the Middle Ages had developed under the dominating influence of the Church, the idea of the Civitas Dei, was disintegrating. It had given the preceding centuries a uniform and unitary view of life by the acceptance of a transcendental purpose of the universe, by offering to the world a definite Weltanschauung, which, in turn, bore the marks of its origin from existing conditions of life. This reciprocity resulted in the essential harmony between the spiritual and the temporal ideals of the time which found literary expression in Wolfram's Parzival. With conditions of life changing under the influence of external forces, such as new contacts with foreign civilizations, growing population, there arose, however, a discrepancy between the old theory and the new practice. This discrepancy brought with it the danger of the transcendental motive being discarded altogether, not because it had been proved to be wrong, but because it had lost grip on life.

In the 14th and 15th centuries the mediæval unity had been practically destroyed. The new individualism had asserted itself in the appearance of many new sects, in the gradual substitution of the general emperor by a number of independent princes, in the strengthening of the vernacular against the predominance of the universal Latin. Instead of with Christianity as a unit, we have to do now with individual Christian nations. Outwardly the great masses still adhered to the old faith, but inwardly many had already broken away from it. The religious thought of the mystics and of other groups could not furnish a new popular ideal for them, and the attempts of the Church for a reformation within itself and the rejuvenation of the old ideals worked too slowly and with insufficient results. Many people therefore gave themselves over merely to enjoyment of life. Pleasure and worldly success threatened to supplant the supermundane aim of humanity as a stimulus for work, which then would be conceived not as a service to the community, but only as a means to gain riches quickly at the expense of others.

With this development in mind, Luther's life work and the Reformation as a whole might be regarded as an effort to check the rising tide of secularization and to preserve the old goal of Christianity, still recognizing it as the sole object of human life. But they tried to adjust it to the new conditions; they did not believe it attainable by the old way, and wished to point a new road to its achievement. In his earlier life Luther himself went through the various stages of mediæval thought.

He became a monk, passed through a period of contempt for the world and for himself, became acquainted with Mysticism and Nominalism, and finally came under the influence of secularizing forces. Mysticism impressed on him its conception of the "calling" and of the immediateness of man's relation to God. But although Luther accepted these doctrines, his intention was not the development of a more or less esoteric sect, but rather the evolution of a new all-embracing system for the guidance of humanity. In his conception of the "calling," Luther retained the social foundation of the mediæval organism, yet he welded it with the mystic idea of the personal calling of man by God instead of a general calling through the Church. According to Luther, it is God Himself who assigns to each man his position on earth and orders him to do the work.<sup>26</sup> But God only places man in his "office"; He is not calling within him constantly and guiding him on his way, as the mystics taught. On the other hand, man's work in the God-ordained position is not put down to his account as a means of earning salvation; it is only to prove his obedience to God's will. By fulfilling the assigned task, man serves God, and incidentally he thereby helps his neighbor. Luther's "calling" differs from that of the mystics in being directed to all men alike, independent of their own attitude and not in the form of a voice calling within the soul, but as a task given to man to prove his obedience.

Combining in this way some of the elements of both previous conceptions, Luther developed his own idea of the "calling," and embodied it in his religious teachings. His translation of the Bible then carried it forth among the mass of the people and preached to them once more the divine basis of man's doings, and the necessity of untiring work at the task to which one is called. For Luther and his contemporaries the symbol of the human procession was no longer valid. They did not conceive of the earth as a valley of tears through which man passes on his way to God, but as the garden which man has to cultivate, into which he is called to live and to glorify God by his work. From a mere thoroughfare the earth to them has become the home and permanent abode of man. Humanity also mirrored itself differently in their eyes. From a compact organism it had changed to a group of individuals not depending directly on each other for their salvation, but bound together solely by the exigencies of social life.

In conclusion a few words may be said about the further development of the conception of the "calling." In Germany, Luther's doctrine and the continuation of the mediæval theories on the problem of the "calling," retained within Catholicism, predominated in the main for the next two centuries. Outside of Germany it was, however, taken up by Calvinism and other religious groups. Calvinistic denominations stressed, more than Luther had done, the idea of predestination. But if some people were chosen, and others were not, the question naturally arose, to which group a certain individual belonged. Calvinism answered this important question by referring to the success of one's activity. If God had chosen the individual, his work would necessarily be good and successful. We have found a somewhat similar idea in the mystic doctrine. By success in his profession, or calling, man did not earn heaven, but proved to himself his predestination for it. A strong premium was thus set on successful work, not for earthly profit, but for religious reasons. Therefore the gains of man's strenuous work were not to be used for his enjoyment, but rather to assure further success, for only thereby could man feel sure of his calling, or selection.

<sup>26</sup> Cf. Karl Eger, Die Anschauungen Luthers vom Beruf. Ein Beitrag zur Ethik Luthers, Giessen, 1900.—K. Dunkmann, Die Lehre vom Beruf.—Max Weber, Die protestantische Ethik.—Ernst Troeltsch, Die Bedeutung des Protestantismus; Soziallehren der chr-Kirchen.

This attitude is found, even to this day, in the religious denominations based on Calvinism. But in general, our time also knows and stresses work in one's "calling" for its intrinsic value and for the sake of results; it emphasizes work primarily for work's sake. These elements in the modern conception of work, although seemingly without relation to religious ideas, still have their roots in the conception of the "calling" developed chiefly by the Reformation. They constitute, Max Weber believed, the main ethical characteristics of modern capitalism.

A. E. SOKOL

Stanford University

II

THE TROUBADOURS OF PEIRE D'ALVERNHE'S SATIRE IN SPAIN

A RECENT study<sup>1</sup> of Peire d'Alvernhe's Chantarai d'aquest trobadors identified one "Guossalbo Roitz" ridiculed by Peire with a certain Spanish nobleman named Gonçalvo Roiz, showed that this man had been in or near Puivert (Aude), where Peire's satire was written, in the summer of 1170, and proposed that the brilliant cortège with which he was travelling had attracted to that spot the troubadours of Peire's satire. Since this group of nobles was going into Aragon escorting Eleanor, the daughter of Henry II of England, to her wedding with Alfonso VIII of Castile, it suggested the possibility that at least some of the troubadours of the satire were attached to the bride's suite.

Were such the case, it would seem reasonable to look in the works of Bernart de Ventadorn, Peire Rogier, Peire d'Alvernhe, Giraut de Bornelh and Raimbaut d'Aurenga—all of whom, according to the hypothesis of Appel and Rajna, may have been present in person at the gathering of troubadours depicted by Peire d'Alvernhe—for some reference to historical events in Aragon in the fall of 1170 or early in the year 1171. This is the problem I shall examine in this study, especially in the works of Raimbaut d'Aurenga and Giraut de Bornelh. Giraut suggests immediately a series of poems already studied by Kolsen.<sup>2</sup> The group contains poems written in Aragon—one is even a tenson with the King of Aragon—all of which Kolsen believes date from the years 1168-69.<sup>3</sup> Let us begin, however, by studying a poem of Raimbaut d'Aurenga (Bartsch, Grundriss, Nr. 389, 33), in which the poet shows an intimate knowledge of conditions at the court of Alfonso II of Aragon.

Raimbaut is in love with a Catalan woman of lowly birth.<sup>4</sup> He speaks also of an intrigue at the court.

E'l reis non a cor d'ufana, a parven ni a semblan;
quar absolre nouia tiran.
Cans enrabiatz lo morda,
reis, qui.us ditz per c'ar n'estancas.
Qu'ieu no.l vos tenc per fize qui.us ho vedes conseillan, c'an vos te trop per enfan.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Mod. Phil., xxxi, 19-34.

<sup>2</sup> Guiraut von Bornelh, der Meister der Trobadors (Berlin, 1894), p. 17 ff.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., pp. 60-63.

<sup>4</sup> Ed. by Appel, Provenzalische Inedita, p. 261, vss. 17 and 41.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid., vss. 25-32.

And the king has not, apparently, a proud heart; for [only] a tyrant rejects his fiancée. King, may a mad dog bite the one who tells you you should stop now in this matter. For I do not hold as faithful to you the one who forbids it to you by his counsel, for rather does he consider you too childish.

This passage makes sense only when we recall that Alfonso II actually did reject his fiancée. He was originally pledged to marry a Byzantine princess, Eudoxia.<sup>6</sup> Before she had reached Aragon he renounced her, taking to wife instead Sancha, the aunt of Alfonso VIII of Castile. Eudoxia had by this time reached Montpellier, where Count William of that city married her. Most histories place the marriage of the King of Aragon to Sancha in 1174, a date which is rejected by Miret y Sans, the most recent and most careful historian of Alfonso II. He finds documents which show that Alfonso and Sancha were already married in 1171.<sup>7</sup>

Raimbaut's poem, with its indignation against those who advise Alfonso II to give up Eudoxia, was certainly written before the king had taken the irrevocable step of marrying Sancha. Furthermore, it seems unlikely that the marriage of Eudoxia to William of Montpellier had yet been proposed, for the latter was Raimbaut's first cousin and had been his guardian during his youth.<sup>8</sup> Had Raimbaut any kindly regard for him, he would have been glad that the treachery of the king had cast such a rich match at his cousin's feet. Consequently, Raimbaut's poem Nr. 33 must be placed earlier than the marriage of Alfonso II to Sancha.

Another passage of this same work reads:

quar tota gens no.n s'accorda,
e non passon pons e plancas;
que non remazes per gel
tro que fos sols guerreian, de qual dir quecx pres'aman. (vss. 20-24)

For all the people do not agree about the matter and they do not cross bridges and foot-bridges [i.e., they do not set out]; for I should not stay back on account of the cold until I were fighting alone [i.e., even if I were left to fight alone], from which speech let each one take advice (?).

These obscure lines must refer to events in Aragon: they occur between the references to the Catalan woman and the treachery of the king. In my opinion, the poet has in mind a military campaign which was given up because of lack of concord among the troops and because of the approach of winter. In the fall of 1170, Alfonso II undertook a campaign against the Moors. One of the king's documents is dated from Fraga, close to Moorish territory, on November 10; but the expedition could not have lasted more than a month, since throughout December the Aragonese court appears in Christian cities away from the limits of Moorish territory.<sup>9</sup> Obviously, the military operations were abandoned at the beginning of the cold season. These historical allusions in Raimbaut d'Aurenga's poem Nr. 33 make the date of its composition fall after the renouncement of the campaign in December, 1170, and before the marriage of Alfonso II to Sancha, sometime in 1171.

<sup>6</sup> Stronski, Le Troubadour Folquet de Marseille, pp. 153-154, and Annales du Midi, xxiii, 491; J. Laurent, Annales du Midi, xxiii, 333.

<sup>7</sup> Miret y Sans, Itinerario de Alfonso I en Cataluña, II en Aragón, in Boletín de la Real Academia de Buenas Letras de Barcelona, II, 260-261.—Stronski, Folquet de Marseille, pp. 153-154, erroneously supports the date 1174, citing Miret y Sans, Bol. de la R. Acad. de B. Letras de Barcelona, III, 278, on which page we read of the marriage of Pedro I in 1204!

<sup>8</sup> Appel, Raimbaut von Orange, p. 9.

At the time Raimbaut is writing he is not in Aragon. He tells us in his poem that he is "entre l Monteill e Gorda" (vs. 44), which I identify with Monteux and Gordes, both in Vaucluse not far from Courthezon, the usual abode of the troubadour. Furthermore, in a document dated January, 1171, Raimbaut pawns some of his lands and it appears that he is either in his own domains or somewhere near them.<sup>10</sup> Are we to conclude that he speaks of conditions in Aragon only on hearsay and that he did not actually visit that realm? If this were so, we should have to explain not only Raimbaut's intimate knowledge of an unimportant military expedition and rumors of the king's abandonment of his fiancée, but also his keen emotional reaction to these circumstances. We must not forget, too, that Raimbaut declares himself to be in love with a Catalan woman. To my mind, the only reasonable explanation of all these facts is to assume that Raimbaut wrote his poem Nr. 33 in Provence, early in 1171, not long after having returned from Aragon.

In my former study of Peire d'Alvernhe's satire, it was shown that statements Peire makes about Raimbaut seem to be ridiculing boastful assertions made by Raimbaut himself in one of his works (Bartsch, 389, 20). This poem Nr. 20 shows Raimbaut taking part in a poetic competition with more than twenty jongleurs. He confidently claims the prize for himself. One is tempted to try to establish some connection between the group of jongleurs with whom Raimbaut competes and the troubadours and jongleurs caricatured by Peire d'Alvernhe. In this same poem Nr. 20, Raimbaut says: "Let the Lord of Talaug know that I am not what I seem . . ."<sup>11</sup> Talaug has been identified with Talau, a hamlet in the department of Pyrénées Orientales,<sup>12</sup> lying but a few miles from the Spanish border. More evidence to show that Raimbaut knew the territory near Aragon and that his supposed trip to that kingdom is plausible.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>9</sup> Miret y Sans, op. cit., II, 268; Zurita, Anales de Aragón, I, 77.

<sup>10</sup> Appel, R.v. Orange, p. 10.

<sup>11</sup> Ed. by Appel, ibid., p. 27, vss. 19-20; also ed. by Crescini, Atti del R. Istituto Veneto, LXXXVI, 1235 ff.

A third poem by the same author (Bartsch, 389, 17) is sent to a lady dwelling in Urgel, across the Pyrenees from Puivert and Talau. The poet is not in that city; but since the legend of the prose biography to the effect that he fell in love with the Countess of Urgel without seeing her is unquestionably a fiction,<sup>14</sup> we must conclude with Appel that the poet knew a lady in Urgel. On the basis of all these links between Raimbaut and Aragon, I am willing to declare without reserve that the troubadour did actually visit that realm.

There remains one important work of Raimbaut d'Aurenga (Bartsch, 389, 7) which we must consider before turning to Giraut de Bornelh's famous Glove-series. I have mentioned that among the poems of Giraut's Glove-cycle there occurs a tenson with King Alfonso II. In this poetical dispute, Giraut asks the king if he believes that a noble lady could love him, her sovereign, as well as she could another man of lesser rank.<sup>15</sup> The king upholds his worth as a lover in a mild fashion, being more amused than offended at Giraut's strange question. At this point, however, Raimbaut enters the argument with a poem in answer to the tenson, upbraiding the other two hotly. "Those in whom love never dwelt are disputing about loving . . ." he begins; then adds, ". . . for I hear something else said, and it does not please me: that a noble lady who deigns to listen to a noble man wishes to ruin her reputation."<sup>16</sup> Appel lists a number of phrases in Raimbaut's work Nr. 7 which are aimed directly at assertions made by Giraut in the tenson. Appel con-

<sup>12</sup> Appel, op. cit., p. 15.

<sup>13</sup> One of the easiest passes of the Pyrenees is the Col de la Perche at Puigcerda, which was the most frequently travelled route into eastern Spain. Cf. L. B. Holland, Traffic Ways about France in the Dark Ages (500-1150), p. 79. From Puivert this pass can be reached by ascending the river Aude and then crossing to the valley of the Tet. Curiously enough, if one takes the earliest route between these two river valleys—the Col de Creu, by which it is six hours' travel on foot from one river to the other—one passes through Talau. Could it be that Raimbaut's poem Nr. 20, with its allusion to the Lord of Talau and its relation to Peire d'Alvernhe's satire, was written at or near Talau, after the performance of the satire at Puivert? In this case Raimbaut would be defending himself against Peire's assertions when he twice says that he is haughty "because of his lady" (vss. 29 and 48).

Moreover, when one crosses the Col de la Perche into Spain, the first important town is Urgel, which is mentioned in works of both Raimbaut and Giraut de Bornelh dating from this same period. Although we cannot be positive, the Col de la Perche seems to be the route of the troubadours and the wedding party.

<sup>14</sup> Appel, op. cit., p. 14.

<sup>15</sup> Ed. by Kolsen, Sämtliche Lieder des Troubadors Giraut de Bornelh, Nr. 59, vss. 1-8.

<sup>16</sup> Appel, op. cit., p. 17.

cludes, "Dann aber dürfen wir beide Dichtungen der gleichen Zeit und Gelegenheit zuschreiben. . . ."<sup>17</sup> We shall soon see that Giraut de Bornelh's tenson with Alfonso II must have been composed between about 1167 and 1173. It was certainly composed in Aragon. If, as Appel says, Raimbaut's vehement reply is "to be ascribed to the same time and occasion," both works must fall during Raimbaut's trip into the domains of Alfonso II in the latter part of the year 1170. Appel's opinion is supported largely by the tone of Raimbaut's work, but to my mind, this evidence is significant. There is a great spontaneity and a keen indignation visible in the composition, which would certainly not be so evident were Raimbaut far removed from the young disputants at whom he wishes to strike.

Turning now to the works of Giraut de Bornelh, we find at this period a cycle of poems bound together by certain common themes. One such motif is the series of allusions to a glove, given to him as a love-token by his lady, Mo Senher or Bel Senher. Unfortunately the poet lost the glove and with it his lady's affection. He was condemned by her to a wandering life, journeying first to Provence and afterwards to Spain.

Several of the poems of the Glove-cycle are roughly dated by their author. Twice he tells us that the loss took place "last year";<sup>18</sup> in a poem written in Spain it is "more than a year" since the misfortune befell him;<sup>19</sup> finally, in one of the last works of the series, from which we learn that Mo Senher has called him back to her from Spain, we also hear that he has been suffering her displeasure for three years.<sup>20</sup> So the whole adventure of the glove covers a period of three years, and Giraut went to Spain during the second year.<sup>21</sup> The whole series can be limited in time to a period from 1166 to 1173. The lower date is set by the fact that Raimbaut d'Aurenga (dec. 1173) and another friend of Giraut de Bornelh called Mo Joi or Joios, who died not long before Raimbaut,<sup>22</sup> are mentioned in works from all periods of the cycle.<sup>23</sup> On the other hand, one of

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., p. 19.

<sup>18</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 26, vs. 46; Nr. 27, vs. 68.

<sup>19</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 28, vss. 31-36.

<sup>20</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 51, vss. 46-56.

<sup>21</sup> Nrs. 26 and 27, both of which tell us that the glove was lost "last year," show that Giraut is in Languedoc. In Nr. 26 he is probably at Narbonne (vs. 98), while in Nr. 27 he has recently left Provence (vss. 76-77). Then in Nr. 28, which informs us that the glove was lost "more than a year ago" (vs. 31 ff.), we discover that Giraut is in Spain (vs. 15). Giraut wishes to impress us with the length of his exile; he would certainly have said "more than two years" had such a period elapsed. Consequently, his sojourn in Spain must have begun during the second year of his exile.

<sup>22</sup> His death is mourned in the planh for Raimbaut's death. Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 76, vs. 15.

<sup>23</sup> See, for example, ed. Kolsen, Nr. 29, where both these patrons are named. This work is one of the last of the series, hence the whole series falls before 1173.

the last works of the group, which shows Giraut going back to his lady, is dedicated to the Dauphin of Auvergne.<sup>24</sup> Robert, the first Count of Auvergne to take the title of Dauphin, began to rule in 1169.<sup>25</sup> It follows that if one of the last poems of the series was written in or after 1169, the beginning of the cycle cannot be earlier than 1166.

In order to fix the period of the Glove-cycle more precisely, I direct attention to one of the last works of that group. The theme of this song (ed. Kolsen, Nr. 51) is the reluctance of the poet to return to his lady—who has finally sent for him—since his return would necessitate giving up a campaign against the Moors. Giraut says:

If I hesitate and if the king and his court keep me [from going back to my lady], the advantage is great and I don't know what the harm will be; and if she complains that I dared to put off my return, let her do what she pleases about avenging herself well. If she lets me put my hope in the campaign which the kings will make, to go is better than to stay back; although honor and worth cannot be so great that I should disobey her command.

And may God now advance our cause and us, so that the evil Saracens may suffer loss and harm, until they are cast down. And one ought not fear evil when winning for God, nor to doubt about the beginning, for good hope [of gain] will bring over the Gascons and Navarrese, if booty is abundant for them, and God will go forward leading our side (ed. Kolsen, Nr. 51, vss. 61-90).

From other Glove-poems of this same epoch we learn that the proposed campaign was in the spring.<sup>26</sup> Is there any historical record of the operations to which Giraut is referring?

The end of the three-year Glove-cycle must fall somewhere between 1169 and 1173. We know nothing of the whereabouts of Alfonso II of Aragon in the spring of 1169; in 1170, various documents from the months of March, April, and May prove definitely that he was not on a military expedition; the same statement holds good for the years 1171 and 1173.<sup>27</sup> Only in the spring of 1172 do we find mention of operations against the Moors.<sup>28</sup> Apparently Alfonso invaded the district of Valencia but was compelled to beat a hasty retreat when the King of Navarre descended upon Aragon with an armed force. Although Giraut's poem was redacted before the expedition, its slighting reference to the people of Navarre, who fight only for material gain, seems to reflect the strained relations between the two kingdoms which culminated in the attack on Aragon.

<sup>24</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 48, vss. 4 and 72.

<sup>25</sup> Stronski, Annales du Midi, xviii, 476.

<sup>26</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 16, vs. 13 ff; Nr. 49; Nr. 19, vss. 4-6.

<sup>27</sup> Miret y Sans, Bol. de la R. Acad. de B. Letras de Barcelona, II, 266-275.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., II, 274; Zurita, Anales de Aragón, I, chap. 32.

Now it is precisely in Giraut's poem Nr. 51 that he states that he has been exiled from his lady for three years (vss. 46-56). Consequently, I believe we can state definitely that the Glove-cycle covers a period from the spring of 1169 to the spring of 1172. Since Giraut entered Spain more than a year after the loss of the glove,<sup>29</sup> his trip must have begun some time after the spring of 1170, and probably before another year had passed. Thus the belief that Giraut came to Spain in late August or September of the year 1170 is admirably supported by evidence from Giraut's own works.

I have already mentioned the tenson between Alfonso II of Aragon and Giraut de Bornelh, against which Raimbaut composed his irate reply. The existence of this answer makes the tenson fall before 1173, the year of Raimbaut's death. Yet both Giraut and the king were very young and could not have been interested in poetry very long before that date. Alfonso was fifteen years old in 1167. He would not be likely to discuss his position as a lover before that age, although once fifteen, the age of one's majority in medieval times and not an uncommon age for marriage, his interest in amatory questions might well be awakened. Giraut himself is said to have been writing as late as 1220;<sup>30</sup> hence we can hardly place his beginnings in poetry earlier than about 1165. From these considerations we see that the tenson between Giraut and the king must date from about 1167 to 1173, during which period Giraut visited Spain. Furthermore, since Giraut accuses Alfonso of incapacity to love truly, could the poem possibly fall after the king's rejection of Eudoxia in 1171? Would Giraut dare to accuse the king of inability to appreciate the delicate feelings of courtly love when the king had already shown himself guilty of infidelity to his lady—the one great sin against the system of fin amor?<sup>31</sup> I have already ascribed Raimbaut's answer to the tenson to the fall of 1170, when that troubadour was in Aragon. With Appel, I feel that the connection between this answer and the original tenson was intimate and immediate, a relation explained by the presence of both Raimbaut and Giraut at the court of King Alfonso.

The theme of the lost glove is not the only one common to the Glove-series. Throughout this group of works Giraut is much preoccupied with the question of literary style, especially the deliberately obscure style known as trobar clus. The writings from the first year of his exile all take a determined stand in favor of obscurity,<sup>32</sup> but those written in

<sup>29</sup> See above, note 21.

<sup>30</sup> Jeanroy, Romania, lvi, 517, n. 1.

<sup>31</sup> Indignation was shown by other troubadours at the betrayal of Eudoxia. Cf. Stronski, Annales du Midi, xxiii, 491. This indicates that Alfonso's deed was generally regarded as a breach of the code of love.

<sup>32</sup> He says, for example, "Last year, when I lost my glove, I used to sing in the clear

Spain—with one exception, which I believe is the first work written in Spain<sup>33</sup>—show a remarkable change in Giraut's attitude. He now attacks the dark style just as enthusiastically as he had defended it.<sup>34</sup>

Perhaps the most interesting discussion of this problem of style is to be found in a second tenson (ed. Kolsen, Nr. 58), one between Giraut de Bornelh and Raimbaut d'Aurenga. The latter begins the dispute by accusing his friend of having abandoned the dark manner. "I should like to know," he says, "why and on what grounds you go about condemning trobar clus?"<sup>35</sup> Giraut excuses himself by saying:

I do not complain if anyone composes according to his desire; but, for myself, I wish to condemn it [i.e., trobar clus] inasmuch as a song is better liked and more esteemed if one makes it light and simple; and do not bear a grudge against me because of this (vss. 8-14).

Sufficient internal evidence in the tenson fixes its date with considerable precision. First of all, it is definitely of the Glove-cycle,<sup>36</sup> thus limiting it to the period from 1169 to 1172. Then, at the end of the poem, occur the oft-quoted lines:

Giraut, greu m'es, per Saint Marsal
Quar vos n'anetz de sai nadal.

Linhaure, que vas cort reial
M'en vauc ades rich'e chabal. (vss. 57-60)

Giraut is leaving Raimbaut at Christmas time in order to go to the court of a king. I cannot agree with Kolsen, who places the poetic dispute in the first year of Giraut's exile from Mo Senher and before his trip into Spain.<sup>37</sup> The mere fact that all of Giraut's works from the first year of style, but now [I use] the obscure style. . . ." Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 26, vss. 46-53. See also Nr. 27, vss. 50-58; Nr. 25, vss. 1-19.

---

<sup>33</sup> This poem is Nr. 28, which, we have already seen, speaks of the loss of the glove as having taken place "more than a year ago." Giraut is deliberately making this poem clear and simple, in order to send it to his friends in Provence who objected to trobar clus (vss. 1-10, 15).

<sup>34</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 16, vss. 1-12; Nr. 48, vss. 1-2; Nr. 49, vss. 1-9; Nr. 51, vs. 3.

<sup>35</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 58, vss. 1-3.—Jeanroy has suggested (Romania, LVI, 517, n. 1) that Giraut may argue against the obscure style merely because it is the convention of the tenson to take a stand opposed to the proposition of the first copla. But Raimbaut's opening words reproach Giraut for previous attacks on trobar clus.

<sup>36</sup> It mentions an honor conferred on him by his lady (vs. 56) as in one of the poems which speaks of the glove (Nr. 27, vss. 69 and 74).

<sup>37</sup> Kolsen's dating of the whole Glove-cycle hangs on his statement that the tenson on trobar clus was written at Christmas, 1168. His reasons are as follows: From 1166 to December, 1168, Alfonso II was in Languedoc and Provence. It seems that Giraut must have left Raimbaut on Christmas and followed Alfonso into Spain at the latter's return (G. von Bornelh, der Meister der Trobs., pp. 60-61).

the Glove-cycle take a firm stand in favor of trobar clus, while the tenson shows him now as definitely against that style, makes it impossible that the poem should be dated at Christmas, 1169. On the other hand, Giraut appears in Spain before Christmas, 1170,<sup>38</sup> and we are also certain that he is in Spain in the winter of 1171.<sup>39</sup> Furthermore, Raimbaut was in Aragon in the last months of 1170 but had returned to his lands in Provence by January, 1171. The tenson between Raimbaut and Giraut could have been written only at Christmas, 1170, when both these troubadours were in Aragon.

But how explain the statement that Giraut is leaving for a royal court? Are we not to believe that the two troubadours were already at the court of Aragon?<sup>40</sup> It is not necessary to think that they remained with the royal suite all the time. No doubt they visited some of the local potentates, and we can easily imagine that they parted at the abode of one of these local rulers, Giraut to go back to the court, while Raimbaut was to pursue his way back to Provence. Or, supposing the tenson to have been written at the court of Aragon, could not Giraut be alluding to a projected visit to the court of either Castile or Navarre?

What significance has Giraut de Bornelh's and Raimbaut d'Aurenga's trip to Aragon when considered simultaneously with facts already gained from a study of Peire d'Alvernhe's Chantarai d'aquest trobadors? We saw that one of the members of the group ridiculed by Peire was a Spanish nobleman, an amateur poet, and one of the resplendent suite accompanying the bride of Alfonso VIII of Castile into Aragon, where the royal wedding was to take place. Since this cortège passed either through or close to Puivert, where Peire's satire was written, it appeared probable that the group of poets portrayed in that work had been attracted to Puivert by the brilliance of the bride's cavalcade. Finally, it seems only reasonable to infer that some of these entertainers followed the bridal party into Aragon, since at the lavish Spanish weddings the troubadours and jongleurs were unusually well received. The bride reached Aragon in September, 1170, and about that time we find two of the figures of Chantarai d'aquest trobadors at the court of Aragon. What better evidence

---

Not only are these statements devoid of logical coherence, but the historical event on which they depend has recently been disproved. Alfonso did not return to Spain in December, 1168. His trip to Provence fell between the spring and the fall of 1167 (Miret y Sans, op. cit., II, 264-265).

<sup>38</sup> See above, note 21.

<sup>39</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 16, was written in the winter (vs. 13 ff.) and Giraut is planning to leave Spain the following April (vss. 25-28), i.e., April, 1172.

<sup>40</sup> The court was at Roda in Ribagorza as can be seen by a document published in España Sagrada, xxx, 110, 421.

could we hope to find to substantiate belief in the intimate relation between the wedding party and the group of singers of Peire's satire?

Before closing this study, we should look briefly at the evidence afforded by the works of other troubadours of the satirized group. Here we find that information is scanty. In the works of Peire d'Alvernhe and of Peire Rogier we find no hint of a sojourn in Spain in the year 1170. The case of Bernart de Ventadorn and Lemozi, known to have been a jongleur in Bernart's service,<sup>41</sup> is curious. From the juxtaposition of their names in Chantarai d'aquest trobadors it appears that they were together as composer and performer at the time of Peire d'Alvernhe's writing. Now Bernart names Lemozi in two poems, both from the same period,<sup>42</sup> in one of which we learn that they are on their way to a foreign land.<sup>43</sup> It follows that if Lemozi appears only in works from a limited period of Bernart's life, and if Bernart and Lemozi are together in Peire's satire, the works naming Lemozi must be approximately contemporary with the satire. And in one of these works we learn that Bernart and Lemozi are en route to a foreign land!

Only one more figure from the merry group of singers of Peire's satire need concern us here. This is a Sir Ebles de Saigna. When Giraut de Bornelh had left Spain to return to his Bel Senher,<sup>44</sup> he sent a song to the Dauphin of Auvergne with the wish that "if it could find Sir Eblon on the way, it could well say to him that I say the difficulty is not in making the work obscure but in making it clear" (vss. 5-10). Giraut has renounced trobar clus and wishes to send news of his decision to a Sir Eblon who lives somewhere toward Auvergne. But why send the news to him? Because—and this is the only way we can interpret the above-quoted passage—Giraut and Sir Eblon had already argued the question of style. Now the Sir Eblon of Giraut's poem Nr. 48 has been identified with the Sir Ebles, or Eblon, de Saigna of Chantarai d'aquest trobadors.<sup>45</sup> Moreover, his home is said to be a Saigna in the department of Cantal, which lies in the region of Auvergne.<sup>46</sup> It seems certain that Giraut, who had argued for trobar clus before his arrival in Spain, had had as one of his opponents this same Eblon de Saigna. Since internal evidence from Chantarai d'aquest trobadors suggests that Eblon was personally at

<sup>41</sup> Appel, Bernart von Ventadorn, p. xli; Crescini, Atti del R. Istituto Veneto, LXXXVI, 1227; Zingarelli, Studj Medievali, I, 332.

<sup>42</sup> Appel, ibid., pp. xl-xli.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., Nr. 45, vs. 47.

<sup>44</sup> Ed. Kolsen, Nr. 48, vss. 71-74.

<sup>45</sup> Kolsen, G. von Bornelh, der Meister der Trobs., p. 61; Crescini, Atti del R. Istituto Veneto, LXXXVI, 216.

<sup>46</sup> Kolsen, loc. cit.; Crescini, loc. cit.; Chabaneau, Hist. Gén. de Languedoc, x, p. 345, n. 5; Jeanroy, Romania, XLII, p. 115.

Puivert, it is highly probable that the dispute on style took place while both men were following the wedding escort of Princess Eleanor.

We cannot say with certitude that Bernart de Ventadorn, his jongleur Lemozi, and Sir Eblon de Saigna took part in the same journey into Aragon which Giraut de Bornelh and Raimbaut d'Aurenga made. Yet the fact that these two last poets appear in Aragon not long after we believe them to have been at Puivert strengthens the theory that the troubadours ridiculed by Peire d'Alvernhe were present in person at Puivert. Moreover, we get perhaps our most vivid picture of the life of the troubadours from our interpretation of the poems which group themselves around the wedding of Alfonso VIII of Castile. We see how the singers flocked to a brilliant festival in search of gifts; how they argued with kings, being received on terms of equality with the nobles out of consideration for their poetic skill; how they discussed literary style among themselves;<sup>47</sup> and how, in lighter moments, they joked one another and poked fun at their divers idiosyncrasies. We can well agree with Crescini when he calls Chantarai d'aquest trobadors "a palpitating document, which brings to life again, as if the intervening centuries were a thin and vaporous veil, even rent and spread apart here and there, the life and art, the spirit and customs of the troubadours and jongleurs. . ."<sup>48</sup>

WALTER T. PATTISON

Wesleyan University

<sup>47</sup> Giraut de Bornelh's renunciation of trobar clus late in the year 1170 should be checked against similar statements of other troubadours to see if there was a universal change of taste about that time. Cf. Peire d'Alvernhe, ed. Zenker, Nr. 1, vs. 6; Nr. 3, vss. 13-18 and Raimbaut d'Aurenga's Nrs. 3, 7, and 38 in Bartsch's Grundriss.

<sup>48</sup> Atti del R. Istituto Veneto, LXXXIII, 795.

III

THE MAGIC CHESSBOARD IN THE PERLESVAUS: AN EXAMPLE OF MEDIEVAL LITERARY BORROWING

LITERARY endeavor in the Middle Ages, as in the Renaissance, was essentially an art of imitation. Since little emphasis was placed upon originality of subject-matter, since praise went rather to the combination and interpretation of familiar materials—or to stylistic qualities—the author felt free to appropriate whatever themes or episodes best suited his fundamental conception. Thus an Arthurian romance was usually a tissue of commonplace incidents and motifs, developed in accordance with the purpose or the taste of the individual writer. To distinguish between the narrative content of a work and the particular interpretation applied to it by the artist, the Middle Ages employed the terms matière and sens. The matière might come from any source; the sens alone was the contribution of the latest reworker.<sup>1</sup>

The practice of building with borrowed materials was given full justification by the rhetoricians of the time; they renewed for their period the doctrine of imitation as formulated by Cicero, Horace, and Quintilian. Among the writers of poetriae Matthieu de Vendôme, in his Ars versificatoria (written before 1175), gives advice to those who would adapt the writings of others:

Materia de qua aliquis agere proponet, aut erit illibata, aut ab aliquo poeta primitus exsecuta. Si exsecuta fuerit, juxta tenorem poeticae narrationis erit procedendum, tali quidem consideratione, ut quaedam collateralia quae non sunt de principali proposito, scilicet comparationes et poeticae abusiones et figurativae constructiones, modus temporum et syllabarum, non inducantur.<sup>2</sup>

Geoffroi de Vinsauf, in his Documentum de modo et arte dictandi et versificandi (written c. 1210?), interprets the "Difficile est proprie communia dicere" of Horace as authorizing such borrowing, and elaborates a system for its application:

<sup>1</sup> Gerbert de Montreuil, for example, prides himself on the originality of his sens:

Puis ce di que li sens est miens;
Ne li doit nuire ne peser,
Se je me deduis au penser.

(Roman de la Violette, ed. Buffum, SATF [Paris, 1928], vss. 26–28).—On the general problem, see Wm. A. Nitze, "Sans et matière dans les œuvres de Chrétien de Troyes," Romania, XLIV (1915), 14–36; Cross and Nitze, Lancelot and Guenevere (Chicago, 1930), pp. 63–65.

<sup>2</sup> In E. Faral, Les Arts poétiques du xii<sup>e</sup> et du xiii<sup>e</sup> siècle (Paris, 1924), pp. 180–181.—For the date of the Ars, see p. 14.

Et quanto difficilius, tanto laudabilius est bene tractare materiam talem, scilicet communem et usitatam, quam materiam aliam, scilicet novam et inusitatam . . . Possumus enim materiam communem proprie dicere si quatuor modos observemus . . . Primus modus est ne moremur ubi moram faciunt alii; sed, ubi moram faciunt, transeamus, ubi transeunt, moram faciamus . . . Secundus modus est ne sequamur vestigia verborum, et hoc est intelligendum quantum ad corpus materiae . . . Tertius modus est ut de materia non transeamus ad talem articulum unde reverti nesciamus ad materiam . . . Quartus modus est ne praemittamus tale principium quod sit nimis arrogans et superciliosum . . .<sup>3</sup>

Thus imitation as a literary dogma was fully developed by the early thirteenth century.<sup>4</sup> It is altogether probable that such theoretical documents, widely read as they were, influenced verse and prose composition in the vernacular, as well as Latin poetry.<sup>5</sup> Naturally, the skill and practice of individual authors in the handling of such materia communis varied considerably. While one writer would follow his source closely, another might make notable changes. Thus a writer's originality may frequently be evaluated by studying his method of adaptation.

The author of the Perlesvaus is peculiarly adept in the remaniement of his source materials. He rarely borrows an entire episode from one of his predecessors; usually, his indebtedness is limited to details—narrative or descriptive—which he weaves skilfully into the fabric of his own work. When a complete incident is incorporated, it undergoes an extensive transformation akin to the dissimulatio of Renaissance writers.<sup>6</sup> The author's favorite device is the division of a story into two or more parts, and the inclusion of these parts at widely separated places in his romance. This interweaving and interlinking of episodes gives the Perlesvaus an integrated type of structure, and produces in the reader an impression of continuity and solidity.

The Chessboard Episode offers an excellent example of the author's method of adaptation, and of his technique of interlinking. It affords one of the closest parallels between the Perlesvaus and any other earlier work. Furthermore, we possess a third text which borrows from the

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., pp. 309–310.—Faral gives no definite date for this work which, he says, might either precede or follow the Poetria nova (c. 1208–1213). See p. 23.

<sup>4</sup> An example of its extensive application in the field of education may be found in the Metalogicus of John of Salisbury, ed Migne, PL, cxc, col 855B; quoted by Baldwin, Medieval Rhetoric and Poetic (New York, 1928), p. 163.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. the opinion of Saintsbury, History of Criticism, (London, 1922), I, 415, that "in so far as they [the vernaculars] were deliberately practiced, the principles of composition and of taste which guided the practice cannot have been different [from those for Latin work]."

<sup>6</sup> Cf. H. Gmelin, "Das Prinzip der Imitatio in den romanischen Literaturen der Renaissance," Romanische Forschungen, XLVI (1932), 125, for Petrarch's definition.

same source for this episode; by studying it, we may appreciate more fully the method and the originality of our author. The source is the Wauchier continuation of the Conte del graal, the additional text the Modena (or Didot) Perceval. The relationship of the Perlesvaus to Wauchier, on this point, was indicated by William A. Nitze,<sup>7</sup> whose opinion was corroborated by Walther Hoffmann.<sup>8</sup> Hoffmann studied primarily the Wauchier-Didot Perceval relationship and concluded that: "Diese Übereinstimmungen machen es einleuchtend, dass G[Wauchier] von PP [the archetype of Didot and Modena] als Quelle benutzt ist."<sup>9</sup> Miss Weston mentioned the occurrence of the episode in the three texts, but did not agree with Nitze's conclusion that Wauchier was here the source of the Perlesvaus.<sup>10</sup> Later Miss Mary Williams, in her study on Peredur, compared the texts of Wauchier and the Didot Perceval, without taking the Perlesvaus into account.<sup>11</sup>

Before proceeding to an analysis of the literary method of the Perlesvaus, we must establish the source relationship between the three texts. For the Perlesvaus, the recent edition of Nitze and Jenkins has been used;<sup>12</sup> for Wauchier, the British Museum Additional MS 36614 (fols.

[Text continues p. 33]

<sup>7</sup> The Old French Grail Romance Perlesvaus (Baltimore, 1902), pp. 59-61.

<sup>8</sup> Die Quellen des Didot Perceval (Halle, 1905), p. 58.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid., p. 54.—Hoffmann's arguments are accepted as conclusive by Lot, Etude sur le Lancelot en prose (Paris, 1918), p. 134, n. 1.

<sup>10</sup> The Legend of Sir Perceval (London, 1906), I, 107-110.

<sup>11</sup> Essai sur la composition du roman gallois de Peredur (Paris, 1909), pp. 60-63, 75-76.—The Chessboard Episode in Peredur is a mere summary, containing no descriptive detail, and is of slight value for comparison with our texts. The entire passage (ed. Loth, Mabinogion, [Paris, 1913], II, 114-115) follows.

Peredur se dirigea vers le château. Le portail était ouvert. En arrivant à la salle, il trouva la porte ouverte: il entra et aperçut un jeu d'échecs: les deux troupes de cavaliers jouaient l'une contre l'autre; celle à qui il donnait son aide perdait et l'autre jetait un cri, absolument comme l'eussent fait des hommes. Il se fâcha, prit les cavaliers dans son giron, et jeta l'échiquier dans le lac. A ce moment entra une jeune fille noire qui lui dit: "Puisse Dieu ne pas t'accorder sa grâce. Il t'arrive plus souvent de faire du mal que du bien."

Magic chessboards appear in other Arthurian romances; e.g., in the prose Lancelot (Sommer, v, 151-152 and 189-190; for the relationship of this to the other romances, cf. Bruce, "The Composition of the Old French Prose Lancelot," Rom. Rev., IX [1918], 375-376); in the Dutch Lancelot (cf. Williams, op. cit., p. 75); and in the Dutch Walewein (cf. G. Paris, Histoire littéraire de la France, XXX, 82-84). These seem to be unrelated to our episode.

<sup>12</sup> (Chicago, 1932).—In several cases (lines 2338, 2339, and 2340) the readings of MSS BrP have been adopted in preference to those of the text (MS O), in accordance with the opinion of the editors that the former constitute the best readings. Reasons for this preference will be given in the forthcoming Volume II of the Perlesvaus. Brackets have been used to indicate departures from the text of MS O.

To facilitate comparison, the three texts are given in parallel columns, each complete, and with no changes in order.<sup>13</sup> Agreements of the Perlesvaus and Wauchier are shown by the use of small capitals; of Wauchier and Modena, by italics; of all three texts, by bold face type.

PERLESVAUS	WAUCHIER	MODENA PERCEVAL
(2334) Et vient en chastel et descent, ET APOIE SON GLAIVE ET SON ESCU AU MUR DE LA SALE, et monte amont LES DEGREZ de mar- bre, et entre en une sale MOLZ BELE ET MOLT RICHE,	A la premiere porte vint Parmi le boile entra &amp; tint Sa voie tot droit a la tor Qui molt estoit de grant valor Ne pareit se mervelle non Des herbergemens d'environ Ne del onbrage que tenoient Dui pin qui en la place estoient A ce voer molt entendi Lors raconte qu'il descendi De son (son) cheval puis l'arcesna AU PIE DE LA TOR APUJA SON ESCU &amp; est sus montes En la sale PAR UNS DEGRES Laiens vit lances en lanciers Coples a ciens &amp; colers ciers &amp; clers espiaus trencans burnis En roides hantes bien forbis LA SALE FU DE GRANT BIAUTE	... si vit aparoir parmi l'espesse de le forest le pumel d'une tor, qui molt estoit biaux et gros; et quant Percevals le vit si en ot molt grant jote et cevauga cele part grant aleüre, et quant il vint la si vit que ce estoit li plus biaux castiaus del monde, et vit le pont abaissié, et le porte desfermée, si entra ens tot a cheval, et vint au perron devant le sale, et descendi et atacha son cheval a .j. anel, et monta amont tous armés l'espée gainte. Et quant il fu amont el palais si garda amont et aval,

<sup>13</sup> In only two cases does the Perlesvaus insert a descriptive detail at a point different from its appearance in Wauchier. The correspondences are then indicated by (I) and (I') (II) and (II'). Modena makes no alterations in order.

PERLESVAUS	WAUCHIER	MODENA PERCEVAL
ET ESTOIT DE LEX EN LEX PAINTE A YMAGRES D'OR.	N'onques en nule roiaute N'ESGARDA HOM SI TRES CIER LIT COM IL TROVA EN MI &amp; vit Covert d'un fres paile grigois Ainc si rice n'ot quans ne rois Lors cuida il molt bien trover Gent o cui il poist parler Mais n'i vit nule rien vivant Au lit s'adrece maintenant Desus s'assist &amp; si pensa Son cieuf &amp; ses mains desarma PUIS A LA SALE REGARDEE QUI A FIN OR ERT TOTE OVREE TOT ENVIRON &amp; PAR DESUS &amp; LI LANBRUNS D'OR MUSI TOS (I) (II) [MS B.N. f. fr. 12577, 149<sup>vo</sup> ET VIT LA SALE A OR MUSIE ]PAINTE ET DE CIPRES LAMBRUISIE] Onques ne rois ne enperere N'ot si tres bele ne si clere Lors dist molt par fait ci bel estre Atant voit .i. huis devers destre Quant il le vit si se leva &amp; vint la droit si s'apuia Si voit unes loges trop beles	et ne vit home ne fame, et vint a une cambre et entra dedens et garda partout, mais il n'i vit home ne feme. Et Percevaus revint arriere ens el palais, si s'en mervella molt, et dist:

PERLESVAUS	WAUCHIER	MODENA PERCEVAL
(I') ET TROVE EU MILEU UNE COUCHE MOLT RICHE ET MOLT HAUTE, et au [pie] de cele couche avoit un eschequier molt bel et molt riche, [a] un [orle] d'or tot plain de pierres precieuses, et estoit li point d'or et [d'azur] ne n'estoient pas li eschec deseure en estant. Missire Gavains	D'erbe fresque &amp; de fleurs noveles Erent juncies lues tot droit Si bone odor laiens avoit Qu'il n'est espice de valeur Dont cil n'i sente la flaireur Signeur ja celer nel vos quier  Enmi leu ot un eschequier  A POINS D'AZUR &amp; DE FIN OR Par molt grant savoir furent (sic) mor Les riches esces d'or polis D'esmeraudes &amp; de rubis Ne vos puis dire leur biaute Molt par rendoient grant clarte Car vos saves bien que ce sont Les plus cieres pieres del mont	'Par Diu, mervelles puis veoir car ceste sale est si juncie, et si sai bien qu'il n'a mie lonc tans qu'il i ot gent, et or n'i voi nului.'  Lors s'en revint en mi la sale et vit devant les fenestres .j. eskekier de fin argent, et par desus l'eskekier avoit uns eskés de blanc ivoire et de noir,
(II') ESGARDOIT LA BIAUTÉ ET LA RICHCE DE LA SALE.	(In Perlesvaus there is another incident inter- calated here; the chessboard episode is re- sumed at line 2457).	... Et il esgarde tot environ et voit toz les huis clos et fermez, et esgarde as piez de la couche et voit .ii. chandeliers ardanz devant l'eschequier et

PERLESVAUS	WAUCHIER	MODENA PERCEVAL
voit les eskés assis, dont li un sont d'ivoire et li autre d'or. Missire Gavains commença a traire des eskés d'ivoire, et cil d'or traient contre lui et le materent .II. foiz.	Li geu furent trestuit assis  Seur .i. feutre de paille bis  Vaut percevaus laiens seoir  Par les esces qu'il vint veoir  S' commenca a manoir  Les geus qu'il vit seur l'escequier  A soi meisme pense &amp; dit  C'aïnc mais si rices geus ne vit  Ne jamais jor tes ne verra  Mais que d'iluec departira  Lors prent .i. des paons atant  &amp; dit que il le trait avant  Autresi tos sans plus d'escart  Traistent li giu de l'autre part  S' percevaus quant veu l'a  A dit ostes; ce que sera  Puis traist encontre vistemant  Tot autresi isnelement  Retraist li geus &amp; cil que fist  Par foi j'ai reconté qu'il prist  &amp; il lui ce dist por verte  Lors fu a desbarat torne  &amp; que vos iroie aloignant  Ne trestos lor trais acoutant  C'AU DAESRAIN EN fu mates  Li bons percevaus c'est vertes  Estrangement en fu maris  Mais asses plus fu esbahis	et estoient assis autresi com por juer. Et quant Percevaus vit les eskés si biaux, si vint cele part et regarda les eskés molt longement, et quant il les ot assés regardés si prist les eskés,  si les manota, et en bouta un avant, et li eskés retraist contre lui.  Quant Percevaus vit les eskés qui traioient contre lui, si le tint a molt grant mervelle et retraist un autre esker, et uns autres retraist contre lui, et quant Percevaus le vit si s'asist et commença a juer,

PERLESVAUS	WAUCHIER	MODENA PERCEVAL
A la tierce fofee, qant il se quida revenchier et il vit q'il en out le poior, il depeça le geu, et une damoisele isr d'une chambre et fet prendre a un vallet l'eschequier et les eschés, et si les en fait porter.	De co qu'il vit tantos par eus Les geus raseoir en lor leus Lors joa tant que mas refu Trois fois tel duel en a eu Que par ire les esces prist El pan de son hauberc les mist &amp; dist jamaïs ne materois Nul chevalier car n'est pas drois Puis vint volt tost droit as fenestres La grant iaue vit sor les estres El plus parfont les veul geler N'i avoit mais que del ruer Quant une damoisele vint As fenestres qui le retint Vn samit vermel ot vestu Brode de fin or &amp; tisu &amp; ele fu a desmesure Bele sor tote creature De l'iaue s'en issi tant hors Que pardesus par li cors Tos des la cainture en amont Lors dist sire li escec sont En ma garde nes getes mie Car vos ferties vilonie Qu'el monde ne puet on trover Si biaux si les doit on garder	et tant iua que par .iij. fois le mata li gius, et quant Percevaus vit çou si en ot molt grant engogne, et dist: 'Par la foi que je doi a Nostre Segnor, grant mervelle voi, car je cuideoie tant de ce giu savoir et il m'a maté par .iij. fois, et je ai dehait quant jamaïs moi ne autre cevalier matera ne fera honte. Lors prist les eskés au pan de son hauberc  et vint a le fenestre  et les volt jeter en l'aigue que desous courroit Issi com il les devoit laisser aler si li escria une demisele qui desus lui estoit a une fenestre en haut et li dist: 'Cevaliers vostre cuers vois a esmeu a molt grant vilenie faire qui les eskés volés ensi jeter en l'aigue, et saciés que si vous les getés vous ferés grant mal.'

167<sup>vo</sup>–168<sup>vo</sup>);<sup>14</sup> for the Modena Perceval, the edition of Miss Weston.<sup>15</sup>

An examination of the parallel texts points to the following conclusions with regard to the source relationship:

1. The Perlesvaus (P) and the Modena Perceval (M) both show definite similarities to Wauchier (W).
2. The order of presentation of details is the same in all three, except for two places where P includes a descriptive detail at a different point.
3. In only eight places does a given detail of W appear in both M and P. These are all essential points of the narrative: the hero arrives at the castle, ascends to the hall, finds the chessboard, sees the chessmen upon it, and moves one of them; the board plays against him, and checkmates him three times; finally a damsel appears.
4. P and W have at least six points of similarity which are not found in M: the hero rests his shield against the wall when he dismounts; the stairs are mentioned; the beauty of the hall, the bed, the gold painting of the room, and the gold and blue squares on the chessboard, are described. Since M does not have these details, we may reject the hypothesis that it might be the common source of P and W.
5. On the other hand, M and W have in common at least ten details which do not appear in P: the hero sees the castle tower, ties his horse after his arrival, finds the hall deserted; it is "joncie"; the first four moves of the chess game are indicated; the hero becomes angry, states his intention to destroy the chessmen, which he puts into the "pan de son hauberc"; he attempts to throw them out the window; at the end the damsel forbids him to do so. Thus P, which lacks these elements, cannot be the common source of M and W.
6. P and M have no details in common which are not also to be found in W. There is thus no necessity to posit a common source other than W to explain their agreements.

Since W contains many details, which are divided between P and M; since P and M agree only in details contained in W; and since neither P nor M could be the source of the other two texts, we may accept W as the

<sup>14</sup> This MS has several readings which are closer to the Perlesvaus than those of the Potvin text, lines 22401–22504. The Perlesvaus (line 2340) reads: "estoient li point d'or et d'azur." Here MS 36614 reads:

Enmi leu ot un essequier
A poins d'azur & de fin or whereas Potvin 22442–43, has:

Enmi avoit .i. eskcékier Porpoint d'asur et de fin or.

Similarly, where the Perlesvaus (line 2341) reads: "Missire Gavains esgardoit la biauté et la richece de la sale," MS 36614 reads: "Puis a la sale regardee." Potvin, however, has "Et vit la sale toute peinte" (line 22429).

<sup>15</sup> Op. cit., II, 31–32.

common source of P and M.<sup>16</sup> Because of the preservation of the order of details, it is highly probably that the author of each prose romance had a copy of W before him, or had but recently read that text, at the time he composed his own romance.

We may now contrast the way in which P and M adapted their common source, W. (1) In W, the Chessboard Episode had served as a prologue to the quest of the white stag. The situation is the same in M.<sup>17</sup> In P, however, the setting is entirely different; the place is now the Grail castle, the time before and after the Grail visit. There is no connection whatsoever with a stag quest. (2) In W, the hero of the episode is Perceval, and he is the same in M. But P ascribes the adventure to Gauvain. (3) In W, all of the actions of the incident follow one another without interruption, as they do in M. On the contrary, P divides the episode into two parts, putting the first half before the appearance of the Grail, the second half after it. (4) W is the most elaborately developed of the three versions. Of the numerous accessory details which it contains, M borrows a large number, while P borrows comparatively few. As a result, P is extremely brief and compact—the whole episode is contained within six sentences—while M is much longer, occupying over a page in the printed text.

It is apparent, then, that M follows W practically without innovation, giving the episode at the same place in the romance, with the same background and hero, and with most of the descriptive detail.<sup>18</sup> In contrast, P takes the incident out of its background and relations, changes its hero, splits it into two parts, and reduces it in size by omitting almost all of the accessory elements. We may suggest reasons why P handled the material as he did. Although he did not intend to include the stag quest, the Chessboard Episode appealed to him for its color and its magic qualities; he therefore retained it. But since he used the episode only as an ornament, he shortened it considerably. Of the two possibilities, amplification and abbreviation, the latter was here imposed upon him by the æsthetic demands of the situation. He located the incident at the Grail Castle in order to add another marvelous element to the merveilleux chrétien of the castle itself. The change of hero was a result of the change of scene.<sup>19</sup>

<sup>16</sup> To assume a common source for all three texts seems unnecessary, since W adequately satisfies the requirements of a source for P and M.

<sup>17</sup> As is the stag quest which follows; cf. Hoffmann, op. cit., pp. 48–58.

<sup>18</sup> Modena is not always unoriginal. Cf. Pauphilet, "Le Roman en prose de Perceval," Mélanges offertes à Ferdinand Lot (Paris, 1925), pp. 610–611, for an appreciation of his method. Modena's originality, however, is generally less striking and less complete than that of the Perlesvaus.

<sup>19</sup> P frequently changes the hero of a story in like manner; Miss Weston, in Rom., II (1925), 361–362, remarks upon the freedom with which he handles his sources. On the general practice of treating borrowed episodes in French verse works, cf. Baldwin, op. cit., pp. 260–269.

Finally, the characteristic device of interweaving serves to disguise the story and to make it encircle, so to speak, the important visit of Gauvain to the Grail.

In this manner, the author of P has assimilated the story, transformed it to serve his own purposes and, except for the essential points and a few significant details, made himself independent of his source. His method is that recommended by the theorists—the borrowing and conversion of narrative materials. To this general method he adds a process characteristic of his own work, that of interlinking. He thus becomes an imitator rather than a mere copier, and a creative artist according to the requirements of his time.

BERNARD WEINBERG

University of Chicago

IV

THE LANGLAND MYTH

IT is remarkable that the one possibly contemporary statement in regard to the authorship of Piers Plowman has never been adequately examined. That is the note in the Trinity College Dublin MS. D, 4, I (Skeat's No. xli, C-text), to the effect that the author was William Langland, the son of a gentleman, Stacy de Rokayle, who lived in Ship-ton-under-Wychwood as a tenant of Lord le Spenser in the County of Oxford:

Memorandum quod Stacy de Rokayle pater Willielmi de Longlond, qui Stacius fuit generosus, et morabatur in Shypton under Whicwode, tenens domini le Spenser in comitatu Oxon., qui predictus Willielmus facit librum qui vocatur Perys ploughman.

From what source came this information and what is its value? Why should it appear in a Dublin manuscript—a somewhere near contemporary text, but corrupt and in a "Northumbrian dialect"?

An answer to these questions is, strangely enough, contained in the poem itself in two lines which have quite escaped notice and comment:

"By Marie," quod a mansed prest of þe march of yrlonde,
"I counte namore conscience bi so I cacche sylver."

(B. xx, 220-1; C. xxiii, 221-222)

Is it not quite singular that the author of the poem should concern himself at all with a cursed, corrupt priest of the March of Ireland? Had this priest anything to do with the note in the Dublin manuscript? I believe the note in the Dublin manuscript has some connection with these lines, for I believe the lines were aimed at a specific individual, and further, that this individual tried to find out what he could about the author and that it is some form of his memoranda which is preserved for us.

In the late fourteenth century there was no priest "of the March of Ireland" quite so conspicuous as Walter de Brugge, "parson of St. Patrick's Trym, in Ireland, and prebendary of Houthe in the Cathedral church of St. Patrick, Dublin."<sup>1</sup> This man not only inspected the king's armies going to Ireland,<sup>2</sup> and dealt with the Irish rebels,<sup>3</sup> but also was right-hand man to the earl of March<sup>4</sup> and eventually guardian of both <sup>1</sup> Pat. Rolls., 14 Richard II, p. 380.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. p. 405.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid. p. 404.

<sup>4</sup> "Grant for good service to the king and earl of March, to Walter Brugge, parson of Trym and prebendary of Houthe in Ireland, to whom the king granted license to remain in England at the schools or elsewhere for ten years, receiving the fruits of his benefices

Edmund and Roger de Mortuo Mari.<sup>5</sup> Inasmuch as Richard II in 1385 declared Roger de Mortuo-Mari, then a mere lad, heir apparent to the English throne,<sup>6</sup> we may assume that his guardian was very much in the public eye and that readers of the poem might have known to whom the author alluded. This connection with the earl of March and his family might explain the poet's slur, "priest of the March of Ireland." Walter de Brugge was the type of person described by the poet—one who cared nothing for conscience so long as he caught silver. He had become inordinately wealthy by serving as attorney in Ireland for those soldiers and gentlemen whom duty or business called back to England to the neglect of their Irish affairs.<sup>7</sup> In addition to these large revenues, he received incomes from the prebends of Warham in the Cathedral church of Hereford<sup>8</sup> and of Fenton in the Cathedral church of York<sup>9</sup> and from the estate of Sir John de Cobeham.<sup>10</sup> When for some reason he apparently desired to study at one of the universities,<sup>11</sup> he was granted a living at St. Mary's Burwell, Cambridgeshire, in the diocese of Norwich, for this purpose.<sup>12</sup> At all times he was the subject of especial favors:

License, for ten years, for the king's clerk, Walter de Brugge, parson of Trym in Ireland and prebendary of Houthe in the Cathedral church of St. Patrick, Dublin, to bring from Ireland into England and Wales such times as he chooses corn, fish and other victuals for his household, as well as horses, goshawks, and falcons for his own use notwithstanding any ordinance to the contrary.<sup>13</sup>

Judging from the records relating to Ireland, no priest there would have been more likely to excite the wrath of the author of Piers Plowman than Walter de Brugge. If another were intended, the passage would nevertheless be easily applied to him.

If, then, Walter de Brugge was the victim of the poet's attack, how did he take that attack? We must enter now definitely into realm of conmeanwhile, notwithstanding ordinance to the contrary, that he be one of ten persons excepted from the provisions of the ordinance of the king and council directing that Thomas, duke of Gloucester, shall have the rents and profits of all those who have possessions in, and are absent from Ireland, to continue for 9 years from Jan. 9 last." Pat. Rolls, 15 Richard II, p. 16. "Roger de Mortuo Mari, earl of March, staying in England, has letters nominating Thomas Mortymer, kngt., and Walter Brugge, clerk, his attorneys in Ireland for one year." Pat. Rolls, 17 Richard II, p. 313. "Pardon to Walter Brugge . . . whilst he tarries in England about the earl's affairs. . . ." Pat. Rolls, 20 Richard II, p. 8.

---

<sup>5</sup> Pat. Rolls, Edward III, Apr. 12, 1371; Pat. Rolls, 17 Richard II, p. 304 (June 24, 1393).

<sup>6</sup> "Mortimer, Roger," D.N.B.

<sup>7</sup> For examples, see: Pat. Rolls, 44 Ed. III, p. 378; 45 Ed. III, p. 66; 47 Ed. III, p. 335; 51 Ed. III, p. 430; 3 Ric. II, p. 496; 16 Ric. II, p. 117; 17 Ric. II, p. 313; etc.

<sup>8</sup> Pat. Rolls, 16 Ric. II, p. 207.

<sup>9</sup> Pat. Rolls, 11 Ric. II, p. 405.

<sup>10</sup> Pat. Rolls, 19 Ric. II, p. 498.

<sup>11</sup> Pat. Rolls, 15 Ric. II, p. 16.

<sup>12</sup> Pat. Rolls, 19 Ric. II, July 27, 1395.

<sup>13</sup> Pat. Rolls, 14 Ric. II, p. 380.

jecture, but conjecture not entirely unsupported by fact. I believe the poet's barb sank into the March priest's flesh and rankled there. I believe he, like some of his kind in England, made every effort to find out who the author was in order in some way to retaliate. The most conclusive proof of Brugge's interest in the poet is furnished by his will, drawn at Trym in 1396 but probated in the Cathedral of York, because of his connection with Fenton. I quote:

In Dei nomine, Amen. Ego Walterus de Bruge clericus et Canonicus Ebor. condo presens testamentum meum in hunc modo. In primis lego animam meam Deo, et B. Mariæ, et omnibus Sanctis, & corpus meum ad sepeliendum in choro ecclesiæ Sancti Patricii de T[r]yme, si me in Hiberniâ mori contigerit; vel alibi, ubi Deus disposuerit. Item lego fabricæ cancellæ S. Patricii de T[r]yme decem libras. Item fabricæ ecclesiæ S. Patricii Dublin xx<sup>l</sup>. Item lego dictæ ecclesiæ S. Patricii Dublin unum novum missale magnum & unum novum calicem deauratum, summo altari deserviturum; ita quod celebrantes ibidem specialem memoriam animæ meæ extunc habeant. Item lego fabricæ cancellæ ecclesiæ de Kylbarrok xl<sup>l</sup>. Item fabricæ ecclesiæ meæ prebendalis de Fenton in ecclesiâ Ebor. x marcas. Item lego quadraginta libras monetæ sex capellanis ydoneis et devotis, per executores meos eligendis & providendis, ad celebrandum per unum annum continuum, in uno loco vel diversis locis juxta dispositionem dictorum executorum meorum, pro animâ meâ, animabusque partris et matrix meorum, Leonelli nuper ducis Clarenciæ, et Edmundi nuper Comitis Marchiæ, et animabus omnium fidelium defunctorum. . . . Item lego Domino Johanni Wormynton unum ciphum argenteum cum uno cooperculo, bibleam meam rubeo coreo coopertam, unum librum vocatum Pers plewman, et unum alium librum vocatum Pars Oculi, cum aliis tractatibus in uno volumine. . .<sup>14</sup>

This legacy of "unum librum vocatum Pers plewman" to a priest of his parish, "Domino Johanni Wormynton" is all the proof we need of Walter de Brugge's interest in the poet and the poem. I believe the Trinity College Dublin manuscript is either the very manuscript left by Walter de Brugge or a copy of that manuscript, and I believe the note which it contains about the author of Piers Plowman is either Walter de Brugge's own memorandum or a copy of his memorandum. One of the interesting things about the Dublin manuscript is the fact that it is in the dialect of Northern England. The best explanation for the dialect is this, that Brugge learned he had been attacked and sent to England for a copy of the poem, which copy was made in his own prebend, that of Fenton, in Yorkshire. Though there is the element of conjecture in this, it makes the first complete story offered for the note in the Dublin manuscript—and the only one.

<sup>14</sup> Testamenta Eboracensia, Pt. 1, pp. 207-210 (Surtees Society, 1836). I wish here to acknowledge my debt to Mr. H. G. Pfander, who copied out in full for me (I had it only in part) the note from the Micklethwaite Collection (B.M. MS. Add. 37,504) which led me to this very important document: "Walter de Bruge Canon of York makes his will 1396—leaves 'unum librum vocatum Pers plewman.' York wills vol. 1. p. 209. This is William Langland's lifetime."—The italics in the quoted portion are mine.

It does not follow that the information contained in the note in the Trinity College Dublin manuscript is of any particular value. Indeed, the note is suspect because it contains an obvious contradiction: it tells us that the author of the poem is William de Longland and yet that his father was Stacy de Rokayle. This contradiction has led to what may be called without malice the Bastard Theory of the poet's origin. Thus A. H. Bright states:<sup>15</sup>

William, Eustace de Rokayle's son, was illegitimate. His mother is unknown. She may have been some "serving wench" at Hanley Castle, or more probably, the daughter of some farmer or tradesman. . . . Being the illegitimate son of a bondswoman, he was born to the position of a serf—adscriptus glebae. . . . His home was at the Longland . . . [a field] of the length of two furlongs or furrow-longs. . . . William . . . adopted the name Langland, or Longland, from the place where he had spent many years of his life, and which may have been connected with his mother's family. . . .

There is one grave difficulty in the way of accepting William Langland as the poet and a bastard. Nothing is clearer than the poet's scorn of illegitimacy! When the poet would describe False, one of the most vicious characters in the poem, he makes him a bastard:

*That False is a faytur [traitor]. a faylere of werkes
And a Bastard i-boren. of Belsabubbes kin.*
(A. II, 99-100)

So, too, when he heaps contempt upon some unholy nuns:

. . . Dame Johanne was a bastarde,
And dame Clarice a knyghtes douhter. a cokewald was hure syre.
(C. VII, 133-134)

Adultery is the practise of sham beggars:

þei weddeþ no wommon . þat þei with deleþ
Bote as [wilde] Beestes wiþ wo . worceþ togedere
And bringeþ forþ Barnes . þat Bastardes ben holden.
(A. VIII, 74-76)

There is no point in multiplying passages of this sort: it is clear enough, even to the casual reader of the poem, that the poet had no patience with Concupiscencia-carnis. He was not only a devout man, but pure; there is the greatest likelihood that he was a cleric, and if a cleric, a rigid churchman, for he would have enforced the test of legitimacy upon all who would be frocked:

<sup>15</sup> Allan H. Bright, New Light on "Piers Plowman" (Oxford, 1928), pp. 36, 37, 42, 43, 66.

For shuld no clerk be crouned . but yf he ycome were
 Of franklens and free men . and of folk ywedded.
 Bondmen and bastardes . and beggers children,
 Thuse by-longep to labour . and lordes [kyn to] seruen.
 (C. vi, 63-66)

It seems scarcely credible that the author of these lines was a bastard.<sup>16</sup> We are forced, then, to dismiss the notion that William de Longlond was the bastard son of Stacy de Rokayle or we are forced to dismiss entirely the note in the Dublin manuscript as reliable evidence about the author of the poem. This is the dilemma of the scholar who would trust too implicitly in the Walter de Brugge note.

Supposing that note, however, is not wholly reliable, is it any less acceptable? The answer must be, Yes and No. Supposing Walter de Brugge or one of his followers discovered there were afloat two theories about the author—one, that his name was William de Longlond, and the other, that the poet was the son of Stacy de Rokayle—is it not conceivable that he combined them in the memorandum in the Dublin manuscript? Once the bastard theory is dismissed this is the only possible interpretation of the contradiction in that memorandum, but it would appear to diminish considerably the value of the Dublin note. Walter de Brugge had no certain evidence if he combined two current theories about the poet. Yet if Walter de Brugge had no certain evidence, one of his informers may have had. Whoever supplied him with the Langland theory or whoever supplied him with the Rokayle theory may have had some glimmer of the truth. Our problem is to determine which of the theories of Walter de Brugge is the more acceptable.

Though scholars have persistently refused to take this view of the Dublin note,<sup>17</sup> they have pushed the search for William Langland to its <sup>16</sup> Attention should be called to Mr. Bright's error in assuming that the poet was a bastard and "a serf—adscriptus glebae." A bastard was a serf because of his body and legally was not free; the type of serf described as "a serf—adscriptus glebae" was a freeman, in that he held freely his tenement and could not be compelled to hold it unless he chose. See Henry de Bracton, Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae (London, 1878) I, 35; 52 (53).—The point is important because, while the latter might take his name from the soil, the former would be far less likely to. I am afraid that it was a misunderstanding of the phrase "adscriptus glebae" which led Mr. Bright to his theory that the poet took his name from the land. See below as to how the name Langland possibly originated.

<sup>17</sup> Note the entire absence of comment on Professor Samuel Moore's article, "Studies in Piers Plowman," Mod. Phil., xii (May, 1914), 19-50. Though Professor Moore followed a different line of reasoning and accepted the statements of Brigham, Sparke, Wisdom as utmost limits. It would appear that no one by this name existed in contemporary England; if he did exist, it would be yet another matter to prove him the poet. Since investigation fails to reveal such a person, are we not at liberty to doubt his existence, to ask ourselves if it were possible for a Langland myth to have sprung up from the poem without any person to attach it to? If this was a possibility, are we not free to investigate Brugge's other theory, that a son of Stacy de Rokayle made the poem?

It now becomes the purpose of this paper to suggest that, if William Langland were not the poet of Piers Plowman, it is astonishingly easy to show how the poem was attributed to him and how a whole myth has developed about him. If the identity of the poet could only be guessed at, it is clear that line 148 in Passus xv of the B-text might furnish a clue: "I have lyved in londe," quod I. "my name is Longe Wille." Reading this line backwards, provides, as has been pointed out countless times, the name "Wille Longelonde." Let us assume that it did provide the guess as to the poet's name. Does it follow that this was a good guess?

Those who hold that an inverted reading of B.xv, 148 does name the poet can hardly hold that the poet went by the nickname "Longe Wille." Fancy ever alluding to him as "Longe Wille Longelonde!" Yet there is the best evidence to show that the poet's nickname might have been "Longe Wille" and that the line does make sense without inversion. In another line in the poem, the author frankly alludes to his unusual size, and hence, to a reason for the nickname: "A muche man, as me þougte. and lyke to my-selve" (A.ix, 58; B.viii, 70; C.xi, 68). Yet rather than meet the dogged assertion that B. xv, 148 does have an astonishing double entendre, let us ask why the author should have risked so much on a device so easily deciphered. His life had been in jeopardy from the moment the A-text was issued. In that version of the poem, the author had championed anonymously the cause of the Good Parliament of 1376, and had made a host of enemies which included some of the most powerful people in England.<sup>18</sup> These enemies were in full control of the government again in 1377; they imprisoned Peter de la Mare, speaker of the Good Parliament, and forced even the great Bishop of Winchester, William Wykeham, to go into hiding. Is it likely that within a year or of greater antiquity than they really are, his conclusions about the Dublin note are very like mine. Differences will be developed below.

---

<sup>18</sup> John of Gaunt, Simon Sudbury, Alice Perrers, Adam de Bury, etc. See my article, "The Date of the A-text of Piers Ploughman," PMLA, XLVII (June, 1932), 354-362. Had the author made no political enemies, his attacks on the Friars would have endangered him.

two the poet would gratuitously furnish them with a clue to his identity? If William Langland existed in the fourteenth century,<sup>19</sup> he would have been easily located, but there were probably hundreds of Long Wills.<sup>20</sup> Those who hold that the poet named himself in B. xv, 148, have yet to explain why he did it.

Evidence for this first step in the presumptive growth of the Langland myth is provided by one of the oldest statements on the authorship of the poem, a note in the manuscript (formerly Ashburnham 130) now in the Huntington Library: "Robert or William Langland made pers ploughman." This statement reveals how the legend grew directly from the poem: B. xv, 148 provided some searcher with the name "William langland," but he thought he found it contradicted, as Skeat has shown,<sup>21</sup> by another line in the poem which he read as, "I, Robert in russet, roamed about":

Thus i-robed in russet, romed I about.
(A. ix, 1; B. v, 1-2)

The next stage in the growth of the legend was supplied by a little group of rabid sixteenth-century Protestants who were interested in the poem as propaganda. At this time, probably, the notion originated that the poet was born in Mortimer Cleobury, in the county of Shropshire, within eight miles of Malvern hills. This stage is represented by a note, said to be in Bale's hand, beneath the earlier one in the same manuscript in the Huntington collection:

Robertus langlande natus in comitatu Salopie in villa Mortymers Clybery in the claylande, within viij myles of Malborne hylles, scripsit, piers ploughman, li. i.

In somer season whan set was sunne.

It is easy enough to see how the conclusion that the poet was born in the neighborhood of Malvern hills was reached from the allusions to these hills in the poem, but scholars have always looked upon the designation of "Mortymers Clybery" for the poet's birthplace as a fact derived from some other source than the poem itself—they have looked upon it as an authentic tradition. Yet one part of this statement clearly reveals that the person who made it had no knowledge of the locality—the assertion that the "villa" is eight miles from Malvern hills. We do not have to look upon this (as Professor Moore does)<sup>22</sup> as a mistake for eighteen miles,<sup>23</sup> but as the guess of someone, unacquainted with the region, from one of the crude maps of the time, for the distance.<sup>24</sup> The point is not an important one, save as it indicates the general ignorance of the person responsible for the rest of the information.

<sup>19</sup> A most thorough search has failed to reveal him; see Skeat's "General Introduction." I may add that I have been through the printed records of the century in a search for him.

<sup>20</sup> See Skeat, "General Introduction," p. xiii; also Vol. iv, p. 212, note to line 68, and p. 344, note to line 286.—It might be suggested that the poet's several allusions to his life and appearance are deliberate falsifications to lead his enemies astray; I do not altogether endorse this view.

<sup>21</sup> B-text, p. xxviii, note 3.

The thing in this note which arrests attention is the phrase, "in the claylande." This lets the cat out of the bag—or rather, makes it possible for us to bell the cat—for it shows us how the idea that the poet's birthplace was Cleobury Mortimer originated. There was no district in Shropshire called "the Clayland," nor did Bale mean that there was one. In the second edition, in 1559, of his Scriptorium Illustrium Maioris Britannie . . . Catalogus (p. 474) he makes it clear that it is clay soil he has in mind:

Robertus Langelande, sacerdos, ut apparet, natus in comitatu Salopiæ, in villa vulgò dicta Mortymers Clibery, in terra lutea [italics mine], octavo à Malvern's montibus milliaro fuit. . . .

This insistence upon the "terra lutea" of Langland's birthplace reveals the origin of the selection of Cleobury for that place. Scanning many manuscripts for facts about the poet, either John Bale or Nicholas Brigham, or someone of their immediate group, inevitably came upon that passage at the end of one version of the A-text which describes the death of the poet and contains the all important line—

And is closed under clom . crist have his soul.

(A. XII, 100)

"Ah-hal!" said he, "we know that the poet came from the region of Malvern hills, and there he lies buried under the clay in his birthplace." If he decided that this line did furnish a clue, it is easy to see how, through a mistaken etymology,<sup>25</sup> this grew into the place name "Cleybirie" and ultimately into "Mortymers Clybery in the claylande."

Proof that, among the pseudo-erudite about 1550, Cleobury meant etymologically "Clay-bury" is possibly indicated by Crowley's spelling in his note on Langland's life.<sup>26</sup> Crowley got his information, he tells <sup>22</sup> "Studies in Piers the Plowman," Mod. Phil., XII (May, 1914), 19-50.

<sup>23</sup> There seems to be some difficulty as to the actual distance of the Malvern hills from Cleobury. See Allan H. Bright, New Light on "Piers Plowman" (London, 1928), p. 34.

<sup>24</sup> If he had used a map on which the Woodbury or Abberley hills to the north were undistinguished from the Malvern hills, of which they are a continuation, the actual distance would be eight miles!

<sup>25</sup> "Cleobury Mortimer (Salop). Dom. Cleberie, 1278; . . . = 'cliff-burge' or 'castle,' etc." J. B. Johnston, The Place Names of England and Wales (London, 1915).

<sup>26</sup> The Vision of Pierce Plowman, 1550 (second issue); reproduced in Bright, New Light, Appendix C, p. 79.—See also third entry in Bale's note-book below.

us, by consulting "such men as I knew to be more exercised in the study of antiquities, then I myself have ben." When the rabid Protestantism of each is considered as supplying the grounds of a mutual attraction, and proximity afforded the opportunity, is it not likely that Crowley chiefly consulted Bale for his information?<sup>27</sup>

Yet on whom we shall pin the infamy of thus selecting Langland's birthplace depends upon the interpretation of passages in Bale's note-book, and perhaps is not a vital matter. Worth revealing, however, is the character of the scholarship of Bale and his friends. The following are the entries in Bale's note-book:<sup>28</sup>

Robertus Langlande, natus in comitatu Salopie in villa Mortymers Clyberi in the cleyeland within viij myles of Malborne hylles, scripsit, Peers Ploughman

li. i. 'In a somer

sonday whan sote was ye sunne."<sup>29</sup>

Ex collectis Nicolai Brigam.

Visio Petri Ploughman, edita per Robertum Langlande, natum in comitatu Salopie, in villa Mortymers Clybery in the cley lande within viij myles of Malborne hylles.

li. i. 'In quodam estatis die cum sol caleret,' &c.

Ex collectis Nicolai Brigam.

Robertus Langlande, a Shropshyre man, born in Claybery about viij myles from Malverne hylles, wrote Peers ploughman

li. i. 'In a somer

season whan set was the sunne,' &c.

Ex domo Guilhelmi Sparke.

Robertus Langlonde, sacerdos (ut apparet) natus apud Clybery prope Malvernium montem, scripsit Peers plowghman opus eruditum ac quodammodo propheticum. Claruit A.D. 1369, dum Ioannes Chichester pretor esset Londini.

Ex Ioanne Wysdome medico.

The first two of these entries (and the earliest entered in the note-book) are marked, "Ex collectis Nicolai Brigam." Whether this means that Bale made these entries from facts he elicited from manuscripts<sup>30</sup> collected by Nicholas Brigham or whether some one else had already so

<sup>27</sup> Compare Crowley's statement with Sparke entry (infra) in Bale's notebook; see also D.N.B. articles for Bale and Crowley.

<sup>28</sup> Index Britanniae Scriptorum (autograph note-book, ed. R. Lane-Poole, Oxford, 1902), pp. 383, 509, 510.

<sup>29</sup> Above sonday Bale has written seson; above sole, warme.

<sup>30</sup> So "collectis" would seem to imply; when he is citing from one of Brigham's works, he clearly indicates it. Compare "Ex venatione Nicolai Brigam" (Index, p. 479, etc.). This is a reference to Brigham's De Venationibus Rerum Memorabilium (See D.N.B.), not now extant.

interpreted the manuscripts, there is no way of determining—no way of telling who is responsible for “Mortymers Clybery in the cleyland.”<sup>31</sup> But what is of importance is the fact that whoever did it was a third-rate scholar, only superficially acquainted with the poem,<sup>32</sup> for he has confused the first line of the lyric “Somer Sondag” “In a somer sonday whan sote was ye sunne”—with the first line of Piers Plowman.<sup>33</sup>

I do not know what the phrase “Ex domo Guilhelmi Sparke” affixed to the third entry in Bale’s note-book means. It may be interpreted to mean that, at the house of William Sparke, Bale got from a manuscript of the poem, or from someone who had studied a manuscript, the information he sets down. It is significant, however, that Bale followed his Brigham notes in his Catalogue and in the second note in the Huntington manuscript, for it indicates he placed no great weight upon this one. William Sparke was no learned searcher of manuscripts, as has generally been supposed, but a London draper, a contemporary of Bale!<sup>34</sup> The fact that Sparke apparently tailored “scutcheons” and sometimes dealt in books,<sup>35</sup> might mean that occasionally manuscripts passed through his hands and that “scholars” sometimes congregated at his house to wag their heads over them.

Evidently Bale held very highly Doctor John Wisdom, the source of the last entry in his note-book, for he quotes him directly (“Ex Ioanne Wysdome medico”) and adopts his language for the beginning of his article in his Catalogue and his date for the composition of the poem.<sup>36</sup> Who this Dr. John Wisdom was, has always remained a mystery—a mystery, however, commanding a great deal of respect.<sup>37</sup> I am now able to demonstrate that he was a contemporary medical quack:

<sup>31</sup> The most obvious solution the duplication of the errors of fact in this note-book, in the note in the Huntington MS, and in Crowley, is to suppose that Bale is responsible for all; in a word, that the entries in his note-book in these cases represent his interpretation of lines in the poem and his guess as to the distance of Cleobury from Malvern hills. I am not absolutely committed to this view.

<sup>32</sup> It is worth pointing out that all the “facts” embodied in the Langland myth were easily accessible, for they all lie at the beginnings or ends of Passus. Casual examination produced them!

<sup>33</sup> Professor Carleton Brown first called this to my attention.

<sup>34</sup> See Pat. Rolls, 6 Henry VII, pp. 337, 346; 13 Henry VII, p. 120; 17 Henry VII, p. 251; also letters in time of Henry VIII (infra, Note 35).

<sup>35</sup> “I have detained Sparke for my Lord’s scutcheons, but cannot get them yet, & must pay more for them than they are worth.” (John Husee to Lady Lisle, Letters & Papers, Foreign & Domestic, 30 Henry VIII, 17 April, No. 791; see also Nos. 784, 813). “I hope you have received the matins book & Mrs. Denny’s token by Sperke.” (Same correspondents, April 26, 1539, No. 859). William Sparke is not to be confused with the soldier, John Sparke, of Lord Lisle’s household, who was possibly a relative (See, ibid., 32 Henry VIII, No. 749. etc.).

<sup>36</sup> Reproduced, Bright, New Light, Appendix C, pp. 79, 80.

<sup>37</sup> See Bright, New Light, p. 34: “This John Wisdom may have been the father or brother of Robert Wisdom, Archdeacon of Ely. . . .”

Grants in June, 1542. No. 443.4: John Wysedom. Pardon of all penalties incurred by him in exercising the mystery of physic in London without license. The preamble states that information was sworn before the barons of the exchequer, 6 July last, by one Otwell Wylde that the said John Wysedome of the parish of St. Stephen's Colman Street, had since 13 July, 32 Henry VIII practised as a physician without having been approved by the Bishop of London or the Dean of St. Powles, contrary to the statute of 3 Henry VIII, and had thereby forfeited 55£, of which the said Wylde prayed to have half; it however appears that the said Wysdome has done many great cures upon the King's subjects, and that Wylde was instigated by evil disposed persons maliciously stomached against the said Wysedom. Also license to him and his son Gregory Wysedom to exercise the said science and mystery in London or elsewhere in the Kings dominions.<sup>38</sup>

This complete view of Bale's "authorities" must considerably diminish our respect for the "evidence" they have supplied about the poet. Yet it is these "authorities" and this "evidence" which furnish our notions today of the poet. Despite the "life" of the poet done by Mr. Allan Bright, under the influence, apparently, of Lytton Strachey and the "modern" school of biography, our actual knowledge of the poet is nil, or like theirs of the sixteenth century, the product of wild conjecture based upon a dubious interpretation of the text. It would appear that no genuine progress could be made with the authorship of Piers Plowman until we have completely abandoned the notions that either William or Robert Langland wrote the piece or that Cleobury Mortimer was his birthplace.<sup>39</sup> Is it not singular that Walter de Brugge, who, through the Mortimers, may be assumed to have had some knowledge of Mortimer Cleobury, makes no mention of this place in his memorandum? This part of the legend developed after his time.

If William Langland is only a myth, we are free to investigate the other theory advanced in the Dublin manuscript memorandum; namely, that the poet was a son of Stacy de Rokayle, a gentleman of Shipton-under-Wychwood, who was a tenant of Lord le Spenser. It is all important to note that this information could not have been derived from the poem itself. It must have come ultimately either from an informer who betrayed the poet or from a friend who deliberately led Walter de Brugge

<sup>38</sup> Letters & Papers, Foreign & Domestic, xvii, 255.

<sup>39</sup> Or Ledbury, either, which does happen to be eight miles from Malvern hills (See Bright, New Light, pp. 33 ff.). Of what significance is the fact that in the neighboring parish of Colwall in 1840 there was a meadow called "Longlands," if the name is common in the locality and merely describes a field of two furlongs length (Bright, p. 43)? Why does Mr. Bright make so much of the dubious "eight miles" (for which several explanations can be given) and ignore the more important phrase "in the Claylands"? See also, below.

(or an intermediary) astray. With the possibility of finding the poet no less than the possibility of missing him altogether, there might be some incentive for the idle scholar to run down the Rokayle theory.<sup>40</sup>

I began an investigation of the Rokayle family in 1927, and since that time I have gathered from the Rolls Series and from the various county publications many hundred records relating to this family.<sup>41</sup>

That there was such a person as Stacy de Rokayle, and that he held lands of Lord le Spenser in Oxford, was known before I began my search. Professor Samuel Moore had produced the following records:

1. In 1328 Roger de Nowers brought suit against Stacium de la Rokele for a debt of 40£.<sup>42</sup>

2. On Jan. 21, 1331, Eustace, son of Peter de la Rokele, acknowledged that he owed to Peter son of Eustace £100 to be levied, in default of payment, of his lands and chattels in the county of Oxford.<sup>43</sup>

3. On Mar. 20, 1349, Eustachius de la Rokeille was a juror in the inquisition post mortem, held at Shipton, Ox., upon the death of Hugh le Despenser.<sup>44</sup>

4. On Oct. 22, 1360, Eustace Rokaill' "of the county of Oxford" & others became mainpernors for Matthew de la Villa Nova, who was appointed keeper of the priory of Mynsterlovel, about 5 miles from Shipton-under-Wychwood.<sup>45</sup>

5. On May 19, 1361, Eustacius Rokaill' was a juror to determine if Thomas de Langeleye should be permitted to enfeof certain persons with his bailiwick of the forest of Wychwood.<sup>46</sup>

These five records established the existence of Eustace or Stacy de Rokayle and rather definitely located him in Shipton-under-Wychwood. Professor Moore then showed that the Despensers had held the manor of Shipton since 1322, and dropped the case. He made no search for a William de Rokayle, for he held that "Piers Plowman" was attributed in the fifteenth century to two different persons, to Robert Langland, a Shropshire man, and to an Oxfordshire man, a son of Stacy de Rokayle"<sup>47</sup>—not necessarily William at all.

<sup>40</sup> There is yet another inducement for garnering the records of the Rokayle family: if, after all, there was a William Langland who was the bastard son of Stacy de Rokayle, he may have assumed the name of Rokayle at times—for all but literary purposes. In no event would an inquiry be wholly futile.

<sup>41</sup> In addition to examining an equally large number dating from the Norman Conquest, collected by Professor William Rockwell, of Union Theological Seminary, whose generosity is here acknowledged.

<sup>42</sup> De Banco Roll, 247; Trinity, 2 Ed. II. Rot. 175 designated "Oxfordshire."

<sup>43</sup> Cal. Close Rolls, 1330-33, p. 178.

<sup>44</sup> Inquis. post. mortem, 23 Ed. III, Pt. II, No. 169 (12).

<sup>45</sup> Cal. Pat. Rolls, 1358-61, p. 474.

<sup>46</sup> Inquis. post mortem, 35 Ed. III, Pt. II, Second Numbers, 32.

<sup>47</sup> Mod. Phil., XII (May, 1914), 19-50.

That Stacy had a son, apparently his heir, is seen in the following record:

Release by Roger Rokayle of Oxford Middleton, to Sirs John Lovel and Richard Abberbury, knights, of all his right in a meadow called "Capronemed" in Shupton under Wychewode.<sup>48</sup>

Did he have another son named William? I produce the following:

Commission of Oyer and Terminer to [various persons] because the abbot of Ste. Katherine's, Rouen, complained that [various persons including] William, son of Eustace de la Rokele, felled his trees growing at Tyngwyck, co. Buckingham, carried them away, also his goods, and assaulted his men and servants.<sup>49</sup>

But this record was made at Lincoln, on Feb. 1, 1316! William, son of Eustace, must have been at least twelve to have had such a charge preferred, even technically, against him. If he were twelve in 1316, he was seventy-two in 1376 when the A-text appeared, seventy-four when the B-text appeared, and past eighty when the C-text was issued. This is possible, but not probable. The whole matter is complicated by the following record (Moore's No. 2):

Eustace, son of Peter de la Rokele, acknowledges that he owes Peter, son of Eustace de la Rokele, £100, to be levied in default of payment, on his lands and chattels in co. Oxford.

It appears that there were two Stacy Rokayles! There originally must have been two brothers or cousins, one named Peter and the other Eustace. Peter had a son named Eustace, who is our Stacy Rokayle of Oxfordshire; Eustace had a son named Peter, to whom the Oxfordshire man owes money. But the latter must also have had a son named William, who at best can be only a first cousin to the Stacy de Rokayle of Shipton-under-Wychwood. The elder Eustace was dead, however, before 1325, for a number of records after that time seem to indicate property settlements on Peter.<sup>50</sup>

If Stacy de Rokayle of Shipton-under-Wychwood had a son William, we have no record of it of the clear character of this one I have just produced. Yet there are, including this record, forty-three entries of a William Rokayle, in the fourteenth century, in my collections. It is necessary to examine these separately if we are to eliminate the names of those who cannot possibly be the poet, for it will appear that these records are not all of the same person.

Record 1.—This is a duplicate of the charge that William, the son of

<sup>48</sup> Ancient Deeds, II, B. 3268. 15 May, 14, Ric. II. See also B. 3269.

<sup>49</sup> Pat. Rolls, Ed. II, p. 652.

<sup>50</sup> Close Rolls, 18 Ed. II, p. 341; 18 Ed. II, p. 347; 4 Ed. III, p. 181; 3 Ed. III, p. 556.

Eustace de Rokele, committed robbery and assault at Tyngewyck, co. Bucks., only this entry is made at Clipstone, Jan. 1, 1316.<sup>51</sup>

Record 2.—William de la Rokele [with others, including William Jordan] is charged with trespass and theft at Aston, Ilmere, and Adynton, co. Bucks., on Feb. 18, 1328.<sup>52</sup> Because of the location of the alleged crime, and because of its nature, it would appear that this William might be the person mentioned in Record 1.

Record 3.—Pardon on Feb. 19, 1316, to William de Rokele and Elizabeth his wife [and others] of that which pertains to the king for a certain disseisin committed by them against William Jurdan of Bray, and Sibyl his wife, for which they were convicted and condemned to prison by John le Foxle and his fellows, justices of assize in the county of Berks.<sup>53</sup> Because the location is that of the adjoining county (to Bucks.) and because William Jurdan is mentioned, it seems probable that the William of this record is the same person as in Records 1 and 2.

Record 4.—Commission of oyer and terminer, on Dec. 8, 1309, to William de Echingham, John de Foxle, and John de Batesford, on complaint by Robert, vicar of the church of Burghershe that certain persons including William de Rokkeley assaulted him at Burghershe, co. Sussex, imprisoned him, cut off his testicles, and carried away his goods.<sup>54</sup>—Although I suspect that this is the same William de Rokele as of Records 1, 2, and 3, I cannot establish this. What is of consequence, however, is the fact that this William, like the persons previously mentioned, is too old from the record (1309) to be the poet.

Record 5.—This is of William Rokel, "masoun," of the Bury of St Edmunds.<sup>55</sup> He is a distinct person from the Williams previously mentioned, but there is no reason why we should suspect that he is the poet.

Records 6-18.—These records, dating from 1323 to 1428, are of two Williams, Sir William de la Rokele and his son of the same name, who are important Norfolk gentlemen, holding large properties.<sup>56</sup> This family is related to the Oxfordshire Rokeles, but neither William is a fitting candidate, from anything that I can discover, for the poet.

Record 19.—This mentions William de la Rokel as "late parson of Reddegrave," in 49 Edward III.<sup>57</sup> If the word "late" here means "dead" (I have discovered in going through the records it does not always mean this), we may dismiss Record 19 as not related in any way to the poet,

<sup>51</sup> Pat. Rolls, 9 Ed. II, pp. 425-426.

<sup>52</sup> Pat. Rolls, 2 Ed. III, p. 281.

<sup>53</sup> Pat. Rolls, 10 Ed. II, p. 621.

<sup>54</sup> Pat. Rolls, 3 Ed. II, p. 246.

<sup>55</sup> Close Rolls, 8 Ric. II, p. 571.

<sup>56</sup> Pat. Rolls, 16 Ed. II, p. 198; 7 Ed. III, p. 504; Close Rolls, 13 Ed. III, p. 35; Pat. Rolls, 18 Ed. III, p. 245; Close Rolls, 37 Ed. III, p. 476; Feudal Aids, III, pp. 484, 506-507, 523, 531, 534, 569, 590, 591. See also: W. Rye, Norfolk Families, p. 745.

<sup>57</sup> Close Rolls, p. 255.

for the B-text dates after 1376. At any rate, this record is without any present significance.

Record 20.—This is also without present significance. It is a license issued to William Rokele in 42 Edward III to cross from the ports of Southampton, Weymouth, or Melcomebe to parts of Brittany.<sup>58</sup>

Record 21.—This merely mentions a William Rokele as collector of the tax in Devon.<sup>59</sup> I cannot identify this man nor connect him with any branch of the family. It is unlikely that he is the poet.

Records 22-27.—These are not so easily dismissed. The first two are rentals in the parish of St. Ebbe, in the city of Oxford (the county of Stacy de Rokayle) in the years 1317, 1324, by Will. de la Rokele.<sup>60</sup> Record 24 makes William Rokel witness to a grant in the parish of All Saints, Oxford, on Sept. 25, 1346.<sup>61</sup> A William (spelled Rokaille) is again a witness in the parish of St. Thomas on Oct. 20, 1348 (Record 25).<sup>62</sup> In Record 26, William Rocaill' is a witness in the parish of St. Thomas, on May 17, 45 Edward III (1372).<sup>63</sup> In Record 27 a piece of land is mentioned as abutting a tenement "which will soon be of William Rokaylle, on the east," in the parish of St. Thomas, Oxford.<sup>64</sup>

If these are records of the same person, it is highly unlikely (because of his great age) that he is the poet. But Records 22 and 23 are not necessarily related to the rest; Record 24 is not necessarily related to the others; and the person mentioned in Record 27 may be distinct from the person or persons mentioned in Records 25 and 26, though this is unlikely since all are connected with the parish of St. Thomas.

In Records 24, 25, 26, 27 we have two, possibly three, candidates for the son of Eustace de la Rokele and the poet. The date of the last record (No. 27) is interesting, for it falls between the last record of Eustace and the single record of Roger who is disposing of property in Shipton-under-Wychwood. The fact that a William Rokele is connected at all with the university town is noteworthy, because of the several discussions in the poem itself of controversies which originated in Oxford—the attack on the Pelagians led by Bradwardine and the attacks on the Friars.<sup>65</sup> These disputations, however, attracted national attention; it is not necessary that the poet should have resided in the city to have written about them. Finally, one of the three William Rokeles, if not all, can conveniently be identified with the "Will Rokaille R" [egrator]<sup>66</sup> who is three times mentioned in an "assise of ale" (Records 28, 29, 30)

<sup>58</sup> Pat. Rolls, p. 130.

<sup>59</sup> Fine Rolls, 6 Ric. II.

<sup>60</sup> Ox. Hist. Soc. xci, pp. 141, 157.

<sup>61</sup> Ox. Hist. Soc. lxxxix, p. 420.

<sup>62</sup> Ox. Hist. Soc., xc, p. 388.

<sup>63</sup> Ox. Hist. Soc., xc, p. 387.

<sup>64</sup> Ox. Hist. Soc., xc, p. 487.

<sup>65</sup> Burrow's Collectanea, iii, 188 ff. See Wood, Hist. and Antiquities (ed. Gutch), p. 491.

<sup>66</sup> Med. Arch. of Univ. of Oxford, Vol. II.

in the city of Oxford about the year 1340. This keeper of a public house might have been the poet, but it is not likely.

Record 31.—Here William Rokel is a witness at Braye, on Oct. 29, 1346, to "the enrolment of a deed testifying that whereas William Jurdan of Braye the elder, granted and confirmed to Isabel, wife of Hugh de Berewyk, his daughter, all his lands in the town of Braye to hold for herself and the heirs of her body, with the remainder, in default of such heirs to William, the son of said William."<sup>67</sup>

Now this William Jurdan, the elder, of Braye, is in all likelihood the William Jurdan of Braye mentioned previously in Record 3 (Feb. 19, 1316) and in Record 2 (Feb. 18, 1328). Then the William Rokel of Record 31 is the William of Records 1, 2, and 3—who is possibly the first cousin, but not the son of Stacy de Rokayle.

Record 32.—Here this William Rokel's death is probably intimated. It is of date Aug. 6, 1351.

License for the alienation in mortmain by John de Bokehurst to the prioress and convent of Bromhale of the manor of Crecchefeld, co. Berks., said to be held in chief, in aid of the sustenance of a chaplain to be found by them to celebrate divine service daily for the good estate of the king, for his soul when he is dead, for the souls of his progenitors, and for the soul of William Rokele.<sup>68</sup>

Record 33.—This is dated Nov., 1371, and is definitely related to Records 31 and 32:

To the treasurer and barons of the exchequer: Order to stay their demand made by exchequer summons upon Alice, prioress of Bromhale for the portion of a sum of 36£, 5 s.,  $\frac{1}{2}$  d., falling upon her as tenant of certain lands which were of William de Rokele, late Queen Philippa's bailiff of the manors of Cookham, Braye, Binfield, and Sonynghull, thereof acquitting her, so that answer be made at the exchequer for the portions thereof falling upon others, the tenants of lands which were the said William's, as the king of his favour has pardoned her of the portion falling upon her for the said sum wherein the said bailiff was bound to Queen Philippa.<sup>69</sup>

This William, who endangered the bond which the prioress of Bromhale had posted for him, is undeniably some kin to the William of Record 33 for whose soul the prioress had employed a chaplain to celebrate daily divine service. The question is, What kin was he? If he was the son, he is of no interest to us, for he could not be the poet. It is quite conceivable however, that he was the son of the cousin of William of Records 1, 2, 3, 31, and 32—the son of Stacy de Rokayle. He might easily have persuaded the prioress to go his bond because of his relationship to the

<sup>67</sup> Close Rolls, 19 Ed. III, p. 677.

<sup>68</sup> Pat. Rolls, 25 Ed. III, p. 193. Italics are mine.

<sup>69</sup> Close Rolls, 45 Ed. III, p. 260.

William for whom daily services were said. It might be pointed out that the poet of Piers Plowman could very well have been bailiff for Queen Philippa—his animosity towards Alice Perrers, later the king's mistress, could thus be explained on a personal as well as a political basis.<sup>70</sup> We do not have to accept this William of Record 33, however, as the son of Eustace or as the poet.

Record 34.—This surpasses in interest previous records; it is a Papal letter, dated May, 1353:

To the bishop of Norwich. Mandate to examine and reserve to William de la Rokele a benefice in the gift of the abbot of Peterborough; the church of Estorp, diocese of London, is to be resigned.<sup>71</sup>

Esthorp, co. Essex, was the manorial home of one branch of the Rokele Family, the chief representative of which was then John, at times coroner, justice, tax collector, verderer, and escheator for the county of Essex.<sup>72</sup> It is conceivable that William, the son of the Oxfordshire relative, was given this living, and that Record 34 names for us the poet, whom most authorities concede was a churchman. Secondly, the fact that this William of Esthorp desired to be moved to the diocese of Norwich cathedral is perhaps of significance. Norwich, the county Norfolk, and the adjacent territory was the home of yet another branch of the family, as we have seen.

Further, certain facts, not before remarked, connect Piers Plowman with Norfolk, and it is possible that the poet enjoyed a brief residence in that district. I do not allude to the contemptuous reference in the poem to the "frenche" spoken in the "ferthest end of Norfolk" (B. v. 239), nor to the casual mention of places in the diocese of Norfolk ("Walsingham," "Rode of Bromholm," B. v. 145).<sup>73</sup> More interesting to my mind is the fact that the families of Rokele and But are closely associated in this region. John But, it will be remembered, is the person, allegedly, who added the lines to the A-text asserting that William the poet was dead. Now it is generally conceded that John But must have been a person of prominence whose word would have been readily accepted. Further, it is clear he must have been bound by some ties to the poet to have participated in the deception. In my records are many which show

<sup>70</sup> See PMLA, XLVII, 354 ff.

<sup>71</sup> Vol. III, I Innocent VI, p. 487.

<sup>72</sup> Close Rolls, 8 Ric. II, p. 511; 12 Ric. II, p. 607; 15 Ric. II, p. 535; 43 Edward III, p. 23; Pat. Rolls, 29 Ed. III, p. 296, etc.

<sup>73</sup> Yet these imply a greater familiarity with the district than the single reference to Shropshire—Malvern hills—on which so much weight has been placed. Bright's anxious effort to localize the poet has led him to take a description of the Ten Commandments for one of the manor of Brockbury, Colwall (New Light, pp. 60, 61)! Aside from London, there are more references to Essex and to Hampshire than to any other localities.

the long and intimate connection of the families in this region. For example, in one, Edward III acknowledges a loan from "William But and Thomas de Rokele, merchants of Norwich."<sup>74</sup> A John But, also a merchant of Norwich, is mentioned from 1333 to 1351 in the rolls.<sup>75</sup> This man is probably either the parent or kinsman of the John But, messenger, selected by Miss Rickert as the person who alleged that William was dead.<sup>76</sup> This perhaps may be inferred from the fact that the messenger is granted tenements in a general locality once common to both the Rokeles and Buts.<sup>77</sup> If the name of the poet of Piers Plowman is not Rokayle, the association of the names But and Rokele in the Norfolk region is certainly curious and may have been responsible for somebody's guess that the poet was William de Rokayle.

In view of the many allusions to the wool trade in the poem (especially B.v, 209 ff., where some of the tricks of the trade are revealed), the fact that Thomas Rokele and William and Thomas But, all merchants, served conjointly as takers of the wool customs in Norwich<sup>78</sup> perhaps has significance.

It is possible, further, to trace one rather unique manuscript of Piers Plowman directly back to the Norfolk Buts. In light of all the discussion about John But, it seems to me remarkable that no one has commented on the fact that at the end of manuscript Rawlinson Poet. 38 is the mark of ownership—"William Buttes"—in an early sixteenth-century hand. On a fly-leaf in this same manuscript is another note of possession: "Suum cuique, Tho[mas] Hearne. Sept. 29, 1732."

<sup>74</sup> Pat. Rolls, 1374-77, Edward III, p. 505.

<sup>75</sup> Close Rolls, 6 Ed. III, p. 434; Pat. Rolls, 13 Ed. III, p. 293; Close Rolls, 13 Ed. III, p. 168; Supple. Pat. Rolls, 14 Ed. III, p. 505; Pat. Rolls, 19 Ed. III, p. 484; Close Rolls, 14 Ed. III, p. 423; Close Rolls, 24 Ed. III, p. 216.

<sup>76</sup> "John But, Messenger and Maker," Mod. Phil., xi, pp. 107-116; July, 1913. Miss Rickert, of course, believes that John But actually did add the lines at the end of the A-text, and that William was dead. She doesn't explain how William wrote the B- and C-texts nor how he happened to use the same language as John But (Compare But's "medleth of makyng," A. xii, 105 with Ymagnatyf's accusation, "þow medlest with makynges . . ." B. xii, 16).

<sup>77</sup> At Barton-upon-Humber, Pat. Rolls, 2 Ric. II, p. 280; p. 296. The whole region from Ipswich, Suffolk, through Norfolk, and along the Wash is common to both the Rokeles and Buts. For example, Arnold de Rokeles is creditor of the king through the collectors of the Port of Boston (Close Rolls, 5 Ed. III, p. 373), while Robert But (named as a merchant of Norwich, Pat. Rolls, 18 Ed. II, pp. 74, 143) was collector of the wool customs in Boston (Fine Rolls, 15 Ed. II, pp. 65, 135; 1-5 Ed. III, pp. 36 ff.).

<sup>78</sup> Many records. Examples: Thomas de la Rokele appointed to take wool for the king's use, Close Rolls, 12 Ed. III, p. 359; Thomas But, searcher in Norwich, Fine Rolls, 12 Ed. III, p. 88; William But, collector of customs on wool in Norwich, Fine Rolls, 7 Ed. III, p. 346. Was it by any chance these Norfolk merchants who were merry and gave Will for his writing woolen clothes. (A. viii, 42 ff.)?

Turning to Hearne's Collections, I discover that when he first became interested in Piers Plowman he possessed no manuscript of the poem (and apparently consulted none), but depended upon Crowley's text and the advice of friends who did have access to manuscripts. (See his entry for Jan. 28, 1712/13, for example.) On May 29, 1725, he records, "Received from Peter Le Neve, Norroy King of Arms, three MSS. lent me by Mr. Le Neve which I must return before the tenth of the month." Item No. 2 he notes as "Piers Plowman in folio on vellum writ (for aught I know) near the time of the author. . . . So very different from the Print . . . that it seems new done by somebody."

By "the Print" Hearne means Crowley's text, from which MS. Rawlinson Poet. 38 would differ decidedly. Moreover, Hearne's brief description of the manuscript loaned him corresponds rather closely with that given by Skeat of MS. Rawlinson Poet. 38;<sup>79</sup> finally, no other manuscript of the poem is mentioned in the Collections. Hearne does note, however, that "The Hegesippius [Item, No. 1] and Piers Plowman cost £1 1/- apiece." This would seem to indicate that he thought of buying the manuscript, but he neither records returning it within ten days nor buying it—which is singular, for it was his habit to set down such things very methodically. There are entries to show his continued interest in the poem—on Aug. 11, on Sept. 7, and on Nov. 3, 1725—and then silence. Mr. Peter Le Neve died in 1729,<sup>80</sup> and it looks as if Thomas Hearne decided, after waiting three years, that no one would claim the manuscript and wrote in it: "Suum cuique. Tho. Hearne. Sept. 20, 1732. An imperfect manuscript of Piers Plowman." The Peter Le Neve, Norroy King of Arms, of whom Hearne borrowed the manuscript was none other than the famous Norfolk antiquarian, who may very well have got it directly from some descendant of the Butts.

Record 34, connecting a William de la Rokele with Norwich cathedral, is further interesting because when Walter Brugge, the March priest, wanted to study at one of the universities, he was granted a living at St. Mary's Burwell, in the diocese of Norwich.<sup>81</sup> It may be through this connection that Brugge made his conjecture that William de la Rokele was the author of the poem. Finally, Record 34 is of value, as we shall see, because it makes possible an early acquaintance between William de la Rokele and Thomas Brunton, bishop of Rochester, whom the poet certainly admired. Brunton was a monk of the Benedictine house at Norwich about the time of this record.<sup>82</sup> In summary, Record 34 may be described as interesting, though nothing more than that. Granted that the author may have been in Norfolk with the Rokeles of that

<sup>79</sup> B-text, Preface, p. xi, No. xiv.

<sup>81</sup> Pat. Rolls, 19 Ric. II, July 27, 1395.

<sup>80</sup> "Peter Le Neve," D.N.B.

<sup>82</sup> "Thomas Brinton," D.N.B.

county and formed an acquaintanceship with John But there, it does not follow absolutely that he is the Rokele of this record.

Record 35.—This, unfortunately undated, makes William de la Rokele witness to a grant by Roger the prior and the brethren of the house of St. Mary Best[une] of a message in Bestune.<sup>83</sup> If this record could be dated, it might be valuable as establishing William de la Rokele in Norfolk.

Record 36.—This merely proves the existence of a William de la Rokele in the general neighborhood of Peterborough (See Record 34): To the sheriff of Roteland: Writ of supersedeas, by mainprise of Robert de Burgh, John Ernesby, William Outeby, of Leystershire, and William Boteler of Gloucestershire, in favour of Robert Saunderson, at suit of William Rokel averring threats.<sup>84</sup>

Record 37.—If William of Record 34 failed to get the Peterborough appointment, this has possible interest as indicating his placement in adjacent Suffolk:

William de la Rokele, who has a parish church for benefice, value 40 marks with cure of souls, or 30 without, in the gift of the abbot and convent of St. Edmunds, is granted permission in 1353 to have a portable altar.<sup>85</sup>

Records 38, 39, 40.—These establish the existence of a William de la Rokele in Landemare, Wethirmonford, and Colchester, co. Essex.<sup>86</sup> Whether this man is to be identified with any other William in the records cannot be determined at the present time.

Record 41.—This surpasses in interest possibly all the preceding records.

Appointment upon petition of Thomas Bromlegh, late master of the house of Strode . . . of Thomas Cobham, John Frenenynham, and William Rockell to audit the accounts of the ferry and bridge between Rochester and Strode.<sup>87</sup>

This record forces our attention upon Professor G. R. Owst's excellent article, "The 'Angel' and the 'Goliardeys' of Langland's Prologue,"<sup>88</sup> in which he establishes beyond the shadow of a doubt that the "Angel" of the B-text Prologue who "lowed to speke in latyn" was none other than Thomas Brunton, bishop of Rochester. Owst believes, moreover, that:

even in the days when the original Vision was still taking shape in his own mind, [the poet] may have learned to look upon the good bishop as his spiritual guide,

<sup>83</sup> Ancient Deeds, III, p. 120. A. 4918.

<sup>84</sup> Close Rolls, 10 Ric. II, p. 254 (June 28, 1386). Yet see allusion to "Rainalde the Reve of Rotland sokene" B. II, 110.

<sup>85</sup> Papal Petitions, I, 253 (I Innocent VI).

<sup>86</sup> Pat. Rolls, 32 Ed. III, p. 57; 43 Ed. III, p. 216. Feudal Aids, VI, 442 (1412).

<sup>87</sup> Pat. Rolls. 9 Ric. II, p. 79.

<sup>88</sup> Mod. Lang. Rev., XX (July, 1925), 272-280.

a hero of earlier preaching scenes. Here, then, was one worthy to appear in his poem as "Conscience" [cites A-text, v, 9-23].

This argues for a long acquaintance of poet and bishop. Record 41 supplies evidence that in 1386 William Rokell was known to the ecclesiastical authorities in Strode (the house of Strode was in the diocese of the bishop) and well enough thought of to be nominated for this auditing position. It is proof, if one cares to look at it in this way, that William Rokell was known to the bishop of Rochester.<sup>89</sup>

Record 41 is valuable also because it brings together again the names of William de la Rokele and Walter de Brugge, "priest of the March of Ireland." It will be noted that one of the auditors of the accounts of the bridge and the ferry at Strode was Thomas de Cobham. The Cobhams were founders of Cobham College, of which the bishop of Rochester was one of the trustees.<sup>90</sup> After the death of the bishop control of this college passed to the hands of the Friars—those mendicants particularly hateful to the author of the poem. Further, in this obvious shift of favor, Walter de Brugge managed in some fashion to procure himself an income from the estate of Sir John de Cobham.<sup>91</sup> This common connection with the Cobhams may have supplied the March priest with the information for his guess that the author of the poem was William de la Rokele. Did the Cobhams betray him or did they mislead Brugge?

Record 42.—This names a Willelmo de Rokell as a witness to a quit claim in London and may furnish evidence as to the metropolitan residence which was certainly a part of the experience of the poet.<sup>92</sup>

Record 43.—This names "John de Cobham, knt.," and "William Rokylle" as witnesses to a court action in London, thus enforcing the Cobham connection and completing the list of records I have to present.<sup>93</sup>

In conclusion, it would appear that there is not one iota of evidence to show that the poet of Piers Plowman was William Langland, while there are enough facts connected with the name of William de la Rokele to lead to speculation. The mathematical probabilities that the poet was Rokele can be calculated by Professor Chambers.<sup>94</sup>

OSCAR CARGILL

New York University

<sup>89</sup> Brunton was bishop from 1372-1389, see D.N.B.

<sup>90</sup> Pat. Rolls, 48 Ed. III, p. 17, et seq.

<sup>91</sup> See note 17 above and text.

<sup>92</sup> Ancient Deeds, iv, 156, A. 7358 (undated).

<sup>93</sup> Close Rolls, I Ric. II, p. 137.

<sup>94</sup> Who has exploited the laws of chance for the first time in scholarly controversy. See his preface to Bright's New Light on "Piers Plowman," p. 10.

BISHOP BRUNTON AND THE FABLE OF THE RATS

PROFESSOR G. R. OWST has called attention to the fact that the fable of the rat parliament, which forms a striking addition to the B-version of Piers Plowman, was also employed with reference to contemporary political conditions in a sermon preached at just this time by Thomas Brunton, Bishop of Rochester.<sup>1</sup> Bishop Brunton, in an unsparing denunciation of corruption in the English government, praised Parliament for its action in bringing the conditions to light, but warned that vigorous steps must be taken to punish the guilty. Otherwise, he continued, Parliament would be like the assembly of rats and mice in the fable which decreed that a bell be hung about the cat's neck yet provided no one to carry the plan into execution.<sup>2</sup> Father F. A. Gasquet,<sup>3</sup> who was the first to point out this passage in Brunton's sermons, conjectured that the parliament in question was the "Good" Parliament and consequently suggested that the sermon was preached sometime in 1376. The interest which the document holds for both the historian and the student of Piers Plowman gives the question of its origin a peculiar importance. Detailed study of the manuscript arrangement of Brunton's collected sermons makes it possible, I believe, to arrive at a clearer

<sup>1</sup> "The 'Angel' and the 'Goliardeys' of Langland's Prologue," M.L.R., xx, 270-279.

<sup>2</sup> British Museum, MS. Harley 3760, fol. 187b: ". . . ne parlamentum nostrum comparetur fabuloso parlamento murium et ratonum, de quibus legitur quod cum in parlamento suo precipue ordinassent quod campanella cato cuilibet ad collum imponeretur vt mures ad campanelle sonitum premuniti ad sua possent confugere foramina satis tute, cuidam muri de parlamento reuertenti rato antiquissimus obuiauit. Cui noua inquirenti, cum mus veritatem negocij intimasset, intulit ille rato, 'Ista ordinacio est optima si quis in parlamento est consitutus vt sit tanti negocij executor.' Et ille respondisset hoc non fuisse in parlamento diffinitum, et per consequens inualidum erat et inane."

<sup>3</sup> Father Gasquet translated selections from several of Brunton's sermons in a chapter, "A Forgotten English Preacher," in his Old English Bible and Other Essays (London, 1908). Concerning the date of the sermon which uses the fable of the rats he remarks: "It is most probable, as I have said, that the sermon was preached during the time when the sitting of the 'Good Parliament' had led men of honesty and uprightness to hope, through the powerful support of the Black Prince, for an improvement in the government, and to insist on the removal of the King's evil counsellors, and the wretched courtesan, Alice Perrers, who had obtained supreme influence over him." (p. 64)

Mr. Owst, (loc. cit., p. 274), accepts without further evidence the date suggested by Father Gasquet: "Now Dr. Gasquet, apparently without any thought of the Plowman's Vision in his mind, has himself identified one sermon of the Brunton Manuscript with the period concerned, when the Good Parliament meets in April of the year 1376."

understanding of the circumstances which inspired the sermon and even to determine the very day on which it was delivered.<sup>4</sup>

In the only known copy of the collection (preserved as MS. Harley 3760) the sermon under discussion stands as No. 69.<sup>5</sup> The first three sermons have disappeared through the loss of ten folios at the beginning of the manuscript. The end of Sermon 4 and the beginning of Sermon 5 are also missing because of the loss of folios 14-17 (according to the original numbering). At the beginning and end of the manuscript the order of sermons appears hopelessly confused. The sermons in the main body of the manuscript (folios 35-284 by the present numbering), however, afford a series of clearly distinguished groups, with addresses designed for the Lenten season and for certain saints' anniversaries recurring at regular intervals. Within each of the groups, moreover, the arrangement of sermons, with sporadic exceptions, follows the course of the calendar year. These facts are sufficient to show that in this manuscript Brunton's sermons do not stand in a haphazard, nor yet an arbitrary, arrangement, but approximately in the order of actual delivery. Occasional inversions of calendar order indicate that MS. Harley is one or two steps removed from the original record, and it is easy to understand how such disarrangements might occur in the course of compiling and copying.

In endeavoring to determine the calendar years to which the several groups belong it is best to proceed on the basis of known biographical data. From some date prior to December 1366 until his appointment to the bishopric of Rochester, Thomas Brunton held the office of papal penitentiary and was presumably absent from England.<sup>6</sup> On January

<sup>4</sup> Sister Mary Aquinas Devlin in her unpublished doctoral dissertation, The Date of the C-Version of Piers the Plowman (University of Chicago, Dec. 1925), discusses Brunton and refers to his use of the fable. An abstract of this dissertation is printed in Univ. of Chicago Abstracts of Theses, Humanistic Series, iv (1925-26), 317-320. A typewritten copy is available at the library of the University. After most of my work on this sermon had been completed, I learned through correspondence that Sister Devlin intends to publish the much needed edition of all Brunton's sermons with an introductory discussion of their relation to Piers Plowman. Since, however, our investigations were wholly independent, it seemed worth while to offer my fragmentary results.

<sup>5</sup> A complete facsimile of this manuscript has been prepared as No. 58 of the Modern Language Association's Rotographs of Manuscripts and Rare Printed Books. Copies are available at both the Library of Congress and the New York Public Library.

<sup>6</sup> See Calendar of Entries in the Papal Registers, relating to Great Britain and Ireland, edited by W. H. Bliss and J. A. Twemlow (London, 1902), Papal Letters, iv, 25 for the following dispatch dated "7 Kal. Dec.," 1366 (4 Urban V) at Avignon: "To the dean of St. Agricola, Avignon, and the sacristans of Narbonne and Bourges. Mandate to cause two gold florins a day to be supplied by ecclesiastics, secular and regular, to Nicholas Lebrehon, an Augustinian friar, S.T.P. papal penitentiary and nuncio, and to Thomas de Brynthon, 31, 1373, however, the pope designated him Bishop of Rochester in place of the elected candidate.<sup>7</sup> He received the spiritual see on March 20, 1373, the temporal on April 8.<sup>8</sup> Since the sermons in MS. Harley were clearly delivered in England and many of them in the diocese of Rochester,<sup>9</sup> let us assume tentatively that the first of the annual groups is composed of those which belong to 1373, when Brunton first returned to England to enter upon his duties as bishop.<sup>10</sup> The second group would then be assigned to 1374, the third to 1375, the fourth to 1376, the fifth to 1377, and the sixth to 1378.

In order that the reader may have the evidence before him, I list herewith the sermons in the Harley collection from folio 35 to folio 284 with indication of the season to which each belongs. The sermon numbers are those given by the manuscript. Inserted titles mark off the annual groups.<sup>11</sup>

Examination of the ensuing list furnishes positive confirmation of the assumption that Group I is to be assigned to 1373 and the succeeding groups to the years immediately following. Number 78

a Benedictine, doctor of canon law, of the diocese of Norwich, papal penitentiary and nuncio, bearers of these presents."

The statement is usually made that Brunton spent these years at Rome, cf. Tanner, Dugdale, the D N.B. etc. Since, however, the papal court was at Avignon during this period and since an important duty of a papal penitentiary was to hear confessions in the principal church of the town where the pope was in residence (cf. Cambridge Medieval History, VII, 275), it seems probable that he was actually at Avignon.

<sup>7</sup> Wharton, Anglia Sacra (London, 1691), I, 378.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., p. 379.

<sup>9</sup> Brunton's activity as a preacher after he became bishop is well established. Walsingham (Historia Anglicana, edited by H. T. Riley, Rolls Series [London, 1863], I, 338-9) gives a summary of the sermon which he preached in connection with the coronation of Richard II in 1377. The present collection seems to correspond with the "Sermones solemnes li. i" concerning which Bale (Index Britanniae Scriptorum, edited by R. L. Poole and M. Bateson [Oxford, 1902], p. 51) had a note from the Monastery at Norwich. His preaching while at the papal court was probably covered by the "Sermones coram pontifice Romano factos, lib. i" which Bale (ibid., p. 433) mentions upon the basis of another note from the same source. That information about Brunton should have been preserved at Norwich is logical in view of the fact that he began his career as a monk there.

<sup>10</sup> This group begins with Ash Wednesday or possibly (see note 12 below) with Quinquagesima Sunday. Brunton was not installed as bishop until the third Sunday in Lent, 1373. There is, however, no reason why he should not have begun to preach before his formal assumption of the new office. If he left Avignon shortly after his appointment, he could easily have reached England by Quinquagesima (Feb. 27). It will be noted that Sermon 23, which comes in this group, is headed "apud Roffam" in the manuscript.

<sup>11</sup> Although the number of sermons in each of the groups is approximately the same, it will be observed that not more than seventeen are included within the limits of a single year. This, however, is what one would expect in the case of a bishop, who not having the responsibilities of a parish priest would preach only on special occasions.

Folio (New No )	Ser- mon No.	Sermon Headings Recorded in the MS.	Calendar Position
Group I (1373)
35a	17	Dominica 24 post Trinitatem, ad Clerum	Late summer <sup>12</sup>
37b	18	In Die Cinerum	Ash Wednesday
39b	19	Dominica Prima Quadragesime	First Sunday in Lent
42b	20	Dominica .3. Quadragesime	Third Lent
45a	21	Dominica in Passione	Fifth Lent
47a	22	In Die Parasceue	Good Friday
51a	23	Ad Clerum, in Visitacione, apud Roffam	Indefinite
52b	24	Dominica 5 post Trinitatem	Summer
54a	25	Dominica 6 post Trinitatem	Summer
55b	26	Dominica 14 post Trinitatem	Late summer
57a	27	Dominica in Quinquagesima	Winter <sup>12</sup>
60a	28	Dominica . . post Trinitatem	Summer
65a	29	Dominica . . post Trinitatem	Summer
66a	30	De Sancto Thoma Cantuariensi, ad Clerum	December 29
70a	31	In Die Natalis Domini	December 25
Group II (1374)
73a	32	In Die Cinerum, apud Roffam	Ash Wednesday
76a	33	Dominica Prima Quadragesime	First Lent
79a	34	Dominica 2a Quadragesime	Second Lent
82a	35	Dominica 3 Quadragesime	Third Lent
86a	36	Dominica 4a Quadragesime	Fourth Lent
90a	37	Dominica in Passione	Fifth Lent
93a	38	In Annunciatione Beate Virginis, apud Eylisforde in Domo Carmelitorum coram Domino de Grey <sup>13</sup>	March 25
96b	39	In Die Parasceueo	Good Friday
101b	40	In Die Pasche	Easter
103b	41	Dominica .3. post Pascham	Late spring
106b	42	De Maria Magdalena	July 22

<sup>12</sup> Here is an obvious error. The sequence would be much improved if No. 17 and No. 27 were interchanged. The former, assigned to the 24th Sunday after Trinity, would then come in a group belonging to the Sundays after Trinity instead of in mid-winter. The latter, for Quinquagesima Sunday, which is now so badly out of place among the Trinity sermons would come properly just before Ash Wednesday. That there has been some confusion in placing No. 17 is further indicated by the fact that in the manuscript, although this sermon is called No. 17 in the running title, it is numbered 27 at the beginning of the text. It seems probable, therefore, that in some way No. 17 and No. 27 have been reversed. The dislocation, however, must have occurred before or during the copying of this manuscript for it is not shown by the original foliation.

<sup>13</sup> The Carmelite house at Aylesford was founded 1242 by Richard de Grey, Lord of Cudnor. As late as 1492 a member of the Grey family was buried there. See The Victoria History of the Counties of England, Kent (London, 1926), II, 201 ff.

Folio (New No.)	Ser- mon No.	Sermon Headings Recorded in the MS.	Calendar Position
109b	43	Dominica infra Octavis Ascencionis, ad Clerum, Londinum	Early summer
111b	44	(No heading given)	Indefinite
115a	45	(No heading given)	Indefinite
119a	46	Londinum	Indefinite
120b	47	Apud Roffam, in Celebracionem Ordinacionis Group III (1375)	Indefinite
122a	48	Dominica post Epiphaniam	January
126a	49	In Die Cinerum	Ash Wednesday
128b	50	Dominica Prima Quadragesime, apud Derteforde	First Lent
131b	51	Ad Clerum	Indefinite
133a	52	In Festo Annunciationis Beate Virginis	March 25
136a	53	Dominica Quarta Quadragesime	Fourth Lent
139b	54	Dominica in Passione Christi	Fifth Lent
144a	55	In Die Cene, in Ecclesia Cathedrali Roffense	Holy Thursday
146a	56	In Die Parasceue, in Ecclesia Cathedrali	Good Friday
152a	57	Pro Mortuis, apud Pepinbery	Indefinite
155a	58	Pro Mortuis, apud Wrotham	Indefinite
156b	59	Pro Mortuis	Indefinite
159b	60	De Sancta Maria Magdalena	July 22
162b	61	De Apostolis Petro et Andrea	May 15
164a	62	De Mortuis, apud Clelisfeld Group IV (1376)	Indefinite
166b	63	In Capite Ieiunij, Roffam	Ash Wednesday
169b	64	Dominica Prima Quadragesime	First Lent
172b	65	Dominica Tercia Quadragesime	Third Lent
175a	66	Dominica in Passione	Fifth Lent
179a	67	In Die Cene	Holy Thursday
180b	68	In Parasceue	Good Friday
186b	69	Dominica 5a post Pascham	Fifth Sunday after Easter
190b	70	Dominica	Indefinite
194a	71	Dominica	Indefinite
196b	72	Dominica in Septuagesima	Winter
200a	73	Dominica Prima post Pascham	Spring
203a	74	In Exequiis	Indefinite
205a	75	In Visitacione	Indefinite
206b	76	Dominica Prima Quadragesime	First Lent
209b	77	De Sancta Maria Magdalena	July 22
212a	78	Apud Roffam pro Domino Edwardo, Principe Wallense Group V (1377)	Summer or Fall, 1376
214a	79	In Die Cinerum	Ash Wednesday
216b	80	In Parasceue, apud Roffam	Good Friday
221b	81	Dominica .3a. Quadragesime	Third Lent

Folio (New No.)	Ser- mon No.	Sermon Headings Recorded in the MS.	Calendar Position
224a	82	In Festo Annunciacionis	March 25
226b	83	De Sancta Maria Magdalena	July 22
230a	84	Dominica . . ; De Sancto Lodewyco	August 19 (?)
233a	85	Ad Clerum, Londinum	Indefinite
237a	86	Dominica in Passione	Fifth Lent
240b	87	In Die Cene	Holy Thursday
243a	88	Dominica Prima post Trinitatem	Early summer
245b	89	Dominica 4a post Trinitatem	Summer
248a	90	De Sancta Maria Magdalena	July 22
251b	91	De Translacione Sancti Thomae Cantuariense	July 7
256b	92	Dominica post . . , ad Clerum	Indefinite
Group VI (1378)
261a	93	Dominica Secunda Quadragesime	Second Lent
267a	94	Apud Roffam, in Elezione Roffense	Indefinite
268a	95	Dominica 2 post Pascham	Late spring
271a	96	Dominica Prima Quadragesime	First Lent
274b	97	In Die Cene, apud Roffam	Holy Thursday
277a	98	In Festo Annunciacionis, apud Hoo	March 25
280b	99	Dominica Quarta Quadragesime	Fourth Lent
283a	100	Dominica infra Octavis Ascencionis	Early summer
285b	101	In Festo Sancte Marie Magdalene, apud Cobham	July 22

is a funeral tribute to Edward, Prince of Wales. Since the Black Prince died in June 1376, this sermon must have been composed in the summer or early fall of that year and serves, therefore, to identify Group IV with 1376. Even more conclusive is the confirmation supplied by the position of the Feast of the Annunciation (March 25) with reference to the Sundays in Lent during the years under consideration. In Group II the Annunciation stands between Dominica in Passione and In Die Parasceue; and in 1374 the actual dates were Passion Sunday—March 19; Annunciation—March 25; and Good Friday—March 31. In Group III the Annunciation precedes the Fourth Sunday in Lent; in 1375 the respective dates were March 25 and April 1. Group IV, like Group I, has no sermon for the Annunciation. In Group V, the Annunciation follows the Third Sunday in Lent; in 1377 the dates were March 1 and March 25.<sup>14</sup> In Group VI the Annunciation precedes the Fourth <sup>14</sup> This group is less satisfactory than the others because, after a break caused by the insertion of two sermons which belong to the summer season and one headed simply Ad Clerum, there is a sermon for the fifth Sunday in Lent. In 1377 March 25 was the Wednesday in Passion Week and were the sequence perfect the sermon for the Annunciation would follow that for the fifth Sunday in Lent. The irregularity is doubtless accounted for by the confusion caused by the intruding sermons. In Group VI the sermon for Holy Thursday is obviously misplaced since it comes before that for the fourth Sunday in Lent.

Sunday in Lent; the dates in 1378 were March 25 and March 28. For all the years suggested, therefore, the groups in MS. Harley and the actual Lenten sequences correspond. If, on the other hand, the groups be assigned to any other series of years at about this period, the sermon on the Annunciation will not come in its proper place with respect to the Lenten Sundays in more than one, or at most two groups. Finally in Group III (1375) no less than four sermons are headed Pro Mortuis although no sermons with this title appear in the other groups. The most natural explanation would seem to be that these sermons were called forth by the unusual mortality of that visitation of the plague which began in the south of England in 1374 and was especially virulent in London in 1375.<sup>15</sup>

No. 69—the sermon which particularly concerns us—stands in Group IV, and accordingly belongs to the year 1376. This address carries the heading Dominica Quinta post Pascham. In 1376 the fifth Sunday after Easter fell on May 18. Consequently we are justified in fixing this as the definite date on which Bishop Brunton put forth his bold application of the familiar fable of the attempt made by the rats and mice to restrain their ancient enemy, the cat.

This date fits remarkably well with the sentiments expressed in this sermon which, as Father Gasquet and Professor Owst have pointed out, reflects the political and governmental situation at the time of the Good Parliament. The phrase, "the king and his sons,"<sup>16</sup> which Brunton uses to describe the royal family, would have been pertinent at any time before the death of Edward III in June 1377. The majority of his references to contemporary conditions, however, would have lost their value after the session of the Good Parliament.<sup>17</sup> Brunton states that persons of evil character have long had control of the government,<sup>18</sup> that a

<sup>15</sup> See The Anonimale Chronicle 1333 to 1381 from a MS. Written at St. Mary's Abbey, York, edited by V. H. Galbraith, Publications of the University of Manchester CLXXV, Historical Series XLV (Manchester, 1927), p. 77: "Mesme celle an mille CCCLXIII (a scribal error for CCCLXXIII) comensast le quart pestilence en plusours villes en Engleterre devers le south pais et endurrast par longe temps En quel pestilence murrerent en lan apres graunt noumbre des citisaunz de Loundres de les meliours et plus riche de toute la cite et plusours vaillaunt clerkes de la Chauncellerie et de le Commune Bank et del Eschequer."

<sup>16</sup> MS. Harley 3760, fol. 190a: "rex et filij"; "regi et filijs."

<sup>17</sup> In the fall of 1376, to be sure, the reforms instituted at this session were swept aside by the king who dissolved the advisory committee appointed by Parliament and restored Alice Perrers and several of the banished officials. By that time, however, John of Gaunt had personally assumed a dominant place in the government, and there seems little doubt that Brunton's attack on official corruption, if made at this later period, would have taken a very different direction.

<sup>18</sup> MS. Harley 3760, fol. 187a: "Set numquid est scitum et quasi vndique predicatum quomodo singulares persone non virtuose set vicose et scandalose per multa tempora habuerunt priuose regimen huius regni?"

woman (obviously the king's mistress, Alice Perrers) is exerting an undue and pernicious influence,<sup>19</sup> that the king and his sons are being em-poverished by greedy officials,<sup>20</sup> and that the king needs more advisers chosen from men of high rank and proved excellence.<sup>21</sup> Surely these complaints and suggestions were made before the Good Parliament had brought about the disgrace of a number of high officials upon charges of peculation, had banished Alice Perrers from court, and had appointed a committee of peers to advise the king. Nor would Brunton have described the latter as ignorant of the conditions in question after a detailed knowledge of these very points had been forced upon him by Parliament.<sup>22</sup>

Brunton's text for his sermon is the phrase Factor operis hic beatus (James I, 25). This text he applied with particular emphasis to Parliament because that body, which apparently was in session, had called attention to certain abuses but had not yet taken steps to bring about reform.<sup>23</sup> Indeed, this was just the point that the fable of the rat parliament was designed to drive home. It is, therefore, particularly noteworthy that these were the conditions existing precisely at the time to which this sermon has been assigned on the evidence of the manuscript. By May 18 all the members of Parliament—and presumably most Londoners—knew of the scandalous conduct of public affairs in the preceding years. The king, however, had not been formally notified, nor had action been taken against the guilty officials. Within ten days after this date Parliament by doing just these things had carried out Brunton's most important suggestions.

The following table, which puts the date determined for the sermon

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., fol. 190b: "Nec est decens vel tutum quod ad vnus vxoris cingulum pendere debeant omnes clauēs."

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., fol. 190a: "Apparetne vobis regnum equitatis si rex et filij per consiliarios ita sunt ducii quod ipsi sunt pauperes et erumpnosi prae gradu et ipsi duciores ita habundant pecunijs?"

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., fol. 190b: "Rex autem Anglie, licet habeat consiliarios et officarios prudentes et fideles, tum in arduis per vnus consilium. . . ."

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., fol. 187b: "Tacent domini temporales quod timent offensam regis, trepidantes vbi non est verisimiliter trepidandum, quod si creduliter veritas diceretur, ita est trac-cabilis et ducilis quod talia in regno nullatenus pateretur."

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., fol. 187a: "Primo inter opera cetera in regno Anglie a retroactis temporibus at-temptata, iam pendet in manibus opus arduum et excellens ex eo quod ad parliamentum sunt vocati prelati, domini, et communes ad traccandum et declarandum de regimine bono regni. Set quid proderit puncca parlamenti traccare et facca transgressorum publice de-clarare nisi post declaracionem sequitur penalís executio debita in hac parte, cum frustra sint iura, nisi sint qui iura debite exequuntur? . . . (fol. 187b) Non sic, domini reuerendi, set ne parliamentum nostrum comparetur etc. . . . (fol. 188a) Amore Christi et ob defen-sionem regni in tanto discrimine constituti, non simus tantum locutores set facciores."

in its proper place in the best extant chronology of the Good Parliament (that preserved in the Anonimalle Chronicle of St. Mary's, York), makes this clear.<sup>24</sup>

Event	Anonimalle Chronicle	Calendar Date
Parliament convenes.	Le lundy en le tierc symaigne apres le Pasche (p. 79).	Monday, April 28.
First separate meeting of Commons denounces conditions.	Le secunde iour apres (p. 80).	Wednesday, April 30.
Commons deliberate and select Sir Peter de la Mare as spokesman.	Le tierce iour apres... tanqe la vendredi proschein (p. 82 f.).	Saturday, May 3– Friday, May 9.
Peter de la Mare denounces corruption in full Parliament.	Le lundy apres (p. 85).	Monday, May 12.
King grants council of Peers requested by Commons to advise with them.	Le dysmaigne apres (p. 88).	Tuesday, May 13.
Date of Brunton's Sermon.	Dominica Quinta post Pascham.	Sunday, May 18.
First meeting of Commons with its advisory committee demands that evils be corrected.	Le lundy proschein (p. 88).	Monday, May 19.
Separate meetings of Peers and Commons held.	Lendemaigne (p. 90).	Tuesday, May 20.
Commons in presence of Peers demand that Alice Perrers be banished and council appointed to direct the king.	Le quart iour apres (p. 90).	Saturday, May 24.
Demands announced to the king who consents. The council chosen. Alice Perrers and the guilty officials removed.	Le secunde iour apres (p. 91).	Monday, May 26.
Parliament disbands.	La translacion de seint Benett (p. 79).	July 11.

<sup>24</sup> The calendar dates in column three are those supplied by Professor Galbraith. Concerning this chronology T. F. Tout (Chapters in the Administrative History of Medieval England [Manchester, 1928], p. 291 note) makes the following comment: "Fortunately we now have in the Anonimalle Chronicle of St. Mary's, York, admirably edited by Mr. V. H. Galbraith, a new source, which makes absolutely clear the chronology of at least its (i.e. the Good Parliament's) early proceedings. . . ."

To determine the circumstances in which the sermon was preached is a more difficult matter. For a number of the other sermons the manuscript gives the place of delivery, the type of audience, or both. In this instance these details are omitted. There is reason, however, to suppose that the place was London. Brunton often preached there,<sup>25</sup> and, as Professor Owst pointed out, Sermon 28 mentions preaching at the capital among the imperative duties of his office.<sup>26</sup> There is evidence, moreover, that Brunton himself was a member of the Good Parliament,<sup>27</sup> and while it remains possible that he returned to Rochester or went to some other place to preach this sermon, far more probably he did not. The phrase domini reuerendi, which he uses in addressing his audience, indicates that the sermon was not delivered before an ordinary congregation. In any case it would seem to have been a congregation composed in the main of members of the parliament. Father Gasquet offered the interesting suggestion that the group in question was the Convocation which met in connection with the Good Parliament.<sup>28</sup>

From what has thus been determined as to the date and the occasion upon which Brunton's sermon was delivered, it is clear that the author of the B-text of Piers Plowman could hardly have failed to know of it.<sup>29</sup>

<sup>25</sup> Cf. Nos. 12, 43, 46, 108.

<sup>26</sup> Owst, loc. cit., p. 278. MS Harley 3760, fol. 60b. "... predicando, et precipue post curam nostram Londonijs predicando, quia est civitas Anglie principalis. . . . Item quia ibi est maior deuocio et capacios populus et ideo presumitur maior fruccus. Item quia quilibet episcopus Anglie habet Londonijs subditos vel parochianos, igitur ibi docens quasi predicat suis et ceteris ecclesiis Anglicanis, vt ista in effectu faciendo "

<sup>27</sup> "L'Evesq de Roucestre" is listed in the account of the Good Parliament preserved in the Rotuli Parliamentorum (II, 322) among the "Hearers of Petitions for Gascony and the Other Lands beyond the Sea."

The Chronicon Angliæ (edited by E. M. Thompson, Rolls Series [London, 1874], p. 69) includes the Bishop of Rochester among the peers chosen by the commons to advise with them. Unfortunately his presence on this second committee is not confirmed by the other extant lists. That in the Rotuli Parliamentorum (II, 322) substitutes the Bishop of St. Davids; that in The Anonimale Chronicle (p. 91) the Bishop of Bath. Could we be certain that Brunton served in this capacity, the interest of No. 69 would be even greater than it is.

<sup>28</sup> Gasquet, op. cit., p. 64 "It is even possible that the discourse, spoken evidently to the clergy, may have been delivered at the meeting of Convocation, which at this time (during the session of the Good Parliament) insisted that William of Wykeham must be allowed to take his place at their deliberations, although he had been disgraced and deprived of the resources of his See of Winchester through the influence and misrepresentations of those who held the old King in their power."

There is some confusion here. The Convocation which demanded the restoration of William of Wykeham was that which met in conjunction with the "Bad" Parliament of 1377. He was not disgraced until the fall of 1376 and his downfall at that time was in large measure due to his activity as a member of the Good Parliament.

<sup>29</sup> Since Skeat's edition of the B-Text for the Early English Text Society, Original Series xxxviii (London, 1869), it has been the consensus of opinion that the poem reflects the Certainly an address of so controversial a nature must have created a considerable stir. The original audience may have been limited in size and character, but the report of the sermon must have come to the attention of everyone who had acquaintance with political events. In this report the daring application of the well-known fable would certainly have had an important part.

The author of the B-text, then, presumably had Brunton's use of the fable in mind when he retold it in the prologue of his own poem. The material could have come to him from other sources, for instance, from Odo of Cheriton or the Contes Moralisés of Nicholas Bozon.<sup>30</sup> Fables however, were not a customary device with the author, in the whole bulk of the three versions of Piers Plowman this is the only real fable. The probability at once suggests itself, therefore, that this unique example was the result of an unusually strong stimulus. Brunton's sermon, which had made the story familiar, and possibly bruited, as a weapon of political controversy, was certainly better suited to act as this stimulus than a general and otherwise quiescent knowledge of fable literature.

The relation of Brunton's sermon to the B-text makes the definite date which we have established for the former especially valuable. If the addition to the prologue was suggested in this way, then the middle of May 1376 becomes the terminus a quo for this part of the poem. How long after this, however, the passage in question—and the rest of the poem—were completed cannot be determined on this basis. It is likely that the sermon would be remembered for some time, so that a number of years may have intervened between Brunton's address and the issuance of the B-text. The more difficult problem of the terminus ad quem must be approached from other angles.<sup>31</sup>

ELEANOR H. KELLOGG

New York University

---

Good Parliament. M. Jusserand, Piers Plowman, A Contribution to the History of English Mysticism (London, 1894), stresses this particularly.

<sup>30</sup> Odo of Cheriton, edited by Hervieux, Fabulistes Latins, II, 633. Nicholas Bozon, Les Contes Moralisés de . . ., edited by L. T. Smith and P. Meyer, (Paris, 1889), p. 144 and p. 212.—Brunton probably got the fable from a source of this kind. The use of exempla, especially fables, was a consistent part of his preaching technique. The present fable is treated in his usual manner; cf. MS. Harley 3760, fol. 61.

<sup>31</sup> Although our investigation thus confirms Professor Owst's general hypothesis as to the source of the fable in the B-prologue, it seems impossible to accept his interpretation of the allegorical figures in this part of Piers Plowman as allusions to actual persons prominent at the time of the Good Parliament. The theory that Brunton himself was the historical prototype of the "angel of heuene" who spoke "in the eyre on heigh" (B, Prologue, l. 128) is particularly unconvincing. The phraseology of the passage is more or less conventional, and the warning spoken by an angelic voice is a literary commonplace. It seems to have grown up in connection with the story of the divine disapproval of the Donation of Constantine which was a favorite with Wyclif and which is introduced, without this particular phrase, in another part of the B-text (xv, 519 ff.). See 1. John of Paris (ca. 1290). "... audita est vox angelorum dicentium in aere," De Pot. Reg. et Pap., xxii (cited by Skeat, Piers Plowman, Notes, EETS 67 [London, 1877], p. 367). 2. Wyclif: "vox audita est in aere angelica," Dialogus iv, 18 (cited by Skeat, op. cit., p. 367). "þer was herde a voyce in þe eyre . . ."; "þe awngelle of god, aperyng in þe eyre in þe tyme of doynge of þis wickid dede, saide þes wordis," The Clergy May not Hold Property, edited by F. D. Matthews, The English Works of Wyclif (London, 1880), p. 374 and p. 380. 3. Gower:

"Ly Rois du gloire celestin
Amont en l'air de son divin
Par une voix q'estoit celestre
Faisoit crier . . ."

Mirour de L'Omme, l. 18640 ff., edited by G. C. Macaulay, The Complete Works of John Gower, i, The French Works (Oxford, 1899);

"Hec vox angelica, que nuper in ethere Romam Terruit . . .",

Vox Clamantis, iii, 283 f., edited by Macaulay, iv, The Latin Works (Oxford, 1902);

"Anon as he hath mad the yifte,
A vois was herd on hih the lifte,
Of which al Rome was adrad,"

Confessio Amantis, ii, 3486 ff., edited by Macaulay, ii, The English Works (Oxford, 1901). 4. Pecoock's Repressor: "a voice of an aungel was herd in the eir," p. 323 (cited by Skeat, op. cit., p. 367).

VI

THE TWO PETROS IN THE "MONKES TALE"

THE chronology of the "Monkes Tale" has been often discussed,<sup>1</sup> and there are widely divergent views regarding its composition. Skeat and others have suggested that it was an independent work of Chaucer's, written early as the beginning of a collection after the form of the De Casibus.<sup>2</sup> More recently, Professor Robinson has suggested that Chaucer's model was the Roman de la Rose, which provided not only the source for some of the stories but the connecting link of the Fortune Moral as well. If Chaucer did use the Roman de la Rose, the "Monkes Tale" may very well have been written early, at a time, indeed, when the French influence on Chaucer was still strong. For this reason and others, Professors Robinson and Kittredge regard the poem as an early composition.<sup>3</sup> On the other hand, Professor Tatlock<sup>4</sup> has argued that the poem was written expressly for the Canterbury Tales and at a time when this project was already well under way.

A complicating factor in dating the "Monkes Tale" is, however, the series of tragedies, conveniently termed the Modern Instances. These tragedies deal with mediæval figures, whereas the other stories are drawn from biblical and ancient literature. Accordingly, the Modern Instances are considered by some scholars as having been later appended to the "Monkes Tale." In any case, the account of Bernabo could not have been written earlier than 1386, since he was slain in December, 1385.<sup>5</sup> It is notable, however, that this tragedy differs in two ways from the others. First, it lacks formal reference to the moral concerning Fortune, which is the central theme of the poem as a whole. In the second place, as Professor Kittredge<sup>6</sup> has pointed out, the stanza bears every indication of being an afterthought, because Chaucer makes the query (B<sup>2</sup>3591): "Why sholde I nat thyn infortune acounte. . . ?"

In considering the date of the Modern Instances, however, we reckon <sup>1</sup> I wish to express my gratitude to Professors Cirot, of the University of Bordeaux, and Oliver Towles, of New York University, for answering my inquiries regarding Spanish and French literature, respectively. My chief indebtedness is to Professor Carleton Brown, whose assistance throughout this investigation and especially in the study of manuscripts has been most generous. Other detailed obligations are expressed in their proper places.

<sup>2</sup> Skeat, Complete Works . . . (Oxford, 1900), III, 427 f.

<sup>3</sup> Robinson, Complete Works . . . (Camb. ed., 1933), p. 14; and Kittredge, Date of Chaucer's Troilus . . . (Chaucer Soc., 1909), p. 46.

<sup>4</sup> The Dev. and Chron. . . . (Chaucer Soc., 1907), pp. 164-172.

<sup>5</sup> See Skeat, Oxf. Chaucer, v, 240-241, and Robinson's note, p. 856.

<sup>6</sup> Op. cit., pp. 44-46.

with the fact that in the manuscripts these occupy two alternate positions in the "Monkes Tale." Twenty-seven manuscripts<sup>7</sup> introduce them immediately following Zenobia, while fifteen<sup>8</sup> place them at the end, following the tragedy of Cræsus. Regard for chronology would, of course, favor the latter arrangement; but the Monk in his prefatory lines (B<sup>2</sup>3178) expressly announces that he does not propose a chronological arrangement for his tragedies: "But tellen hem som bifore and some bihynde." In the light of this statement, Chaucer's authority would rather favor the middle position. Furthermore, as Professor Robinson remarks, the fact that the account of Cræsus closes with a definition of tragedy makes it "a natural ending of the whole tale."<sup>9</sup>

Before drawing any conclusion in regard to this, it is necessary to note also an important difference in the text of the "Nun's Priest's Prologue" which immediately follows the "Monkes Tale"; and which seems to have some connection with the order of the tragedies. Whereas in twenty-nine manuscripts<sup>10</sup> the "Nun's Priest's Prologue" appears in its full form, in no less than ten manuscripts<sup>11</sup> a passage of twenty lines (B<sup>2</sup>3961-80) is lacking. It appears significant, now, that when one reads the prologue with these lines omitted, the connection is in no wise impaired. Moreover, with these lines omitted the Knight continues as the speaker down to line B<sup>2</sup>3995, while the Host comes into the dialogue with the line, "Thanne spakoure Hoost with rude speche and boold (B<sup>2</sup>3998)." It would be indeed singular if a scribe could have omitted this passage and left the text so perfectly connected. What is most significant of all, however, is that in this passage we have the statement, "He spak how Fortune covered with a clowde (B<sup>2</sup>3972)," which refers back to the last line of Cræsus: "And covere hire [Fortune's] brighte face with a clowde (B<sup>2</sup>3956)." This proves conclusively that when this passage was written the Modern Instances did not stand at the end.

It might possibly be argued that the Modern Instances stood at the end in the first draft and that Chaucer then put them back into the mid-

<sup>7</sup> B<sub>o</sub><sup>1</sup>, B<sub>w</sub>, C<sub>p</sub>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>2</sup>, F<sub>i</sub>, G<sub>i</sub>, H<sub>a</sub><sup>2</sup>, H<sub>a</sub><sup>4</sup>, H<sub>i</sub>, I<sub>i</sub>, L<sub>a</sub>, L<sub>o</sub>, L<sub>d</sub><sup>1</sup>, M<sub>e</sub>, M<sub>g</sub>, M<sub>m</sub>, N<sub>i</sub>, P<sub>h</sub><sup>2</sup>, P<sub>h</sub><sup>3</sup>, P<sub>w</sub>, R<sub>a</sub><sup>1</sup>, R<sub>y</sub><sup>1</sup>, R<sub>y</sub><sup>2</sup>, S<sub>i</sub><sup>1</sup>, S<sub>i</sub><sup>2</sup>, T<sub>i</sub><sup>1</sup>, and T<sub>o</sub><sup>2</sup>.

<sup>8</sup> A<sub>d</sub><sup>1</sup>, A<sub>d</sub><sup>2</sup>, C<sub>b</sub>, C<sub>n</sub>, D<sub>d</sub>, D<sub>s</sub>, E<sub>i</sub>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>1</sup>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>2</sup>, G<sub>g</sub>, H<sub>g</sub>, L<sub>n</sub>, M<sub>a</sub>, P<sub>y</sub>, and S<sub>e</sub>.—These data were garnered from Sir William McCormick's The Manuscripts of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales (Oxford, 1933).

<sup>9</sup> P. 853. Professor Robinson also suggests another means for accounting for the arrangement; but since this explanation "involves a complicated series of assumptions . . .," he prefers "to regard the order with Cræsus at the end as the one intended by Chaucer at the outset."

<sup>10</sup> A<sub>d</sub><sup>1</sup>, A<sub>d</sub><sup>2</sup>, B<sub>o</sub><sup>1</sup>, B<sub>w</sub>, C<sub>b</sub>, C<sub>n</sub>, D<sub>d</sub>, D<sub>s</sub>, E<sub>i</sub>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>2</sup>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>3</sup>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>3</sup>, F<sub>i</sub>, H<sub>a</sub><sup>2</sup>, H<sub>a</sub><sup>4</sup>, H<sub>i</sub>, L<sub>a</sub>, L<sub>e</sub>, L<sub>d</sub><sup>1</sup>, L<sub>n</sub>, M<sub>g</sub>, M<sub>m</sub>, N<sub>i</sub>, P<sub>h</sub><sup>2</sup>, P<sub>h</sub><sup>3</sup>, R<sub>y</sub><sup>1</sup>, R<sub>y</sub><sup>2</sup>, S<sub>i</sub><sup>1</sup>, and T<sub>o</sub>.

<sup>11</sup> C<sub>p</sub>, H<sub>g</sub>, I<sub>i</sub>, M<sub>a</sub>, M<sub>e</sub>, P<sub>w</sub>, P<sub>y</sub>, S<sub>e</sub>, S<sub>i</sub><sup>2</sup>, and T<sub>o</sub><sup>1</sup>.

dle at the time when these lines were inserted to bind the two together. This would supply a possible reason for transferring them from one position to the other. But there are only four manuscripts which have the Modern Instances at the end followed by the shorter prologue, and these manuscripts are of doubtful or unreliable authenticity.<sup>12</sup> Had such a change been made, we would expect a considerable group of such manuscripts.

The more probable explanation of the Modern Instances at the end is scribal tinkering. The reason for placing them at the end is obviously chronological, since these tragedies ranged from 1288 to 1385.

We appear to have, therefore, three stages in the arrangement of this material: (1) with the Modern Instances in the middle followed by the shorter form of the "Nun's Priest's Prologue;"<sup>13</sup> (2) with the Modern Instances in the middle followed by the expanded form of the prologue<sup>14</sup>—a stage also no doubt attributable to Chaucer; and (3) probably as the result of scribal arrangement, with the Modern Instances at the end and the expanded prologue following.<sup>15</sup> Chaucer may himself have made this shift, but whoever is responsible failed to notice that it resulted in breaking the connection between "Fortune" and the "clowde" and the last line of the tragedy of Croesus. The recognition of these three stages has important implications for the general problem of manuscript relations in view of the fact that this third stage is the arrangement followed, not only by Ellesmere, but by every one of the nine manuscripts which Manly designates as Class I.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>12</sup> The manuscripts in question are H<sub>g</sub>, M<sub>a</sub>, P<sub>y</sub>, and Se. Manly in the introduction to his edition lists M<sub>a</sub> as Class I, P<sub>y</sub> as II<sub>a</sub>, and both H<sub>g</sub> and Se as Very Irregular.

<sup>13</sup> For these six MSS, I give in parentheses Manly's classification, as follows: C<sub>p</sub> (II<sub>b</sub>), I<sub>1</sub>(II<sub>c</sub>), M<sub>c</sub>(II<sub>a</sub>), P<sub>w</sub>(II<sub>c</sub>), S<sub>1</sub><sup>2</sup>(II<sub>b</sub>), and T<sub>c</sub><sup>1</sup>(II<sub>a</sub>).

<sup>14</sup> Nineteen MSS are represented in this second stage: B<sub>o</sub><sup>1</sup>(II<sub>a</sub>), B<sub>w</sub>(II<sub>c</sub>), E<sub>a</sub><sup>2</sup>(II<sub>c</sub>), F<sub>1</sub>(II<sub>c</sub>), H<sub>a</sub><sup>2</sup>(II<sub>c</sub>), H<sub>a</sub><sup>3</sup>(II<sub>c</sub> for this portion), H<sub>i</sub>(II<sub>c</sub>), L<sub>a</sub>(II<sub>b</sub>), L<sub>c</sub>(II<sub>a</sub>), L<sub>d</sub><sup>1</sup> (Very Irregular), M<sub>g</sub>(II<sub>a</sub>), M<sub>m</sub>(II<sub>c</sub>), N<sub>1</sub>(II<sub>a</sub>), P<sub>h</sub><sup>4</sup>(II<sub>a</sub> for this portion), P<sub>h</sub><sup>3</sup>(II<sub>c</sub>), R<sub>y</sub><sup>1</sup>(II<sub>c</sub>), R<sub>y</sub><sup>2</sup>(II<sub>c</sub>), S<sub>1</sub><sup>1</sup>(II<sub>c</sub>), and T<sub>o</sub> (Very Irregular).—Two MSS, G<sub>1</sub> and R<sub>a</sub>, lack the prologue, but have the Modern Instances in the middle.

<sup>15</sup> There are ten MSS to show the third stage: A<sub>d</sub><sup>1</sup>(I), A<sub>d</sub><sup>2</sup>(I), C<sub>h</sub> (Very Irregular), C<sub>n</sub>(I), D<sub>d</sub>(I), D<sub>s</sub>(I), E<sub>i</sub>(I), E<sub>n</sub><sup>1</sup>(I), E<sub>n</sub><sup>2</sup>(I), L<sub>n</sub>(II<sub>a</sub>).

<sup>16</sup> E<sub>i</sub>, G<sub>g</sub>, D<sub>d</sub>, D<sub>s</sub>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>1</sup>, A<sub>d</sub><sup>1</sup>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>3</sup>, M<sub>a</sub>, C<sub>n</sub>.—Brusendorff, The Chaucer Tradition (Oxford, 1925), p. 492, n. 2, would have these tragedies at the end as Chaucer's own arrangement.—In discussing the "Nun's Priest's Prologue," Miss Hammond (Bibliography, pp. 242–243; cf. Robinson's note, p. 857) suggests that the first intention was to have the Host make the interruption (in l. 2767 four MSS, A<sub>d</sub><sup>1</sup>, E<sub>n</sub><sup>3</sup>, T<sub>c</sub><sup>2</sup>, Cx<sup>1</sup>, read Hoste and Knyght); but that Chaucer then perceived he would have the Host, not only interrupting before the Melibee, but here as well; and that, to avoid this repetition, he substituted the Knight, and added, the Croesus passage. But the interruption in the case of the Host could hardly be considered monotonous repetition, since his speech occurs at the end of Sir Thopas, which is separated from the "Nun's Priest's Prologue" by both the tale of Melibee and that of the Monk. More-

From the foregoing discussion, one point stands out: the Modern Instances were written, not as a postscript, but as a part of the fabric of the "Monkes Tale." The chronology of this group of stories carries with it, therefore, the date of the tale as a whole.

In this connection, the stories of the two Pedros ("Petros," Chaucer calls them) are clearly significant; for both Peter of Spain and Pierre of Cyprus died in 1369.<sup>17</sup> This fact gives the year 1369 as the earliest possible date for the composition of the poem. Contemporary references of this kind would be, moreover, less likely to have point long after the events themselves. It is reasonable to suppose, therefore, that Chaucer wrote these tragedies while the facts were still fresh in his mind. Indeed, the two Pedros are so definitely of contemporary interest that we may inquire if the materials concerning them upon which Chaucer drew do not give indications of an early date.

It is notable that in introducing Don Pedro Chaucer addresses him as "O noble, O worthy Petro, glorie of Spayne."<sup>18</sup> But in thus presenting him in a favorable light, Chaucer appears unique; for all other contemporary writers,<sup>19</sup> even Ayala of Spain,<sup>20</sup> anathematized Don Pedro.

over, the statement (B 3998): "Thanne spak oure Hoost with rude speche and boold" would seem to introduce him for the first time as speaker in this short prologue.

<sup>17</sup> Pedro of Spain was murdered in 1369, shortly after the battle of Monteil (Alfred Morel-Fatio, "La Donation du Duché de Molina à Bertrand du Guesclin," Bibl. de l'École des Chartes, LX (1899), 147). Pierre of Cyprus was assassinated in January, 1369. See N. Jorga, Philippe de Mézières (Paris, 1896), p. 390, n. 5. <sup>18</sup> B<sup>2</sup>3565.

<sup>19</sup> Notably, Froissart, Chroniques de J. Froissart, ed. S. Luce, (Paris, 1888), VIII, and Deschamps, Œuvres Compl. de E. Deschamps, ed. Marquis de Saint-Hilaire (Paris, 1880), II, 327-328; III, 1882, 100. For this second reference, I am indebted to the kindness of Professor Carleton Brown.

Edward Storer, Peter the Cruel (New York, 1911), p. 204, states that Villani and Machaut also severely criticized Don Pedro. Alfred Morel-Fatio, Bibl. de l'École des Chartes, LX (1899) 151, n. 2, has pointed out that in the Cancionero de Baena (no. 304) Pedro is made the subject of a vicious rhyme. And George Ticknor, History of Spanish Literature (New York, 1849), p. 182, n. 15, found several Spanish ballads denouncing Don Pedro for his murder of Leonor de Guzman as well as for his cruelty in imprisoning Queen Blanche.

All these literary detractions were of course not without a basis in fact. For example, in the case of Queen Blanche, just referred to, the actions of the King appear thoroughly reprehensible; because at the time Pedro married Blanche he was still enamored of Maria di Padilla. Indeed, H. D. Sedgwick, The Black Prince (Indianapolis, 1932), p. 205, states that for this reason Pedro deserted Blanche on the Wednesday following their marriage on Monday. The case, however, appears even worse, for Blanche wrote the Pope she was deserted on the very day of the wedding (George Daumet's Innocent VI et Blanche de Bourbon, rev. by L. Mirot, Bibl. de l'École des Chartes, LX, [1899], 654-655). The French, as a matter of fact, suspected Pedro of having murdered Blanche in 1361 (Prosper Merimée, Hist. de don Pedro, roi de Castille [Paris, 1865], p. 265; E. Lavisse, Hist. de France, pt. I, ed. A. Coville [1902], p. 178; H. D. Sedgwick, Spain, A Short History [Boston, 1925], p.

Skeat has endeavored to explain this unusual view of Chaucer's on the ground that "our Black Prince fought on the side of Pedro against Enrique at the battle of Najera. . . ." <sup>21</sup> But Skeat fails to note that this very battle marked the beginning of a rupture between the English Prince and Don Pedro over Pedro's treatment of prisoners, <sup>22</sup> which developed later into a quarrel between the two over the payment for the Prince's military services. <sup>23</sup> Indeed, when the Black Prince returned to his home in Aquitaine, he was still unreconciled with Pedro. <sup>24</sup> Accordingly, if Chaucer had intended to represent the attitude of the Prince, his account of Pedro would have been unfavorable. As another possible explanation for Chaucer's sympathetic view of Pedro, Skeat <sup>25</sup> reminds us that Pedro's daughter, Constance of Castille, was later married to John of Gaunt.

Besides this, there is the still more important question as to how Chaucer received the same story as Ayala, whose statement of the tragedy appears to be the true one. This fact was first observed by Dr. Furnivall, who stated that "Chaucer is a witness for the truth of the Spanish chronicler Ayala as against the French writers Froissart, Cuvelier, and others. . . ." <sup>26</sup> We know quite a lot about Chaucer's relations to Froissart, <sup>27</sup> with whom we would normally expect him to be in agree-99). It was just such unprincipled actions as these that won for Don Pedro the name of the Cruel (T. Morgan, Jour. Engl. Arch. Ass., XLVII [1891], 177).

---

On the fairness of the contemporary accounts, see Ticknor, op. cit., p. 183, n. 17; J. B. Sitges, Las Mujeres del rey don Pedro I de Castilla (1910), p. 53; and C. E. Chapman, History of Spain (New York, 1918), p. 116.

<sup>20</sup> The first volume of Ayala's Crónicas de los Reyes de Castilla (Madrid, 1779) is concerned with the reign of Don Pedro. For an explanation of Ayala's attitude, see Ticknor (I, 176-178) and R. Altamira y Crevea, Historia de España y de la Civilización Española (Barcelona, 1929), pp. 10-12.

<sup>21</sup> Skeat, Oxford Chaucer, VI, 238.

<sup>22</sup> Edward Storer, Peter the Cruel (New York, 1911), pp. 309-310.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid. Cf. J. Leslie Hotson, "The Tale of Melibeus and John of Gaunt," SP, XVIII (1921), 432.

<sup>24</sup> J. R. Moreton Macdonald, A History of France (London, 1915), I, 254-255.—At an earlier period, the relations between England and Spain were more friendly. In fact, Edward III, who had once congratulated Alphonso XI on the conquest of Algeir (J. M. Manly, Trans. and Proc. of the Am. Phil. Ass., XXXVIII [1907], 92), planned a marriage between Princess Joan and Don Pedro; but the project was abruptly terminated in 1348 when the English princess succumbed to the Black Death on the way to Castille (T. F. Tout, Political History of England [New York, 1905], III, 370). Later, in 1362, Edward III, in order to insure his hold on Aquitaine, concluded with Pedro an alliance offensive and defensive (J. R. Green, Hist. of the English People, p. 100).

<sup>25</sup> Oxford Chaucer, V, 238.

<sup>26</sup> J. J. Furnivall, "A Chaucer Difficulty Cleared Up," Notes & Queries, 4 S, VIII (1871), 449-450.

<sup>27</sup> See G. L. Kittredge, "Chaucer and Froissart," Engl. Stud., XXVI (1899), 321-336.

ment. It is therefore surprising that Chaucer, who elsewhere turns to Froissart,<sup>28</sup> felt obliged in this story to refer to an outside source. There are serious chronological difficulties, moreover, in supposing Chaucer read Ayala.<sup>29</sup> How, then, are we to explain that both writers agreed in the details?

The solution which I wish to offer is that the story was transmitted to Chaucer through his friend, Sir Guichard d'Angle.<sup>30</sup> It is to be observed that Ayala, according to his own statement,<sup>31</sup> had been captured by the English at the battle of Nagara in 1367<sup>32</sup> and kept in prison until after the death of Pedro in March, 1369.<sup>33</sup> Sir Guichard, we may add, was also a participant in the Spanish campaign.<sup>34</sup> Indeed, at the battle of Nagara, he and his two sons, according to the Herald of Chandos,<sup>35</sup> distinguished themselves for their valor. Moreover, as Sir Guichard was

<sup>28</sup> R. D. French, A Chaucer Handbook (New York, 1929), pp. 88, 129.

<sup>29</sup> The first edition of Ayala's chronicle was printed at Seville, October 8, 1495 (A. Paulau y Dulcet, Manual del Libro Hispano-Americano [Barcelona, 1926], iv, 261). For this reference, I have to thank Professor E. Herman Hespelt, of New York University.

<sup>30</sup> On Chaucer's relation to d'Angle, see the present writer's account in Three Chaucer Studies (Oxford, 1932), pt. II, pp. 28 ff., 34-39; and in MLN, XLVIII (1933), 510-511.

<sup>31</sup> In the Remado de Palacio. My attention was first drawn to this in reading George Tickner's Hist. of Sp. Lit., I, 100. See also D. Marcelino Menendez y Pelayo, Antología de Poetas Líricos Castellanos (Madrid, 1918), iv, p. xii.

The poem may be consulted in the following editions: A. F. Kuersteiner's Poesía del canciller Pero López de Ayala, Hispanic Society of America, New York, 1920, Bibliotheca hispanica, vols. 21-22, also Biblioteca de autores españoles (Madrid, 1864), LVII, 425-476. For these references, I am indebted to the kindness of Mr. J. R. Spell, of the Univ. of Texas.

One manuscript states Ayala was imprisoned in "Inglaterra," but the others report Gascony as the place. See Wm. J. Entwistle's essay in Spain, A Companion to Spanish Studies, ed. E. Allison Peers, New York, 1929), p. 112.

<sup>32</sup> Ayala was released when Enrico succeeded to the throne after the death of Pedro I. See Ticknor, Hist. of Sp. Lit., I, 178-179.

<sup>33</sup> The date of March 23 for the murder of Don Pedro as given by Skeat, Robinson, and others appears to be inexact. R. Amador de los Ríos ("Los Restos Mortales del Rey don Pedro de Castilla," Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas y Museos, x [1904], 113) states in this connection that: "Aunque ni acuerdo en que la fecha existe, parece, la alevosa muerte de don Pedro acaeció en la noche del 22 al 23 de Marzo de 1369. . . ."

<sup>34</sup> Sir Guichard, in fact, is reported by the Herald (The Life of the Black Prince, ed. M. K. Pope and E. C. Lodge [Oxford, 1910]) as one of "les hautes officers du tre noble Prince":

Primerment Iohn Chaundos fust Conestable
Et apres sa mort le Captawe sanz fable
Mons Guichard dangle fut Mareschall (4197-99).

<sup>35</sup> Et la fut bons Guicharz d'Angle,
Qui ne se tenoit pas en l'angle;
Avoecques li ot ses deux filz
Et d'autres chevaliers de pris,
Qui bien fesoient lour devoir (3239-43).

the Black Prince's Marshal of Aquitaine,<sup>36</sup> it is clear that he would have heard the details. We can readily understand, therefore, how Sir Guichard and Ayala would receive the same report of Pedro's death.

Indeed, this interpretation seems more reasonable than any that has been suggested. An alternative view, however, is that the story came to Chaucer through Philippa.<sup>37</sup> But this suggestion, likely as it might seem, leaves unexplained a second important point in Chaucer's account. For in the second stanza Chaucer emphasizes the treachery of Don Enrico and the baseness of du Guesclin and de Mauny, who aided him in the conspiracy to murder Pedro.<sup>38</sup> Why should Chaucer in an additional stanza have been obliged to censure them? Now, if we suppose the poem to represent Sir Guichard's attitude, Chaucer's strong feeling against the conspirators is easily explained. In the first place, Chaucer's disapprobation of Enrico would be accounted for, because Sir Guichard, who had been captured by Enrico's forces in 1372, was compelled for two years to suffer the tortures of a Spanish dungeon.<sup>39</sup> While they were imprisoned, the English captives were on one occasion led before certain visiting Frenchmen, whom they prayed: "Noble gent de France et douce, se nous fussions voz prisonniers, vous ne feussions pas si villainement menez ni si durement traictiez comme nous sommes."<sup>40</sup> One month after the capture (i.e., in July) of Sir Guichard and his colleagues, Owen de Galles saw the prisoners (i.e., those who were not killed or wounded after their capture) "liés ou enchainés deux par deux, comme des chiens tenus en laisse."<sup>41</sup> In the light of these facts, it is clear that Sir Guichard would have represented Enrico unfavorably.

Furthermore, with regard to du Guesclin and de Mauny, Sir Guichard had equally good reasons for being embittered. For while he was imprisoned in Spain, these French generals persecuted Sir Guichard's wife. Dame d'Angle was, in fact, forced to surrender her castle of Achart. She <sup>36</sup> The title of Marshal of Aquitaine was given to Sir Guichard as reward for his loyalty and fidelity to the English cause. R. Delachenal, Histoire de Charles V (Paris, 1928), iv, 21.

<sup>37</sup> F. N. Robinson, The Complete Works of Geoffrey Chaucer (Cambridge edition, 1933), pp. 855-856.

<sup>38</sup> Chaucer (in B<sup>2</sup> 3573-80) alludes to du Guesclin by referring to the heraldic emblems on his coat of mail; to de Mauny by punning on his name in the phrase "wikked nest" (OF. mau ni; i.e., MnF. mal nid). Brusendorff (The Chaucer Tradition [Oxford, 1925], p. 489) has suggested that Chaucer drew upon a ballade on du Guesclin attributed to Deschamps in writing his description of Bertrand's coat of arms.

<sup>39</sup> Chroniques de J. Froissart, ed. S. Luce (Paris, 1888), viii, pp. 38-42, 295-299. Ayala mentions (Crónicas de los Reyes de Castilla, II, 12 ff.) Guichard d'Angle by name as one of the prisoners captured at Rochelle.

<sup>40</sup> Chronique des Quatre Premiers Valois, ed. S. Luce (Paris, 1862), p. 235.

<sup>41</sup> R. Delachenal, Histoire de Charles V (Paris, 1928), iv, 416.

received a safe-conduct, however, and fled to the Duke of Berry.<sup>42</sup> She made a personal appeal to the Duke, which we have in her own words:

Monsigneur, vous savés que je sui une seule femme à point de fait ne de deffense, et veve de vif mari, s'il plaist à Dieu; car mon signeur, messires Guichars [Guichard d'Angle], gist prisonniers en Espagne, ens es dangiers dou roy Henri. Si vous vorroie prier en humilité que vous me feissiés celle grasce que, tant que mon signeur sera prisonniers en Espagne, mi chastiel et ma terre, mon corps et (mes biens, avec) mes gens, puissent demorer en pais, par mi tant que nous ne ferons point de guerre, et on ne nous en fera point ossi.<sup>43</sup>

The plea touched the Duke's heart and he swore to place his aid in her behalf. Strong inducements, in the form of bribes and assurances to exchange prisoners, were accordingly made to Bertrand du Guesclin and Oliver de Mauny. At length, the Frenchmen were persuaded, not only to desist their persecutions of Dame d'Angle, but to effect in 1374-75 the release of Sir Guichard and his colleagues.<sup>44</sup> Therefore, in explaining Chaucer's denunciation of the French generals, the evidence points again to Sir Guichard as the informant.

According to the present interpretation, we have, therefore, not only an explanation of Chaucer's agreement with Ayala, but the source of his view of the conspirators who brought about the murder of Don Pedro. Nor is it necessary to call in (as have Skeat and others) either Gaunt or Constance, or much less Philippa, to account for Chaucer's taking the part of Don Pedro because the Duke married Constance of Castille. Obviously Philippa would have been informed only by hearsay. And there would be little reason for Chaucer to turn to Gaunt, especially when he could have received the story more directly from his friend. For Sir Guichard had been throughout a promoter of this particular marriage. It was he, indeed, who suggested to John of Gaunt the policy of a marriage with Constance of Castille. Moreover, he was intrusted with and succeeded in the negotiations for the marriage alliance. Afterwards, he was present when the nuptials of the Duke and Constance were solemnized at Rochefort. This clearly reveals, of course, the regard in which the Duke held him. It is to be observed, moreover, that he attended Lancaster and his bride to England, where the company was received by King Edward, "who, at the feast of St. George . . . 1372, admitted our heroic knight into the order of the Garter. . . ."<sup>45</sup> As another evidence of the high regard in which Sir Guichard was held by the English court, we may note that when King Edward III was asked in 1374 whether he preferred to rescue from the Spaniards Otto de Granson or Sir Guichard, he replied "que il s'enclinet plus à monseigneur Guichart d'Angle que à monsieur Othe."<sup>46</sup> On the basis of these facts, it will be seen that Sir Guichard had every reason to represent the murder of the father of the new Duchess of Lancaster in sympathetic terms.

<sup>42</sup> The substance of the foregoing paragraph is drawn from G. F. Beltz, Memorials of the Order of the Garter (London, 1841), pp. 184-186.

<sup>43</sup> Chroniques de J. Froissart, ed. S. Luce (Paris, 1888), viii, 116.

<sup>44</sup> Du Guesclin and his nephew Oliver de Mauny, it appears, had received from Enrico certain lands in Spain as reward for their services. The estate of Soria in Castille du Guesclin surrendered for the Earl of Pembroke; Mauny, his estate of Agreda for Sir Guichard and other Englishmen captured at Rochelle. Beltz (pp. 186-187) explains another phase of the transaction as follows: "It happened that a rich French knight, the sire de Roie, a prisoner in England, had an only daughter whom Oliver de Mauni desired to espouse." But Beltz appears incorrect in representing Oliver as the suitor, for it is established by other evidence that the knight was Alain de Mauny (Chron. de J. Froissart, ed. Luce, viii, xcvi, note 4).—Beltz gives 1374 as the date of the prisoners' release; the time was in the early months of 1375 (Paul Guérin, Archives Historiques du Poitou, xix [1888], 173, n. 2).

It remains to be noted that Sir Guichard was personally associated with Don Pedro. According to Froissart,<sup>47</sup> it was Sir Guichard who was appointed in 1367 to escort Pedro to Burgos, capital of Old Castille. It is also significant that Sir Guichard witnessed in 1366 the famous conference between Don Pedro and the Black Prince, where he would have heard of Pedro's having been forced to flee for his life to Bordeaux.<sup>48</sup> It is to this very flight, in fact, that Chaucer appears to refer in the statement "Out of thy land thy brother made thee flee."<sup>49</sup> Accordingly, the tragedy of Don Pedro of Spain is best explained and most fully accounted for on the basis that Sir Guichard d'Angle was Chaucer's informant.

It is easier to understand Chaucer's interest in the second "Petro" than the first, for Pierre of Cyprus had visited England on at least two occasions. In fact, it is possible that Chaucer in 1358, while retaining a

<sup>45</sup> The facts made use of in the foregoing paragraph are drawn from G. F. Beltz, Memorials of the Order of the Garter (London, 1841), pp. 184-186.

<sup>46</sup> Chroniques de J. Froissart, ed. Luce, VIII, 166.

<sup>47</sup> The French chronicler (VII, 50) recounts the story as follows: "Tantost apriès messe et boire, li rois dan Piètres monta à cheval, et li contes Sanses ses frères et li mestres de Calatrave et tout cil qui si homme estoient devenu, et li doi mareschal messires Guigars d'Angle et messire Estievenes de Cousentonne et bien cinq cens hommes d'armes, et se partirent, de l'ost et dou prince et chevaucierent viers Burghes."

<sup>48</sup> Beltz, op. cit., pp. 184-186. Don Pedro had repaired to Bordeaux to enlist the services of the Black Prince. He came, however, with promises rather than with gold. But despite this, and the hesitancy among the Gascons in the Prince's council, Don Pedro prevailed upon the Black Prince to undertake the campaign. At length, in February, 1367, the English Prince, whose coffers were now replenished with gold from Navarre and whose forces had been augmented by divisions under John of Gaunt, crossed the Pyrenees. T. Morgan, Jour. British Arch. Ass., XLVII (1891), 178-182; A. E. Prince, English Hist. Rev., XLVI (1931), 353-371; and Walter of Peterborough's poem, "Prince Edward's Expedition into Spain . . .," Political Poems and Songs (Rolls series, 1859), I, 97-122. <sup>49</sup> B<sup>2</sup>3568.

position in the household of Prince Lionel, may have seen Pierre's father, Hughes IV, who attended the banquet given by King Edward.<sup>50</sup> Chaucer, however, had the opportunity of hearing from his friends of Pierre's own activities. For the King of Cyprus was present at the tournament which celebrated the birth of the first son of the Black Prince, where he would have seen or met Guichard d'Angle, who participated in this festival.<sup>51</sup> Sir Guichard was also present in 1364 at the meeting of Edward III and Pierre at Bordeaux.<sup>52</sup> The year before (i.e., 1363) the King of Cyprus had made a celebrated visit to England in the interest of organizing a new crusade,<sup>53</sup> and prominent among the company sent to welcome the King was Chaucer's friend, Sir Richard Stury. It was Sir Richard, indeed, who assisted in conducting Pierre through the city of London and to his lodging.<sup>54</sup>

In taking up the tragedy of Pierre of Cyprus, however, the case is considerably simplified, because for this story we have a literary source. The striking fact about Chaucer's stanza on Pierre is that it is historically inaccurate in every detail.<sup>55</sup> It is significant to note, accordingly, that Machaut's La Prise d'Alexandrie, a poetic biography of Pierre, is also unhistorical.<sup>56</sup> Moreover, Machaut's poem, though longer than Chaucer's, contains the same mistakes in statement.

Both Machaut and Chaucer, for example, praise the valor of the King and describe him as little short of a martyr. In the record of history, however, Pierre appears in a different light. His injustice in dealing with his subjects aroused public indignation,<sup>57</sup> and the cruelty of his treat-

<sup>50</sup> R. Morris, Chaucer: Prologue, Knights Tale, &c. (Clarendon Press Series, 1903), p. vii, note C.

<sup>51</sup> N. Jorga, Philippe de Mézières (Paris, 1896), p. 184.

<sup>52</sup> Beltz, Mem. of the Order of the Garter, p. 184.

<sup>53</sup> J. L. Lowes, PMLA, xix (1904), 594, notes 4-6.

<sup>54</sup> N. Jorga, op. cit., p. 179. Sir Richard's colleague was Gautier de Mauny, whose name is not to be confused with that of the French family. Gautier's last name is variously spelled; he is referred to in a royal letter as "nostre cher et foial Wauter de Manny" (B. Wilkinson, Eng. Hist. Rev., XLII [1927], 250).

<sup>55</sup> This was first noted, so far as I know, by Professor Lowes. "Chaucer's statement of the case in the Monk's Tale is curiously out of variance with what seem to be the facts" (PMLA, xix [1904], 597 f., note 2).

<sup>56</sup> My attention was first called to this in reading L. de Mas-Latrie's "Guillaume de Machaut et La Prise d'Alexandrie," Bibl. de l'École des Chartes, xxxvii (1876), 445-463. Machaut received the story from Gautiers de Conflans, a knight of Champagne. "Vesci sa parole & son dit, // Si comme Gautiers le me dit" (La Prise d'Alexandrie [ed. Mas-Latrie, Geneva, 1877], vv. 8285-86).

<sup>57</sup> In one instance, without the sanction of high court, Pierre assumed the right to pass judgment against a knight, and in another he exerted private authority in condemning a poor vassal to prison and exile. See L. de Mas-Latrie, Bibl. de l'École des Chartes xxxvii (1876), 445-465.

ment of Marie de Giblet led directly to his assassination.<sup>58</sup> Chaucer, on the other hand, says Pierre was slain "for no thing but for thy chivalrye" by "thyn owene liges."<sup>59</sup> Similarly, Machaut, after extolling the virtues of his royal patron, states: "Mais ceus qui ces ouevres faisoient // Tous ces hommes liges estoient."<sup>60</sup> Machaut then goes on with the emphatic statement: "Et en ce despit // Lors en son lit fus [?sus] li coury . . ."<sup>61</sup> with which we may compare Chaucer's description: "They in thy bedde han slayn thee."<sup>62</sup> But here history again reports that when Pierre was murdered he was not only standing "upright and outside his bed" but "in the adjoining apartment."<sup>63</sup> Finally, both poets agree in giving an <sup>58</sup> Machaut mentions in La Prise d'Alexandrie (ed. Mas-Latrie, pp. 268-269) Jacques d'Ibelin, Sire d'Arzur, Jean de Gaurelles, and Henry de Giblet as the murderers. The name of Pierre de Mimars is added in Chronographia Regum Francorum (ed. R. Moranville, Paris, 1893), II, 304—Henry de Giblet, Marie's father, seems to have been drawn into the conspiracy as a result of King Pierre's animosity toward his family; the dissension arose over the following ridiculous matter: "Le 8 janvier 1369, Henry de Giblet chassait avec deux beaux lévriers turcomans qu'il avait donnés à son fils Jacques, quand le jeune comte de Tripoli, fils du roi Pierre, voyant passer ces chiens en lut envie et les fit demander au fils du vicomte, qui les lui refusa en accompagnant son refus de paroles blessantes pour le prince et la famille royale. Le roi, informé de cet événement, fit demander les chiens à Henry de Giblet, qui, prenant le parti de son fils, ne voulut pas les lui remettre. Le roi fit prendre les lévriers, et il en résulta un incident à la suite duquel le roi enlevait à Henry de Giblet la charge de vicomte de Nicrosie et l'envoyait à Baphe, pendant qu'il faisait mettre aux fers Jacques de Giblet, son fils, et l'obligeait à travailler aux fossés de la tour Marguerite. Marie de Giblet, fille d'Henry et sœur de Jacques, alors veuve de Jean de Verny, fut obligée de se réfugier au monastère de Notre-Dame de Tortose, pour échapper au roi qui voulait la remarier à un tailleur, serf de Raymond de Rabin, nommé Caras; sans égard pour l'asile, le roi l'en fit arracher et mettre à la torture." See E. Rey, "Les seigneurs de Giblet," Revue de L'Orient Latin, III (1895), 420. In attempting to force Marie, a lady of the nobility, to marry a serf, Pierre was obviously opposing the feudal code. Compare the story by Saxo Grammaticus (The Danish History . . ., trans. Oliver Elton [1905], II, 374-380) of Helga's (Ingeld's sister) attachment to a low-born goldsmith and of the wrathful vengeance of Starcad. <sup>59</sup> B<sup>2</sup>3584-85. <sup>60</sup> VV. 8756-57.

<sup>61</sup> The meaning of the passage is clear from the following longer quotation concerning the assassination of Pierre:

Devant son lit sont arresté
De mal faire tuit apresté.
Li sires d'Absur la courrine,
Qui de soie estoit riche & fine,
Tira, pour le roy mieux veoir,
Et pour son cop mieux asseoir.
Et si tost comli roys le vit,
De son lit gisant li dist:
"Estes vous la, sires d'Absur,

Faus garson, traître, parjur.
Qui vous fait entrer en ma chambre?"
Et li respondi sans attendre:
"Je ne sui mauvais ne traïtes,
Mais tel estes vous, com vous dites;
Dont vous morrez, sans nul respit,
De mes mains." Et en ce despit
Lors en son lit fus [?sus] li coury
Et ij. cos ou iij. le fery . . . vv. 8686-703.

<sup>62</sup> B<sup>2</sup>3586.

<sup>63</sup> As translated from L. de Mas-Latrie, Bibl. de l'École des Chartes, XXXVII (1876), 461-462.

inaccurate statement as to the time of the assassination. Pierre was in reality murdered at midnight, January 17–18, 1369.<sup>64</sup> But Machaut gives the time as "à l'aube crevant"<sup>65</sup> and Chaucer as "by the morwe"<sup>66</sup> (i.e., early in the morning).

In the light of these facts, we may readily accept La Prise d'Alexandrie as the source of the tragedy of Peter of Cyprus. It was perfectly natural, of course, for Chaucer to turn to Machaut. For Chaucer, as has long been known, made use of several poems of Machaut in writing certain passages of the Book of the Duchess.<sup>67</sup> Professor Lowes<sup>68</sup> has shown, moreover, that Machaut's Dit de la Marguerite influenced Chaucer in the "Prologue" of the Legend of Good Women. This new evidence provides, therefore, an addition to the influence of Machaut on Chaucer.

In this connection, we may return to the chronology of the "Monkes Tale." We have already noted 1369, the year both "Petros" died, as the earliest date for the poem. Moreover, La Prise d'Alexandrie is dated by French chronologists as about 1369.<sup>69</sup> The indebtedness of the stanzas on Ugolino to Dante<sup>70</sup> suggests as a convenient date 1374, the period of Chaucer's introduction to Italian literature. Also, since Sir Guichard was Chaucer's informant, the story of Pedro of Spain would antedate 1380, the year Sir Guichard died.<sup>71</sup> This chronology, furthermore, favors the suggestion made by Professor Kittredge: "... we may feel pretty safe in inferring for the tribute to Constance's father, Pedro of Castile, the date of 1373 or 1374. The royal title which John of Gaunt had recently assumed, by right of his wife, made such a tribute especially timely."<sup>72</sup> In the light of this evidence, the composition of the "Monkes Tale" would appear to belong to the neighborhood of 1374 or 1375; that is, at a date shortly following Chaucer's first Italian journey.

HALDEEN BRADY

New York University

<sup>64</sup> N. Jorga, op. cit., p. 390, n. 5.

<sup>65</sup> V. 8636.

<sup>66</sup> B<sup>2</sup> 3586.

<sup>67</sup> Kittredge, PMLA, xx (1905), 1–24.

<sup>68</sup> PMLA, xix (1904), 593 ff.

<sup>69</sup> L. de Mas-Latrie, editor of La Prise d'Alexandrie (Geneva, 1877), p. viii; and V. Chichmaref, G. de Machaut, Poésies Lyriques (Paris, 1909), I, p. lxvii.

<sup>70</sup> Skeat, Oxford Chaucer, vi, 241. Tatlock (Dev. and Chron. of Chaucer's Works, pp. 164–165 and notes) points out that Chaucer "quotes Dante also in the account of Nero; and [that] the Italian influence is also plain in the form of the names which he gives to Zenobia's sons."

<sup>71</sup> Three Chaucer Studies (Oxford, 1932), pt. II, p. 36.

<sup>72</sup> The Date of Chaucer's Troilus and Other Chaucer Matters (Chaucer Society, 1990), p. 46.

VII

SATIRE IN SIR THOPAS

THE Rime of Sir Thopas," wrote Tyrwhitt, "was clearly intended to ridicule the 'palpable gross' fictions of the common Rimers of that age, and still more, perhaps, the meanness of their language and versification." This view, which Skeat found "judicious and correct," has until recent years met with little question. In 1922, however, Miss Lilian Winstanley, while admitting the piece to be a burlesque of the metrical romances, argued that it was also "intended as a satire against Philip van Artevelde"; and Professor J. M. Manly later set forth at considerable length the view that "the object of satire was the ridiculous pretentiousness" of the Flemings, that "Chaucer's primary object in writing was not so much to burlesque the minstrel romances as to produce a satire of the countrymen of Sir Thopas, and that his contemporaries enjoyed its subject matter even more than its form." This general line of argument has been accepted by Professor F. N. Robinson, who, in his admirable edition of Chaucer, observes that "two recent studies of Sir Thopas have made it seem very probable that Chaucer had another purpose, perhaps his primary one, namely, to poke fun at the Flemish knighthood." Since this interpretation of Chaucer's gay little piece has thus received an authoritative blessing, in a standard edition, it may well be examined in some detail, in order to determine how far it is really valid.<sup>1</sup>

It will be remembered that Philip was the son of James van Artevelde, under whose guidance the great Flemish cities and towns, where much of the wool grown in England was made into cloth, attained great prosperity, especially Bruges, Ghent, and Ypres. James established friendly relations with Edward III; he was killed in an insurrection in Ghent in 1345. Many years later, in 1381, according to Froissart, Philip van Arte-

<sup>1</sup> For the quotation from Tyrwhitt, and Skeat's comments, see the latter's edition of the Works (Oxford, 1894), III, 423. Miss Winstanley's views will be found in her edition of the Prioress's Tale and the Tale of Sir Thopas (Cambridge, Eng., 1922), pp. lxxv ff; Professor Manly's in "Sir Thopas, a Satire," in Essays and Studies by Members of the English Association (Oxford, 1928), XIII, 52-73, and in his edition of the Canterbury Tales (New York, 1928), pp. 628 ff. References to Manly below are to his essay, unless otherwise noted. The remarks quoted above will be found on p. 60 of the essay, and on p. 629 of the edition. Professor F. P. Magoun, Jr., PMLA, XLII (1927), 833, notes that in one of the Lowell lectures in 1924 Professor Manly had "adduced interesting evidence as to political satire latent in the poem." For Professor Robinson's comments, see The Complete Works of Geoffrey Chaucer (Boston, etc., 1933), pp. 842 ff. Details of arguments by Miss Winstanley and by Manly are incorporated in his notes. Quotations from Chaucer below, except as otherwise noted, follow Robinson's text.

velde was chosen leader of the burghers in their rebellion against the Count of Flanders.<sup>2</sup> He sent an embassy to Richard II in the hope of advancing the cause of the cities, and a message to the King of France to beg his mediation. Neither accomplished anything. The French were for various reasons out of sympathy with the Flemings, and the English took offense at insistence on payment of an old debt. In November, 1382, Philip's citizen army was defeated at Roosebeke, near Courtrai, by a brilliant French force under the young king, Charles VI, supporting the troops of the Count of Flanders, and Philip himself perished on the battlefield.

The first objection to Miss Winstanley's theory is that there is no reference to Philip van Artevelde, open or concealed, in Chaucer's poem. How is a reader to know that Philip is being satirized? If he does not know this, the whole point of the piece, as Miss Winstanley conceives it, is lost. The elder Artevelde was not lord of Flanders, but leader of the burghers. We should expect that Chaucer would give us some hint—something like the "goode faire White she het" in the Book of the Duchess, or "the feeld of snow, with th' egle of blak therinne," identifying Bertrand du Guesclin in the Monk's tragedy of Pedro of Spain. Again, nothing in the poem is more definite, if Sir Thopas stands for a real person, than the statement that he was born in Poperinghe.

Yborn he was in fer contree,
In Flaundres, al biyonde the see,
At Poperyng, in the place.
His fader was a man ful free,
And lord he was of that contree,
As it was Goddes grace.

But Philip van Artevelde was not born in Poperinghe. That the town was one of those which did him homage, as Miss Winstanley urges, or that James his father—who was a burgher of Ghent—had "devoted himself in a quite special way to the interests of Poperinghe," seems quite beside the point. Poperinghe was one of the most energetic of the smaller towns in Flanders, and it naturally gave the burgher cause support. The reason why Chaucer selected it as the birthplace of his hero will be considered presently.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>2</sup> "L'élection de Philippe d'Artevelde comme rewaert est de beaucoup postérieure à l'époque indiquée par Froissart. Il est vrai qu'au mois de juin 1381, il reçut le commandement d'une des cinq armées qui sortirent de Gand, et au mois d'octobre il était le premier des commissionnaires chargés d'administrer les biens des bannis mis en séquestre. Cependant il ne devint rewaert, d'après la plupart des chroniques flamandes, que le 24 janvier 1382." Kervyn de Lettenhove, Oeuvres de Froissart: Chroniques (Bruxelles, 1869), ix, 560.

<sup>3</sup> Manly argues (p. 65) that there is "a very humorous twist" here, because the lord of Poperinghe was the Abbot of St. Bertin. But Chaucer was not referring to the lord of Popper-

Furthermore, Miss Winstanley's theory forces us to conclude that Chaucer inserted into the Canterbury Tales satire of a man long since dead, and that, too, into one of the gayest of his scenes. Nobody knows just when Sir Thopas was written; "the tale contains no definite indication of date,"<sup>4</sup> but it certainly cannot have been introduced into the narrative of the pilgrimage before 1387, and probably was put in much later. Philip must, then, have been dead at least four years, and in all probability more. It is of course possible to assume that the piece was an old one refurbished for the Canterbury collection—I shall have something to say about this presently—but if it was a satire on Philip van Artevelde this does not seem probable.

Miss Winstanley leans heavily upon the testimony of Froissart in the Chronicles<sup>5</sup> to prove that Chaucer was attacking Philip; she thinks that "Chaucer had exactly the same reasons for satirizing van Artevelde as Froissart," and points out that John of Gaunt was not in sympathy with the Flemish burghers. Froissart, she says, "does his utmost to ridicule the leaders of the burghers and treats van Artevelde throughout as a comic character and an absurd pretender." I do not think that anyone who reads Froissart dispassionately will agree. His sympathies were indeed with the French, and he does not always represent Philip in a favorable light. According to the Chronicles, Philip was advised, when he assumed the leadership of the Flemings, to be cruel and haughty, and he acted to some extent on this advice. His vanity, his love of display, and his lack of experience as a soldier, are also mentioned. But he is called "a handsome and agreeable man," and is stated to have been generous, eloquent, able to make himself beloved, and compassionate on occasion. Froissart is of course not always accurate in his depiction of events or in his estimates of character. I shall discuss presently his account of the appeals sent to the French and English courts, and his general attitude towards the French and the English. In any case, he is, I think, very far from treating Philip van Artevelde with the scorn and irony which Miss Winstanley discerns. Moreover, we are not bound to conclude that Chaucer and Froissart saw eye to eye, and reasons will appear for thinking that the English poet may have had the more favorable impression of the Flemings.<sup>6</sup> inghe; he did not say "the lord of that citee"; contree clearly refers to Flaundres, three lines above.

---

<sup>4</sup> Robinson, p. 842.

<sup>5</sup> The translation of Thomas Johnes, which Manly uses for citation, is convenient for reference. I use the ed. New York, 1880. Philip's career is set forth in Chapters LXX to CXXV, pp. 281-322. Many of these chapters deal, of course, with other material. The French text will be found in vols. ix and x of Kervyn de Lettenhove's edition (see footnote above).

<sup>6</sup> It has even been maintained that the chronicler was in sympathy with the Flemings; cf. the Encyclopædia Britannica, 14th Ed. (1929), article "Froissart," ix, 863: "In Flanders

Some of Miss Winstanley's parallels between Sir Thopas and the career, tastes, and character of Philip, as set forth by Froissart, may now be quoted.

Sir Thopas is attired in an extraordinary fashion. "Now here . . . we have a parallel with Froissart who represents the Flemish burghers as being attired and armed in the most extraordinary variety of manners." (p. lxxii)

"Sir Thopas . . . is fond of toothsome delicacies"; "it does suggest what Froissart says of the delicacies brought to the army of the Flemish burghers." (p. lxxii)

"Chaucer's Sir Thopas is a person who loves pastoral meditations among the birds and flowers; he rejoices to be in the woods, hearing the songs of the throstle and the wood-dove. So Froissart represents Philip van Artevelde as having been accustomed, before he was called to supreme power, to a life of retirement and to have been very fond of meditation in the fields and of gentle and solitary occupations such as fishing." (p. lxxiii)

Chaucer's Sir Thopas keeps royal state at home; Froissart says that Philip had minstrels play for him. Froissart states that Philip had fine horses; "so Chaucer refers mockingly to the noble steed of Sir Thopas." Sir Thopas's men sang of popes and cardinals: "We can see admirably the sting of ascribing love-romances to the 'popes and cardinals' when we remember that Urban VI blessed Philip van Artevelde and considered his cause as a crusade." (p. lxxv. ff.)

"The name of the giant 'Olifaunt' was the name of the great horn of Roland in the Chanson de Roland; as such it was symbolic of French chivalry and the army which opposed Philip van Artevelde was almost entirely composed of the French noblesse and their feudal servants for the burghers of the great towns could not be trusted to take any part in the attack." (p. lxxvii)

I believe that this gives a fair idea of Miss Winstanley's general method; her discussion should of course be read in full. I will leave the reader to judge of the validity of these parallels; they appear, not to put it more strongly, to be "general rather than particular."<sup>7</sup> As for the inter-Froissart met many knights who had fought at Rosebeque, and could tell him of the troubles which in a few years desolated that country, once so prosperous. He stayed at Ghent, among those ruined merchants and mechanics, for whom, as one of the same class, he felt a sympathy never extended to English or French, perhaps quite as unfortunate."—I think that this is a mistake, the sympathies of Froissart seem to have been with the antagonists of the burghers. Notice especially his comment on the battle of Roosebeke, cited here below. The reason seems to have been his devotion to the aristocracy. Although not of noble birth, he was permeated with the ideals of chivalry, and delighted in gentle manners and in pageantry. But that it can be held that Froissart sympathized with the Flemings surely indicates that he was not ridiculing them or their leader.

---

<sup>7</sup> Manly, who reviews Miss Winstanley's work briefly, makes this criticism (p. 63) of her parallels in regard to dress, arming, and equipment. In his essay he does not expressly pretation of "Olifaunt" ("Elephant" is surely a very good name for a giant), I think that Chaucer would look more "elvish" than ever, if he could hear it in Heaven.

Professor Manly's hypothesis is more plausible, and more adroitly set forth. But when the charm of his exposition and the interest and value of his illustrative material are discounted, it appears to rest on the slenderest of foundations.

In the beginning he tries to show the inadequacy of the usual view of Chaucer's intention in writing Sir Thopas. His summary of this view, and of dissent from it, does not appear to me correct. I italicize the passage to which I take exception.

The commonly accepted view [of Sir Thopas] regards it as a satire on the medieval metrical romances, which were the most popular form of literature current in Chaucer's day. Many scholars have sought to support this view by collecting from the extant romances parallel expressions tending to show that Chaucer had saturated himself with the rhyme-tags and other mannerisms of these romances, and was attempting by his burlesque imitation of them to bring them into disrepute and put an end to their vogue.

Who are the "many scholars" who have drawn such a conclusion from these parallels? I do not find it in the work of Bennewitz, or of Kölbing, or of Magoun, or of Miss Strong, who have made very careful studies of the resemblances to Sir Thopas in the romances.<sup>8</sup> Manly continues:

To this view there has been opposition on the part of many other scholars, lovers of the medieval romances, who, although recognizing the inanities and banalities of incident and diction which abound in the worst of the romances, nevertheless have so strong a sense of the vigor and beauty of the best of them that they cannot readily believe that Chaucer could have been insensible to their merits or could have wished to heap ridicule upon what was after all the most lively and vigorous form of English literature in his own day, and one which at its best must have made so strong an appeal to his own tastes and sympathies. . . . To me the romances seem to have supplied, not the object, but the form and medium, of the satire.<sup>9</sup>

I do not know of such opposition to a view which I cannot find has ever been widely believed. We are not told who the "many other scholars" are. In any case, one may obviously hold—as I think antecedently reject her conclusion—"whether Philip van Artevelde was the specific object of the satire or not" (p. 65)—but in his edition (p. 629 f.) he says "this personal identification seems to me unlikely."

---

<sup>8</sup> C. J. Bennewitz, Chaucer's Sir Thopas, dissertation (Halle, 1879); E. Kölbing, Englische Studien, xi (1888), 495-511; F. P. Magoun Jr., PMLA, xlii (1927), 833-844; Caroline Strong, MLN, xxiii, 73 ff. and 102 ff.

<sup>9</sup> Pp. 57-59.

probable—that Chaucer was not satirizing the romances as a whole, but the poorer and more absurd of those he knew. Was Thackeray attacking all novels because he parodied a degenerate type in Catherine, or Fielding because he made fun of Pamela in Joseph Andrews? We may accept Sir Thopas as designed wholly to ridicule one phase of romance writing without committing ourselves to the belief that Chaucer was trying to drive the romances out of business, or that he was insensible to the merits of the good ones.

What, now, is the definite evidence that the piece was intended as a satire on the Flemings? This, it seems to me, reduces itself to one point: Sir Thopas was born in Flanders. It is noticeable that nowhere else in the poem is anything specifically Flemish mentioned, except the knight's hose, which came from Bruges. This is natural in a description of sartorial perfections, just as in the preceding line his shoes are said to have come from Spain, renowned for its leather, as Bruges was for its woven fabrics. There are bourgeois elements in the description, which we shall consider in a moment, but I cannot see that these are any more Flemish than, for example, French or English. The little joke at the end, that Sir Thopas drank water afiel, specifically "water of the well", certainly does not suggest that the Flemings are being satirized. As Manly has himself observed in another connection, "the Low Countries, including Flanders, were notorious for drunkenness."<sup>10</sup> It may be, of course, that Sir Thopas's birth in Poperinghe is a gibe at the Flemings, though this is not a necessary conclusion. Discussion of Chaucer's humor is hazardous, but it has always seemed to me that the joke here is that the reader is led to expect that the knight came from a far-off land of romantic character—"Yborn he was in fer contree"—which turns out to be no further "beyond the sea" than Poperinghe, just one of the commercial towns in Flanders. And how prosaic a spot! It is as if a French romancer writing in France were to make the birthplace of his hero Liverpool or Leeds. Possibly the comic sound of the name Poperinghe to English ears, which Mercutio could have told us about, is partly responsible for this "birth-place." But even if my suggestion is wrong, and Chaucer did intend a hit at the Flemings by making his hero one of their countrymen, is it not dangerous to make the whole interpretation of the piece turn on this? Is the Pardoner's Tale a satire on the Flemish because the "ryotoures three" live in that country? May not the birthplace of Sir Thopas be as much a detail as the setting of the opening scene of the Pardoner's narrative?<sup>11</sup> Had this little parody been intended primarily as a satire on the men of Flanders, should we not expect some further direct evidence?

<sup>10</sup> Edition, p. 617.

<sup>11</sup> Miss Dorothy M. Norris, "Chaucer's Pardoner's Tale and Flanders," PMLA, XLVIII, 636-641, suggests that the poet meant to warn his king and his country against cupidity.

Professor Manly believes that Chaucer's contemporaries were accustomed "to poke fun, mingled with not a little resentment, at the efforts of the Flemish bourgeoisie to ape the manners of the English and French aristocracy"; and he goes to great pains to show that "throughout the narrative the satire is distinctly centred upon the bourgeois outlook of Sir Thopas and his ignorance of the manners, customs, and equipment of the aristocracy."<sup>12</sup> The latter statement seems an exaggeration. A part of the ridicule of Sir Thopas lies in giving him bourgeois details of costume and countrified tastes, such as swearing on ale and bread and wrestling for a ram as a prize. But this is surely only a minor part of Chaucer's fun, which seems rather directed at the absurdities of the way in which rhyming mother-wits set forth knight-errantry. To quote Manly's own words, written in another connection, "Every ridiculous feature of the tenth-rate romance is exploited with glee—its exaggerations, its love of insignificant detail, its prolixity, its capacity for consuming hours in 'passing a given point'."<sup>13</sup> The reasons for the bourgeois elements in the description are not far to seek. Cervantes has shown how effectively knighthood can be rendered ridiculous by the intrusion of the homely detail of low life. Moreover, the English romances such as Chaucer is generally supposed to be caricaturing were intended primarily for the simpler middle-class folk who could read no French, or not read at all. In these pieces courtly elegancies are often neglected. Probably Chaucer felt this, and deliberately made his carpet knight plebeian.

It is further urged that "such a poem would have been highly appropriate, during the visit of the Flemish embassy [in 1383]<sup>14</sup> . . . or immediately after it. Such a satire would certainly then have had a point and an appeal which it could hardly have had at any time later."<sup>15</sup> This raises two difficulties: first, is it likely that Chaucer looked upon the Flemings at the time of this embassy as fit objects for satire; and second, is it likely that Sir Thopas was composed as early as 1383-84?

I hesitate to differ from Professor Manly, whose opinion must carry great weight, in regard to Chaucer's attitude towards social and political conditions. But is it a necessary conclusion that the poet would have been disposed to ridicule van Artevelde's party, which sent the embassy to Richard's court? The relations between England and Flanders in the fourteenth century were complicated, and some circumstances support Manly's point of view. John of Gaunt, who wanted men and money to enforce his claim to the throne of Castile, was opposed to the Flemish cause. Chaucer's sympathies, like those of Froissart, were of course to some extent with the aristocracy, as was natural for a man who had spent his life at court. He may well have felt that the revolt of the Flemish towns was somewhat like the Peasants' Revolt in England in 1381. Moreover, the Flemish weavers settled in England had made themselves objects of special hatred. On the other hand, I do not think that Chaucer's attitude was exactly like that of Froissart, who says of the defeat of the Flemings in the battle of Roosebeke, in a passage which would afford Professor Manly and Miss Winstanley effective ammunition:

As no one seems to have perceived this before, it is doubtful if Richard would have been greatly moved. <sup>12</sup> Pp. 59, 71. <sup>13</sup> Mod. Phil., viii (1910), 144.

<sup>14</sup> "The Issue Roll of the Exchequer for 7 Richard II indicates that the men of Ghent remained in England from 6 August to 30 December 1383, and received payment from the Exchequer at the rate of a noble a day for the seven." Manly. Essay, p. 62. <sup>15</sup> P. 73.

This battle, from the beginning to the defeat, did not last more than half an hour. The event was very honorable to all Christendom, as well as to the nobility and gentry; for had those low-bred peasants succeeded, there would have been unheard of cruelties practiced, to the destruction of all gentlemen, by the common people, who had everywhere risen in rebellion.<sup>16</sup>

After a detailed investigation, Professor Patch has urged, and I think with reason, that Chaucer extended his kindly view of human nature to the lower classes, and that "his influence inevitably would tend to a broader social sympathy."<sup>17</sup> Furthermore, it must be remembered that England was at war with France, and the the French king led the forces against the Flemish burghers in 1382. Froissart expressly says that the English were jealous of the French.

You must know, that the king of England, his uncles, and the nobility, were much vexed at the good success and great honor which the king of France and his nobles had gained at the battle of Rosebecque. When the English knights conversed together on the subject, they said: "Ha, by holy Mary! how proud will the French be now, for the heap of peasants they have slain. I wish to God, Philip von Artaveld had had two thousand of our lances and six thousand archers: not one Frenchman would have escaped death or imprisonment."<sup>18</sup>

There had long been friendly relations between Edward III and the Flemish townsmen. Philip van Artevelde was a godson of Queen Philippa, and John of Gaunt of James van Artevelde. Froissart tells us, indeed, that the English lords laughed when the embassy tactlessly pressed the payment of an old debt (a point which both Miss Winstanley and Professor Manly emphasize), but what the lords laughed at was clearly not absurdities of Flemish dress and manners, but the absurdity of the supposition that such a debt could receive serious consideration, at a time when the English were extremely short of funds. So when Philip's emissary proposed mediation between the Flemings and the Count of Flanders, the French are said to have laughed—because the interests and sympathies of the French and of the Count were closely identified. Froissart says that if the embassy to Richard II "had been silent, respecting these crowns [the money owed them], and had only requested assistance from the king of England, he would have gone in person to Flanders," or have sent thither a powerful force.<sup>19</sup> The Flemish envoys were courteously treated by the English; at Calais the governor "received them very politely; when he understood they wanted to go to England, he provided them with ships and passage-boats."<sup>20</sup> The Londoners were cordial to the visitors. "They were received with much kindness, and the English commonalty even manifested great sympathy for those of their order in Flanders who stood in such peril of their lives and liberties."<sup>21</sup> The so-called "crusade" of the Bishop of Norwich was, as Miss Norris notes, "really an expedition to support the popular party of Flanders against its Count and the King of France."<sup>22</sup> Despite commercial jealousies, intimate relations had existed between England and Flanders for fifty years. Many Flemings had come to England, and the English were thoroughly familiar with them. They knew the Flemish vices—love of dress and drink, dissolute morals and rough manners. They resented their competition in industry. But is it likely that the Flemings, represented by an embassy of important citizens, headed by the Bishop-elect of Ghent, would have seemed so ridiculous that Chaucer was moved to create Sir Thopas? Perhaps so; but it does not seem at all certain.

<sup>16</sup> "Cette desconfiture fu très-honnerable et prouffitabile pour toute crestieneté et pour toute noblèche et gentillèche; car, se li villain fussent là venu a leur entente, onques si grans cruautés, ne oribletès n'avinrent au monde, que il fust avenu par les comunautés qui se fussent partout revelées et destruit gentillèche." Kervyn de Lettenhove, x, 173; Johnes, p. 322, Chap. cxxv.

<sup>17</sup> Howard R. Patch, "Chaucer and the Common People," JEGP, xxix (1930), 376-384.

<sup>18</sup> Johnes, p. 326, Chap. cxxx.

Professor Manly believes that there is "no sufficient reason why such a poem should have been written expressly for the Canterbury Tales, whether Chaucer's object was to satirize the romances or the Flemings."<sup>23</sup> Here, of course, he runs counter to the generally received opinion. As Robinson says, "It is usually held to have been written during the Canterbury period, and even to have been planned for the dramatic situation in which it is so effectively introduced."<sup>24</sup> Chaucer apparently wrote

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., p. 310, Chap. cvi.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., p. 309; Chap. cv.

<sup>21</sup> James Hutton, James and Philip van Arteveld (London, 1882), p. 271.

<sup>22</sup> P. 638.

<sup>23</sup> P. 73.

<sup>24</sup> Loc. cit., p. 842.

"expressly" for the Tales what happened to interest him at the moment. Thus the Canon's Yeoman's Tale seems to reflect a sudden resolve to expose alchemy, although this involved the introduction of two new characters, and many others had had no opportunity to tell a story. Sir Thopas affords a contrast to the varied literary types in the Tales, and being an extravaganza, could not place Chaucer in competition with the other pilgrims in story-telling. It has dramatic importance, too; the Host has rallied Chaucer on his full waist-line and habitual<sup>25</sup> abstraction, and in return Chaucer gives him, the great arbiter elegantiarum of narrative, not the "deyntee thyng" which he expects, but a piece of "drasty rymyng" which so irritates him that he stops it short. After it is all over, the Host has nothing to say about the Flemings; that is not the point. But he does object to "rym dogerel." Doggerel romances have called forth doggerel satire. Then Chaucer proceeds, under cover of a "moral tale vertuuous," to which no objection can be taken, to irritate the Host afresh by singing the praises of a noble and helpful wife, quite unlike the "goode lief" who makes his Southwark home life miserable. How straight Chaucer's shaft went to the mark is amusingly shown in Harry Bailly's long and pathetic outburst, after the Tale of Melibeus is over.<sup>26</sup>

<sup>25</sup> I am not convinced by Dr Thomas A. Knott's contention (see "A Bit of Chaucer Mythology," Mod. Phil., viii, 135-139) that Chaucer's manner and appearance as described by the Host in his raillery in the Prologue to Sir Thopas were not habitual, but only the temporary effect of the pathetic story told by the Prioress. The Host says "I always see you looking at the ground"—"For evere upon the ground I se thee stare." But "evere" does not mean "always" to Dr. Knott; it means "steadily, fixedly at this moment," [italics mine]—the very opposite of the usual significance of the word. "He smeth elvyssh by his contenance," continues Harry Bailly. Dr. Knott thinks that as a result of the sad tale of the little schoolboy, Chaucer began to look elvish, which he takes to mean "the look of 'other-worldliness' caused by the mingling of pity and sympathy and strong religious feeling." Perhaps these emotions would make a man look like an elf, but it seems open to doubt. The company are sobered by the Prioress's narrative, but what the Host says of Chaucer seems to refer to his wonted habit, like the jest about his girth. This, at least, can hardly have been increased by his emotion. There really seems to be no difficulty about the passage. It is preposterous to suppose that the poet, a courtier and man of affairs, "was of a modest and retiring disposition which would not permit him to mingle with his companions on terms of good fellowship," which Dr. Knott thinks an inference generally drawn from the lines, even if we were not told the contrary in the Prologue (31-32). Like the Clerk of Oxford and other reflective persons, Chaucer falls easily into an abstracted mood, contrasting with the merry badinage of the journey. It is from one of these fits of abstraction that Harry Bailly rouses him, just as he rouses the Clerk:

It is no tyme for to studien heere.
Telle us som myrie tale, by youre fey!

<sup>26</sup> See an article of mine in Mod. Phil., xi (1913), 247-258. Robinson reads "Goodelief" in B 3084.

Professor Manly suggests that Sir Thopas was composed "during the visit of the Flemish embassy . . . or immediately after it," that is, in 1383 or 1384, and that "the audience for which the Canterbury Tales were put together may perhaps have welcomed with renewed amusement and delight a poem which had aroused their mirth when the object of its satire was still a fresh and vivid interest."<sup>27</sup> But they would very likely have been bored by it. Nothing is staler than satire when it is out of date, and before it is old enough to assume historic interest. At least four years, and probably more, must have elapsed since the visit of the Flemish embassy. Chaucer could hardly have reached this point in the Tales before 1387, at the earliest, the year in which, as Manly says, it is commonly supposed that "he definitely began to work out his plan for the Canterbury Tales as a group,"<sup>28</sup> and it seems likely that he inserted Sir Thopas into the pilgrimage much later than this. Some kinds of dishes will bear warming over; the Canterbury collection provides examples. But Sir Thopas is of a different sort. There are certainly strong reasons for doubting that such an airy bit of pâtisserie has been, like one of the Cook's Jack of Dover pies, "twies hoot."

WILLIAM WITHERLE LAWRENCE

Columbia University

<sup>27</sup> Essay, p. 73.

<sup>28</sup> Edition, p. 28.

VIII

THE SOURCE OF CHAUCER'S MELIBEUS

THE source of Chaucer's Tale of Melibeus is well established. This long medieval tractate on prudence is a translation—and a very close translation—of a French treatise which Chaucer read and admired so much that he put it into English dress and placed it among his Canterbury Tales. The French treatise was, in turn, an adaptation of a Latin work by Albertano of Brescia: namely, Liber Consolationis et Consilii.<sup>1</sup> Chaucer's tale, however, was uninfluenced by the Latin: he was content simply to translate the French adaptation which he had under his eyes.<sup>2</sup>

The only easily accessible text of the French source is to be found in that late fourteenth-century anthology of advice to a young wife entitled Le Ménagier de Paris.<sup>3</sup> Scholars dealing with problems involving Chaucer's handling of his source material in the Melibeus have been wont to have recourse to this text in Le Ménagier.<sup>4</sup> It is my purpose in this paper to demonstrate that Le Ménagier gives an unsatisfactory text of the source of Chaucer's tale. My evidence is drawn principally from MS. fr. 1165 at the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris.<sup>5</sup> This manuscript

<sup>1</sup> Sundby, Thor (ed.), Liber Consolationis et Consilii, Chaucer Society (1873).

<sup>2</sup> Koeppel, Emil, "Chaucer und Albertanus Brixiensis," Archiv, LXXXVI, 29–46. Below I refute Miss Landrum's argument opposed to Koeppel. My study of the French manuscripts also renders me unable to subscribe to Professor Tatlock's belief that Chaucer knew the Latin version when he wrote the prologue to the Melibeus. (Tatlock, J. S. P., The Development and Chronology of Chaucer's Works, Chaucer Society [1907], p. 190.) Undoubtedly he knew another version (perhaps more than one) which was different from the one which he was using; but, as Professor Tatlock admits, at least one of Chaucer's statements about this other version does not fit the Latin tale. There were, besides the version employed by Chaucer for the Melibeus, at least three other Old French translations of Albertano's Liber Consolationis et Consilii: may not Chaucer have been referring to one of them? Conceivably, too, his reference may have been to one or more other manuscripts of the very version which he was employing, since the manuscripts differ among themselves in respect to completeness and accuracy.

<sup>3</sup> Pichon, Jérôme (ed.), Le Ménagier de Paris (Paris, 1846), I, 186–235.

<sup>4</sup> Professor A. S. Cook argues for Chaucer's knowledge and use of Le Ménagier in his article "Chaucer's Clerk's Tale and a French Version of His Original," The Romanic Review, VIII, 210–226. In another place ("Chaucer's Source MSS. for the Clerkes Tale," PMLA, XLVII, 431–452) I have demonstrated that Chaucer did not use Le Ménagier for the story of Griselda and her husband; in the present article I shall demonstrate that he did not use Le Ménagier for the story of Melibeus and his wife. It seems doubtful, therefore, whether Chaucer knew Le Ménagier at all; certainly he did not employ it as source material.

<sup>5</sup> In all, I have located twenty-six manuscripts containing the text of the Old French Melibée which was Chaucer's source. (This does not include the three manuscripts of Le Ménagier.) The list follows: Bibliothèque Nationale (Paris), MSS. fr. 578, 580, 813, 1090, 1165, 1468, 1540, 1746, 1972, 2240, n. a. 10554, 15015, 17272, 19123, 20042, 25547; Biblio-

I have compared throughout and in detail with both Le Ménagier and the Melibeus. In passage after passage MS. 1165 differs from Le Ménagier. How then, we are impelled to ask, does Chaucer's translation compare with these two different texts of his French original? In brief, which reading did Chaucer follow? The answer is significant. In over 150 passages he follows MS. 1165 rather than Le Ménagier. Hence, Le Ménagier cannot be accepted as accurately reproducing the source manuscript which Chaucer had before him.

Below I present a selection of fifteen passages representative of the 150. This evidence, fragmentary as it is, suffices. In each group of parallels, I cite (1) the original Latin upon which the French is based, (2) the French reading in Le Ménagier, (3) the French reading in MS. 1165, and (4) Chaucer's rendering, which will be found in every instance to follow MS. 1165 rather than Le Ménagier.

1. Albertano, 106, 8-12:<sup>6</sup> Et Seneca in Epistolis dixit: "Concordia parvae res crescunt: discordia maximae dilabuntur." Et Tullius dixit: "Mea quidem sententia paci, quae nihil sit habitura insidiarum, semper est consulendum."
Ménagier, 227: Car Sénèque dit en ses escrips que par concorde les richesses petites deviennent grandes, et par discorde les grandes deviennent petites et vont à déclin et se fondent tousjours; et vous savez que un des grans biens de ce monde ce est paix.
MS. 1165: Car saint Jacques<sup>7</sup> dit en ses epistres que par concorde les petites richesses devienient grans et par discorde les grans richesses vont decliner et se fondent touziours. Et vous savez que un des grans et des souverains biens de cest monde est paix.
Chaucer, 2866-8: For seint Jame seith in hise epistles: that "by concord and pees the smale richesses wexen grete, and by debaat and discord the grete richesses fallen doun." And ye knowen wel that oon of the gretteste and most sovereyn thing, that is in this world, is unitee and pees.

---

thèque de l'Arsenal (Paris), MSS. 2691 and 3356; Bibliothèque de Brussel, MSS. 9237, 9552, and 10404; British Museum, MSS. Reg. 19 C VII and Reg. 19 C XI; Bibliothèque de Beauvais, MS. 9 (2807); Bibliothèque de Lille, MS. 392; Bibliothèque de Besançon, MS. 587. With the exception of the last three, I have seen all these manuscripts. The list, of course, does not include manuscripts of other Old French translations of Albertano's tale of Melibeus. I am aware of three other translations—one at the Bibliothèque Nationale in MS. fr. 1142, another at the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal in MS. 2880, and a third (in verse) at the Bodleian in MS. 5264 (Marshall 29).

<sup>6</sup> Albertano references are to page and line in Sundby, op. cit.; Ménagier references are to page in Pichon, op. cit., 1; Chaucer references are to line in the Melibeus (Skeat's one-volume Oxford text is employed for all references throughout the paper). In printing passages from the MSS. I have accented tonic e (ê) wherever it might be mistaken for e muet.

<sup>7</sup> Skeat conjectured that Chaucer's reading was due to such an error in the French manuscript (Skeat, W. W., The Works of Geoffrey Chaucer, v, 222); here we have corroboration of Skeat's surmise.

2. Albertano, 99, 10–11: Ab inimicis auxilium postulare.
Ménagier, 221: Mendier l'aumosne de son ennemy.
MS. 1165: Mengier l'aumosne de son ennemy.
Chaucer, 2757: To eten the almesse of his enemy.
3. Albertano, 115, 4–6. Ait enim Salomon: "Audite populi et omnes gentes et rectores ecclesiae."
Ménagier, 230: Car Salemon dit: oiez-moy, dit-il, tous peuples et toutes gens et gouverneurs de l'Eglise.
MS. 1165: Car Salemon dit, croy moy, dist il, peuple et toutes gens et gouverneurs d'eglise.
Chaucer, 2944: For Salomon seith: "leveth me, and yeveth credence to that I shal seyn; I seye," quod he, "ye peple, folk, and governours of holy chirche . . ."
4. Albertano, 65, 17–19: Septimo demum errasti quia, facta partita, non es secutus voluntatem et sensum sapientium et amicorum.
Ménagier, 205: Après tu as erré car tu n'as pas suivy la volenté de tes loyaux amis sages et anciens.
MS. 1165: Après tu as erré car tu as faite division entre ceulx de ton conseil, tu n'as pas sceu la volenté de tes loyaux amis sages et anciens.
Chaucer, 2445–6: Ye han erred also, for ye han maked no divisoun bitwixe your conseilours; this is to seyn, bitwixen your trewe freendes and your feyned conseilours; ne ye han nat knowe the wil of your trewe freendes olde and wyse.
5. Albertano: Not in Liber Consolationis et Consilii.
Ménagier, 223: Fay tousjours aucunes bonnes euvres pour ce que l'ennemi ne te treuve oiseux, car l'ennemi ne trait pas légèrement en son euvre celluy qui est occupé en bonnes euvres
MS. 1165: Fay, dist il, touzours aucunes bonnes oeuvres pour ce que ly anemis te treuve occupé car ly ennemis ne prent pas legierement en son oeuvre ceulx qu'il treuve occupez en bonnes oeuvres.
Chaucer, 2785–6: "Doth somme gode dedes, that the devel which is our enemy ne finde yow nat unoccupied. For the devel ne taketh nat lightly un-to his werkinge swiche as he findeth occupied in gode werkes."
6. Albertano: Not in Liber Consolationis et Consilii.
Ménagier, 224: Et le philosophe dit que mieulx valut estre preudome et petit avoir que estre mauvais et avoir grans richesses.
MS. 1165: Et ly prophete dit que miex vault proudomme estre et un petit avoir que estre mauvais tenus et grans richesses avoir.
Chaucer, 2820–1: And the prophete seith: that "bette it is to been a good man and have litel good and tresour, than to been holden a shrew and have grete richesses."
7. Albertano: Not in Liber Consolationis et Consilii.
Ménagier, 228. Les troublés ne sont pas bien cler-voyans.
MS. 1165: Oeil troublé n'est pas bien cler voyant.
Chaucer, 2891: "Troubled eyen han no cleer sighte."
8. Albertano: Not in Liber Consolationis et Consilii.

Ménagier, 202: Bieneureux est l'homme qui n'a point esté es consaulx des mauvais.

MS. 1165: Eux est ly homs qui n'a suyvi le conseil des mauvais.

Chaucer, 2387: "Blisful is that man that hath nat folwed the conseil of shrewes."

9. Albertano, 2, 6-7: Prudentiam nomine.

Ménagier, 186: Une femme nommée Prudence.

MS. 1165: Une femme appelée Prudence.

Chaucer, 2157: His wyf that called was Prudence.

10. Albertano, 83, 14: Credo itaque, quod Deus . . .

Ménagier, 213: Je tien que Dieu . . .

MS. 1165: Je tien et le croy que dieu . . .

Chaucer, 2598-9: I holde and bileve that god . . .

11. Albertano, 94, 16-95, 1: "[Doctrina viri] per patientiam [ejus cognoscitur], et gloria ejus est iniqua praetergredi"; et iterum: "Qui patiens est, multa gubernatur prudentia."

Ménagier, 218: . . . par patience, et nostre Seigneur dit que patience vaint; et encores dit que en nostre patience nous possiderons nos âmes. Et autre part dit Salemon que cellui est patient qui se gouverne par grant prudence.

MS. 1165: . . . par patience, et autre part dit que cilz qui est paciens se gouverne par grant prudence.

Chaucer, 2702-3: . . . by patience." And in another place he seith: that "he that is pacient governeth him by greet prudence."

12. Albertano, 95, 25-6: Talem patientiam, quae ad perfectionem pertineat, habere minime valeo.

Ménagier, 219: Patience est une grant vertu.

MS. 1165: Pacience est une grans vertuz et vertu de perfection.

Chaucer, 2708: Pacience is a greet vertu of perfeccioun.

13. Albertano, 3, 23-4, 1: Temperatus fletus a tristi vel inter tristes non est prohibitus.

Ménagier, 187-8: Certes, dist Prudence, pleurs ne sont mie deffendus à celluy qui est triste.

MS. 1165: Certez, dist Prudence, plour atrempez n'est pas defendu a ycelluy qui est triste.

Chaucer, 2178: Prudence answerde, "Certes, wel I woot, attempree weping is no-thing defended to him that sorweful is."

14. Albertano, 2, 19-22:

Quis matrem, nisi mentis inops, in funere nati

Flere vetat? non hoc illa monenda loco est.

Cum dederit lacrimas animumque impleverit aegrum,

Ille dolor verbis emoderandus erit.<sup>8</sup>

Ménagier, 187: Cellui est fol qui s'efforce d'empeschier la mère de plorer la mort de son enfant, jusques à tant qu'elle se soit bien vidée de larmes.

<sup>8</sup> Since Albertano is quoting Ovid here (see Sundby, op. cit., p. 2), Chaucer's turn of phrase may have been influenced directly by the Latin poet; but it seems more probable that here, as in the rest of the Melibeus, he was following his French source very closely.

MS. 1165: Cilz est folz qui s'efforce d'empeschier la mere de plourer en la mort de son enfant jusques atant qu'elle soit bien raemplye de larmes.

Chaucer, 2166: "He is a fool that destourbeth the moder to wepen in the deeth of hir child, til she have wept hir fille."

15. Albertano, 8, 14-6: Quatenus personam tuam ita custodias, quod neque dolus neque astutiae desint tibi ad cavendum.

Ménagier, 190: Aies diligence de garder ta personne et euvres en telle manière que tu soies bien pourveu d'espies et guettes.

MS. 1165: Aies diligence de garder ta personne en telle maniere qu'il ne te faille ne espies ne guaites.

Chaucer, 2215: Do thy diligence in kepinge of thy propre persone, in swich a wyse that thou ne wante noon espye ne wacche.<sup>9</sup>

These parallels demonstrate the untrustworthiness of Le Ménagier.

A few corollaries to this demonstration need to be presented. In the first place, some of the parallels throw a revealing light upon the state of Chaucer's source manuscript. The first four in the illustrative group indicate that Chaucer worked with a corrupt copy which was at some distance from the original manuscript of the translation. The errors are of such a nature as to establish that they did not originate in mistranslations from a Latin, but in French miscopyings from a French translation—occurred, that is to say, through scribal error in the French manuscripts. Copying the mistake in his corrupt manuscript, Chaucer gave <sup>9</sup> Since these are merely representative illustrative passages, I have thought it wise to indicate briefly all the places in Chaucer's tale for which Le Ménagier is untrustworthy. This list, with two exceptions (Ch 2498 and 2557, for which MS. B. N. fr. 20042 was consulted), is based wholly upon closer readings in MS. 1165, and will probably be augmented by examination of other manuscripts. Le Ménagier, then, does not give accurately the reading of Chaucer's source manuscript in the following places: Mén 186, Ch 2157, 2159; Mén 187, Ch 2163, 2165-6, 2169, 2172-3, 2175, 2178; Mén 188, Ch 2184, 2189; Mén 189, Ch 2190, 2194-5, 2202; Mén 190, Ch 2208, 2215, 2218, 2222; Mén 191, Ch 2227; Mén 192, Ch 2234-6, 2240-1, 2244-6; Mén 193, Ch 2251, 2254; Mén 194, Ch 2258, 2264; Mén 195, Ch 2274, 2281; Mén 196, Ch 2284, 2289-90, 2293, 2296; Mén 197, Ch 2308, 2310-21; Mén 198, Ch 2327, 2329; Mén 200, Ch 2360-1, 2367; Mén 201, Ch 2377; Mén 202, Ch 2387-8, 2392; Mén 203, Ch 2407-11; Mén 204, Ch 2420-2, 2424; Mén 205, Ch 2432, 2435, 2444-5; Mén 206, Ch 2453, 2455, 2459, Mén 207, Ch 2475, 2478, 2483, 2491, 2494, 2498; Mén 208, Ch 2507, 2510-2; Mén 209, Ch 2519; Mén 211, Ch 2557; Mén 212, Ch 2586, 2590; Mén 213, Ch 2594-6, 2598-9, 2601, 2608-9, 2611-3; Mén 214, Ch 2619, 2626, Mén 215, Ch 2631-2, 2636, 2638-9, 2644; Mén 216, Ch 2647-8, 2652, 2654, 2659-60, 2662; Mén 217, Ch 2665, 2669, 2674-5, 2684; Mén 218, Ch 2687, 2692, 2695, 2699, 2702-3; Mén 219, Ch 2708, 2711-3, 2718, 2720-1; Mén 220, Ch 2725, 2730, 2732, 2736; Mén 221, Ch 2739, 2741, 2743, 2746-9, 2754, 2757-8; Mén 222, Ch 2763, 2775-6; Mén 223, Ch 2785-6, 2792-3, 2795; Mén 224, Ch 2804, 2820-1, 2824-5; Mén 225, Ch 2832, 2839-41, 2843; Mén 226, Ch 2847, 2849, 2851-2, 2854-5, 2863; Mén 227, Ch 2866-9, 2878-81; Mén 228, Ch 2887-8, 2891, 2894-5, 2902, 2904, 2907-8; Mén 229, Ch 2909-11, 2914; Mén 230, Ch 2944, 2950; Mén 231, Ch 2959-61, 2970, 2974; Mén 232, Ch 2985, 2991, 2993, 2997, 2999, 3001; Mén 233, Ch 3005, 3017-8, 3025-6; Mén 234, Ch 3031-2, 3050; Mén 235, Ch 3059, 3067.

St. James the credit for something that Seneca wrote ("Sénèque"—"saint Jacques"); and verbs which started out in the Latin as "to beg," "to hear," and "to follow," although they were safely carried over from the Latin to the French by the translator, were erroneously metamorphosed by French scribes into "to eat" ("mendier"—"mengier"), "to believe" ("oiez"—"croy"), and "to know" ("suivy"—"sceu")—errors which Chaucer, blindly following his source and lacking a copy of the Latin, perpetuated in his own version.

The striking nature of some of these differences between Le Ménagier and the source manuscript which Chaucer used leads to the necessity of re-examining all arguments advanced by scholars who have relied upon Le Ménagier. With only Le Ménagier to rely upon, one might easily become convinced that Chaucer probably had access to the Latin as well as to a French version of his tale. If, in the illustrative list of fifteen parallels cited above, one were to disregard the readings in MS. 1165 and confine one's attention to Chaucer, Le Ménagier, and Albertano, one would find a number of passages in which Chaucer differs from Le Ménagier and seems to have gone to Albertano for his reading: the last four parallels, in fact, are of this type. The presence in MS. 1165 of the passages as Chaucer has them, however, demonstrates that Chaucer's French manuscript contained the readings in question. And so, I am convinced, it will be found with all instances of apparent reliance upon the Latin.

This is certainly so in two readings which Miss Grace W. Landrum has cited to prove that Chaucer made use of the Latin.<sup>10</sup> They are as follows, with the addition of the corresponding readings from MS. 1165:

1. Albertano, 10, 28-30: Ait enim Jhesus Sirac: "Musica in luctu importuna oratio."

Ménagier, 192: Not in Le Ménagier.

MS. 1165: Et Ihesu Syrac dit que musique em plour est ennuyeuse narracion.

Chaucer, 2235: For Jesus Syrac seith: that "musik in wepinge is anoyous thing."

2. Albertano, 10, 24-6: Dictumque fuit illi: "Ubi non est auditus, non effundas sermonem, et importune noli extolli in sapientia tua."

Ménagier, 192: Not in Le Ménagier.

MS. 1165: Car Salemon dit la ou tu n'auras audience ne t'efforce point de parler.

Chaucer, 2237: For Salomon seith: "ther-as thou ne mayst have noon audience, enforce thee nat to speke."

In each of these parallels a quotation occurs in Chaucer which is altogether lacking in Le Ménagier but which does appear in the Latin of Albertano. But the corresponding passages in MS. 1165 demonstrate at once not only that the expressions were in the French version but also that Chaucer's rendition is much closer to the French than to the Latin.

<sup>10</sup> Landrum, Grace W., "Chaucer's Use of the Vulgate," PMLA, xxxix, 75-100.

The new light cast by the hitherto unexamined French manuscripts helps us toward the truth concerning still another theory. Professor J. Leslie Hotson has advanced the argument that "the Melibeus is a political tract, designed to dissuade John of Gaunt from launching on the invasion of Castile in 1386."<sup>11</sup> He points out certain parallels between the fictitious characters and events of the story and the actual characters and events of the historical period, and concludes that there are three or four passages in which Chaucer altered his source in order to fit his materials more closely to the particular demands of political propaganda. Two of these passages I cite here, with controverting evidence drawn from MS. fr. 20042 of the Bibliothèque Nationale.

1. Albertano, 69, 23-4: Custodias te ab omnibus extraneis et ignotis.

Ménagier, 207: Après, tu te dois garder de toutes gens estranges et mescongneus.

MS. 20042: Apres tu te dois garder de toutes gens estranges et menchongniers.
Chaucer, 2498: Thanne shul ye kepe yow fro alle straunge folk, and fro lyeres.

2. Albertano, 77, 24-5: Non enim habes filios masculos.

Ménagier, 211: Tu es tout seul et n'as nul enfant masle; tu n'as fors une seule fille tant seulement.

MS. 20042: Tu es tout seul et ne as nul enfans fors fille tant seulement.

Chaucer, 2557: For certes, ye ne han no child but a doghter.

In the former of these two parallels, it will be observed that the "unknown people" mentioned in Albertano and Le Ménagier are transformed in Chaucer's version into "liars." Where did Chaucer get his "lyeres?" Professor Hotson believes that it is a deliberate change by Chaucer, made to enforce a very pointed warning to John of Gaunt against certain scheming ambassadors from Portugal, "members of the international Ananias club,"<sup>12</sup>—diplomatic "lyeres." This argument, however, collapses at once when we examine the reading in MS. 20042. Chaucer did not alter his source; he was simply working with a manuscript which contained an erroneous reading, and he copied the error.

In regard to the second parallel, Professor Hotson points out that, although both Le Ménagier and Albertano make direct reference to the lack of a son or male heir, Chaucer suppresses any such direct reference. The explanation advanced for this alteration on Chaucer's part is that "any person of tact, addressing the Duke of Lancaster, would not care to remind him of John, his only son by Constance of Castile, who had died in infancy; leaving his father with but one daughter Catherine, to carry on his claim to the throne of Castile."<sup>13</sup> The reading in MS. 20042, however, proves once more that Chaucer was merely following his source; hence, the proposed explanation of the minor change must be rejected.

<sup>11</sup> Hotson, J. Leslie, "The Tale of Melibeus and John of Gaunt," Studies in Philology, xviii, 430.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., 447.

It is no matter for wonder that these theories, based as they are upon Le Ménagier as Chaucer's source, have proved to be false. Since (as I hope I have demonstrated) numerous passages in Le Ménagier vary from the corresponding passages in Chaucer's source manuscript, any scholar who relies upon the text of Le Ménagier will be led to believe erroneously that Chaucer altered or added or omitted numerous passages.<sup>14</sup>

If Le Ménagier does not afford a reliable text of Chaucer's source, where are we to find one? Although I have listed above numerous passages in MS. 1165 which are closer to Chaucer than the corresponding passages in Le Ménagier, I make no claim that MS. 1165 gives a satisfactory text. It does not. It, too, has many deficiencies. For when MS. 1165 and Le Ménagier give readings which differ from each other, Chaucer's translation frequently follows the latter. In all, I have found about three hundred passages in which the two texts give divergent readings. In slightly over half of these, Chaucer follows the reading in MS. 1165; in slightly under half, he follows Le Ménagier. In other words, neither MS. 1165 nor Le Ménagier separately affords a satisfactory text of Chaucer's source manuscript. Together, however, they come close to supplying such a text. Whatever deficiencies may remain can undoubtedly be supplied by one or more of the remaining twenty-five manuscripts. For each MS, to quote Chaucer's own prologue to the tale, Ne saith nat al thing as his felaw doth, . . .

For somme of hem seyn more, and somme lesse.<sup>15</sup>

What we now need is a careful examination of these manuscripts of the French Mélibée, and a careful comparison of them with Chaucer's text. From such an examination and comparison will result a text of Chaucer's source that is complete, accurate, and reliable. Pending the completion of a work of this nature, it would seem wise not to rely unreservedly upon Le Ménagier for the text of Chaucer's source of the Tale of Melibeus.

J. BURKE SEVERS

Lehigh University

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., 447-448.

<sup>14</sup> A notable exception to this statement is the theory advanced by Professor Tatlock concerning line 2389 of the Melibeus (Tatlock, op cit., 192). Consulting Le Ménagier at this point, Professor Tatlock found a passage which was lacking in Chaucer's version—a passage deploring the sorry state of a nation burdened with a boy-sovereign. Interpreting this omission as deliberate on Chaucer's part, he deduced therefrom a date for the tale—i.e., after the death of the Black Prince, when the youth of his successor, Richard, rendered politic the omission of the passage. My investigations confirm Professor Tatlock's theory: no manuscript of the twenty-three which I examined omitted the passage, although some of them shortened it somewhat.

<sup>15</sup> Prologue to Melibeus, ll. 2135, 2139.

IX

THE CANTERBURY TALES IN 1400

PROFESSOR F. N. ROBINSON'S Complete Works of Geoffrey Chaucer is remarkable for many things; most of all, perhaps, for the best text we have, but hardly less for the extraordinarily comprehensive survey in his commentary of the mass of earlier scholarship. He gives a clean picture of the views held by most scholars today. Some relate to the arrangement and possible revision of the Canterbury Tales. These subjects obviously depend closely on the history of the work shortly before and after Chaucer's death, but as to this no one has in print systematically considered and appraised all the possibilities or expressed any clean-cut view. Chaucer students will suspend judgment on various matters pending the publication of results by Professors Manly and Rickert and their collaborators at the University of Chicago—especially on many readings and on most of the history and relations of the MSS.; but so far Mr. Manly's results<sup>1</sup> have been expressed incidentally and often doubtfully. The subject has been touched on with penetration by the much-regretted Aage Brusendorff in his erratic but brilliant and independent Chaucer Tradition.<sup>2</sup> The chief other comparatively recent writers are Professors J. Koch and W. W. Skeat, and Miss E. P. Hammond.<sup>3</sup> Their remarks on the subject are superficial or incidental—in fact so purely directed to this or that detail on the outside, and so without expression of a clear and complete view as to what physical history of the Tales lies underneath the existing MSS., that in spite of their learning and ingenuity one is sometimes inclined to murmur <sup>1</sup> Especially in Canterbury Tales by Geoffrey Chaucer (New York, 1928), hereafter cited as "Manly."—Some statement seems fitting as to the relation of the present study to him and his work. I sent the MS. to him to ascertain if it would be in any way or for any reason impolitic to print. He replied, of course in a kind and liberal spirit, that it would not be. Though in order not to confuse responsibility little or none of the information afforded by him and his co-workers has been embodied here, certain matters or expressions which he criticized have been modified or omitted, and he has saved me from more than one error; certain other opinions have been reinforced with further evidence. My desire has been to confine myself to broader conclusions unlikely to be invalidated by more exhaustive manuscript-detail, and to matters admitting legitimate difference of opinion. In all cases I am grateful to him.

<sup>2</sup> London and Copenhagen, 1925; cited hereafter as "Brusendorff."

<sup>3</sup> The works cited under these names are respectively Eight Manuscripts of Chaucer's Cant. T. (Ch. Soc., 1913), Evolution of the Cant. T. (Ch. Soc., 1907); Chaucer: a Bibliogr. Manual (New York, 1908). Other works cited hereafter merely under the authors' names are Robinson's edition already mentioned (Boston and New York, 1933), and Sir W. McCormick's The Manuscripts of Chaucer's Cant. T. (Oxford, 1933). For the MSS. the abbreviations of Manly, McCormick, and Robinson are used.

of a sursanure
In surgerye is perilous the cure.

The present study will assume the reader's general knowledge of the extraordinary variation in the eighty-five (or so) known complete or defective MSS. as to three matters—arrangement, omission of undoubtedly genuine passages, insertion of undoubtedly spurious passages. It is hard to think of any work ever written, important or unimportant, which was intended as a unit and in which there is anything like so chaotic a condition in the early authorities. This chaotic condition is the conspicuous feature of the MSS. to one familiar with them; it could hardly be worse. Detailed accounts of the differences among MSS., and suggestions as to their evolution, will be avoided here so far as possible, in deference to Mr. Manly and his collaborators; they are here put under his correction, "for I am not textueel" as he is. My justification for writing is that years ago I extensively examined over two-thirds of the more complete MSS., and came to certain conclusions, which were reserved only for lack of all the evidence, and are here extensively revised. The chief subjects to discuss are: first, the probabilities as to Chaucer's method of work, possible revision, publication by him, the condition of the MS. at his death; second, what happened afterwards, and the influence of the professional scribe and bookseller; and third, Chaucer's intentions as to arrangement in relation to the actual arrangements. Even though strictly limiting one's attempts in this intricate region, one would be unpardonable in presenting conclusions without genuine modesty.

We do not know in what physical form Chaucer worked on the Tales, but can surmise with probability. He would write in a cursive but legible hand on loose sheets of vellum or paper. Assuredly he did not write in an already bound volume. The medieval pictures we often see of scribes at work on one were designed for picturesqueness; art then was symbolical rather than realistic. To produce in an already unified volume the original draft of a work which embodied several earlier-finished parts, which could hardly be and certainly was not written in a settled and evenly progressive order, and which would be foreseen as requiring many undefinable gaps, would be both wasteful of time and expensive vellum or paper, and highly inconvenient. Above all, had Chaucer left the Tales in a bound volume or two, it is hardly credible that we should find in the MSS. the chaos we are suffering from. Whether the sheets were entirely separate, or in fascicules or quires as Miss Hammond (p. 159) and Brusendorff (pp. 58, 126) thought, I see no reliable evidence. Nor how far there was in October, 1400, perfect physical unification of each group by juxtaposition, tying, or sewing, or whether the order of the parts of it was indicated by a notation on them or on a memorandum, or whether the unity and correct arrangement within the groups is merely due to the scribes' or "editors' "4 wits, which they were certainly not beyond.

There must have been some revision by Chaucer in the original MS.; it stands to reason; and there is some evidence, though not a great deal. Of alternatives for single words or phrases which look genuine there are few or none.<sup>5</sup> Of alternative entire lines a very few may be genuine, but most were patently supplied by scribes to replace accidental losses in earlier copies. One or two instances of alternative couplets also may be genuine. And there are almost certainly a few short passages later added by Chaucer;<sup>6</sup> though not impossibly the appearance of a passage in but few MSS. might in one or two instances be due to damage to the original (as at top or bottom of a sheet) soon after copying had begun. Such revisions may have been written ambiguously, alternatives imperfectly erased or expuncted or without clear indication as to which the author preferred; added passages written on loose sheets (easily overlooked), or in the margin without clear indication of their proper place of insertion, and easily overlooked, or omitted lazily by scribes, who were far from having the modern scholar's logical mind and thirst for accuracy. These matters need not be discussed further here; enough to say that there is no reason to deny some afterthoughts or to see many of them.

On the other hand, there are far more evidences of lack of revision—conspicuous incompletenesses, contradictions, irrationalities. Some of these are notorious and strike the attentive reader between the eyes; as to others there might be debate, especially since there is a question how much prosaic realism and unimportant consistency Chaucer demanded of himself. Much of this he often gives us, sometimes subtly; but unless it is clearly there, the modern scholar should beware of indulging his microscopic eye. Poetic not literal truth is the business of the poet medieval or modern, as to which Mr. Robinson has some good words (p. 2). But for all that there is a lack of finish at many points which we cannot doubt Chaucer would have corrected if he could.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>4</sup> By the word "editor" (which will recur) I mean someone who took more responsibility for solving problems and getting things into shape than would be expected of an ordinary copyist.

<sup>5</sup> Of the nine alternatives in MchT 1305-6 none is genuine; Chaucer probably wrote the first six words, hoping vainly to finish the lines later, as Virgil so often did in the Aeneid, and the scribes mended according to their lights, as they so often did. A modern editor I believe should omit all except these six words (as MSS. Hg and Hk, only, do—suggestively as to the history of the text) After most alterations Chaucer would cancel.

<sup>6</sup> One which has been doubted (as by Manly, p. 512) is the graunt—haunt couplet about the Friar in the Prolog, 252 a b, in several MSS. In favor of its authenticity I would point out that it is not only in one of the very oldest MSS., the Hengwrt, but that this contains no spurious lines, to say nothing of couplets, whatever; on the contrary it often carefully leaves blanks for lines obviously missing. I do not believe any discoverable MS.-genealogy will prove otherwise likely additions to be spurious; everyone knows there was a vast amount of contamination, both constant and sporadic.

There is one more matter relating to the condition of the MS. as Chaucer worked on it—the extra-textual features. One may well believe that none of the mere titles, headings, and endings of the parts are due to him;<sup>8</sup> the scribes even of closely allied MSS. wantonly vary the wording and even the language (English, Latin, French) far more than would be likely had they found them in the original, for there is certainly no reason to believe that the latter was used but once and never consulted again, or to doubt that the conditions in it were well known to some better-informed “editors.” If as is possible Chaucer left certain informal identifying labels which guided the scribes, we can hardly see what they were. On the other hand, I agree with Brusendorff<sup>9</sup> that the marginal Latin extracts from sources are mostly Chaucer’s own margin-alia (omitted by some scribes for want of space or interest); though not in the view that they are due to an assumption of dignity and learning—rather to the genuine medieval love of precedent and authority, especially in Latin, sincerely shared by Chaucer. Here is a case where the lights and shades of our own portrait of Chaucer are affected, and a racy savor of the traits and tastes of early readers and scribes conveyed, by the MSS. “Our learned poet Chaucer’s” disinterested art at times is momentarily occulted for the modern by Chaucer’s interest in learning for its own sake, as in the predestination discourse in the Troilus, Dorigen’s soliloquy on suicidal heroines in the Franklin’s Tale, and many a shorter passage. Chaucer’s taste was not just that of 1934. His <sup>7</sup> Lists of cases, not complete and perhaps not without debatable matters, are given by Brusendorff (pp. 116–20); the writer’s Harl. MS. 7334, pp. 24–25; and elsewhere. Here I should not include six cases where the word write is used of these orally-delivered tales (KnT 1201, Mel 2154, MkT 3843, MchT 1739, FkIT 1549, SNT 78), which are far too numerous to be “oversights”; Chaucer for the moment thought of himself as the literary man, not as the imaginary reporter, and in all cases but one found the word convenient for a rime. This matter is good to remember when one is tempted to force the realism.

<sup>8</sup> See, e.g., Skeat’s Eight-Text Edition, pp. 2–5; he seems to believe the same. So also Brusendorff (p. 131), who further makes the legitimate, startling, and unacceptable suggestion that Chaucer may not have meant the Sec. Nun’s Tale for that lady after all.

<sup>9</sup> Pp. 82, 127. Mr. Manly so far is undecided (pp. 574–575). These extracts are collected, from the Ch. Soc. prints of MSS., in Skeat’s Eight-Text Ed., pp. 9–18. It is noteworthy that they are much commoner in two of the oldest MSS. (El, Hg).

same careful side is probably illustrated by another extra-textual feature, the Latin glosses over difficult words ("i. impetus" over "vezc," KnT 1985; "i. ceriose" over "ceriously," MLT, 185, and many more); and over homonym rimes ("hic," "audire," over "here," "here," ChPr 4339-40, PhysT 173-174, etc.), and perhaps even some of the "nota bene" pointers and "Auctor" labels.<sup>10</sup> Since these glosses are found, so far as known, in few MSS. and those only the oldest, they go back very close to Chaucer, and, quite numerous, were assuredly inserted by some person informed, careful, and solicitous. Were there any evidence of a very careful literary executor, they might be ascribed to him, as a warning to scribes against officious correction; but one may differ with Brusendorff (p. 129) in thinking most of them probably Chaucer's own warnings. A poet who shows so much solicitude, with his cautions against "Diane," "Samuel," actually put in the verse, might well warn scribes against other officious emendation. What is most interesting is the suggestion in all this that the extant MSS. are largely derived not from a "fair copy" but directly from Chaucer's original MS.,<sup>11</sup> as is a priori most likely; or just possibly from a "fair copy" on which he had made such notations, meaning it to serve as the exemplar for copyists.

All this lack of revision and this informal noting have a bearing on the next question, as to any circulation of the Tales before Chaucer's death. For any publication, most of the probability and evidence seem negative—publication meaning<sup>12</sup> such a "release" that the author no longer had control, that new copies were made, and that he could not prevent unlimited reproduction from them. That the work as a whole was not so published seems certain. The imperfections and incompleteness just mentioned would naturally make a writer unwilling to launch and to allow multiplication of copies of a work in such a state—a work which as long as life and health held he would expect to continue and perfect. We know that Chaucer was a sanguine sort of man; it is scarcely likely that he ever knew he was to die in October or so of 1400, and if he ever did come to realize that he was doomed, he would probably either have still hoped for time to improve the work or else would have been in no condition to think about it. Chaucer especially was unlikely to publish, frequently betraying, as we have seen, solicitude for the purity of his text and his literary reputation.<sup>13</sup> To a finished poet before the days of printing the prospects must have been gloomy indeed; Dante and Chaucer both took precautions against them, but no poet with such even amusing candor as Chaucer. That he himself ever published the work as a whole in any form is so unlikely that one may well be surprised to find some scholars half-considering it.<sup>14</sup> Publication at what stage? Why at the particular stage where the work chanced to be cut off by his death? To any publication in large parts, or in "groups," much of the same considerations applies; few or none of these are not in need of some revision; no "group" except the first is self-explanatory. I know of no evidence in the MSS. favoring the idea, and cannot for a moment believe that the confusion there is due to any such reason. This idea too it is surprising to find favored or implied by one or two earlier writers.<sup>15</sup> Against publication by Chaucer of single tales or long prologs there is less probability, but no positive proof of it is known. I know of none in fragmentary MSS., or MSS. of single tales, to show that they are not derived after Chaucer's death from fuller MSS. for the benefit of persons who desired merely a part;<sup>16</sup> copies of a mere part of the Tales may have been purchasable or rentable; this was common with pieces, peciae, of long Latin works.<sup>17</sup> In deference to Professor Manly's studies I pursue no farther the subject of indications in the Canterbury Tales themselves that this or that single poem may have been published separately.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>10</sup> All these and other remarks also are collected by Skeat (pp. 5-9), who thinks some may be due to Chaucer; assuredly not all. These glosses in the Ellesmere MS. are certainly in the same hand as the text, which probably shows that they were copied from its parent. They are commoner by far in El and Hg than in other published MSS.

<sup>11</sup> So Manly, Stud. in Philol., xxviii, 616.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. R. K. Root, PMLA, xxviii, 419-420, etc.; Brusendorff, p. 55. Much of Mr. Root's serviceable article, chiefly on Latin works in Italy, may be applied to vernacular works in England.

<sup>13</sup> See Troilus, v, 1793-98 (also Brusendorff, p. 59), ibid., III, 726, compared with KnT 2062-64; PardT 584-585 (intended perhaps for Chaucer's scribe as well as the Pardoner's congregation). I have put in the same category the Latin glosses in the earliest MSS. over homonyms and hard words.

<sup>14</sup> Skeat, Evol. C. T., pp. 12, 19, 27; Eight-Text Edit. of C. T. (Ch. Soc., 1909), pp. v, 50; Miss Hammond, pp. 243-244, 250, 262 (she suggests a pirated edition). Professor Carleton Brown, PMLA, XLVIII, 1041-42, believes in more than one genuine arrangement and draft; why, unless the earlier was uncorrectable because published? It is a trifle difficult at times to see just what the conception of the history really is.

<sup>15</sup> Miss Hammond, pp. 243-244, and in Mod. Philol., III, 162 (she seems to overstate in saying that the supposed fact "has long been recognized"); Carleton Brown, PMLA, XXXVI, 28-29. The view was well opposed by Koch (p. 420; Anglia Beibl., XXII, 282).

<sup>16</sup> Miss Hammond (p. 260) seems to agree. But there is interest for another reason in observing which the single tales thus selected are (list in McCormick, pp. 535 ff.); one of the commonest is Melibeus. Of course some MSS may be mere débris.

<sup>17</sup> G. H. Putnam, Books and their Makers during the M. A. (New York, 1896), I, 233, 238, 256, 258-259, 267. Conceivably some of the incomplete MSS., without headlinks for example, (when not mere débris) might be derived from such peciae.

<sup>18</sup> I would not say that never can there have been two copies even of a shorter prolog,

Two matters outside the Tales may seem to suggest partial publication by Chaucer—the fact that two parts of the Tales were probably known before his death. The poet himself cautions his marrying friend Bukton (Envoy a Bukton, l. 29), "The Wyf of Bathe I pray yow that ye rede." He may have given him a copy (of her prolog presumably), perhaps sent it with this envoi; but in this envoi Chaucer was not giving military orders—he may have meant "come and look at my copy," or merely "remember what she says." The other part is the Knight's Tale, from which the lines (1785–86)

The god of love, a, benedicite!
How myghty and how greet a lord is he!

are quoted as its opening by The Book of Cupid (or The Cuckoo and the Nightingale); a charming poem (modernized in 1801 by Wordsworth) abounding in reminiscences from Chaucer, which G. L. Kittredge, followed by other scholars, is cautiously inclined to believe by Sir John Clanvowe, who died before March 4, 1392.<sup>19</sup> But these lines by no means prove that Clanvowe possessed a copy of the Knight's Tale in any form; he might have learned them through one of the methods of divulgation on Chaucer's part which one must think highly probable.

These methods are lending and reading aloud. There is naturally no way of proving, but also no reason to doubt, that now and then Chaucer would show or lend a part of the poem to a trustworthy friend. Chaucer reading aloud is a familiar idea, and with the king's court as audience forms a picture which has stimulated more than one artist, medieval and modern. Abundant evidence for this natural practice has been collected from the works of other medieval writers and especially from Chaucer's.<sup>20</sup> These, and general hearsay, seem the most probable, if not the only probable, methods by which a knowledge of the Tales would be spread before Chaucer's death.

The probabilities are, then, that at his death the Tales were mostly in no "fair copy" but in his own informal draft, on separate sheets (or possibly quires), certainly not all physically and inseparably unified.<sup>21</sup> for whatever reason produced; one must remember the long and short forms of the Mk-NP link (Mrs. Heseltine, in McCormick, pp. xxix f.), and MS. variations as to extra passages in WBP, MkNP link, and CIT. But all these might have been on extra sheets sometimes overlooked. Such a thing as Mk NP link is specially unlikely to have been published separately.

<sup>19</sup> Mod. Phil., I, 13–18, see Skeat, Oxford Chaucer, VII, 347, lviii.

<sup>20</sup> By Dr. Ruth Crosby, Radcliffe College dissertation (unpublished), 1928. Some of the wording in the Tales which seems unfitting on the pilgrimage is, as I have said, due to the fact that Chaucer was thinking of his visible auditors and his readers.

<sup>21</sup> It is best to keep till later the question whether he left any indication as to the order of the "groups." Brusendorff (p. 72) once implies some significant arrangement of parts by Chaucer. His point is far from convincing.

As to what would happen after Chaucer's death there is an illustration in the biography of the only medieval poet comparable to him in greatness—an anecdote toward the end of Boccaccio's Vita (or Trattatello in Laude) di Dante,<sup>22</sup> telling how at Dante's death the last thirteen cantos of the Commedia had never been seen and could not be found, and how his sons and admirers hunted earnestly for months among his papers and elsewhere, and were in despair at not finding them. The account of their discovery through a dream, moulding away in a secret closet, is irrelevant, and also considered apocryphal like much of the Vita (though not every picturesque story is false); but even if the whole story of the thirteen missing cantos is false, the deep interest implied is what one would expect. Just so in Chaucer's case, no one can doubt that immediately the MS. of the Tales would be sought on his desk or in his chest, and pounced on with intense curiosity and interest. Just what happened then we can never know; it would depend upon his heirs' good sense and good feeling. We cannot deny the possibility that irreparable damage was done, that notes of his intentions, even parts of poems (e.g., Cook's and Squire's Tales), or whole poems, were lost; parts of the work may have been borrowed by the careless, or have been stolen, or have been destroyed accidentally, or even deliberately. But though there is evidence of carelessness, there is no reason to believe any of this. We do not know whether anyone functioned as what could be called a "literary executor," though the phrase has been used in this connection.<sup>23</sup> All we know is that copies were made very soon, presumably at once, in order to satisfy the avidity of relatives, patrons, and friends. Some of these may even have made copies for themselves and others.

But what was much more influential was the entrance of the professional scribe and bookseller upon the scene, and "commercializing," pretty much in the sense in which a great modern publishing-house, with all its zeal for good literature and its human relations with authors, is commercialized. I mean a vivid and practical consideration of the opinion, the comfort, and the pleasure of the purchaser. This subject almost nobody as yet seems to have considered,<sup>24</sup> but it is of the utmost importance for understanding the history of the MSS. A large part of the changes and adjustments in the MSS. were for the contentment and convenience of readers, and made no doubt with business motives.

<sup>22</sup> Opere Volgari, Magheri-Moutier ed. (Florence, 1827-34), xv, 72.

<sup>23</sup> Brusendorff, pp 72, 130; Manly, Stud. in Philol., xxviii, 616. One or two people have trifled with the possibility that the officious, able, sometimes stupid person, a martinet as to versification, who is responsible for the very early MS. Harl. 7334 was no less a person than Chaucer's friend John Gower, who was all those things, and who did not die till 1408. Chaucer edited by Gower! Stranger things have happened.

<sup>24</sup> So far as I know it has been mentioned only in the Chaucer Concordance, p. iv.

Unfortunately little exact and comprehensive information about the book-trade in England in the fifteenth century is available,<sup>25</sup> and most of the information which we have relates to making and dealing in books among the clergy and in the universities, where the language was Latin and the subjects technical. In Chaucer's day the time was long past when almost all book-making was in the hands of "the old monks."<sup>26</sup> With the increase of a middle class, of reading the vernacular, of production of meritorious literature in it, and the desire for literate entertainment, clerical scribes would hardly figure here; it is impossible to imagine that secular reading-matter multiplied much except through secular and commercial routes. That all this would be true there is sufficient evidence. The stationarius, librarius, bibliator, bibliopola are mentioned now and then, selling and renting books, surely not wholly even if mostly Latin books. Richard de Bury mentions them (doubtless for their Latin books) early in Chaucer's century in England as well as in other countries, and gave orders to the enterprising ones; a librarius is mentioned in as small a place as Lincoln in 1359-60, but London naturally seems to have been the center. Here these men formed a gild in 1403 or 1404; books were sold in the fifteenth century in England as well as elsewhere by grocers, mercers, pedlars, and at fairs—books most of which would doubtless be in English. As early as the thirteenth century, according to Putnam, the earliest named Paris bookseller was one Herneis le Romanceur, so nicknamed, according to the evidence, because he sold vernacular books.<sup>27</sup> It is noteworthy that nearly all the books printed by Caxton were English, which shows the demand for them in the later fifteenth century. Further, the dealers mentioned assuredly did not handle merely second-hand books; there is no reason to doubt that they employed staffs of scribes. Needless to labor these points. No one familiar with the Chaucer MSS. doubts that they were written mostly by professionals. The probability is also that most of them were written for and sold by book-dealers,<sup>28</sup> and that commercial considerations were kept in mind, and will prove to be recognizable.

<sup>25</sup> W. Wattenbach, D. Schriftwesen im M. A. (Leipzig, 1896), especially pp. 554-556, 560-562; Richard de Bury, Philobiblon, chap. 8; F. Kapp, Gesch. d. deutschen Buchhandels (Leipzig, 1886), especially pp. 20-21; Brusendorff, pp. 54-55 (little on vernacular books in England); G. H. Putnam's desultory and uncritical Books and their Makers during the M. A. (New York, 1896) is useful, especially I, 226-274, 302-313. I have not seen most of A. Kirchhoff's work (1853-55). With patience an informing treatise on the subject could be written.

<sup>26</sup> Yet in 1898 H. B. Wheatley suggested that the heads of monastic scriptoria would pay Chaucer "something for a new Canterbury Tale," and competed in publishing the Tales; his ideas are completely misguided (Prices of Bks., p. 2).

<sup>27</sup> Kapp, pp. 20-21; Wattenbach, pp. 561-562, Putnam, I, 232, 260, 264, 271, 306 (the reference here seems wrong), 311-313; Ducange, s. vv.; E. G. Duff, A Century of the Engl. Bk. Trade (London, 1905), pp. xi f, xiv, xvi; G. J. Gray, Earlier Camb. Stationers (Oxford, 1904), p. 15; Wheatley, p. 27. There is sometimes mysterious information about prices of books (mostly liturgical), writing materials and copying in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries in J. E. Thorold Rogers' Hist. of Agric. and Prices in Eng. (Oxford, 1866-1902), vols. I, II, III, IV (155, 599 ff., sale at fairs, and prices, sixteenth century); G. G. Coulton, Chaucer and his Eng., pp. 98-100; Wheatley, pp. 51 ff.; Gray, pp. 18-22.

In one event of about 1484 we find a clear instance of the desire of the maker to please the buyer. It is little the less significant for appearing in the production not of a MS. but of one of the earliest printed books—in the well-known proem to Caxton's second edition of the Canterbury Tales. Caxton says he has diligently overseen and duly examined this second edition to the end that it may be made according to Chaucer's own making; for he finds many MSS. have abridged the work and left out many things, and also have set in some places certain verses which Chaucer never made. One of these incorrect books, which he had supposed correct, had been brought to him six years before, and used for his first edition, which was sold to many.

Of whome one gentylman cam to me/and said that this book was not accordyng in many places vnto the book that Gefferey chaucer had made/To whom I answerd that I had made it accordynge to my cople/and by me was nothyng added ne mynusshyd.

Thereupon the gentleman, desiring a better edition to be printed, lent him a copy which had been much prized by his own father, and which "was very trewe/ and accordynge unto his owen first book by hym made" (i.e., Chaucer's original copy; here the man was no more uncritical than most). Regretting that "to fore by ygnoraunce I erryd in hurtyng and dyffamyng" Chaucer's book by setting in some things which he had not made and leaving out many which were requisite to be set in it, Caxton used this borrowed better copy for his second edition.<sup>29</sup> It is a fact that the first edition (though not much worse arranged) has more bad readings than the second, omits more genuine passages, and inserts more spurious. What especially offended the gentleman and grieved Caxton was very likely the spurious obscenities, more numerous here than in almost any other edition or MS.<sup>30</sup> But it is perfectly clear that Caxton, and very likely the gentleman, noticed not only additions but also omissions; that we have here a critical and sensitive reader who was familiar with more than one text of the Tales and did not hesitate to make his displeasure known; and that the bookseller was probably moved not only by admiring zeal for Chaucer but by a desire to content his customer. No doubt there were many readers as critical and other booksellers as considerate. One more fact looks in the same direction; among various regulations in the book-trade in Paris in the later middle ages, according to Putnam (p. 259), a stationarius who gave a member of the university (it is true) an incorrect or incomplete MS. to copy was liable for damages. People were on their guard.

<sup>28</sup> The fact that a MS. has the arms of the owner does not necessarily prove that it was not bought, when written to order, or even ready-made, from a bookseller; cf. Putnam, p. 268. I do not discuss how far this is applicable to the CT MSS.; but see, e.g., MSS. Paris and Petworth in McCormick, and p. 121 below. The numerous signs that the CT, as one might expect, appealed to well-to-do and aristocratic people, as shown by Mr. Manly and Miss Rickert, do not of course show that they were not commonly got from regular booksellers. My conclusions are in accord with those of Professor J. W. Thompson in his book in preparation on medieval libraries (my thanks to him).

<sup>29</sup> "Prohemye" reprinted by E. Flugel, Neuengl. Lesebuch (Halle, 1895), I, 6-7. The two editions are analyzed by McCormick (pp. 55-76).—Just so Thynne in 1532 had compared various texts of Chaucer, and laments their depravation (Flugel, p. 305).

The commercializing of the Tales, for better or worse, is perceptible in various matters, explains much, and is well worth enlarging on. For this subject, though as was said I have examined more than two-thirds of the existing fuller MSS., I depend mostly on McCormick's Manuscripts of the Canterbury Tales, a vast work fascinating and most welcome to the MS.-student (facilitating universal statements). Far the most important of these matters is the gaps and breaks in continuity between tales, which were sure to make an uninformed buyer think he was getting a damaged copy. They had to be dealt with.<sup>31</sup>

One method of dealing with them was calling attention to them. This does not refer to the blank spaces often left, where something was plainly wanting, in the hope of later discovering what belonged there; but to frank statements. If a scribe wrote (like him of the Hengwrt MS.) "Of this Cokes tale maked Chaucer na more," or (like him of Additional 5140) "incipit fabula Phisici sine prologg," he notified the attentive reader that the lack was not the fault of him or his exemplar, but was due to the poet himself. Such notations are found in just five places only—after the Cook's and Squire's Tales, and before the Physician's, Second Nun's and (only twice) Shipman's.<sup>32</sup> These positions were the inevitable ones, for the former two tales are the only incomplete tales not obviously meant to be incomplete, and the latter three the only tales which in the best MSS. start in with no sort of link which carries on the narrative of the pilgrimage. The modern scholar is apt to blackguard the scribes or "editors," often with reason; but they really did use their wits, such as they were. There was doubtless much turning of pages, comparison of opinion and heated discussion.

<sup>30</sup> The same in Ne; almost as many in Ha<sup>2</sup> and a few others.

<sup>31</sup> I do not wish to overstate this matter. A modern might go through many MSS., perhaps, or through McCormick's book, without noticing these efforts. But once he notices them, he finds a vast amount of evidence that the scribes were constantly trying to deal with the appearances of incompleteness.

<sup>32</sup> The texts where these five sets of notations exist are, respectively: En<sup>2</sup>, Ha<sup>2</sup>, Hg, Py; Cx<sup>2</sup>, Dd, Nl, Py; Ad<sup>1</sup>, Cn, Dd, Ds<sup>1</sup>, En<sup>1</sup>, En<sup>2</sup>, Ma; Dd, Ds<sup>1</sup>, En<sup>1</sup>, Ha<sup>2</sup>, Ma; Dd, Ds<sup>1</sup>. To quite an extent these lists are identical, showing a set policy. These texts are of all dates, Hg and Dd being among the oldest in existence. The fact that a spurious headlink for Shipman's is almost the commonest of all spurious links explains the rarity of its appearance

More adroit methods of dealing with the gaps were to conceal or to fill them. One way was inserting the rubrics, headings, endings, etc., which are found in almost all MSS., probably none (as already said) due to Chaucer. Their absence in a few MSS.,<sup>33</sup> and their extraordinary variety, almost suggest that in some exemplars in the scriptoria they were absent, and were filled in by scribes at their own sweet will. At any rate the scribes gave them considerable thought. The fact that so many are in Latin (though sometimes dubious Latin), and a few in French, secures an air of literary dignity, and would appeal to cultivated readers. Some are clear "blurb," meant to attract; some to facilitate use and to interpret; most give an appearance of continuity, and tend to conceal gaps. The medieval reader was consequently far less conscious than the modern of the torso-character of the Tales. The fact is that the modern editor, tactlessly, one might say, calls the utmost attention to it (as if the mutilations of a Victory or a Hermes were purposely blackened) by his "group" headings, his interrupted line-numbering, his commentary; while the early reader, free from irrelevant distraction from his literary pleasure, was hardly conscious of what might have been there but was not. When the scribe of MS. Cardigan writes after the Cook's fragment "Finitur fabula Coci Incipit prologus Legisperiti," the inattentive or dull reader may almost have taken him at his word and no questions asked. It is hard to doubt that this was one reason for producing the headings and endings.

Another way of concealing the gaps was excision of ragged edges, or mending of them. The Squire's Tale seems never entirely cut out because unfinished; there is already in it much of interest; in spite of the promises (ll. 661 ff.) of what is to come, one can fancy some readers not being unpleasantly struck with its incompleteness, and total excision would

---

"sine prologo." None of the above-mentioned notations indicates, as Brusendorff supposed (p. 120), the scribes' belief that Chaucer had finished the poem. It should be added that the scribe of Ha<sup>5</sup> appears to call attention to the absence of CYP and T though known to exist.

<sup>33</sup> Hk, Ld<sup>2</sup>, Mc; sometimes, but evidently not always, the explanation may be that blanks were left for a rubricator who never arrived, have been too heroic a remedy. But in fifteen texts we find the tercia pars, merely one unfinished sentence, excised.<sup>34</sup> The Cook's Tale, on the other hand, is barely started, and by its unfulfilled preparations would show incompleteness at a glance, and to the better sort of reader would not seem important; accordingly five MSS. wholly drop it out with its prolog. Four ridiculously try to round it off with one or other lame and impotent conclusion.<sup>35</sup> What is much more important is the Gamelyn expedient. One may well believe that the insertion of Gamelyn in something like half the MSS. was due by no means to the fact that it was thought to be by Chaucer, or was found "near the Cook's Tale" (whatever that may mean), but to the fact that this good and little-known story found among Chaucer's papers could be attributed to the Cook (with a feeble link or other means of juncture) and divert attention from his first and imperfect tale. The medievals were not much exercised about questions of authenticity.<sup>36</sup>

What has seemed far more enigmatical, to some at least, is the omission of certain links. The links seemed rather unimportant. We have come, especially since Kittredge's Chaucer and his Poetry, to think of the work chiefly as a dramatic whole, but to the fifteenth century it was chiefly a collection of stories. Why not discreetly drop a small part which merely made trouble?<sup>37</sup> The cases which come in such questionable shape as to force discussion are the "Host-Stanza" after the Clerk's Tale, the Nun's Priest's endlink, and the Man of Law's endlink (or "Shipman's Prologue"). In a sense these are the most crucial parts of the whole work, its flower in the crannied wall; if we can understand their history, I believe we shall come nearer to understanding the external history of the whole. Omission of links in order to conceal incompleteness is not proposed here as explaining all such omissions. Mr. Manly has illuminated the subject by indicating that they were sometimes on loose sheets, not always found. That this was at times the explanation, especially among the oldest MSS., is recognized in the terminal note on MS. Hg in this article, the Clerk-Merchant link being a marked instance. But the other reason also operated.

<sup>34</sup> Just so some thirteen MSS. omit the whole of the unfinished couplet, MchT 1305-6 (two others, Hg, Hk, omitting all but the six genuine words). This passage is one of the most suggestive as to the history of the text and the careful comparison and discussion which must have taken place.

<sup>35</sup> Bo<sup>2</sup> and others. I add that Se has something similar at the end of SqT, but wrongly placed.

<sup>36</sup> Just so the Northumberland MS., in foisting in the tale of Beryn, actually in a Latin couplet mentions its author, an ecclesiastic of Canterbury (McC., p. 376).

<sup>37</sup> Miss Hammond (p. 244) made the explicit assumption that scribes never omitted links which were in their originals—a very large assumption indeed. It vitiates a great part of the argument on the history of the CT produced by this able pioneer.

The Host-stanza is not troublesome. It has long been recognized as Chaucer's first idea of a link from the stanzaic Clerk's Tale to some uncertain poem to follow, and to be continued doubtless into further seven-line stanzas.<sup>38</sup> Its position is just after the Clerk's envoi; there is no reason to suppose it ever meant for any other position, and presumably it was written before the Clerk-Merchant link was conceived, but it is perfectly harmonious with this (except in verse-form). Its occurrences are in what seem the later forms of the tale, but it is often lacking from these. Chaucer obviously had not deleted it, though conceivably he had stroked out; no one can say whether he would have removed it had he fully revised the Tales. The appropriate procedure for editors seems that usually adopted, to leave it in the text.<sup>39</sup> But most of the scribes omit it, apparently as interrupting and as different in verse from the following passage; in a word, as producing an unfinished appearance.

The "Nun's Priest's Epilogue" has been thought more problematical, in which the Host praises him and his tale in a rowdy style, and calls on "another," unspecified, for a tale. This is found in only ten (early and late) out of the fifty-seven more or less complete MSS,<sup>40</sup> but the fact that it is scarcer than the Man of Law endlink favors the explanation given here as to the omission of both. While editors have inclined to consider it mostly or wholly genuine, opinion has rather strongly favored the idea that Chaucer had rejected it. There seems no reason to doubt its genuineness, it has his distinction of style; and the final couplet, sometimes thought suspicious, seems a vivid illustration of his method of work. Normally in a link the first part deals with what precedes, and very likely was written about the same time as that, but the latter part, usually dealing with what follows, would be written perhaps much later when this had been decided on. Here the "seide unto another"

<sup>38</sup> The only other genuine link in stanzas is that between the stanzaic PriT and Thopas; the two other tales in seven-line stanzas are followed by couplet-links. There is not the slightest reason to doubt the genuineness of the Host-Stanza. One might hazard a query as to whether Chaucer once thought of another stanzaic tale as following; later he evidently decided to put all links in couplets.

<sup>39</sup> As Manly does fully, Koch and Robinson with brackets. Skeat puts it at the foot of the page, and the Globe editor wholly omits.

<sup>40</sup> McCormick, p. xix. Mostly or all genuine, but probably cancelled (Skeat); all suspicious (Globe); genuine but cancelled (Koch; Robinson also, but suspecting the final couplet); spurious or genuine, but perhaps cancelled (Manly); genuine, except final couplet, and deliberately omitted by scribes (Brusendorff, p. 89). But cf. Tatlock, MS. Harl. 7334 (Ch. Soc., 1909), pp. 23-24, which says briefly what is said above. It is hard to be sure what idea of the history of the CT is implied by the idea that NPE is genuine but cancelled.

(l. 4652) seems unnaturally inconclusive from a patching scribe, but natural from Chaucer, who had he proceeded would have made the Host say "Yeman, com neer," or the like. Nor is it easy to see any sound argument for the view that Chaucer rejected it. The presumption is always against the rejection of any entire part of an unfinished work; Chaucer was never inclined in revising to omit (unless for special reasons in the prolog of the Legend). Mr. Manly's reason for believing in rejection by Chaucer is that some of the ideas appear also in the eugenic chaff by the Host in the Monk's prolog. It is surprising to think of Chaucer as objecting to repeated ideas or repeated language, which are indeed one of the features of his manner.<sup>41</sup> Why should not Chaucer, who had his own ideas about clerics, have had the same one about the Monk and the Priest; and would anyone expect him to allude to the earlier occurrence in the later? He never does. On the other hand, the omission of this link by scribes is easily explicable. Hooking to nothing which follows, and containing the unfulfilled phrase "seide unto another," it gave readers legitimate ground for suspecting a damaged copy; accordingly, since it is short and unimportant, and most scribes did not revere Chaucer's every word, out it went. Four, however, adopted the middle course of substituting "the nunne" for "another," and adding six spurious lines to introduce the Second Nun's Tale. This expedient suggests that the omission of NPEp is due not to ignorance of its existence but to its unfinished look. It is very noteworthy that these six lines form almost the only spurious link in any of the ten MSS.;<sup>42</sup> therefore the Nun's Priest's epilog is retained in MSS. (though not in all of them) which do not try to conceal gaps by spurious links. Rarely by insertions or by omissions, therefore, do they attempt as others do to secure a false air of completeness. The present writer has not the least doubt that this link should be retained in the text, and without any hedging.

<sup>41</sup> See, e.g., Kittredge, Date of Chaucer's Troilus (Ch. Soc., 1909), p. 32, Tatlock, Devel. and Chronol. of Ch's Works (Ch. Soc., 1907), p. 77. Chaucer's "favorite line" about pity in the gentle heart appears no less than five times. In the two links under discussion there are three pairs of lines with echoing of words and thought (4641-42, 3135-36; 4645, 3131), and there is a general parallel in idea. But so is there in the Prioress' and Second Nun's prologs, and also echoing of words in as many pairs of lines (1668, 54 and 56, 1657, 36; 1664, 50). So is there in the Miller's and Manciple's prologs, and in many other places, a recurrence of situation and idea, and more or less of wording. Mr. Manly notes the parallels between the latter half of MkP and the NPEp, only 1500 lines apart, and infers the cancellation of the latter, he does not note those between its first half (on the Host's wife) and MchP and MchEp (the latter two only 1200 lines apart). Which of these should Chaucer have cancelled? The verbal parallels are less striking than Manly's—also than mine above; but three appearances of a pilgrim's ill-tempered wife are striking enough. Cf. MchP 1223-25 with MkP 3085-90, and 1239 with 3094 ff., MchP 1222 with Mch-Sq link 2428, 1226-27 with 2432, 1221-22 with 2429 and 2433-34, 1243-44 with 2439-40. Perhaps all this tends to invalidate an argument for cancellation based on likeness in thought or language. Chaucer may have written one of these links long after the other, and without much memory of it, but we cannot affirm that he would ever have changed or even regretted such repetition. I believe the usual omission of NPEp is due to the scribes or "editors," and has no connection with its resemblance to the earlier link. It is hard to see how it could have any.

The case of the link after the Man of Law is much more complicated, but in essentials perhaps no less intelligible. Being nearly twice as long and far livelier, though often omitted, it was retained in much more than half the complete texts (35 out of 57). But the trouble was worse than the passive suggestion of a loss; it forced active uncertainty on both scribes and readers, for the swashbuckler who demands the next tale (l. 1179) in some twenty-eight texts is the Squire, in six is the Sumner, in one the Shipman,<sup>43</sup> and all are questionable. What increases the seeming puzzle is that in some thirty-two MSS. what directly follows is the Squire's Tale; yet that in four of these (and perhaps originally in another MS.) it is the Sumner who is mentioned; and that in two others what directly follows is the Merchant-Squire link or the Wife's prolog. The vast majority of the texts would seem at first glance to show that Chaucer wrote Squyer in l. 1179, and meant his tale to follow, but it is a vivid illustration of the complex history of the Tales that this conclusion would be wrong. One need not dilate here on what has long been recognized as the beautiful fitness of this link to the Shipman and its grotesque unfitness to the Squire;<sup>44</sup> while subjective impressions of relative merit may weigh little against strong MS.-evidence, the latter must be fully criticized, and strong cases of dramatic fitness in so dramatic a poet as Chaucer are as clear as proofs of holy writ. He cannot have written ll. 1178-90 for the Squire, or, unless momentarily, have considered transferring them to him. While one must not maintain that the relative number of MSS. for a reading is not often a significant argument, this depends on the genealogy and other circumstances; the delusive finality of the impression made by the agreement of many MSS. must be resisted by one who would see the truth; in a very peculiar case like this, one must equally realize that a solution of a puzzle satisfying to the scribes may have been early adopted and handed down widely. Further, that the reading Sumner was earlier than the reading Squire is distinctly shown by the conditions in the MSS. as mentioned above; still further, while three of the oldest and best MSS. (Ellesmere, Hengwrt, Camb. Dd) are among those which adopt the expedient of omission, this very fact suggests that their scribes found no such simple-seeming conceived much attention from scholars." On the other hand, the Shipman, who was in the habit of throwing objectionable persons overboard, would not consider whether or not he had a right to be disrespectful to the Parson; there is rich humor in this pirate heading off a clerical bore by professing fears of heresy; and the breeziness of his "joly body" and his clinking a merry bell is perfect for him.

<sup>42</sup> Ry<sup>1</sup> has a CY-Ph link. The MSS. which retain the Host-Stanza refrain still more from spurious links.

<sup>43</sup> McCormick, p. xvii. I do not understand why his assistant says that in only 29 "the link introduces the Squire's tale," though by their own showing it does so in 32 (pp. xvii, 69, 103, 225). No one doubts this link is genuine. Koch and Robinson think it cancelled; Brusendorff has a peculiar and unacceptable theory (p. 72); Manly does not commit himself save by printing it merely in his notes.

<sup>44</sup> To pass over Brusendorff's fantastic suggestion (p. 72), the only person who has argued at large for the Squire is Dr. C. R. Kase, in the course of an ingenious and painstaking essay in Three Chaucer Studies (New York, 1932), pp. 39-50; but see also Brown in PMLA, xxvi, 27-28 and XLVIII, 1054; Skeat, Evol. CT., p. 12. Mr. Kase's arguments are so odd as to be hard to refute briefly, but the following may suffice. The Squire might not have hankered after a Parson's tale, but he was too "courteous, lowly and serviceable," too well-bred (as shown in his tale and the links before and after it), to volunteer among his elders, his father and all, such high-spirited bluster and such rudeness to a good, learned, and probably elderly priest. Every human being whose soul is sworn by in Chaucer is obviously dead, and there was at hand too fine an assortment of medieval oaths for the Squire to treat his father, riding beside him, so jauntily as to swear by his soul. It is no wonder that, as Mr. Kase says, the dramatic appropriateness of this passage to the Squire "has not re-

Though almost no one has argued for the Sumner, I add that the rollicking speaker here cannot have been that surly fellow; nor would a man who had a suppressed desire to show off his parrot Latin have boasted that there was but little Latin in his maw. (Here I retract a note on p. 218 of Devel. and Chronol.)

In support of his view that the Squire's Tale was written to follow the Man of Law's, yet that it and the Franklin's were meant as a unit, Mr. Kase argues against Kittredge's view, accepted by almost everyone, that group F was written as a part of the "marriage group." Here again much that he says is odd and irrelevant. After pausing to wonder at his statement that the Franklin's Tale, especially the delightful little verse-essay near the beginning (ll. 761-786) on the Conduct of Life, are not concerned with marriage, I merely point out that there is in this tale "textual linking" and "reference back to the D and E Groups," of which it suffices to compare Fklt 745 ff. with CIT 351 ff., 751-2 with MchT 1379, 768-70 with WBT 1038-40, 774 with CIT passim (esp. 1044-50), 804-806 with MchT 1259-60, 818 with WBP 592, 1364 with MchT 2239 ff. (serving as a retort), and with 2280-85 (as illustration). I do not affirm that the one passage was always meant to recall the other; but this suffices to show that the debate on marriage was held in mind in Fklt as much as one need expect; Chaucer was writing tales, not polemics. In Mr. Kase's idea that Chaucer's first plan was a Man of Law-Squire sequence, and his final plan (as held by all scholars) the Merchant-Squire, there is nothing a priori unlikely; the question is merely one of evidence, of which Mr. Kase shows none except the commonest reading in l. 1179 and the usual position of SqT, which are better interpreted otherwise.

After this note and article were written, Professor F. Tupper's "Bearings of the Shipm. Prol." appeared in JEGP, xxxiii, 352-72. It is pleasing that we almost exactly agree throughout.

dition as the Squire mentioned and his tale following; and another of them (Harleian 7334) is one of those with the Sumner. Since the sequence of parts never favors this latter reading, it is hard to fancy it an alteration from Squire, and easy to fancy the opposite alteration. All the indications therefore are that "Squire" is a scribal alteration. Now then, what next? The unlikelihood of the Sumner has been shown in the last footnote, and there and by earlier writers the exquisite appropriateness of the Shipman. Why then do we find him, and his tale following, in only one MS., and that a late and peculiarly disordered one? Not, assuredly, because the right reading and arrangement have come straight down from Chaucer to the late and poor Selden MS.; nor probably because it has been restored there through consulting the original text, for though this is likely enough now and then by the curious and privileged, if the reading was plainly to be seen there why should it ever have been changed? A clear "Shipman" cannot have been in the original. It is unlikely that the Selden MS. offers any evidence at all, or that this good reading in it is anything but an accident. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that in Chaucer's MS. there was something peculiar and ambiguous in the designation of the person in l. 1179. Since the Shipman, though appropriate, is not inevitable, it is not absolutely impossible that the passage may have been written, in an early stage of the Tales, for some other pilgrim than one of the three found. But there is the striking fact that all the three designations begin with S-;<sup>45</sup> the only three in the whole company of more than thirty (except the Sergeant of Law, whose tale has just been finished). Unless my arithmetic is far astray, the chance that the appearance of S- pilgrims only is not accidental but significant is many many thousands to one. It really looks then as if what the scribes found after Chaucer's death was something like "S. . . ." The original author would be unlikely to limit himself to the S- pilgrims in mending the trouble, but this is just what a scribe who found "S. . . ." would do in feeling about for the author's intention. The probability, then, seems to be that, having written this link for the Shipman, earlyish in the growth of the Tales,<sup>46</sup> before the transfer of the present Shipman's Tale to him from the Wife of Bath, Chaucer changed or suspended his plan, and partially expunged the word Shipman; that, after this transfer being busy with other parts, he never made the trifling restoration needed in l. 1179;<sup>47</sup> that some of the scribes met the glaring unfinished appearance by dropping the whole link, others by unfittingly inserting the Sumner, others later by changing Sumner to Squire, and putting his tale immediately next, taking advantage perhaps of the confusion existing in group E-F, where it belonged;<sup>48</sup> and that the scribe of Selden or a predecessor had the wit or luck to see that the Shipman was the best solution. Why earlier scribes did not see the same thing we cannot say, except that clearly the earliest solutions of puzzles often and naturally became accepted and unquestioned; there is really nothing strange in this. I say once more that the Selden MS. gives no authority for this solution; some scholars speak as if this fact proved the solution wrong; but the removal of one unsound argument pro is not an argument contra. The above explanation should not be penalized because complicated, for the true history of the Canterbury Tales was probably more complicated than any account of it which will ever be written. At any rate, the clear probability is that most of the expedients in dealing with this enigmatical link after the Man of Law were deliberately adopted in order to remove the glaring signs of indecision and incompleteness.

<sup>45</sup> Miss Hammond seems to have been the first to remark on this, in Mod. Phil. III, 163-164.

<sup>46</sup> So Skeat continued to believe, though he changed his mind as to other things about it for reasons hard to understand (MLR, v, 430-434). It is not strictly impossible, perhaps, that Chaucer left the spot blank or illegible, that a very early scribe or "editor" (anathema sit) wrote "Sumnour" on the original MS., and that others used their own judgment. But there is no evidence for such a notion, and my supposition seems far likelier. This is one of the passages that make one believe in lively discussion among early "editors."

The explanation of the omission of these links which has been most favored hitherto we have seen to be revision by Chaucer; having written them in an early stage of the work, he has been supposed to have cancelled them. It is not quite easy to understand to what conception of the early physical history of the Tales this idea is meant to point. To the production by Chaucer of two or more recensions of this fragmentary work? It is hard to see either evidence or probability for such an idea. To some form of visible cancellation of these links which would leave them still legible—expuncting, stroking out, a vacat in the margin—which would allow some scribes to put them in after all? Shortening of so incomplete a work, especially by omission of admirable passages, seems unlikely (as said already), and no adequate motive is perceptible here. When so many scribes went the lengths they did to conceal gaps, even the most scrupulous would be unlikely to insert what the author had visibly cancelled. Whether Chaucer might have omitted some link had he revised no one knows; in most cases I should think it very unlikely; but if he gives no sign of such an intention it does not concern us. Mr. Manly's penetrating idea as to loose sheets explains some cases of omission in the very earliest MSS.; but not as many (I believe) as my explanation. There is not a single text out of the fifty-seven which does not omit one or more; none contains all the links. Some are omitted in one set, some in another, with various cross-arrangements. In two cases of two texts<sup>49</sup> certainly (or almost) by the same hand the later fills some of the gaps but never all. After the first years, no genuine part would have been very hard to find; many persons were familiar with more than one text, as is shown by the Caxton anecdote, the frequency of contamination, and other facts. What a scribe most desired, perhaps, was not quite so much to find everything as to avoid glaring gaps. The interests of the scholar and the purely literary reader are not identical; but the scribe was, and worked for, the literary reader. The foregoing explanation seems more serviceable than the conceivable suggestion that these links, some very short, were by themselves on loose sheets, which got mislaid; though this also may sometimes have occurred.

<sup>47</sup> His omission to indicate the intended unity of B<sup>1</sup>-B<sup>2</sup>, as he may have done somehow with other groups, might be due to realizing that the beginning of SkT had to be rewritten. I cannot for a moment believe Brusendorff's idea (pp. 118-119) that the Shipman is meant to be quoting an imaginary female speaker; it requires as much modern punctuation as Skeat's interpretation of MchT 1684-87.

<sup>48</sup> I repress conjecture here as to the origin and history of this confusion.

The other way of dealing with gaps between tales was by means of spurious links. It is quite clear that the chief purpose of these<sup>50</sup> was to introduce the following tale, for though they sometimes comment on what precedes, the absence of a headlink is much more conspicuous than that of an endlink; we have seen that it is the absence of a prologus which is apologetically remarked on. There was a peculiar temptation to insertion in the fact that it was not uncommon to leave in a MS. a blank page or so where a link was obviously lacking, clearly in the hope that the missing part would turn up in another text; probably this sometimes happened—one explanation of the immense amount of contamination in the MSS. There is no reason to suppose that most of the spurious links originated thus; but the blank, perhaps after a vain search, would be an inviting hint to some enterprising dealer or even amateur to tag Chaucer's verses with partial or complete links. There is seldom more difficulty in discriminating between them and the genuine than in discriminating in a handful of real nutmegs and wooden nutmegs.

<sup>49</sup> Caxton's two editions, and El and Hg (see pp. 128, 129 below). Caxton for his second, and presumably the El-scribe at times, used a fresh exemplar. The El-scribe probably used more care and intelligence than any other, and the only links he omits are the two which most strongly indicate incompleteness. An intelligent scribe is the riskiest of guides when what we are seeking is the original Chaucer.

<sup>50</sup> Lists in Miss Hammond, pp. 156-157; Brusendorff, pp. 69-70; Manly, pp. 82-86; the Ch. Soc. Six Text edition; and above all, presumably exhaustively, McCormick, pp. xxv-xxviii, and (with the text) in his account of all the MSS., pp. 1 ff.

They were composed by men of small literary ability, in the rough verse usual in the fifteenth century, often with reminiscences of Chaucer's lines elsewhere, sometimes as a mere cento from them, in group E-F sometimes as a making over of genuine couplet-links into seven-line stanzas in order to embody the genuine Host-Stanza. They strike one much as if a naïve stenographer (the scribe's nearest modern equivalent) should lose a leaf here and there out of her notes, and should invent what she thought her employer might have said, using his mannerisms. They serve the function, and no doubt are the product of an intuition, of filling gaps and concealing from the uncritical the torso-character of the Tales; amusing as they sometimes are, they certainly serve no other function. I am not prepared to say that there ever was a MS. in which every gap was fully filled; but in those MSS. in which spurious links are abundant the gaps would not be disturbing to the uncritical. One other matter should be observed—that while none or few are found in the very oldest MSS. (bad arrangement is earlier therefore than the spurious links sometimes produced by it), yet most of them<sup>51</sup> are found in several or many MSS., and therefore presumably were produced early in the MS.-tradition, probably after a series of complaints at incompleteness. This is one of several indications that shortly after Chaucer's death those who took the responsibility for getting the Tales into the hands of readers were greatly exercised as to the form they should go in.

As to spurious passages within the Tales and links themselves<sup>52</sup> little need be said. Various reasons may have helped to produce them—literary exercise, edification, sportiveness (sometimes, as we saw, to the point of gross obscenity), but most are intended to conceal accidental losses. Even the obscene additions may have been intended to appeal to the sort of customer who today affects certain "curiosa" and privately printed éditions de luxe. In spite of Caxton's disgusted gentleman, there were other tastes than his in the fifteenth century. Most of the spurious passages inside have the effect of making the MSS. more salable.

The matters thus far discussed in this article mostly show an attempt by scribes or "editors" to rid the Tales so far as they could of a markedly unfinished air, with the purpose probably of contenting purchasers. It is true that the possible occurrence of misbinding may show a lack of sustained professional concern for keeping things smooth. But it would seem that those most occupied with the production of MSS. were applying their wits to the problem, a fact of which there are many more signs than are mentioned here. Consideration of the opinion of readers, heading off their dissatisfaction, is so constant that one must believe the production of MSS. was due chiefly to the initiative of booksellers, not to that of readers. A reader having a copy made on his own initiative would be less inclined to the Jesuitry of concealing or spuriously filling the gaps.<sup>53</sup>

<sup>51</sup> Except a half-dozen found respectively only in La and Tc<sup>1</sup> (Mrs. Heseltine, in McCormick, pp. xxv-xxviii).

<sup>52</sup> Noted by McCormick in his account of each MS.

The chief of all questions, practically, concerns the arrangement of the work, a stale subject which cannot be evaded, but may be approached in a fresh manner, and which also shows signs of the commercial or practical consideration. In the last century the usual view was that Chaucer had fully decided on the arrangement, and that his decision could be discovered;<sup>54</sup> lately, however, scholars have been more doubtful.<sup>55</sup> There is assuredly nothing inherently improbable in a fixed and discoverable plan, even one with a consistent scheme of towns passed, even with consistent notes of time, and a clear idea of the number of days in the pilgrimage and the lodging places. Indications of these might or might not be given in the imperfect remains, but there is nothing unlikely in the discovery of an order consistent with them. It would not have taken much foresight to perceive that in the long run it would save work and revision; and though the medievals were mostly not much interested in small realism, the greater writers were, including Dante and sometimes Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Chaucer especially.<sup>56</sup> It is unlikely that a realist like him would have embarked on a highly realistic plan with the disorderly method of a Herr Teufelsdröckh. It may even be, as was said above, that he wrote out a skeleton outline, which of course would be lost. If we find a fairly consistent arrangement discoverable, it is more likely to have been what was in his mind than to be accidental.<sup>57</sup> But it is just as likely that at times he would forget and <sup>53</sup> There is backing for this opinion in the Paris MS. It bears both a private coat-of-arms and the name of the "scriptor," as very few do; it also contains no spurious links and omits most of several tales with a frank expression of distaste. So the least commercial-looking of the MSS. is the least Jesuitical. The mere spurious lines in which it abounds would not be recognized as such, and may have been inherited from its original.

<sup>54</sup> Furnivall, Temporary Preface (Ch. Soc., 1868), pp. 9-44, esp. 42-43, Skeat, Oxf. Chaucer, III, 376-379.

<sup>55</sup> Manly, pp. 77-78; and Stud. in Philol., xxviii, 617; Brusendorff, pp. 125-126; Koch, Pard. T. (Ch. Soc., 1902), p. xx; Robinson, p. 1005.

<sup>56</sup> Consider the surprising freedom from inconsistencies in the Divina Commedia, and its time-scheme, discoverable only on minute observation. Chaucer was not the perfectionist Dante was; but his love of reality appears in the unobtrusive accuracy shown by Mr. W. C. Curry in many passages, and shown in the Troilus and the Franklin's Tale. On that in Troilus see Root, PMLA, xxxix, 50.

<sup>57</sup> I venture to draw a parallel with what I have said (Kittredge Anniversary Papers, p. 345) of the Phyl astrology; a certain date is pointed to, and on that date the astrological depart from it. Above all we should not force things, as Dr. Furnivall did; the question at this point, I say emphatically, is not what was his arrangement, but is any accurate arrangement discoverable. So we turn from a priori considerations to evidence.

Evidence on the arrangement is of four kinds (in order of decreasing importance): actual joining by links, clear allusions to earlier incidents of the pilgrimage, notes of place, notes of time. It is hard (to say the least) to doubt that he left the poem in eight groups, fully linked internally—those lettered A, B<sup>1</sup>, B<sup>2</sup>, C, D, E-F, G, H-I, and thus arranged by Furnivall. No one will dispute any of these except E-F and H-I. E and F were uselessly separated by Furnivall,<sup>58</sup> against all the evidence, merely because he thought the Squire began a day. But the certain form of the Merch-Sq link (E 2419-F8) proves that E and F are a unit; so far as I know, it has never been doubted that the first part of this link is meant to follow the Merchant's Tale and the last to introduce the Squire's and it is a positive fact that the MSS. are unanimous for it as a unit.<sup>59</sup>

For dividing H-I there may seem somewhat more justification, but discussion is needed. The hitch here is that it is morning in the Manciple's prolog (l. 16), and four o'clock in the Parson's (l. 5) after only the short Manciple's Tale, that the geography seems odd, and that the reading Manciple (Pars P 1) is not at first above suspicion, being on an erasure in what seems the most archaic of the MSS., the Hengwrt. This last point is discussed below (p. 138 f.), and in several ways is explicable; also the discrepancy of time, by granting that each prolog must have been written without thought of the details of the other, and that notes of time are arbitrary and unreliable.<sup>60</sup> But Messrs. Manly and Root in 1928 and conditions prove to be extraordinarily potent for Chaucer's purpose; how can we believe this accidental?

---

<sup>58</sup> Temp. Pref., p. 29. See the present writer in Harl. MS. 7334, pp. 21, 26 (notes). See even Dr. Kase, op. cit., pp. 54, 58.

<sup>59</sup> The only exception (merely apparent) is in Ln, where the two tales which it is used with are far from each other, and a later hand splits it to introduce each. Even where the pilgrims mentioned are changed, the link remains a unit. Its last part (for the Squire) never has a separate heading (see even Skeat's way of printing); it has no "quod oure hoste," but continues the preceding speech. These facts may be verified in McCormick's MSS. of CT, and are stated by his assistant Mrs. Heseltine, p. xxii. I am not discussing the complex history of the E-F links, but so far as I know there is no theory even of revision, or anything, to contradict the view that E-F was finally (and so far as known always) intended as a unit.

<sup>60</sup> To put H and I together will help explain a still worse absurdity, in Pars P itself; "ten of the clokke" (l. 5) was certainly written by Chaucer, though a child could see the time is late afternoon, and several MSS. correct the reading. When he decided to join Manc and Pars, he probably changed from four to ten (as was easy) and postponed changing the rest (not easy). How otherwise can one explain the flagrant impossibility in Pars P2-7?

1929<sup>61</sup> argued for the view that H and I were written, respectively, for the first and last tales on the return-journey, and therefore could not be connected. As they convincingly hold, there is a lack of reality in putting two tales in the last two miles before Canterbury, and no "thrones ende" is known between it and Harbledown. On the other hand, such may have existed, or the words may have been written without thinking of the exact identity and location of the thorp, of which there must have been many all along. Against Root's and Manly's views there is much to be said. First, in so huge a plan as that of the Tales, begun latish in life, there is probability against the writer starting in on the second half before securing the degree of completeness given by a completed first half; unless there were some highly interesting matter which could not be worked into the first half, as there certainly is not in either of these two links. It would have been only humanly natural also, in the earliest-composed element in the second half, to drop some clear allusion to the returning, which there also certainly is not. Further, it would be curious that the two pilgrims chosen for these two homeward-bound tales should be among the few who have told none of the outward-bound; this fact suggests carrying on the first series rather than starting the second. As to the Manciple part more particularly, if the two links were not thought of together the difficulty hardly seems great; one short tale in the last two miles is not unreasonable; and why should not a party of early-rising medievals have ridden the eight miles or less from Ospringe and heard a half-dozen tales while it is still "by the morwe"?<sup>62</sup> As to the Parson's prolog, Manly and Root point out certain lines (16-19, 47, 63) which truly seem to imply the end of a series. These have been supposed heretofore by most readers (probably and reasonably, as by the present writer) to refer to the finality of the arrival at Canterbury; further, perhaps Chaucer had not yet formed the plan announced in Prol 791-795, or much more likely had abandoned its vastness yet not made the needed change there. Again, since we must discuss realism, the Host's manner of speaking to the Parson shows that he scarcely knows him, for though the pilgrim Chaucer (Prol 31 ff.) knew all the pilgrims the first evening, the Host here (Pars Pr 22-23, 21, 27-29; cf. 31 ff.) asks the Parson whether he is a parson or vicar, and in good sooth makes a bad guess as to what sort of talk he is likely to give; this suits the first part of their week or so together far better than the very end. There is also a plain implication (l. 25) that as yet he has told no tale whatever—a very great departure from the plan if this is at the end of the return. These arguments are not conclusive, but they are as conclusive as Mr. Manly's. Again, unrealistic as the tale is in the circumstances, it fits the approach to the martyr's shrine a thousand times better than that to the Tabard Inn and a jovial dinner. The other pilgrims feel just so (ll. 61–63, 70–71), and with resignation see the propriety of ending "in som vertuous sentence" (though, realizing what they are in for, they more than hint for brevity). Manly<sup>63</sup> even goes so far as to suggest that, while the Parson's prolog was written for the return-journey, Chaucer wrote no tale for it, and that the actual Parson's Tale or treatise was put in the Canterbury Tales not by Chaucer, but by someone after his death who found it among his papers. Though this cannot be disproved, the evidence seems much against it. To one who sees into the Parson he pretty well forecasts the character of this treatise (ll. 31–40, 46, 49–51, 55–57); he refuses bluntly to tell "a fable," and offers only "moralitee and vertuous matere," to be told in prose "at Cristes reverence." Does not all this fit the Parson's Tale? To our way of thinking it is far from a merry tale, though of great historical interest and not without Chaucer's own vivacity; but "tale" here as often means merely something said, and "mery" (or pleasant) fits the idea of it held by the tactless Parson<sup>64</sup> (whose flawless personality in the Prolog becomes slightly clouded here and in the Man of Law's endlink). The Parson's Prolog has always seemed to some a fine example of Chaucer's keen reality. But as to the character and length of the tale his unrealistic and "medieval" side got the better of him, and he thought of the literary rather than of the oral-talk side of the Tales, as we know he often did. In view of the ambiguity (to say the least) of the evidence, of the uncertain date and uncertain permanent vitality in Chaucer's mind of the plan for the Tales presented in Prolog 791–795, of the naturalness (for all his realism) of temporarily overlooking arbitrary things like time of day and a mere implication of an unnamed location while writing over a long period, and finally of the uncertainty as to how much wary though unessential realism we can constantly expect, we are not forced to an upsetting and heroic remedy. It seems better to believe that neither of these two links was written with detailed thought of the other, and that before publishing the complete work Chaucer would have revised here. No one knows better than Mr. Root and Mr. Manly how many passages in the Canterbury Tales call for revision.

<sup>61</sup> Manly, p. 655, and Stud. in Philol. (Royster Memorial Studies), xxviii, 613-617; MLN, xlv, 493-496.—Dr. J. A. Work uses some of the arguments used below, but in general he follows these two scholars (JEGP, xxxi, 62-65).

<sup>62</sup> With horses walking two or three miles an hour there was plenty of distance also for E-F and G since Ospringe. I do not understand why Mr. Manly sees in MancP 4-13 or later any implication of beginning the day's tales; all that seems implied is a momentary lull (l. 5). The situation is a stock one, natural to recur in a series of fragments written as the C.T. were, and especially natural in headlinks—remarks on a fresh start of tales, "time we began," someone silent (Prol 828 ff., MLP 16 ff., CIP 1 ff., MancP 5 ff.).

<sup>63</sup> Cant. T., p. 656; Stud. in Philol., xxviii, 616.

<sup>64</sup> I could illustrate this from real life in the twentieth century. We might compare Chaucer's own characterization, with conscious humor, of the long and matter-of-fact though highly interesting Melibeus (ll. 2127, 2154) as a "litel thyng in prose," "this murie tale." Professor Robinson (p. 16) is with me as to the Pars. T.

If H and I were designed for the outward journey, in view of the geography it is hard to doubt that they would stand last in what we have, and in view of Manciple in ParsP1 (if as I believe that is what Chaucer wrote) hard to deny that Chaucer made them a unit. Inconsistency of time cannot weigh against clear unity. Whatever theory one holds, no one arranging what we have could put anything between them; which affords a good definition of a "group." The argument in this section, if sound, points to eight groups, and only eight, of which A is first, H-I last.

As to the positions of the other groups (to disregard till later any evidence imagined in the order in the MSS.), the clear-allusions evidence puts D before E-F and probably just before, because of allusions to the Wife of Bath, far more than the two actual mentions of her. The validity of notes-of-place evidence requires consideration.<sup>65</sup> Being unimportant to the essence of the poem, geography might be forgotten, and not infallibly point to a comprehensive plan. But unless contradicted by real evidence it seems valid in a working hypothesis. Chaucer must have gone many many times over the road between the metropolis and political capital and the ecclesiastical metropolis; it formed the greater part of the shortest sea-route to the Continent, where he had been so often; he probably had had business duties in Canterbury, and may himself have gone on the most popular pilgrimage in England. Among places along the route he must have known which comes first, quite as well as a New Englander knows the situation of Providence and New Haven between Boston and New York, or a Britisher Dover and Calais between London and Paris. Though Kentish geography is not striking to us, it would be vivid to him. It is as bad to minimize as to exaggerate the realism of the Canterbury Tales. Accordingly, no one has doubted that G should slip into place after D and E-F, and before H-I.<sup>66</sup>

The point at issue is the relative positions of B<sup>2</sup> and D. In the former the pilgrims are close to Rochester ("Loo, Rouchestre stant heer faste by!", MkProl 1926); in the latter (WBP 847-8) the Sumner promises his enemy the Friar two or three such damaging tales of friars

<sup>65</sup> For the passages which supply all this evidence, see Furnivall, Temp. Pref., pp. 42-43; Miss Hammond, pp. 160 ff.

<sup>66</sup> In D 847 the party has not reached Sittingbourne (sixteen miles from Canterbury); in G 556 they are at Boughton (only six miles).

er I come to Sidyngborne,
That I shal make thyn herte for to morne, and amply keeps his promise with two anecdotes eight hundred lines later in the same group D. The unimportant place Sittingbourne is ten miles beyond Rochester, and seems unlikely to be in anyone's mind far on the London side. That it would be chosen merely for the rime is unlikely; it is morne which seems chosen for the rime, and as Manly<sup>67</sup> once retorts, "rhyming is not as difficult as Brusendorff implies." The evidence then is for B<sup>2</sup> before D. The only contrary evidence is that the other order is that in the MSS., the authority of which as to arrangement is disregarded for the moment. The two kinds of internal evidence just treated extend the order to A B<sup>2</sup> D E-F G H-I.

This would leave adrift only B<sup>1</sup> and C, and unused only notes-of-time evidence. Notes of time are so arbitrary and unfixed that we can rely on them little in this instance or elsewhere, partly because the significance of times of day depends on what day of the pilgrimage each falls in.<sup>68</sup> If we may allow any weight at all to notes-of-time evidence,<sup>69</sup> there are difficulties against any position for B<sup>1</sup> except between A and B<sup>2</sup>; in any case there is no better position, indeed none so good, and it has never been disputed. Though this is mostly because it is the position in the MSS., I accept it for other reasons. On the basis of internal evidence only, therefore, the order A B<sup>1</sup> B<sup>2</sup> D E-F G H-I is discoverable and involves no contradictions.<sup>70</sup> Group C contains no evidence of any sort as to its position; it might possibly, but in each case inappropriately and with difficulty, come after B<sup>1</sup>, D, E-F, or G, and for none of these positions is there the slightest internal evidence anywhere. With perfect smoothness it may be put between A and B<sup>1</sup> or between B<sup>2</sup> and D; the latter, Furnivall's position, cannot be improved on. The likeliest conclusion for every reason seems to be that pretty much throughout his work Chaucer had some sort of time-scheme and arrangement in mind, that <sup>67</sup> P. 505. I add that he detects the absence of a fixed plan in the geographical contradiction in the MSS. between two links here (pp. 77-78), but (as we saw) not so in another between H and I, and bases a revolutionary theory on it.

<sup>68</sup> I still believe the evidence distinctly favors the intention of a three-days pilgrimage, with nights at Dartford and Ospringe conceived as coming between A and B<sup>1</sup> and between D and E; see PMLA, xxi, 478-485. E-F must follow D, but not necessarily on the same day. It is likely enough that had the work been completed some of these arrangements would have been changed; we are merely discussing what is indicated by the present evidence, which seems clear if not decisive.

<sup>69</sup> In MLP 14 the hour is ten in the morning, and the implication is that there have been no tales for some time; the opinion has been expressed above that B<sup>1</sup> should be immediately followed by B<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>70</sup> Except that in H-I, which cannot be cured by rearrangement.

he did not carry it through with perfect proportion and consistency, and that had he finished his work he might have changed it. We must not assert that the entire arrangement thus arrived at is that intended by Chaucer, but it seems likely enough to be; for no order is better, most others involve contradictions, and there is nothing against this.<sup>71</sup>

Except the order in the MSS.? How can we ignore that? The not unnatural assumption has constantly been made that Chaucer must somehow be responsible for one or more of the innumerable arrangements in the MSS.,<sup>72</sup> but the details and implications of the assumption seem seldom to have been thought out. At this point the arrangement and mutual relations of the MSS. can no longer be entirely evaded. To go into the subject extensively would be audacious in the absence of all the evidence, and above all in view of the authoritative work being done by Mr. Manly and his colleagues. And most brief and broad statements as to relations would be equally risky. Happily neither is necessary for the present purpose, a consideration of whether the MS. order of the groups is in any way due to Chaucer. If anyone should surmise that results may be vitiated by the lack of a general view of MS.-relations, my reply is that the immense amount of contamination which every informed person realizes existed, and the amount of discussion which must have occurred, seems to provide a better explanation of any possible opposition from a probable MS-genealogy than the abandonment of what here follows.

Two things are certain. The nearly fixed and consistent order which was elicited long ago, perhaps confirmed here, almost the only such order possible, is found in not a single text out of the fifty-seven.<sup>73</sup> What is much more important is this. If there is validity in the view presented earlier as to the physical form in which Chaucer worked on the Tales, the form in which he left them, and their history shortly after his death, we must question the authority in the arrangement of any of the MSS. Possibly someone might ask, did not Chaucer conceivably leave notes as to arrangement (as mentioned above), which might have been used by one of the early "editors," and might account for some one arrangement in the whole chaotic series? If this very risky guess were sound, probably all would agree that the order could be only that of MS. Ellesmere and a few later congeners;<sup>74</sup> and this order is adopted by recent editors, Koch, Manly, and Robinson. There is good reason against adopting it as authoritative, not only in the geographical difficulty, and the separation of B<sup>1</sup> and B,<sup>2</sup> and the improbability that any authoritative order survived, but in the arrangement of the nearest relative of the Ellesmere, MS. Hengwrt.

<sup>71</sup> I therefore take issue with Brusendorff (p. 126), and Manly, pp. 77-78, and Stud. in Philol., xxviii, 617. The debate really comes to the dilemma—which is more likely, a discoverable and fairly thorough plan with rare irrationalities, or no discoverable thorough plan at all? I vote for the former.

<sup>72</sup> One would like to know, how many of them? See even Professor Carleton Brown, PMLA, XLVIII (1933), 1058-9.

<sup>73</sup> In five texts (McCormick, pp. 327, 335, 387, 405, 425), mostly very incomplete, and all hopelessly disordered, the undoubted unit B<sup>2</sup> is broken up, and a part comes earlier than D; the whole of it never. One is almost surprised at this, considering the extraordinary variety of orders in which the work became shaken up. No one could conceivably find MS. precedent for the order B<sup>2</sup>D here.

This close relationship, and the excellence of the Hg text, are well known. What is not so well known is, first, the great age of these two texts, which makes them the best guides to original conditions. The three oldest MSS. are considered to be these two and Harleian 7334.<sup>75</sup> Still more important is the fact that El and Hg were almost certainly written by the same hand, as can be easily verified.<sup>76</sup> What is more, Hg was written earlier than El. This is shown first by the fact that while all El's chief peculiarities of omission and commission are in Hg, the latter omits several important elements present in El, of which the chief are the entire Canon's Yeoman's prolog and tale and the Clerk-Merchant link.<sup>77</sup> Whether or not the two MSS. used almost always (as is probable) the same original, had the Hg-scribe previously copied these passages he is most unlikely to have omitted them in a later and specially careful

<sup>74</sup> A B<sup>1</sup> D E-F C B<sup>2</sup> G H-I. The most considerable difficulty here (to ignore the affinity of B<sup>1</sup> for B<sup>2</sup>) is the mention of Sittingbourne before Rochester. Another of the oldest MSS., Harleian 7334, makes the worse error of putting also Boughton-under-Blee before Rochester.

<sup>75</sup> Cf. Brusendorff, p. 84; E. Markert, Chaucers Canterbury-Pilger u. ihre Tracht (Wurzburg, 1911), p. 4; and Athenaeum (1911), ii, 210-211.

<sup>76</sup> See the terminal note on the Hengwrt MS. (pp. 133, 134 below).

<sup>77</sup> Besides this, Sq headlink is adapted to the Franklin and Fkl headlink to the Merchant, distortions correct in El. These differences in content with closely similar text in these two MSS. probably by the same hand and mostly copied from the same original are extremely illuminating as to the sort of thing which happened shortly after Chaucer's death. The suggestion (which has actually been made) that the lack of CYP and T in Hg proves they were a late addition by Chaucer shows an idea of the history of the CT hard to understand, and certainly contradicting what is said of it here. They are lacking also in He, Ra<sup>2</sup>, Sl<sup>2</sup>, Tc<sup>2</sup>. The sheets containing them may have been temporarily lost, lent, or mislaid from an unbound original, and later returned to it, or were taken by the El-scribe from another original. They were not lost from their right place in Hg during binding or otherwise, but were never there. It is true that it would be hard to prove them never in Hg in a wrong place; it is not quite impossible also that CYP and T were intentionally omitted, as most of them were (with an amusing comment) in the Paris MS.; conceivably there might have been some resentment at the reflections on alchemists or on canons. There may be several ways of explaining their absence from Hg; but far the most likely is absence from the original.

copy. Caxton in his second edition fills in some of the gaps in his first, and makes no fresh ones. An equally clear indication of the priority of Hg is the contrast in order. While El has the smoothest and most reasonable of all the MSS. arrangements, Hg has one of the very worst. Even on the supposition (wrong, I believe, pp. 136, 137 below) that it was early misbound, it was never anything like so well arranged as El. It is obviously most unlikely that a careful scribe (or even two of them) would produce from one and the same original a copy inferior in both content and order after a fairly good one.

There is another and more doubtful consideration as to the El-arrangement. From what has been said and from its extreme handsomeness and carefulness it is clear that the Ellesmere was produced with peculiar solicitude, an édition de luxe.<sup>78</sup> If a possible reason for the El-arrangement is discoverable which could hardly be due to the author, this will obviously be an argument for the secondary character of this arrangement, which we remember is A B<sup>1</sup> D E-F C B<sup>2</sup> G H-I. We have seen that to the attentive early "editors" the absence of a headlink was much more conspicuous than of an endlink, and also that the only groups<sup>79</sup> always without a genuine headlink are C, B<sup>2</sup>, and G, those, therefore, which most mar the continuity. Now El is one of the MSS.<sup>80</sup> which have no spurious links, and it also never excuses beginning a group without a headlink by stating that it does not exist. This is assuredly not because the very wary Ellesmere-man did not notice the absence of links. What he did do was to put these headless groups as near the end as he possibly could — primum bonum vinum, tunc id quod deterius est. So it is only well after the middle of the Tales that this most conspicuous sign of incompleteness appears in El. The author would surely have had better views as to arrangement than this, even if he did not take the moderate trouble to compose permanent or makeshift headlinks. We saw, too, that the only links omitted by E1 are the two which most emphasize incompleteness. The indications great and small, therefore, are that the excellences of arrangement (such as they are) in E1 are secondary and not Chaucerian.

<sup>78</sup> El used to be called an "edited MS.," showing such signs of meddling as the "modern instances" in M&T at the end, and the omission of ML and NP endlinks. I cannot for a moment agree with Brusendorff's peculiar view (p. 78) that Chaucer meant the "modern instances" to come last in M&T. Since these peculiarities are also in Hg, they are no argument for or against my position as to the priority of Hg. But all these variations among the oldest MSS. do show how the earlier scribes tried and tried again to get things into a satisfying shape. "Edited MS." is unmeaning; most of the early MSS. are "edited," El merely more intelligently. The later MSS., made in wholesale routine, show less use of the wits, often were misled by spurious links, and are more careless as to arrangement; at times there may have been misbinding, and since the original confusion may have become well known, scribes perhaps gave up the problem of order as a bad job.

<sup>79</sup> WB Prol though beginning abruptly carries on the narrative of the pilgrimage, and with a label attributing it to the Wife is satisfactorily connective.

<sup>80</sup> These number about 24 out of the 57. In the terminal note (pp. 137, 138) I show that Hg also probably had reasons, intelligible though less good, for his arrangement.

The question remains if there is anything whatever in any often-found sequence of the groups to suggest that it owes anything whatever to Chaucer and not everything to the scribes or "editors"; though it is to be sure hard to see why a sequence due to him should be any more likely to survive through nearly a century than one due to an "editor." The only evidence for such survival would be indications as to intended position so delicate as probably to escape an early "editor," yet inevitable to us. Such evidence as some have thought to detect assuredly has the delicacy, but completely lacks the inevitability. Now obviously the order A D E-F H-I is palpably predetermined or fully explained by the two termini and by allusions, and therefore cannot plausibly be deducted from the credit of the "editors." We are used to slurring them, but after all they had some sense. The only sequences which are common enough to be worth examining are A directly followed by B<sup>1</sup> and C directly followed by B<sup>2</sup>.<sup>81</sup> Is there any reason to believe that these point to an arrangement somehow indicated by Chaucer? The sequence A B<sup>1</sup> comes near being universal; to disregard some eight badly deranged or mutilated texts, I find only MS. Ld<sup>1</sup> without it. This sequence we have seen to be as good as can be devised, perhaps the best; it is adopted, I believe, in all editions. The facts that it is not inevitable through evidence, yet is almost universal, permit the opinion that Chaucer somehow pointed to it. But just as possibly it was that adopted by the earliest "editor" and was retained by his successors, perhaps because the solution of the first doubtful point would be easy to remember. The sequence C B<sup>2</sup> usually comes toward the end, and is about as common; barring badly deranged and damaged texts, I find none with no sign of it, strikingly enough so that on this fact has been based an argument<sup>82</sup> that here is the position of C intended by Chaucer. It is true that the frequency of this sequence is partly explained by a development which followed Chaucer's death; its presence in over a third of the MSS. containing it is fully explained by the "John pardoner" spurious link from the Pardoner to the Shipman, so that to the scribe's eye C B<sup>2</sup> just as much formed a "group" as B<sup>2</sup> itself did. But it is also true that this spurious link is lacking in a considerably larger list of MSS., including most of the oldest; in the majority, therefore, there is no visible explanation of the sequence, yet it is maintained. Here too one cannot deny the possibility that Chaucer somehow pointed to it. But also just as possibly it was adopted by the earliest "editor" (it is in Hg), and by chance or for some unknown reason unusually well retained. Neither of these sequences is of weight in face of a priori and other considerations against indicated arrangement by Chaucer, and of arguments against the second sequence. At any rate, anything like evidence for arrangement of the "groups" indicated externally by Chaucer does not exist.

<sup>81</sup> For the facts see McCormick and (more conveniently) Manly, pp. 79-81. The nearest other cases are F C, and B<sup>2</sup>G, in only a fourth or fifth of the MSS.

<sup>82</sup> By the late and deeply-regretted Samuel Moore, PMLA, xxx, 116-123. He assumes of course that some group-arrangements (which ones?) in the MSS. are authoritative; and speaks of a general agreement (by whom?) that the worst defect of the Chaucer Society arrangement is the position of C. His assumption granted, his argument is sound enough.

If it is true that, according to all evidence, the only even plausible MS.-arrangement is not due to Chaucer—and if the foregoing discussion leads to a sound opinion that he is very unlikely to have left a unified and arranged copy—then a highly significant conclusion follows. None of the MSS., however good, has any authority whatever in determining the order of the "groups." This is meant literally. No more guidance to his intention is to be found in the MSS. or in any MS. than is to be found in Robinson's or Manly's text, or in Skeat's or Tyrwhitt's or Urry's. The best of the authority in any of them is that only of enlightened opinion. If the above is correct, the nearest we can come to learning Chaucer's intention is by doing as we have already done—coördinating all the internal indications, and seeing how far they produce a self-consistent arrangement, complete or partial. We cannot be perfectly certain that Chaucer intended that which has been elicited; and we cannot be at all certain that if he had added more he might not have changed some of the signs which point to this order, and have produced or pointed to some other order. But we can reach no nearer point than this. Perhaps the practical question is not so much how did Chaucer plan to arrange what he has left, but how would he have arranged it if he had published merely what he had left. He would have had to adopt some arrangement, and so have we. It is hard to see what answer is better than that which has been reached. The fact that it is that reached two generations ago by Furnivall is certainly nothing against it. Every scholar has had the experience of adopting a view, abandoning it, then returning, possibly on somewhat altered grounds, but with increased confidence because of the very return. Perhaps the increased confidence is in place here.

The still more practical question, as to the best procedure for a modern editor, produces the same answer. The procedure of recent editors in following the Ellesmere order is cautious and in a way defensible, but seems fundamentally unsatisfactory—partly because there is no evidence whatever that this order is, probably it is not, what Chaucer had planned or would in any event have adopted had he acted in the circumstances with full consideration; and partly because it involves puzzling or misleading or dissatisfying the modern reader (less kindly treated than the medieval). This of course does not refer to the position of C just after the Franklin, though its position in the Six-Text and Skeat seems preferable; nor to the mention of Sittingbourne earlier than Rochester, which would trouble few but Kentishmen; but to the problem what to do about the reading in l. 1179 of the Man of Law's endlink, the fact that by all appearance the speaker intended is the Shipman, and the fact that the Shipman's Tale stands without a prolog. Here is a tale in search of a prolog, and a prolog just suited to it in search of a tale. Even if we should not grant (as I believe we should) that Chaucer meant this link for the Shipman, it seems hard to deny that this junction is a happy way out, which the poet himself might well have adopted. If an editor does not take it, he must follow the procedure of one or other of the three last and cautious editors, Robinson, Manly, and Koch; and the fact that each of them follows a different procedure is suggestive of the unsatisfactory character of all. He either must like Koch read "Esquier" in l. 1179, grossly inappropriate, and followed up inappropriately also by the Wife of Bath, with the Squire's Tale far distant; or like Manly must omit this admirable passage from the text altogether, and thereby convey the unjustifiable assumption that Chaucer canceled or did not write it; or, strangest of all, adopt from the Selden MS. the reading "Shipman," yet not adopt from it the position of the Shipman's Tale directly after this link, but leave it seven thousand lines later, though all ready to snap into place. It is doubtless cautious to follow the order in the best MS; but it seems a despairing solution if that is neither authentic, nor consistent, nor satisfying. A minor but practical disadvantage in the separation of B<sup>1</sup> from B<sup>2</sup> is the fact that for a half-century and more an immense scholarly literature has used one line-numbering for B<sup>1</sup> and B<sup>2</sup> together; the use lately of two sets of line-numbers in B<sup>2</sup> (the old from unquestionable and a new from much more questionable necessity) is unesthetic and sure sooner or later to produce confusion. This disadvantage would be cheerfully accepted if there were fundamental sound reason for the separation—not so cheerfully otherwise. The foregoing argument, if valid, might be summed up by asking why a modern editor should adopt an arrangement and a content which were probably devised by an ill-informed fifteenth-century "editor" to make his book salable, which contradict what evidence there is as to Chaucer's intention, and which tend to mystify the reader and to emphasize the fragmentary state of the work.

This study has confessedly done little directly to illuminate the nature of Chaucer's genius and personality, but so far as it is sound it has done what it could to clear away some things which tend to obscure them. Its chief conclusions are suggestive enough to justify the pedantry of summarizing them.

1. Chaucer probably left the Canterbury Tales mostly in his own informal draft, and without external indication of the order of the "groups."

2. The chances are that he knew where he intended almost all of these to be placed, if not quite all, though he might have changed had he proceeded farther, or had he revised; and he has left many clear if not conclusive internal indications.

3. He never published the work as a whole, nor probably many (if any) parts of it.

4. Commercial considerations, the desire to satisfy purchasers, played a large part in the procedure of those who produced the MSS., as to omissions, insertions, and arrangement—their success being often marred by their own want of perception.

5. The order of the "groups" in the MSS. has no authority whatever.

6. The order adopted by Furnivall and Skeat is as near as any which can be devised to what Chaucer seems likeliest to have intended, and is the best practically.

NOTE ON THE HENGWRT MS.

Hg, now Peniarth MS. 392D in the National Library of Wales at Aberystwyth, is probably one of the oldest of the MSS. It has been variously dated "about 1450 A.D.," "circa 1420,"<sup>1</sup> and much earlier yet; although it is well not to snatch hastily a hasty dating, and to remember that datings of MSS. cannot usually be fixed within limits much less than a generation, I am prepared to believe Hg almost and perhaps quite the oldest, and to fall in with the long-held opinion that it is the most significant of all as to the post mortem history of the CT. It contains some 30 quires, nearly always with 8 folios to a quire,<sup>2</sup> and 40 ll. to a page. It is in the same hand throughout, as the Ellesmere is, and these hands are almost certainly the same.<sup>3</sup> Besides the likeness of handwriting, and substantial identity in readings in the passages compared, and even in spellings (including eccentricities), there are identical mannerisms and identical and quite peculiar flourishes. Their texts are well known to be usually close together, closer than either to any other, and perhaps closer than any other two texts are to each other, so much so that it seems probable for textual reasons that in large part they were copied from a common original.<sup>4</sup> A study of the history of Hg would be invaluable for the history of the CT as a whole, and may be hoped for from Manly. Here nothing so extensive is given. But since at two points above (pp. 122, 128-9) conditions in Hg are important, two matters are considered, the beginning of Pars P and the arrangement of the MS. This treatment of them should not be regarded as merely contingent on the larger study, but as separable from that, and I hope sound, being based so far as known on all the facts in existence. The chief sources for facts are my own examination of the MS. at Aberystwyth, certain photostats lately made for me there, some hours with those at Chicago (my thanks to Mr. Manly), the facsimiles already mentioned, answers to my questions given by Evan D. Jones, Esqre, B. A., of the Department of MSS. there, McCormick's MSS. of C's CT., and the Ch. Soc. print of Hg.

<sup>1</sup> Chaucer Soc., Autotype Spec. of Chief Chauc. MSS., facsim. and Forewords; Nat. Libr. of Wales, Charter of Incorp. and Rep. on the Progress of the Libr. (Oswestry, 1909), pp. 50 ff.; respectively.

<sup>2</sup> Except in those (important in this argument, and with none of the text missing) comprising folios 82–87 (only 6 folios), 152–160 (9 folios, the first separate, with no catchwords, discussed in note 6 below), 225–234 (10 folios, normally arranged, none separate). There are one or two other cases of peculiarities among the 30 quires. F. 203 recto, within a quire, has catchwords, evidently inadvertent. Ff. 161–176 (containing Fhl, SN, Cl) form a quire of 16 ff. These cases are not significant, as the others are.

<sup>3</sup> Facsimiles in the National Library's publication just mentioned, of A, ll. 4323–92; and in the Chaucer Soc. Autotype Spec., of B, 1191–1226. These may be convincingly compared with that of El published by the Manchester Univ. Press in 1911. Koch is not aware of the identity of hand.

That while Hg was being written there was no predetermined order in view, that the scribe was not sure where all the parts would later be put, seems certain. This is shown first by the entire absence of signatures, of any lettering and numbering of the folios, an absence unusual in CT MSS.; though sometimes due to trimming of folios in rebinding, that is not the case here.<sup>5</sup> It is shown more especially by the catchwords at the foot of the last page of each quire, which by giving the first words of the following quire show the binder that this is to come next, and which in Hg are never contradicted by the actual order; every time when a quire ends within a tale or link catchwords were necessary, and are present, and the correct quire follows, but the point is that at every one of the 4 places where a tale or link ends with a quire the catchwords are omitted,<sup>6</sup> these omissions are between <sup>4</sup> Skeat, Evol. of CT, p. 34; Koch, Eight MSS., p. 68 (cf. 128, 132, 142), and Pard. Prol., and T. (Ch. Soc., 1902), pp. xxxvi f.; Spec. of . . . Unpr. MSS. of CT. (Ch. Soc., 1897) iv, xlv f.; Athenaeum, 1872, ii, 208 (ten Brink quoted).

<sup>5</sup> Though the folios have been trimmed. The fact that folios 225-9 (which begin the 10-f. quire) have just under the text the numbering i, ij, iij, iiij, v, with no preceding letter, proves that there were never any other signatures beneath, because these would have made this needless. Further, those familiar with this MS. will probably grant that vestiges of signatures would be likely to remain on some folios.

<sup>6</sup> It is less confusing to exclude here the very peculiar case between MchT and FklT, rather similar. A quire ends 58 lines before the end of MchT (at E 2360), with the proper catchwords. Then comes a single separate folio beginning with these words and ending the tale (followed by a rubric) at the middle of the verso, the rest of which was left blank, and has no catchwords. Then comes a complete 8-folio quire, the first 1½ pp. of which are as follows. At the top of p. 1 is "¶Here folwen the Wordes of the Worthy Hoost to the ffrankeleyn," followed by a ¼ p. blank, then by the genuine MchSq link (Ey goddes mercy—I wol seye as I kan, E 2419-F 4), which fills the rest of the page without any blank. At the top of p. 2 comes the rest of the link (F 5-8), followed by a ½ p. blank containing only

"¶Explicit" and

"¶Here bigynneth the ffrankeleyns tale." Below the middle of this p. 2 there begins the Fkl "proem" (Thise olde gentil Britons), which with the tale continues normally throughout the quire. There is nothing abnormal except the extra folio, the blanks, and the fact that F 1 instead of "Squier" reads "Sire ffrankeleyn." Several things are certain. The scribe used the separate folio because he wished to end MchT without committing himself as to what should follow. Why was he so cautious? Since MchSq link was obviously composed to follow MchT, the answer is that it was not then at hand. Why did he at first leave one and a half pages and more blank before Fkl proem? He hoped to find a link. At some time after he began Fkl proem and tale he found the MchSq link. If it had the Fkl in F 1, he inserted it here inevitably. If (as probably) it had the correct reading "Squier," why did he not insert it before SqT, already copied and with a blank page before it with ample space for MchSq link? Because the wording made it much more necessary that this link should follow MchT than precede SqT, it was too late to change the position of SqT, and it was easy to change "Squier" to "Sire frankeleyn" ("Sire" obviously suggested by "Squier"). The absence of catchwords at the end of the separate folio proves that Hg did not know what words would begin the next page; he may or may not have known that MchSq link existed, and have intended FklT to come next. The presumption is, it is true, that this case was originally like the other four where catchwords are wanting, and that he omitted them and left the blank on the mere chance that a link would turn up; but the exposition is clearer through treating this case separately. The whole matter is a good specimen of the early laxity as to safeguarding and altering Chaucer's MS. or the first copies.

CookT and WBP, SumnT and MelMonk link, MancT and ML headlink, MelT and Pars headlink. What is more, in 3 of these 4 the not beginning the next poem before the next quire was due to an elaborate effort; for after SumnT the last 2½ pp. are left blank (much the longest of all the blanks), and the last quire of MelT contains 10 folios instead of 8 as normally, besides other singularities mentioned later. With CookT, luckily for the scribe, he was so near the end of the quire that only a ½ page remained; which he left blank.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>7</sup> It is notable that in every one of these 4 cases it makes no difference whether or not Chaucer's text indicates what is meant to follow, it gives no indication after Ck or Sumn, but does so after Mel and (as I believe, and in almost all MSS.) after Manc. The one-fourth page blank between Ck and WB is far from unparalleled; not only did our man in writing E1 leave one of his few blanks here; within quires in Hg he left a page blank between MLT and SqT, a half and a quarter and a half page blank between MchT and FklT (before and after the MchSq link, made over to Fkl, the very peculiar case described above), a half-page blank between FklT and SecNP, a quarter-page blank between PardT and ShipmT. All except part of those in the peculiar case are at the bottom of the page. These blanks are not, as might be fancied, due to a preference for starting a new poem at the top of a page. Hg had none; in the first half or so of the work (from Prol to MancT) he almost always begins a new one on the same page as the last (always, except in a very few cases where by chance the last fills the page). But in the later part of the MS., where are the blank places under discussion, there are about as many cases of beginning on a new page as on the old, and half of these cannot possibly be deemed accidental. The clear reason is that in this part of the MS. the scribe was very doubtful about the completeness and the sequence, and wished to leave space (even thinking of inserting an extra folio if necessary) for rearranging or the supplying of a link; which usually proved to be not forthcoming, either because Chaucer had never written it (as after Fkl, Pard), or because Hg did not find or use it (as after ML, SN, Cl). That this was the main reason for leaving the blanks is almost proved by the peculiar case just mentioned. The blanks of a page or more (2½ pp. after SumnT, 1 p. after MLT) betray even more clearly the hope that some connective would turn up. Hg left so long a blank after SumnT because it was so near the end of a quire that he was willing to leave the rest blank; a shorter after MLT because that ends close to the beginning of a quire; at the only other cases where a tale or link ends without a following connective, —NPT, MancT, MelT—the last two end exactly with the quire (allowing the insertion of following folios later if needed), and NPT ends before the middle of the quire, to leave the

In the fourth case an 8-folio quire is exactly filled; by chance, unless, wishing to fill this quire exactly, the scribe tucked in what would do so. It is clear then that the scribe was much at sea as to the arrangement, since every time when he ends a poem or prose tale with the quire he by omitting catchwords avoids committing himself as to what shall follow, and leaves the decision till later. This obvious reason for omitting shows it was not due to oversight. At the same time he cannot have been always deeply concerned about the arrangement, since in other cases with seemingly equal ground for uncertainty he makes on the spot the decision as to arrangement,<sup>8</sup> though usually allowing for possible insertion of a passage, which at Mch-Fkl was actually made.

One of the chief questions about the arrangement of Hg is whether any of it can be due to misbinding of Hg, a belief held by Sir William McCormick (pp. x, xix, 245). It is quite impossible except at some of the 4 points already mentioned, where a tale or link ends with a quire and where there are no catchwords. The only rearrangements of the 5 portions made by these points which have anything to be said for them as intended are two. One is the order of portions—1, 4, 3, 2, 5—which besides putting MelT just before MelMk link, gives the order—group A, MLP and T, Sq, Mch, etc., which is bad, but found in many other MSS. (this may be a slight argument for the opinion that it was scribally intended). I do not believe Hg did intend this, for I believe he meant 4 to be next to 5, but shall not enter an elaborate discussion, since this possible rearrangement is less important for us now than the other. It would leave the order still very bad indeed, and of course quite un-Chaucerian. The other is 1, 2, 4, 3, 5, which puts MelT just before MelMk link, and MancT just before ParsP. The misbinding theory here assumes the binder misplacing, in their proper order, 3 complete quires. It looks somewhat attractive, at first indeed almost irresistible, for it removes the strange break between MelT and the link which mentions this, and also that between MancT and ParsP (whatever is the explanation of the hesitant reading in ParsP 1).

All the same I believe the scribe did not intend this order 1, 2, 4, 3, 5, and that its prima facie plausibility involves much greater difficulties under the surface. The chief reason is that (as stated before) he put no catchwords<sup>9</sup> at the end of MelT or of MancT (each ending a quire); if he meant MelMk link or ParsP to come next, why not their opening words as catchwords at the end of the preceding quire, as normally? Further, in order to end MelT with a quire, and so not commit himself as to what should follow it, he put two extra folios in that quire, and toward the end crowded the writing; why, unless in order to end MelT with the quire? And again, if he had meant MancT to be just before ParsP 1, why should he have apparently originally written in that line something else than manciple? Manciple replaced by a reading fitting the present position would be an argument for misbinding; an unknown reading replaced by manciple is not. (Further discussion of this reading comes later.) A highly important consideration is that (as I said) Hg felt more certain of the inrest of which blank would have been too much; but the chief reason for no blanks is that early in the MS. the scribe was not so uncertain and suspicious as he was later.

---

<sup>8</sup> These cases, where Chaucer's text does not show what tale is to follow, but where Hg continues in the same quire, are NPT-MancP, with no intervening blank space; MLT-SqT, with a page of blank; FklT-SNP, with a half-page of blank; PardT-ShipmT, with a quarter-page of blank; and two cases where (since Hg lacks CYP and CLMch link) Hg found equal uncertainty, SNT-CLP, and CIT with Host's stanza-PhysT, each with an insignificant blank. While in some of these cases leaving some blank space for links possibly to be found, Hg did not trouble here to leave open the question of arrangement.

<sup>9</sup> None are erased. The very few other irregularities of procedure in Hg mentioned in n. 2 are not nearly enough to justify doubt that the extra sheet, crowded writing and absence of catchwords have the significance I give them.

ternal structure of his 5 portions when copying the first 3 (viz., <sup>(1)</sup> group A, <sup>(2)</sup> group D, and <sup>(3)</sup> MelMk link-MkT-MkNP link-NPT-MancP and T), for (as we saw) he left no blanks (except at the ends of groups A and D), while in his fourth portion (viz., from MLP to MelT, much less than half the whole work) he left 4 or 6, all within quires. It is pretty clear that the chief reason why Hg put MLP-MelT late, just before the inevitably closing portion, is that it was the most problematical and confusing portion, and he preferred to put the clearest portions toward the first—a good example of the tunc deterius principle. Again, there are two other possible reasons for deciding to put together Mel and Pars, and not Manc and Pars; Hg, while not given to noting Chaucer's intimations, may have noticed that MancP came in a morning and ParsP late in an afternoon, or (more likely) perhaps he thought he might wish (and finally did wish) to put MelT and ParsT, the only prose tales and the least generally attractive, together and at the very end. I do not believe it is without his intention that the two long prose tales are last. As to the ignoring of the connection obviously meant by Chaucer between MelT and MelMk link, either he overlooked its existence (strange, but not at all impossible with an ordinary scribe), or he thought the above considerations more important—by this time despairing of getting things exactly right, he may have merely consulted his own taste.

With far from absolute conviction, I propose the following as an explanation of the arrangement of Hg. It was copied from loose sheets, not from a bound volume. Its scribe was a good deal concerned about the arrangement and connection of parts; especially toward the end, he was far from certain that he had all the parts, and was very doubtful about the best arrangement. But in the peculiarities of the arrangement some rationale can be detected on examination, though almost never intended by Chaucer. He put first the two "groups," A and D, which were least problematical, and then a smaller portion which he also felt sufficiently sure about. He put at the very end the 2 long prose tales, then as now the least generally attractive. He put next each other NPT and MancP and T, both tales being of the nature of bird-fables; possibly also because the latter would just fill the quire. He put next each other 4 especially ideal tales (Fkl, SN, Cl, Phys), forming an unbroken sequence, SN and Cl being alike also in being 2 of the few stanzaic tales. In 3 cases he finally put next each other especially bawdy tales or parts, CookT-WBP, SummT-MelMk link, Pard end-ShipmT. If this conjecture as to ideal and bawdy sequences seems rash, it finds curious and independent support. We have seen that after just 6 tales blanks are left, and seen reason to believe that the motive for the blanks was chiefly uncertainty as to what ought to follow. Of these 6 tales, 4 are exactly the 4 tales which begin the sequences just mentioned, the 4 ideal and bawdy sequences all contain the intervening blanks which indicate some uncertainty. It really seems likely that Hg at the end of his labors accepted these two makeshift reasons for placing poems about which he had previously shown uncertainty, the blanks allowing for later insertions if desirable. It is true that there may have been other reasons for some of these sequences, and that 2 other sequences (only MancML and MLSg) are entirely unexplained—a purely empirical criterion would hardly work always, and people completely at sea are often inconsistent. The above suggestions give a possible and intelligible explanation. A man who had not the wit to examine and think carefully, and did not realize the efficacy of dramatic contrast, yet had more taste than to throw a disorganized mass together helter-skelter, would be likely enough to think first of harmony of tone; having read or copied a portion ending in a certain tone, he would be likely enough to look next for what would continue the same tone. In such cases as these the true explanation is likely to be trivial and complicated. In sum, the Hg-man (whom we may feel for) so far as we can see was the first who ever wrestled with the problem of arrangement. In E1, his later and especially handsome copy, he used more care or better guidance, and got a more satisfying order; he followed all the internal indications he noticed, putting E directly after D; but put at the end the conspicuously truncated "groups" (see pp. 129-130), just as in Hg he had put there the most confused and least attractive parts. In both MSS. therefore he used the principle of tunc deterius.

The second chief matter in this note is ParsP 1,

By that the manciple hadde his tale al ended, which is highly significant for the history and development of the CT (as we have seen, pp. 122 ff.). The word manciple is in the same hand and ink as the rest, but on an erasure, seemingly made after the whole line had been written. The original word was of the same length, or possibly a shade longer.<sup>10</sup> Since manciple is suspicious only in Hg, since Hg is perhaps the earliest MS., and since the late afternoon time of ll 2-4 contrasts with the morning in MancP, it has been conjectured that Chaucer did not mean to connect Manc and Pars, that he wrote some other word than manciple in ParsP 1, and that Hg, followed by all other MSS., made the change. If Chaucer wrote manciple, we seem to find in Hg the unusual situation of the word being abandoned and then restored, and restored where MeT just before makes manciple inappropriate. At first sight it is plausible to suppose that he wrote some other word.

It is pertinent to ask what other pilgrim Chaucer could have designated here. The only ones whose labels used by the poet are not distinctly too short, or too long (like ffrankeleyn, haberdashere), are Prioress, Marchant, Sommour, Pardoner, Plowman, and Carpenter. The first 4 are not favored by the endings of their tales, and what follows in Hg and other MSS. Some of them are for other reasons unlikely or impossible, and the fact that all 4 have already told tales is against them here; there is no case of a second tale but the peculiar one of Chaucer himself. The Carpenter might have been intended, but his label has too many syllables to be likely from Chaucer. The Plowman is the most promising, the two peasant brothers coming at the end, with the implication that his tale was either lost or never written. Though one cannot deny that in some stage of the evolution Chaucer might have intended one of these, or some person unknown, and though if one adopts what seems to me the wholly unacceptable view that ParsP and T were meant for the return-journey, anything is possible, except for the Plowman there is no fair answer to the query what pilgrim Chaucer could have meant instead of the Manciple. So far the indications rather oppose the idea that Chaucer wrote anything but manciple. A strong indication against any other Chaucerian reading is that all other MSS. have this clearly,<sup>11</sup> including the equally authoritative El, which I find no reason to doubt is probably here as usually<sup>12</sup> from the same original. Whether it is or not, Chaucer's MSS. had manciple unless some meddler actually changed the word in it, or unless the original was never copied from but once, both suppositions unlikely. The conceivable supposition that Chaucer left a blank has nothing to be said for it.

But what then is the explanation of the puzzle in Hg, if its earlier reading was not due to Chaucer? I have none which is instantly convincing, but several which are possible and more satisfactory than the alternative supposition—that Chaucer designated some more or less unlikely person, that Hg copied this and then changed to manciple because he meant <sup>10</sup> The / which in other lines marks the caesural pause was also erased, so the original word was little if at all longer. There seems no possibility of distinguishing anything more of the earlier reading.

<sup>11</sup> Except that 4 late MSS. (Ch, Gl, Ra<sup>3</sup>, Tc<sup>1</sup>) changed to yeman, Marchaunt, or Frankelen, trying to adapt to wrongly preceding tales.

<sup>12</sup> Incidentally I add,—even WBP and M&NP link suggest the same original, the passages there in El but lacking in Hg having been perhaps on loose sheets disregarded by Hg. See p. 112 above. I accept with alacrity Manly's theory as explaining things sometimes.

MancT to precede, yet that he headed off this order by 2 of his only 4 significant omissions of catchwords, those which would have ensured MelT and MelMk link, and also MancT and ParsP, being put together, and that the binder completed the disaster. The alternatives are these. Hg, having left himself entire freedom as to what should just precede ParsP, might have planned to put it just after SumnT, and in the manner of the 4 MSS lately mentioned have written Somnour (his usual form, Somonour in Prol, neither really too short), having changed his mind, he would restore the original reading, being as fitting as any as well as being genuine. Unless Hg is here copied from Chaucer's own MS, its parent may have substituted (like the 4 late MSS. mentioned above) a wrong reading to fit some other wrongly preceding tale, and Hg have restored manciple as being correct. He might even conceivably have written manciple the first time, but so badly that he erased and re-wrote, though this seems unlikely. He may have written something appropriate to the preceding MelT, something feeble, and thought better of it, and restored the original reading; he usually did try to harmonize a visibly contradictory connection by means of an invented reading.<sup>13</sup> The likeliest reason then for the writing in of manciple is that it was thought to be (as I believe it was) what Chaucer wrote, and had been displaced by something wrong. With so many possibilities we are not forced to accept what is almost an impossibility.

A strong reason for disbelieving that Chaucer wrote anything but manciple is what has been said earlier as to the strong probability (to say the least, see pp. 122-125 above) that Chaucer intended the MancPars sequence. If we cannot accept the return-journey theory for either of these parts, the geography shows they must come last, even if Chaucer had written all the outward-bound tales, he would hardly in this 55- or 60-mile journey have put more than these two in the last two miles.

This note may be dull reading and what is worse may seem inconclusive. It would be pleasant to find one simple explanation which would fit everything into a convincing brilliancy like a finished picture-puzzle. But with the complex situation and a certain amount of (often excusable) obtuseness, inattention, and variability in the scribes, such satisfactions are usually denied us. De facto, a complex situation usually though not always means a complex explanation. The trouble is that, however satisfying such may be, a reader is likely to ask if some other complex explanation just as satisfying, but different, may not later be proposed by someone else; therefore the first, however logical, may not convince. But I do not believe the present explanation will seem as unlikely as any alternative worked out as fully.

J. S. P. TATLOCK

University of California

<sup>13</sup> In most cases marring the verse and style—Marchant in SqFkl link, 675, 696, 699, ffrankeleyn in MchSq link ("F," 1). The only case where he might conceivably have done this and did not is in the MelMk link; here it would have been a waste of trouble since this is preceded by several blank pages, which he hoped might be filled later.

X

E.K. IS SPENSER

IN the 14th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica (1929) under the Spenser entry, J. C. Smith says:<sup>1</sup> "The notion that E. K. is a mask for Spenser himself has been disproved by Dr. Herford." Since 1895, when the late Dr. C. H. Herford published his edition of the Shepherd's Calendar, a great many critics, as well as Professor Smith, have accepted as final Dr. Herford's conclusion that E.K., the so-called editor, is some one other than Spenser, and is probably Edward Kirke. In this paper I shall try to refute the arguments advanced by Dr. Herford and his followers,<sup>2</sup> and to give supporting evidence for the affirmation in my title.

First Dr. Herford says: "E.K. shows ignorance of things which Spenser must have known. His information is professedly imperfect." To those who believe that Spenser is playing a dual rôle in the poem, this is no argument; and Dr. Herford admits its weakness. For when he cites "E.K.'s" ignorance about the tale of Roffy (September eclogue) and the identity of the lamented person in the November dirge, he says: "These cases are not, taken by themselves, free from suspicion. For in dealing with Algrind, E.K. is evidently silent with a purpose. There, however, he makes no profession of ignorance." Thus Dr. Herford admits feigning, and in so doing points the argument for his opponents. Why should an acknowledged annotator feign? Does it not seem more reasonable to think that Spenser himself is not revealing more than he wishes to reveal?

<sup>1</sup> On the strength of that, Professor Smith goes on to say, "It is not unlikely indeed that the Mistress Kerke in Westminster who took charge of letters for Spenser in October of the year 1579 was E.K.'s mother and that all three were living at her house." He further supposes E.K. "getting to work on the notes" after 10 April, 1579.

<sup>2</sup> Schelling and Rhys speak of "E.K., Spenser's friend, Edward Kirke"; De Selincourt says it is natural, Renwick says it is common sense, to accept the view that E.K. stands for Edward Kirke. Draper says that E.K. is Edward Kirke "plausibly enough." Schelling, F. E., English Literature during the Lifetime of Shakespeare (N.Y., 1927), p. 48.—Rhys, E., Lyric Poetry (N.Y., 1913), p. 134.—Spenser, Poetical Works, ed. with an introd. by E. De Selincourt (London, 1924), p. xiv.—Spenser, The Shepherd's Calendar, ed. by W. L. Renwick (London, 1930), p. 163 f.—Draper, in JEGP, xviii, 557.—C. H. and T. Cooper were the ones who discovered that an Edward Kirke had matriculated as sizar at Pembroke in 1571. See Notes and Queries, 2d ser., ix (1860), 42. Collier (1862), Hales (1869), and Grosart (1882) are among the editors who have adopted the Edward Kirke theory.—G. C. Moore Smith in Harvey's Marginalia (1913), p. 24, speaks of "the editor, Edward Kirke"; J. B. Fletcher (Encyc. Amer.) and the late Edwin Greenlaw (PMLA, v, 26) grant E.K. a separate existence, but think that much of the gloss must have been inspired, if not dictated, by Spenser.—J. J. Higginson in his Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar . . . (N.Y., 1912), favors Edward Kirke; also B. E. C. Davis, Edmund Spenser (Cam., 1933).

Dr. Herford's second point is that "E.K. is a bold etymologist."<sup>3</sup> My contention is that the gloss is not built up by the dictionary method, and that such mistakes as occur in the gloss are those that Spenser himself would have made. I shall try to show that the gloss is true to the idea in the poem. For instance, herse (xi, 60)<sup>4</sup> is not defined as "solemn obsequies in funerals"; we are to understand that the line "O heavy herse!" refers to the solemn obsequies; these obsequies are a sad ceremony until one thinks of the soul passing into heaven, and then they become happy: "O happy herse!" (xi, 170). The idea that herse is used by apheresis for rehearsal (recital) is well taken by Herford, Skeat, and others; but that does not conflict with the gloss, as they seem to think; although Spenser's mind may have travelled from his thought of obsequies in the first stanza to the dirge itself as a recital. Farther on in the same November gloss appears: "Eternall night is death or darkness of hell." The form of statement is the same here as in the case of herse; but no quarrel has ever been entered against "E.K." about his definition of eternal night.

Spenser is equally poetic in his use of the word glen (iv, 26).<sup>5</sup> What he is most interested in explaining in the gloss is that the lady whom he is celebrating is well born. He styles her briefly and poetically "the widowes daughter of the glen" (a word in keeping with the pastoral idea, and rhyming with frenne); but he is at pains to tell us that she is a gentlewoman "of no mean house." He does not say that glen means "country hamlet or borough," as Dr. Herford says that he does.

Again, "welked" (xi, 13) seems to Dr. Herford a shibboleth to show up E.K. as an annotator ignorant of his author's meaning. Let welked <sup>3</sup> Dr. Herford admits that "Most of his mistakes in this kind, such as the derivation of Æglogue (General Argument), of Elf and Goblin ("June" glosse) may well have been shared by Spenser." Here again Dr. Herford sides with his opponents. Other examples could be cited (for instance, spell, iii, 40) where there is more poetry than truth; and all of them taken together show that Spenser was using the gloss to indulge his fancy and also no doubt to make a display of learning.

<sup>4</sup> Dr. Herford's note says: "Skeat is probably right in explaining this (against E.K.) as for something rehearsed or recited. In F.Q., iii, 2, 48, Spenser uses it of the recital of the Church service. It may be rendered burden." Needless to say, the correct interpretation is not against E.K.

N.E.D. under hearse gives solemn obsequies as a definition, and cites this passage; but adds, "perhaps an error."

<sup>5</sup> According to N.E.D. glen was at that time coming into English use from Ireland and Scotland; and it is both possible and probable that Spenser knew that it was "a wild valley" from colloquial use. He uses it in that sense in F.Q., iii, 7, 6.

derive from M.E. welken (wither) as Dr. Herford suggests. Then, combining gloss and verse, Spenser says to us: "As the Moone being in the waine is sayde of Lidgate to welk [i.e. wither], [so I say], nowe sad winter hath welked [i.e. withered] the day, [i.e., (shortened and empayred it)]." Spenser's innovation, if any, is to use an intransitive verb transitively. Both here and in "the welked [i.e. withered] Phoebus" (i, 73) the shorter day is clearly meant, and not the gloom of winter.

About the word wonne—"Thereto aye wonned to repayre," ii. 119—Dr. Herford says: "This is one of the glosses which cannot be due to the writer of the poems. Wonned is here were wont." The gloss has "to wonne) to haunt or frequent." I am willing to believe that in the bracketed wonne) Spenser has simply indicated the whole phrase wonned to repayre, which certainly means to haunt or frequent. The idea of custom, of doing a thing again and again, inherent in the M.E. wonen was no doubt in the poet's mind when he glossed this line; perhaps more so than when he wrote:

And wonned not the great God Pan
Upon Mount Olivet? (vii, 49)
Whilome there wonned a wicked wolf (ix, 184)

To illustrate, however, how the poet's mind could shift, we have only to note that he has used Pan twice in the same eclogue, meaning each time something different; but he has carefully glossed it each time, once to mean Christ (vii, 49), once to mean the Pope (vii, 179).

Mr. J. J. Higginson has adopted the foregoing citations made by Dr. Herford, and has added some of his own.<sup>6</sup> For example, he cannot understand how evermore could render the sense of ay in the sententious line:

Ay little helpe to harm there needeth (ii, 198)

Yet then as now the word ay could be mistaken for the affirmative yes; the poet informs us in the gloss that he intends the adverb of time. For such a prosaic purpose, who but a poet would select so poetic a word as evermore? Mr. Higginson also fails to feel the force of the gloss's to dote used to explain assot (iii, 25) meaning infatuated, like a fool (after the French); and he misinterprets aforesayde in the gloss (v, 257; ix, 161), apparently not sensing that it does not refer to anything in the gloss, but refers to the ideas developed in the poem before the glossed line occurs. This last item is proof that the gloss writer knew the poem very well and had it constantly in mind, and is an answer to Mr. Higginson's note on assot to the effect that the glosser showed unfamiliarity with the text. Mr. Higginson himself shows unfamiliarity with the text when he accuses the glosser of using dogge wrongly for dogges (vi, 22)<sup>7</sup> and of glossing blacke (ix, 97) as hell.<sup>8</sup> He cites the "failure to follow the order of the text in the gloss, especially noticeable in the April eclogue" as an argument in favor of a pedestrian and alien annotator; but such liberties would seem more natural to the poet himself than to an alien annotator. A poet, on looking through his poem, might very easily append new comments to the end of his gloss and not fit them in where they belonged.

<sup>6</sup> Op. cit., pp. 165-178.

Also, in spite of Mr. Higginson, weeping and complaint (greete, viii, 161) do constitute mourning, and loss (scathe, xii, 100) does constitute a hindrance. Mr. Higginson takes exception to the use of order in the gloss to explain equipage (x, 114).<sup>9</sup> N.E.D. shows that about that time the word order could be used to mean rank, grade, class, series, or a body of persons engaged in the same profession, occupation, or pursuits. So that for Spenser to teach his muse to tread in the order of the warlike Bellona is permissible. Mr. Higginson says that the glosser did not understand tambourines; but is not Spenser himself floundering here? Spenser may have heard the word but not associated it with the proper instrument;<sup>10</sup> and therefore showed confusion of thought in his note saying that the instrument might be the clarion. He may even have made the word himself;<sup>11</sup> some of his coinages, such as crumenall (ix, 119) and stanck (ix, 47), have been agreed upon by Herford, Renwick, Higginson, and others; he was among the first to use quaint (x, 114) in the modern sense of strange.<sup>12</sup>

Spenser did make mistakes, but they were of a nature that makes it seem incredible that he could have found an annotator to uphold him in them. For instance, in the March eclogue (line 23) Spenser speaks of Lethe lake; and his hypothetical gloss-writer docilely explains that Lethe is a lake in hell which the poets call the lake of forgetfulness. Does it not seem better to think that it was Spenser's error (or poetic license) both in poem and gloss?

<sup>7</sup> Cf. Sommer, Facsimile edition.

<sup>8</sup> blacke) is the keyword for blacke bowre of sorrow which is glossed as hell from which Great Pan (Christ) saved mortals "with dear borrow."

<sup>9</sup> Equipage in and before the Elizabethan era had the meaning of equipment, especially military. N.E.D. gives this passage from Spenser as first citation under the definition: train of retainers or attendants, retinue; as second citation a passage from Fairfax's Tasso. Spenser shows that he is leaning to the new usage, and he has glossed it accordingly, using the word order instead of rank, which he might have used.

<sup>10</sup> A somewhat analogous error would be the American misapplication of the word portecochère.

<sup>11</sup> Blount's Glossographia (1661) cites only Spenser's use of it.

<sup>12</sup> Although Spenser (i.e., E.K.) explains in the gloss that quaint means strange, and shows fully how that might be, Dr. Herford pronounces this "far-fetched." Such contradiction of explicit evidence is scarcely understandable.

Again, in the eclogue assigned to November (whether or not written for November) Spenser puts the sun in the sign of Pisces (line 16); and the gloss states that the sun is in Pisces all November! A "mistake" of E.K.? It is far more interesting and plausible to accept Harvey's information about Spenser that he knew little astronomy,<sup>13</sup> and to believe that when he decided to move the end of the year<sup>14</sup> (as set forth in the general argument) from February around to November–December, he thought he could move the signs of the Zodiac also. It would be natural and to his interest to make use of the gloss to bolster up his haziness of mind on the question; and without much analysis of the matter, he might have been influenced by Du Bartas,<sup>15</sup> who, without giving names of months, groups Capricornus, Aquarius, and Pisces, and associates with them the snow and cold of winter.

The foregoing discussion covers practically all of the details concerning words and their interpretation which Herford and Higginson adduce to prove that E.K. is an entity apart from Spenser. They charge E.K. with making mistakes; and as they interpret E.K.'s annotations, these same annotations are clumsy and blundering indeed; read aright, they show that a poetic mind was at work in the gloss as well as in the poem. In the hands of Dr. Herford and his adherents, E.K. seems scarcely more than a moron, a mere straw-man. Could such an inept person have written the note on Forever (October gloss)<sup>16</sup> regarding the honor awarded to poets? Could he, unless Spenser had been holding his pen all the while, have written the poetic "arguments," the general argument as well as those for each eclogue? Could he have written the flowing lines of the Introductory Epistle, replete with solicitous mention of the special characteristics of the poem as they could be set down only by the author himself? Professor Renwick says that E.K. was no fool.<sup>17</sup> My own conclusion is that, when the commentators have got done pointing out what he did and did not write on his own initiative, he must have been at least a very colorless person, if he had any reality at all.

<sup>13</sup> Harvey's Marginalia, ed. Moore Smith, p. 162: "Pudet ipsum Spenserum, etsi Sphaerae, astrolabique non planè ignarum; suae in astronomicis Canonibus, tabulis, instrumentisque imperitiae."

<sup>14</sup> It is interesting to note in this connection that the beginning of the civil year was not officially changed from March to January until the mid-eighteenth century in England.

<sup>15</sup> Du Bartas, Première Semaine, 4<sup>e</sup> jour.

Harvey's Marginalia, ed. Moore Smith, p. 161: "M. Spenser conceives the like pleasure (much delight to repeate it often) in the fourth day of the first Weeke of Bartas. Which he esteemes as the proper profession of Urania."

Spenser's familiarity with the Semaine does not necessarily depend upon the edition of 1579. In Bn and BM is listed a latinized version of the poem, date 1573.

<sup>16</sup> Higginson says, "Perhaps Spenser did contribute the note on forever." Op. cit., p. 175.

<sup>17</sup> Ed. Renwick, p. 169.

Prof. Renwick comments thus on E.K.'s information (Oct. gloss) that Hobbinal is Harvey: "Spenser cannot have objected to that revelation; it would have been quite in Harvey's character to arrange for it with E.K."<sup>18</sup> How much simpler and more worthy it is to believe that in every mention of Harvey in the gloss Spenser is writing from his own heart and in his own person! Spenser's affection for Harvey is well known. So manifest is it, that Mr. G. C. Moore Smith, in his edition of Harvey's Marginalia, says of the Shepherd's Calendar: "Sufficient to say of it that it is an eternal monument to the friendship of Edmund Spenser for Gabriel Harvey."<sup>19</sup> This same note of warm friendship for Harvey is sounded in the Introductory Epistle (signed E.K.):

Defend [the poet] with your mighty rhetoric & other your rare gifts of learning . . . and be perswaded to pluck out of the hateful darknesse those so many excellent English poemmes of yours. . . . Trust me you doe both them great wrong, in depriving them of the desired sonne, and also yourselfe, in smothering your deserved prayses, and all men generally, in withholding from them so divine pleasures, which they might conceive of your gallant English verses. . . .

Yet Harvey never mentions E.K., nor Edward Kirke, in his letters, marginalia, or other writings. In his marginalia he groups in one place, "the rare spirits of the age," and in another "the most admired of contemporary poets";<sup>20</sup> he mentions Spenser, Sidney, Dyer, and many others; but he does not mention E.K., nor Edward Kirke. Yet Mr. Higginson says, "E.K. presents a higher conception of the ideal poet than Spenser does."<sup>21</sup> It would seem that Harvey would surely have included Edward Kirke<sup>22</sup> among the rare spirits of the age, if he had had such great ability. It would seem that E.K. might have expected no less from one whom he styles (Jan. gloss) "my verye singular good freend, M. Gabriel Harvey." E.K. in the Introductory Epistle sounds the praise of Harvey.

He also praises Spenser, even, as it might seem, to the point of extravagance. This brings me to what I have lately come to believe to be the crux of the whole controversy. The praise meted out to the poet in

<sup>18</sup> Ed. Renwick, p. 166.

<sup>19</sup> Harvey's Marginalia, ed. Moore Smith, p. 24. Although Harvey was far inferior to Spenser as a poet, and although his Latinized style cannot compare with Spenser's rhetorical prose, yet it is clear that he was at that time Spenser's affinity in the world of books.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., pp. 231-233.

<sup>21</sup> Op. cit., p. 172.

<sup>22</sup> Sidney Lee's statement in D.N.B. (entry: Kirke) that "Edward Kirke formed a warm friendship with Harvey and Spenser during his residence at college" seems scarcely warranted. All that we know certainly about Edward Kirke is that he matriculated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1571; after graduation took orders; became rector at Risby, Suffolk; and died there in 1613.—Strange that neither he nor any of his descendants ever laid claim to any of Spenser's greatness, nor even to his friendship.

the Epistle is offensive to Dr. Herford and others, if admittedly written by Spenser. They feel that his honor and standing among poets will be dimmed if he is convicted of being his own laudator. Dr. Herford says:

E. K. expresses opinions concerning both "the author" and other poets, which it is incredible that Spenser should have put forth under whatever disguise, and which are not involved in that disguise.

Mr. Higginson says:

It is evident that E.K. employs methods of praising the poet which it is impossible to believe that Spenser himself could have used.<sup>23</sup> . . . It is a far cry from the young poet's open acceptance of praise which exploited his unfledged work, to an absurd boasting of his own powers.<sup>24</sup>

Sidney Lee writes:<sup>25</sup>

If Spenser were the author of E.K.'s preface and notes, he would be exposed to a charge of repulsive immodesty in lavishing praise upon himself; but it is incredible that the poet who disguised himself in his early works under the pseudonym of Immerito should be guilty of this offence.

J. P. Collier (1862) speaks of "the absurd speculations hazarded by some critics that Spenser had in fact been his own editor, and consequently his own laudator."

I wish to show that the praise was part of the disguise; and that it is possible to believe that there was no immodesty to the point of being repulsive. Let us admit that Spenser knew how to write with enthusiasm about his poetry. In his letters,<sup>26</sup> he says of his Epithalamium Thamesis that "it will be very profitable for the knowledge, and rare for the invention and manner of handling," of his Dreams "that M. Angelo himself could not amend the best nor reprehend the worst," of his Stemmata Dudleiana that "in his own fancie he never did better," of the Faerie Queene that he intended "to overgo Ariosto," of his Iambicum Trimetrum that "they be precisely perfit for the feete, and varie not one inch from the rule." The tenor of his words here is not very different from that of the Introductory Epistle. The excuse for the letters is that Spenser was writing freely and frankly, exuberantly, in fact, to his friend. The excuse for the praise in the Epistle is that it was necessary to the purpose of introducing the anonymous poet.

That Spenser should have wished to keep his anonymity in publishing the Shepheardes Calender is understandable. It is a natural impulse of a new writer at any time to wish to ascertain the attitude of the public toward his matter before revealing his name. In the days of Queen Eliza-

<sup>23</sup> Op. cit., p. 170.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., p. 171.

<sup>25</sup> D.N.B. (entry Kirke, Edward).

<sup>26</sup> Cf. Spenser-Harvey correspondence.

both it was more than usually important, especially since Spenser wished to express himself on ecclesiastical matters, which formed a vexed question in those times.<sup>27</sup> As a poet, he was attempting to establish pastoral verse in the English language; he, like Chaucer, saw beauty and poetical possibilities in the English language and in English verse (the vogue for Latin verse and for English verse in the Latin manner claimed his attention but not his heart, as his printed works attest); and he had to lament an unsuccessful love for a lady whom he names Rosalinde.

As there were several reasons for his use of a pseudonym, Immerito, there was also several reasons for his adoption of the elaborate scheme of introductory letter, argument, and gloss. There was precedent, for one thing; scarcely anything was published in those days without a commendatory letter, or poem.<sup>28</sup> So E.K. says in the Introd. Epistle: "Hereunto have I added a certain glosse or scholion . . . which maner of glosing and commenting, well I wote, wil seeme straunge and rare in our tongue . . . yet forsomuch . . . that in this kind, as in other we might be equal to the learned of other nations, I thought good to take the paines upon me." Moreover, it is reasonable to believe that Spenser felt it would be better for his verse to appear not unfriended. In addition, he had so many things to say, as pointed out above, that he needed all the means possible in which to say them. No one could say these things so well as he could himself, even if there were anybody to say them.<sup>29</sup> But anonymity must be maintained; therefore he adopted initials as an indication of another personality.

Why did Spenser adopt the particular initials E.K.? It would not have been unheard of to select initials at random. Such things have been done. But to think of him as Edmundus Kalendarius is not difficult;<sup>30</sup> and it would have been quite in keeping with the habits of scholars of his day for him to so regard himself. In a Latin poem which I shall quote later, he speaks of himself as Edmundus; and the Latin adjective (Kalendarius) would be naturally appended in connection with the work in hand.<sup>31</sup> It seems to me a mere coincidence that Edward Kirke's initials should have been the same; just as it is a mere coincidence that Spenser should have received his letters by arrangement with a person whose surname began with the letter K (i.e., Mistress Kerke). The idea has been put forward that in the small group of sizars at Pembroke College Edward Kirke must have been known to his fellow-sizar, Edmund Spenser, and that Spenser may have borrowed Kirke's initials. We cannot prove that he did not. What I wish to demonstrate in this paper is that the entire poem, including Epistle and gloss, was the work of one mind and hand, and that the use of E.K. was a device.<sup>32</sup> Spenser, the young Cambridge poet and scholar, who could write with such enthusiasm about poetry, did not need a collaborator, and the literary conventions did not exact it of him. Moreover, a perusal of poetry collections of that period shows that initials were a not unusual disguise.<sup>33</sup>

<sup>27</sup> In the analysis of the ecclesiastical eclogues, written by the late Edwin Greenlaw (PMLA, xxvi, 419 f.) he shows that Spenser was perilously brave in writing about the Catholic-Protestant controversy, even in allegory. He also shows how closely the gloss is united to the poem, pointing out some "charmingly innocent notes." An instance of this is in the Sept. eclogue: "So as never since that time, there have been wolves here founde, unless they were brought from other countryes." Another would be the note on "kings and potentates" (April gloss) which Mr. Higginson cannot understand, although the reference to the Pope (July eclogue) is certainly foreshadowed. Mr. Greenlaw notes "a garrulous dwelling on minor points of pedantry where the allegory is a trifle sharp."

<sup>28</sup> Ronsard's Amours, with notes and glossary by A. Muret is a favorite citation of editors (Renwick, Fletcher, etc.); the glossing of Virgil's Eclogue is another.

<sup>29</sup> G. L. Craik, Spenser and His Poetry (London, 1845), has this comment on the idea that E.K. was identical with Spenser: "It does not seem to us impossible, or very improbable. Such a device, by which the poet might communicate to the public many things requisite for the full understanding of his poetry, which he could not have openly stated in his own name, and at the same time leave whatever else he chose vague and uncertain, or at least indistinctly declared, had manifest conveniences."<sup>2</sup>

We have considered the reasons for anonymity, and the structure of the poem through which this anonymity expressed itself. If there is to be mystification, it must be maintained; and I think that Spenser has done this. He liked to speak of himself in the third person, as we shall note again later on; and it was with relish that he adopted the rôles of Colin Clout, Immerito, and E.K. The introductory letter, signed E.K., is an excellent piece of impersonation. It is a fine touch to make E.K. say, "I was made privie to his [the author's] counsell and secret meaning." Since it was incumbent upon the writer of an introductory letter to praise an author, Spenser, in the rôle of E.K., does not hesitate to say that the author of the Shepherd's Calendar, when known, will be beloved and wondered at,

<sup>30</sup> Notes and Queries, 5th ser., vi (1876), 365. Some one signing himself Beta, has suggested: "... E.K., intended, not improbably for the poet himself, the initials signifying here Edmund the Kalenderer."—Cf. Sommer, Introduction to Shepherd's Calendar, Facsimile ed. p. 17.

<sup>31</sup> Kalendrier des Bergiers was the title of the old work to which Spenser refers in the Epistle in applying "an olde name to a new worke." Probably he knew it best in translation under the title of The Shepherd's Calendar, mentioned in Harvey's Marginalia (ed. Moore-Smith, p. 163) as being among the "A.B.C. of our vulgar Astrologers."

<sup>32</sup> Craik (op. cit.) says: "No one would know so well as himself in all cases what to disclose and what to withhold, and he would perhaps be more likely therefore to perform the office himself."

<sup>33</sup> Cf. Old Ballads, ed. J. P. Collier, Percy Society; England's Helicon, etc.

for no lesse, I think, deserveth his wittinesse in devising, his pithinesse in uttering, his complaints of love so lovely, his discourses of pleasure so pleasantly, his pastorall rudeness, his morall wisenesse, etc.

All of this is in the spirit of the requirements; and Spenser, behind his mask, enters into the work as he thinks it should be done. This is not self-laudation in the ordinary acceptation of the term; yet as a means of recognizing him in his disguise we cannot help noting how closely the phraseology chimes with what he says about himself in his letters. It is true that Spenser has a sense of the high calling of the poet,<sup>34</sup> and of his own vocation to be a poet; but he has inward fears, and modesty, which he presents by saying:

As for Colin, under whose person the Author selfe is shadowed, how furre he is from such vaunted titles and glorious showes, bothe himself sheweth, where he sayth, of Muses Hobbin, I conne no skill and

Enough is me to paint out my unrest.

It is significant that the author of the Epistle could quote so aptly from the poem (vi, 65, 79).

Another charge which Dr. Herford brings is that the gloss speaks slightly of Marot in a way which Spenser, the confessed imitator of Marot, could not have done. Dr. Herford cites the January gloss:

The word Colin is Frenche, and used of the French poete Marot (if he be worthy of the name of a Poete).

He also cites the November argument in which this appears:

This Æglogue is made in imitation of Marot his song, which he made upon the death of Loys the frenche Queene. But farre passing his reache, and in myne opinion all other the Eglogues of this booke.

Dr. Herford censures this as "insolent disparagement of the gifted French poet. This is pardonable enough in a loyal friend [supposed to be writing the gloss]; but if E.K. be Spenser himself it would imply a baseness of which he cannot for a moment be suspected." I believe that Dr. Herford is far too severe. The dispraise of Marot could easily be part of the disguise for the rôle of gloss writer; moreover, it would have been no crime if Spenser's opinion of Marot's poetry had varied from one time to another; a poet is not a person of one mood, nor of one point of view. But we have, in addition to these surmises to justify Spenser in his parenthesis, literary history, to tell us that Marot had brought upon himself a great deal of odium for the part he played in the Marotique and Sagontique quarrel;<sup>35</sup> and there were consequently, especially among the Protestants, people who would not be willing to grant Marot a worthy place anywhere, certainly not among the poets. As to the November Argument, Dr. Herford's comment that the comparison between Marot's poetry and Spenser's is "unjust as well as unbecoming" bears too heavily, I think, upon a very innocent little signal given to the reader to note particularly the ensuing eclogue.

<sup>34</sup> Again and again in his poetry he says that in poetry is the only true immortality.

Again, Dr. Herford says that "E.K. displays literary tastes differing from Spenser's"; and he cites E.K.'s expressed distaste for alliteration as against Spenser's constant use of it. Whatever may be the idea expressed in the cited passages, they bear, as we shall see, the mark of the confirmed alliterator, and therefore show Spenser's hand in framing them. In the first passage, "the rakehelly rout of our ragged rymers (for so themselves use to hunt the letter)" the stress is not upon alliteration but upon the fact that they "without learning boste, without judgment jangle, without reason rage and fome"; in contradistinction to this, the Epistle points out that in this author the sentences are "well grounded, finely framed, and strongly trussed up together." Spenser had some learning, and was not ashamed of his endowments; it would seem that he might be forgiven for showing contempt for those who "being in the midst of all theyr bravery, sodenly eyther for want of matter, or of ryme, or having forgotten theyr former conceipt, they seeme to be so pained and travailed in theyr remembrance, etc."<sup>36</sup> In the October gloss it was the hand of one who found alliteration as easy as breathing that wrote "I think this playing with the letter to be rather a fault than a figure"; Dr. Herford admits that this is a "mild cavil"; but mild or not, it seems quite in the Spenserian manner to put in this note for the purpose of using the learned word cacozelon, which means fault (i.e. faulty imitation).<sup>37</sup>

Mr. Higginson adopts the foregoing citations made by Dr. Herford, and adds as an item that whereas Spenser used several words of foreign origin in his Calender, the writer of the Epistle was opposed to borrowing from foreign languages, "making our English tongue a gallimaufrey, or hodgepodge of al other speches." A careful reading of the Epistle convinces me that in it the writer was not inveighing so much against the use of words of foreign derivation, as against those people who show contempt of good native words; just as today there are objections made against those who lard their conversation with French phrases, or who express themselves wholly in slang, disdaining the slight labor of finding an English equivalent. There is, therefore, no inconsistency between Spenser's practice and the expressed opinions of the Epistle.

<sup>35</sup> Cf. Saintsbury's article on Marot in Encyc. Brit.—Spenser may be deferring to Du Bellay's censorious opinion expressed in his Deffence et Illustration de la Langue Francoyse.

<sup>36</sup> Sir Philip Sidney mentions Spenser in his Defense of Poesy, but says that there were few at that time who had "poetical sinews" in them. Cf. ed. Cooke, p. 47.

<sup>37</sup> The note in full reads: "For lofty love) I think this playing with the letter to be rather a fault than a figure, aswel in our English tongue, as it hath bene alwayes in the Latine, called Cacozelon."—It is rather Spenserian that the Latin form should not be given quite correctly.

Another charge which Dr. Herford brings is that E.K. is a false guide, and therefore not Spenser, in the matter of sources for borrowings and imitations. Dr. Herford says:

Aware that the names "Thenot and Colin" are borrowed from his "January," glosse, and that the "November" is founded upon an Eclogue of his, he (E.K.) gives no hint that the "December" is a direct imitation of another. This omission may indeed be due as well to envy as to ignorance.

If Dr. Herford allows himself to impute envy and to touch on probabilities, we may perhaps be allowed the same latitude. In the place of envy on the part of the gloss writer, I should insert vanity on the part of the author. Perhaps there was a literary vanity at that time which countenanced misleading citations. Dr. W. P. Mustard says as much in his edition of Mantuanus:<sup>38</sup>

E.K.'s comment on Spenser's poem states that "this [October] Æglogue is made in imitation of Theocritus his xvi Idilion," adding—what most of his readers were likely to know—"and the lyke also is in Mantuane." But this comment is misleading, and must have been intended to be misleading. Spenser's indebtedness to Theocritus is exceedingly slight; but it would doubtless be more impressive to refer one of his poems to a great Greek model than to the "homely Carmelite" whose Eclogues were a familiar text-book in almost every school.

Or, if not vanity, perhaps it was considered clever, a sort of literary hide-and-seek, to indicate sources in a somewhat oblique way. The Epistle hints at such a thing when it says: "Yet so as few, but they be wel sented can trace him out." Texts were few and hard to obtain to verify a reference; it was necessary to trust to memory. Professor A. S. Cook says of Sidney<sup>39</sup> (and the same could apply to Spenser) that he was not "singular among the Elizabethans" for the inaccuracy of his quotations. The conclusion is that the many vague and misleading citations of sources over which Professor Renwick has spent much time in his edition do not furnish an argument for the existence of an alien gloss writer.

<sup>38</sup> Eclogues of Baptista Mantuanus, ed. by W. P. Mustard (Baltimore, 1911), pp. 134-135.

<sup>39</sup> Sidney, Defense of Poesy, ed. Cook, p. xix.

We shall now take up that part of the Harvey-Spenser correspondence which bears upon E.K. Those who advocate a personality for E.K. apart from Spenser find herein, they think, their strongest argument. I wish to show that the evidence points the other way. Dr. Herford says, "Spenser's correspondence with Harvey repeatedly refers to E.K." I consider this statement misleading, to say the least; for with us, repeatedly certainly means more than twice—the actual number of times that Spenser refers to E.K.

The above-mentioned Epistle, or Introductory letter to the Shepherd's Calendar, is dated "10. of Aprill, 1579." The first letters that we have from Harvey and Spenser were exchanged in October, 1579. Ample time had elapsed for Harvey to have seen the E.K. letter, and to be familiar with that pseudonym, as also with Immerito. Harvey's letter, dated "23. Octob. 1579," is addressed "To my verie Friende, M. Immerito," and begins thus:

Liberalissimo Signor Immerito, in good soothe my poore storehouse will presently affourd me nothing, either to recompence, or to countervaille your gentle Masterships, long large, lavish, Luxurious, Laxative Letters withall, (nowe a Gods name, when did I ever in my life, hunt the Letter before? but belike, theres no remedie, I must needes be even with you once in my dayes). . . .

Harvey makes use of Immerito; so that we know that he is in the secret of the Shepherd's Calendar. He also uses the expression, "hunt the letter," which occurs in the letter intended to introduce the Shepherd's Calendar, written the previous April as noted above. This letter of Harvey's, dated 23. Octob., is in answer to a packet received from Spenser, containing three letters. The first contains a Latin poem, addressed

Ad ornatissimum virum . . . G.H. Immerito sui, mox in Gallias navigaturi. . . .

This poem, written by Spenser on the eve, as it were, of his setting off on a commission under Leicester, is full of praise of Harvey. Toward the close, he says:<sup>40</sup>

An Angel even Gabriel (although surrounded by innumerable friends and attended by a choir of deities) may often look for one absent, Immerito, and he will wish, O that my Edmundus were here, he who wrote new things and who did not keep silent about his loves.

Angelus et Gabriel (quamvis comitatus amicis Innumeris, geniũmque choro stipatus amaeno)
Immerito tamen unum absentem saepe requirit,
Optabitque, Utinam meus hic Edmundus adesset,
Quĩ nova scripsisset, nec Amores conticuisset
Ipse suos . . . .

Spenser dates this letter 5. of October, 1579, and closes it by saying:

So once againe, and yet once more, Farewell most hartily, mine owne good Master H. and love me, as I love you, and thinke upon poore Immerito, as he thinketh uppon you. . . . Per mare, per terras, Vivus, mortuusque, Tuus Immerito.

I have quoted from this letter to show what Spenser could do when writing to a "warm friend";<sup>41</sup> also to show that he was fond of speaking of himself in the third person and under a pseudonym. It is here that he speaks of himself as Edmundus. It is also in this letter that he says that his letters may be sent by Mistress Kerke, "and by none other." However, his faith in Mistress Kerke may have been somewhat dashed, for when he came to Mistress Kerke's on October 16, he found that the Latin letter was still lying there, not having been sent to Harvey. On the previous evening (October 15) he had written again to Harvey, on the subject of dedicating books and on other matters, including affirmations of respect, admiration, and love for Harvey. At the close he becomes intimate and affectionate as usual, saying:

Maister E.K. hartily desireth to be commended unto your Worshippe; of whome, what accompte he maketh, youre selfe shall hereafter perceive by hys paynefull and dutifull verses of your selfe.

He breaks off at this point, leaving the letter open until he arrives at Mistress Kerke's the next morning, the sixteenth. Can we help thinking that he is referring to the long, laborious Latin poem which he had written ten days previously, and from which I have quoted above? Can we help coming to the further conclusion that Immerito, Edmundus, and E.K., being spoken of in the same vein, are one and the same?

On the morning of the sixteenth Spenser arrives at Mistress Kerke's to deliver his letter to the carrier. He finds there a letter from Harvey, sent the previous week; but he also finds that his own letter (of Oct. 5) had not been sent to Harvey. So, in addition to what he has already written on the morning of the sixteenth, he adds in a postscript

My last farewell<sup>42</sup> whereof I made great accompt, and much marvelled you shoulde make no mention thereof, I am now tolde, (in the Divels name) was thorough one mans negligence quite forgotten, but shoulde nowe undoubtedly have beene sent, whether I hadde come, or no. Seeing it can now be no otherwise, <sup>41</sup> Spenser was devoted to those to whom he gave his heart, among others to Philip Sidney and Lord Grey de Wilton, as evidenced in the Faerie Queene.

<sup>42</sup> That is, the letter of Oct. 5 containing the Latin poem.—Harvey acknowledged this poem in his letter of 23 Oct. 1579: "You're Latine Farewell is a goodly brave yonkerly peece of work, and Goddilige yee, I am alwayes marvellously beholding unto you, for your bountifull titles."

I pray you take all together, with all their faultes. . . . But I would rather I might yet see youre owne good selfe, and receive a Reciprocall farewell from your owne sweete mouth.

The three letters were then dispatched together.

The Shepherd's Calendar was "entered" for publication in December, 1579. A letter following that date interests us, because, being written by Spenser in April, 1580, there occurs in it the second, and only other, mention of E.K. In a postscript to that letter he says:

I take best my Dreams shoulde come forth alone, being growen by meanes of the Glosse (running continually in manner of a Paraphrase) full as great as my Calendar. Therein be some things excellently, and many things wittily discoursed of E.K.

I take this to mean that Spenser intended to use again the pseudonym E.K. No one can paraphrase a work so well as the author himself; nor can any one comment thereupon as wittily (in Elizabethan English, intelligently, or discreetly) as can the author, whether he signs his own name, or some fictitious initials. This is the last that we hear from Spenser of E.K.

Dr. Herford sought to clinch his argument that E.K. was not Spenser by citing the mention of E.K. in Spenser's letters; but it has been the purpose of this paper to show that the sequence of letters and Spenser's temperament and attitude toward his friends prove beyond reasonable doubt that Spenser was referring to himself. The publishing in 1580 of the part of the Harvey-Spenser correspondence from which I have quoted could not have been fortuitous. Perhaps it was intended to make as clear to Spenser's contemporaries, as it does to some of us of the present day, just who Immerito and E.K. were. Certainly no one of that day has left any record of wonderment about E.K. My theory is that they knew that E.K. was merely another version of Immerito.

There have been commentators who have increased my faith in this interpretation. Craik (1845) points the way to the identification of E.K.'s dutiful verses as the long Latin poem by Spenser.<sup>43</sup> Uhlemann (1888),<sup>44</sup> followed by Sommer (1889),<sup>45</sup> has taken up the matter in some detail, as Herford has done, but with a different conclusion from Herford. Uhlemann and Sommer bring forward Spenser's knowledge of Plato, which E.K. reflects so clearly; they excuse the untrustworthiness of the indication of sources on the ground of Spenser's having probably done it from memory; and they identify the treatise on poetry, mentioned by E.K., as Spenser's English Poet, which apparently never left the author's hands. Their best argument, however, is the citation of the couplet:<sup>46</sup>

<sup>43</sup> Craik, Spenser and His Poetry.

<sup>44</sup> Uhlemann, "Der Verfasser des Kommentars zu Spenser's Shepherdes Calendar," Jahresbericht, No. xiii, des Königl. Kaiser Wilhelms Gymnasiums zu Hannover (1888), Progr. No. 292.

<sup>45</sup> Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, Facsimile ed. by Sommer.

All that I eate did I joy, and all that I greedily gorged
As for those many goodly matters left I for others.

Spenser translated this from the Latin, once, when he spent the night with Harvey, and he mentions it in one of his letters. E.K. uses it in the gloss to the May eclogue to explain a source for certain lines. It seems to me that no one can read the correspondence of these two bookish young men, Harvey and Spenser, boon-companions of the spirit, and still think that there was a third person of flesh and blood picking up the crumbs from their intellectual feasts, aware of their secrets, and yet not sharing their intimacy.<sup>47</sup>

Spenser, in the gloss, has not hesitated to throw dust into the eyes of the reader; and so well has he succeeded that Professor Renwick<sup>48</sup> says that "after working through the poems and the glosses one feels the contact of a different, a less flexible mind."<sup>48</sup> For my own part, the gloss seems the product of a very supple mind, and all of one fabric with the poem. It forms a philosophical, polemical, shrewd, whimsical, and altogether delightful accompaniment to the eclogues, a most skilful "undersong" such as Willye sings to Perigot in the August eclogue. I have shown, I think, that when one tries to understand what Spenser meant, the gloss is seen to be a clear projection of his own mind; and philologists can find therein a picture of the development and use of the English language unsullied by the "mistakes" of a supposititious annotator. More than that, if we admit that it is Spenser writing throughout, the literary criticism of the Epistle can be accepted as coming from the hand of a master.

AGNES D. KUERSTEINER

Indiana University

<sup>46</sup> May Eclogue, gloss.

<sup>47</sup> It is rather more interesting to think that it was Spenser who had the copy of Sir Thomas Smith's book of government, "a perfect copie in wryting, lent me by his kinsman, and my verye singular good freend, M. Gabriel Harvey" (Jan. gloss) than to think of its being in the possession of a young clergyman who sank at once into obscurity.

<sup>48</sup> Ed. Renwick, p. 163 f.—I believe, however, that Professor Renwick is open to conviction on this point, for he says, "Certainly there is little inherent absurdity in the notion" (i.e., that Spenser is E.K.). Professor Renwick also says the fear of envy "even passes through to E.K." when he writes in the Epistle "Yf Envie shall stur up any wrongful accusation, etc." I think it much more logical to think that Spenser is himself expressing the fear of envy which seemed to be with him all his life. Cf. F.Q. vi, 12. 40-41; Amoretti, LXXXVI, 1.

XI

MILTON'S DEBT TO WOLLEB'S COMPENDIUM THEOLOGIAE CHRISTIANAE

IN seeking for sources of Milton's theology, scholars have gone far afield. While they have argued for Milton's dependence on Ochino, Boehme, Servetus, and even the occult Cabbalists—with little or no external evidence and only vague and general parallelism to corroborate Milton's knowledge and use of these writers—they have disregarded certain systematic theologies, which Milton knew, and which have the same general plan and purpose as the De doctrina Christiana. With one of these treatises, the present investigation is concerned:<sup>1</sup> it will seek to determine the relationship of the De doctrina to Wolleb's Compendium Theologiae Christianae with the view of contributing something to an evaluation of Milton's originality as a theologian, and to a knowledge of his habits of borrowing and of the manner in which he worked.

To this problem, scholars have given scant attention. In a footnote to his translation, Sumner<sup>2</sup> observed that the De doctrina, like the Compendium, was divided into two books, that the plans of Book II were similar, and that the two works contained arguments and even sentences that were almost identical. Some thirty years later, Barber<sup>3</sup> compared Sumner's translation with the Compendium, contributed little that was new, and concluded that Sumner had not stated the similarities too strongly. Since Barber's time, no student of Milton seems to have sought to ascertain more accurately the extent of Milton's indebtedness or the significance of his borrowings.

Published in 1626, the Compendium Theologiae Christianae was the work of John Wolleb, preacher and professor of Old Testament theology at Basle.<sup>4</sup> The treatise consists of some three hundred duodecimo pages divided into two books of thirty-six and fourteen chapters respectively.

<sup>1</sup> This study grows out of a suggestion of Professor Hanford in A Milton Handbook (New York, 1933), p. 211, and is the first of a series of papers dealing with Milton's indebtedness to the sixteenth and seventeenth century systematic theologies.

<sup>2</sup> A Treatise on Christian Doctrine (Cambridge University Press, 1825), p. 602 n.

<sup>3</sup> Bibliotheca Sacra, xvi (1859), 596-599. Lacking Sumner's Latin edition of the De doctrina, Barber was unable to pursue his comparison to any great extent.

<sup>4</sup> In this study, I have used the earliest edition available: Compendium Theologiae Christianae . . . autore Johanne Wollebio (Cantabrigiae, 1642). For biographical and critical data, see H. J. Leu, Allgemeines Helvetisches Eydgenössisches, oder Schweitzerisches Lexicon (Zurich, 1764), xix, 572-574; W. Gass, Geschichte der Protestantischen Dogmatik (Berlin, 1854), I, 397; K. R. Hagenbach, Die Theologische Schule Basels und ihre Lehrer (Basel, 1860), pp. 23-24; J. H. A. Ebrard, Christliche Dogmatik (Königsberg, 1862), I, 67-68. Leu contains some inaccuracies; and Ebrard, it would seem, overstates Wolleb's importance.

Each chapter contains an introductory statement of the relationship of that chapter to the system as a whole, definitions, and sets of rules (canones), in which the author dissects his topic into its causes, parts, modes, objects, etc. To these, he adds other comments and examples, which are often supported by Biblical citation or quotation. Scholastic in its dogmatism, and anti-Catholic in its bias, the treatise reveals that its author sometimes lacked a sense of the essential and buried the significant under a mass of academic detail; but in spite of this pedantry and the strained coherence of the canones, the seventeenth-century divines found in the Compendium a unity, a conciseness, and a clarity of arrangement that made the book extremely popular. Before 1660, it went through at least eight editions and was translated into Dutch, Hungarian, and English. At the Reformed universities, it became the basis of lectures on dogmatics and ethics. In turning to this treatise, therefore, Milton was utilizing what many considered the best systematic theology of the day.

External evidence for Milton's knowledge of the Compendium exists in the testimony of Edward Phillips.<sup>5</sup> Concerning the work done by Milton's students during the period of 1639-47, the poet's nephew wrote:

The next work after this, was the writing from his own dictation, some part, from time to time, of a tractate which he thought fit to collect from the ablest of divines who had written of that subject; Amesius, Wollebius, &c. viz. A Perfect System of Divinity, of which more hereafter.

This statement lacks the corroboration of other contemporary biographers; and Milton, in the De doctrina, failed to mention the Compendium; but a comparison of the two treatises affords ample internal evidence that verifies Phillips's assertion.

To the Compendium, the demonstrable debt of Book I of the De doctrina is not great. Both treatises, it is true, consist of two books: "Of the Knowledge of God" and "Of the Worship of God." The works have, in five instances, identical chapter headings;<sup>6</sup> and throughout the two treatises occur numerous similarities. Each work, for instance, has utilized the same bases of division in discussing the names of God,<sup>7</sup> decrees,<sup>8</sup> and the incarnation,<sup>9</sup> the mediatorial office,<sup>10</sup> and the exaltation<sup>11</sup> of Christ. Similarities exist in the analyses of the fall,<sup>12</sup> in the arguments that the Messiah has already come,<sup>13</sup> and in the remarks on the singular

<sup>5</sup> William Godwin, Lives of Edward and John Phillips (London, 1815), p. 363-364.

<sup>6</sup> See Dd. iv, Comp. iv: "De Prædestinatione"; Dd. vii, Comp. v: "De Creatione"; Dd. xii, Comp. xii: "De Poena Peccati"; Dd. xx, Comp. xxix: "De Fide Salvifica"; Dd. xxii, Comp. xxx: "De Justificatione." <sup>7</sup> Dd. 14; Comp. 9. <sup>8</sup> Dd. 22; Comp. 21.

<sup>9</sup> Dd. 212; Comp. 76.

<sup>10</sup> Dd. 216; Comp. 87.

<sup>11</sup> Dd. 224; Comp. 104.

<sup>12</sup> Dd. 180-181; Comp. 47.

<sup>13</sup> Dd. 213; Comp. 82.

meaning of מַלְאָכִים,<sup>14</sup> and on the despair of the evil angels.<sup>15</sup> The influence of Wolleb, however, may be logically questioned. The bi-partite division of systematic theologies was not unusual,<sup>16</sup> the chapter headings consist of common terms; the bases of division are conventional; and the discussions concern matters which were commonplace to Renaissance theologians.<sup>17</sup> Such objections, however, seem hardly valid in the case of the following remarks on Scripture and on the second advent of Christ:

De doctrina, pp. 346-347

Sensus cujusque scripturæ unicus est; in veteri tamen testamento sæpe est compositus ex historia et typo: exempli gratia in his Hoseæ verbis, cap. xi. 1. cum Matt. ii. 15. ex Ægypto vocavi filium meum: ubi et de populo Israelitico et de Christo puero sensus duplex constare potest.

Compendium, p. 8

Sensus cujusque Scripturæ non nisi unicus est: in Veteris tamen Testamenti Vaticiniis sæpe est compositus ex historia & typo.

Exempli gratia, Hoseæ cap. 11. v. 1. in his verbis, Quia puer est Israel quem diligo, ideo ex Ægypto vocavi filium meum, sensus est compositus; literaliter enim ac historice de liberatione populi Israelitici ex Ægypto; typice vero seu mystice de vocatione Christi ex Ægypto sunt intelligenda. Matthæi 2. 15.

Ratio recte interpretandi scripturas utilius quidem a theologis traditur, quam diligentius aut fidelius observatur; linguarum peritia; fontium inspectio; scopi animadversio; locutionis propriæ et figuratæ distinctio; causarum, circumstantiarum, antecedentium, consequentium consideratio; locorum cum aliis locis comparatio; fidei quoque analogia ubique spectanda est; syntaxeos denique haud raro anomalia non omittenda . . .

Media verum Scripturæ sensum investigandi sunt, frequens oratio; linguarum cognitio; fontium inspectio; argumenti & scopi consideratio; verborum propriorum & figuratorum distinctio; causarum, circumstantiarum, antecedentium & consequentium notatio ac Logica analysis, obscuriorum cum illustrioribus, similium cum similibus, dissimilium cum dissimilibus comparatio; fidei denique analogia.

<sup>14</sup> Dd. 18; Comp. 10.

<sup>15</sup> Dd. 158; Comp. 41.

<sup>16</sup> Thus Ames and Polanus, both quoted by Milton in the De doctrina. See Gass, op. cit., I, 397.

<sup>17</sup> See, for instance, William Ames, The Marrow of Sacred Divinity (London, 1642), pp. 74, 92; James Usher, A Body of Divinity (London, 1702), pp. 119-120; Franciscus Gomarus, Locorum Communium Theologicorum Epitome (Amsterdam, 1643), pp. 29, 53; Zacharias Ursinus, Corpus Doctrinæ Christianæ (Geneva, 1623), pp. 41-42; John Calvin, Institutes, II, I, xv, xvi.

De doctrina, pp. 373–374

Diem et horam adventus Christi solus Pater novit . . . Signa tamen quædam a Christo et apostolis sunt tradita, quæ de adventu ejus nos admoneant. . . . Signa autem illa communia sunt vel propria. . . . Communia sunt, quæ excidium Hierosolymitanum veluti typum adventus sui et adventum ipsum communiter prænuntiant: cujusmodi sunt pseudoprophetæ, pseudochristi, bella, terræ motus, persecutiones, pestis, fames, fidei et charitatis imminutio ad hunc usque diem. . . . Propria sunt, securitas atque impietas extrema, et universa propre defectio. . . . Secundo, antichristi revelatio, et per spiritum oris Christi abolitio.

Compendium, p. 189

Etsi tempus adventus Christi exquisite, quoad diem & horam nemo norit (a): signa tamen a Christo & Apostolis tradita sunt, diem ejus appropinquantem aut instantem indigentia (b) . . . Signa illa communia sunt, aut propria. Communia sunt, quæ excidium Hierosolymitanum & extremum Christi Adventum communiter significare debuerunt. . . . Nempe, Pseudo-Prophetæ, Pseudo-Christi, bella, pestilentiæ, fames, terræ-motus, persecutiones Christi caussa, prodictiones, fidei & charitatis defectus, &c. Propria sunt, extrema securitas & impietas, (a) Antichristi revelatio & per Spiritum oris Christi abolitio. . . .

These thirteen similarities may all represent direct influence; but since eleven are theological commonplaces and lack conclusive verbal parallelism, the case for the influence of the Compendium on Book I of the De doctrina must rest ultimately on the two passages quoted in full above.

Book II, however, presents considerable evidence of debt. This fact, the chapter headings fail to indicate, for Milton and Wolleb differed on a basic matter of Christian ethics. A staunch Calvinist, Wolleb believed that the Mosaic law was still binding on Christians, and organized and named his chapters on the basis of the relationship of the Christian virtues to the individual commandments. Milton, however, was a conservative antinomian, held that the decalogue had been abrogated by the promulgation of the Gospel, and rejected consequently such a classification. A careful comparison of the two treatises, however, would seem to indicate that this difference of opinion troubled Milton little: he omitted the references to the decalogue, added the argument that the form of good works was faith rather than congruency with the decalogue, and utilized the Compendium as he saw fit. In both the De doctrina and the Compendium, Book II consists of two parts: the duties of man to God, and the duties of man to man. In the first part of both treatises, chapters i–iii have similar organizations: the general virtues are identical, and most of the special external virtues and their opposing vices are the same. In chapters iv–vi, however, the differences are more numerous: chief of these are the absence in the De doctrina of certain academic distinctions present in the Compendium, the discussion of idololatria and invocatio sanctorum as opposites of invocatio rather than ritus, and of jusjurandum and sors as species of invocatio rather than of sanctificatio ejus nominis. In both works, however, the virtues and vices are in general the same, and considerable verbal parallelism<sup>18</sup> attests Milton's debt to Wolleb. Chapter vii of the De doctrina, a discussion of the circumstances of worship, owes little or nothing to the corresponding portion of the Compendium, chapter vii. In the second part of Book II, Milton's organization is so different, that only a general idea of the similarities may be given. In varying degrees, De doctrina viii is similar to Compendium viii and xiv;<sup>19</sup> De doctrina ix to Compendium xi-xii;<sup>20</sup> De doctrina x to Compendium iv;<sup>21</sup> De doctrina xi to Compendium viii;<sup>22</sup> De doctrina xii to Compendium x;<sup>23</sup> De doctrina xiii to Compendium xiii;<sup>24</sup> and De doctrina xiv to Compendium xii.<sup>25</sup> De doctrina xv-xvii, if dependent at all, are expansions of certain statements in Compendium ix, x, xii.<sup>26</sup> This similarity of structure and statement, present in practically every chapter of the two works, would seem to indicate that the basic source of Book II of the De doctrina was the corresponding section of Wolleb's Compendium Theologiae Christianae, and that at some time during the period that Milton was writing this portion of his treatise, he had the Compendium before him, and borrowed, reorganized, added, and omitted as it suited his purpose and beliefs.

Comparison of sentences and paragraphs reveals that Milton, in taking over Wolleb, often made only minor changes in words or word order.

De doctrina , p. 462	Compendium , p. 260
Sobrietas est temperantia ab immodico cibo et potu.	Sobrietas est temperantia a superfluo cibo & potu.
De doctrina , p. 477	Compendium , p. 245
Charitas erga proximum est qua eum diligimus ut nosmetipsos.	Charitas erga proximum est, qua proximum ut nos ipsos diligimus.

<sup>18</sup> See, for instance, Dd. 387-388, Comp. 203; Dd. 398, Comp. 208; Dd. 401-403, Comp. 210; Dd. 404, Comp. 210-211; Dd. 407-410, Comp. 213-215; Dd. 413, Comp. 216; Dd. 423-425, Comp. 222; Dd. 432-433, Comp. 236-238; Dd. 440, Comp. 232; Dd. 443-444, Comp. 239.

<sup>19</sup> See Dd. 457-458, Comp. 244-245, 251.

<sup>20</sup> See Dd. 462, 465, 467-468, Comp. 261-262, 274-275.

<sup>21</sup> See Dd. 476, Comp. 215.

<sup>22</sup> See Dd. 477-479, 481, Comp. 245-249.

<sup>23</sup> Here, there seems only a slight similarity of plan.

<sup>24</sup> Dd. 493-494, 501, Comp. 277-280. Here Milton's treatment of the Compendium is midway between the two extremes. He adds two virtues (simplicitas and admonitio), attaches to fidelitas the meaning given by Wolleb to taciturnitas, gives another a new name (libertas loquendi for parrhesia), adds, omits, and shifts opposites from one virtue to another. Only the connection of these virtues to the treatise as a whole, their order, their general similarity, and some verbal parallelism remains to show the debt.

<sup>25</sup> Dd. 507-508; Comp. 272-274.

<sup>26</sup> Compendium, pp. 252, 258, 274.

De doctrina, pp. 402–403

Huic [constantia] opponitur inconstantia. . . . Et pertinacia in errore seu proposito malo.

Often, by compression, Milton attains a conciseness superior to that of Wolleb.

De doctrina, p. 413

Appellatur [vera religio] in scripturis λατρεύειν, Matt. iv. 10. et δουλεύειν, cap. vi. 24. Gal. iv. 8. Errant igitur pontificii, qui λατρεῖαν [sic] Deo, δούλειαν [sic] sanctis angelis et hominibus tribuunt.

De doctrina, p. 434

Illa [idololatria] est qua idolum cultus religiosi causa vel fabricatur, vel habetur, vel colitur; sive id veri Dei confictum simulachrum sit sive falsi.

Compendium, p. 210

Ei [constantia] opponitur Inconstantia & Pertinacia in errore seu malo proposito.<sup>27</sup>

Compendium, p. 216

Appellatur [vera religio] in Scripturis Δουλεία & Λατρεία. Pontificii Λατρείαν Deo, Δουλείαν sanctis Angelis & hominibus, Ὑπερδουλείαν Mariæ tribuunt. Sed sine Scriptura, imo contra eam. Nam & λατρεύειν, Matth. 4, 1. & δουλεύειν, Matth. 6, 24. soli Deo jubemur.

Compendium, p. 225

Idololatria, est qua idolum fabricatur, retinetur, aut religiose colitur. Idololatriæ duo sunt genera. Prius est, cum pro Deo habetur & colitur, quod verus Deus non est; atq; hæc primo præcepto repugnat. Posterius idololatriæ genus est, cum verus quidem Deus colitur, sed aut in Idolis, aut in sanctis, Angelis & demortuis.<sup>28</sup>

Sometimes, Milton omits theological matters from his definitions, and thus imparts to them a significance broader and more ethical than that of Wolleb.

De doctrina, p. 407

Spes est qua Dei promissiones certo expectamus.

Compendium, p. 212

Spes est, qua futura Dei beneficia, imprimis autem salutis nostræ complementum, Dei promissionibus & Christi merito nixi, indubitato expectamus.

<sup>27</sup> See, for instance, jejunium ecclesiasticum (Dd. 423, Comp. 222); charitas hominis erga seipsum (Dd. 457, Comp. 244); verecundia and honestas (Dd. 465, Comp. 261–262); and castitas (Dd. 464, Comp. 261).

<sup>28</sup> See, for instance, the opening sentences of Book II; prudencia (Dd. 398, Comp. 208); jejunium publicum (Dd. 424, Comp. 222); opposites of charitas erga semetipsum (Dd. 458, Comp. 245); vigilantia (Dd. 463–464, Comp. 261). Occasionally Milton expands for clarity or explicitness. See votum (Dd. 425, Comp. 222); opposites of promptitudo (Dd. 401, Comp. 210).

De doctrina, p. 388

Bona opera sunt quæ agente in nobis Dei Spiritu per veram fidem facimus, ad Dei gloriam, salutis nostræ spem certam, et proximi ædificationem.

Compendium, p. 203

Bona opera sunt, quæ Spiritus sancti gratia ex vera fide & ad Legis præscriptum præstantur, ad Dei gloriam, salutis nostræ certitudinem & proximi ædificationem.<sup>29</sup>

On occasions, Milton borrows arguments from the Compendium. Instances of such dependence may be found in Milton's discussion of usury<sup>30</sup> and in his brief against works of supererogation.<sup>31</sup> Sometimes, Wolleb's remarks serve merely to call up similar statements in the De doctrina: for instance, the discussions of the cherubim, the brazen serpent, and the Catholic assertion that idols are the books of the laity.<sup>32</sup> A statement of Wolleb often serves as a starting point for a discussion or a refutation. Thus, Wolleb's statement that "Prudentia est, in malis culpae nullum, in malis poenae nimiud eligere" gives an excuse for caustic remarks on doctors of theology.<sup>33</sup> Wolleb's assertion that of oaths given to robbers, promising ransom and silence, only the first should be kept leads Milton to offer an extended argument that neither oath is binding.<sup>34</sup> Wolleb's definition of mendacium, Milton quotes and spends a page in pointing out that it is too narrow.<sup>35</sup>

In adapting Wolleb to his needs, Milton has rejected many of the scholastic niceties that characterize the Compendium. Among these are details concerning true religion,<sup>36</sup> the Lord's Prayer,<sup>37</sup> fasting,<sup>38</sup> oaths,<sup>39</sup> and lots.<sup>40</sup> Milton uses none of Wolleb's classical quotations<sup>41</sup> or historical references,<sup>42</sup> and takes over little of his violent anti-Catholicism<sup>43</sup> or his Calvinistic insistence on the depravity of man.<sup>44</sup> Scholastic distinctions and narrow sectarianism would seem to have no important place in Milton's exposition of Christian ethics. Many of his additions have a pronounced utilitarian purpose. He omits definitions and the opposites of the affections, and adds a discussion of the motives that should govern

<sup>29</sup> See the exclusion of references to the decalogue in the reorganization of Book II; patientia (Dd. 475, Comp. 215), benevolentia (Dd. 481, Comp. 247), promptitudo (Dd. 401, Comp. 209); constantia (Dd. 402, Comp. 210).

<sup>30</sup> Dd. 507-508, Comp. 272-273.

<sup>31</sup> Dd. 391-392; Comp. 204-205.

<sup>32</sup> Dd. 436, Comp. 226-228.

<sup>33</sup> Dd. 399; Comp. 208.

<sup>34</sup> Dd. 430; Comp. 236.

<sup>35</sup> Dd. 493-495, Comp. 277. Wolleb, however, points out that his definition has those exceptions that Milton notes. <sup>36</sup> Compendium, pp. 216-217. <sup>37</sup> Ibid., pp. 219-220.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., pp. 221-222.

<sup>39</sup> Ibid., p. 235.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., p. 238.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., pp. 237, 248, 250. Milton, however, of his own accord quotes Homer for an example of verecundia (Dd. 465).

<sup>42</sup> Compendium, pp. 237, 248, 266, 283.

<sup>43</sup> See, for instance, Compendium, pp. 213, 226-229, 234, 237, 261.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., pp. 207, 209, 214, 245.

their exercise.<sup>45</sup> He asserts that our duties to God are sometimes to be postponed when our duties to man are more pressing.<sup>46</sup> He comments on the effect of a good example,<sup>47</sup> discusses practical aspects of prayer,<sup>48</sup> and thanksgiving,<sup>49</sup> neglected by Wolleb, and collects Biblical passages that describe the good and the evil man.<sup>50</sup> Thus Milton borrows, compresses, expands, omits, and adds, and attains in Book II of the De doctrina an economy of expression, a directness of presentation, an emphasis of essentials, and a broad, humanistic appeal too often absent in the corresponding part of the Compendium.

In the composition of the De doctrina, therefore, Wolleb's Compendium seems to have played a considerable part. Milton, however, states that his treatise was compiled from Scripture alone.<sup>51</sup> To this apparent contradiction, an examination of Milton's use of the Bible would seem to offer some solution. For his definitions and canones, Wolleb offers on the whole no great amount of annotation. Milton's documentation, as he himself admits,<sup>52</sup> is, if anything, excessive. Verbal parallelism of introductory remarks and similarity of citation and presentation, however, indicate that in these matters Wolleb exercised some influence on Milton. Compare, for instance, the following discussions of justitia:

De doctrina, p. 508

Justitia in rebus custodiendis est quæ in depositis ac pignoribus repetendis aut restituendis observatur: de qua Exod. xxii. 7. si quis dederit proximo pecuniam aut suppellectilia ad servandum—Sic. v. 10, 11. Ezech. xviii. 7. neminem oppresserit, pignus suum debitori restituerit. Pignus a paupere quatenus accipiendum, videatur Exod. xxii. 26. si pignore ullo acceperis vestem—. Deut. xxiv. 6. ne pignori accipito metam aut catillum—. De pignoribus humane ac modeste accipiendis præcipitur eodem cap. v. 10. ne ingreditor domum eius—.

Compendium, pp. 273–274

Justitia in rebus custodiendis est, quæ in depositis ac pignoribus repetendis aut restituendis æquitas observatur.

Exod. 22, 7. Si quis dederit . . . in rem proximi sui. Similis lex de asino, bove & parva pecude sequitur v. 10, 11. Pignus accipiens videat, ne aut pignus recipiat a paupere, aut pignoris loco id retineat, quo pauper carere nequit. Exod. 22, 26. Si pignore acceperis vestem proximi tui, dum inclinat Sol, restituito illam ei, nam solum operimentum ejus est. Deut. 24, 6. Ne pignore accipito quisquam metam aut catillum: nam is vitam acciperet. & v. 10. Ne ingreditor . . . proferat ad te pignus suum foras: Ezech. 18, 7. Neminemque oppresserit, pignus suum debitori restituerit.<sup>53</sup>

<sup>45</sup> Dd. 458–461; Comp. 285–287.

<sup>46</sup> Dd. p. 455.

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., pp. 390–391.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., pp. 417–420

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., pp. 427–428.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., pp. 393–394.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., p. 3.

<sup>52</sup> Dd., p. 4.

<sup>53</sup> The omissions indicated in the quotation from the Compendium are my own. The passages are too long to quote in full, and they add nothing to the discussion.

That this dependence was neither blind nor uncritical, the following discussion of zelus would seem to indicate.

De doctrina, p. 440

Exempla hujus virtutis sunt in Loto, 2 Pet. ii. 7, 8, in Mose. Exod. xxxii. 19. in Phineas, Num. xxv. 7. in Elia, 1 Reg. xix. 10. in Jeremia, Jer. xxiii. 9, 10, 11. frangitur cor meum in me—, nam adulteris plena est haec terra: in Christo, Matt. xii. 30. Joan. ii. 14, &c. in Stephano, Act. vii. 51 &c. in Paulo et Barnaba, cap. xiv. 14. et xvii. 16, 17.

Compendium, p. 232

Exempla ejus sunt in Lotho, 2. Petri. 2. 8. in Mose, Exod. 32. 19. in Pinehas, Num. 25, 9. in Davide, Psalm. 69 & 119, 53. in Elia, 1 Reg. 19, 10, in Jeremia, Jer. 33. 9, 10, 11. in Johanne Baptista, Matth. 14. 14. in Christo, Johan. 2. 14 &c. in Paulo, Act. 14, 14, & 17. 16, 17.<sup>54</sup>

Here, similarity of expression and order of examples indicate direct dependence. Milton, however, has omitted the examples of David and of John the Baptist, and has added Stephen and Barnabas, who is also included in Acts xiv. To the citation concerning Lot, Milton has added verse seven, which is also applicable. In the case of Jeremiah, Milton has given the correct chapter reference and has added the quotation. This addition, omission, change of citation, and addition of quotation is typical of Milton's treatment of Wolleb,<sup>55</sup> and indicates that Milton checked all borrowings carefully. Differences in the quotation of individual verses, moreover, show that Milton did not copy them from the Compendium but from his own Junius-Tremellius.<sup>56</sup> These facts and the greater number of Biblical quotations found in the De doctrina seem to permit the following conclusions. First, the evidence bears out Milton's statement<sup>57</sup> that in imitation of some of the shorter systems of theology, he was in the habit of listing passages of Scripture under certain heads. Second, it indicates that in these compilations, the Compendium suggested more than merely the topic headings under which the passages were classified; and third, that Milton checked Wolleb carefully with Holy Writ. In the composition of the De doctrina, therefore, Wolleb's Compendium played no small part; but Milton considered its authority secondary, and consequently verified his borrowings. To these, he added other quotations, which he himself collected. In this sense, then, the De

<sup>54</sup> See also the paragraphs in Dd. 478 beginning nec inimici charitate . . ., and in Comp. 245–246 beginning neque haec in parte . . .; invidia (Dd. 481–482, Comp. 247–248), and asseveratio (Dd. 432–433, Comp. 236).

<sup>55</sup> For expansion of citation to quotation, see Dd. 482, Comp. 248: Mark ix, 38; James iii, 16; Luke xiv, 1; Dd. 481, Comp. 247: Luke xv, 10; Prov. vi, 1, xi, 15. For complete quotation of a passage quoted only in part by Wolleb, see Dd. 468, Comp. 275: Luke xii, 15; Jude 16.

<sup>56</sup> See, for instance, Dd. 402, Comp. 210: Luke ix, 62; Dd. 407, Comp. 213: 1 Sam. xxvii, 1; Dd. 409, Comp. 214: Matt. x, 28.

<sup>57</sup> Dd. p. 2.

doctrina may be said to have been compiled from, and to depend, if not always immediately, at least ultimately, on Holy Scripture alone.

If the present study reveals that Milton's theology is less original than many have previously thought, this disappointment would seem in a degree compensated for by the fact that a comparison of the works appears to contribute something to a fuller understanding of the De doctrina and its author. The comparison, in the first place, enables us to assign a terminus a quo for Book II of the De doctrina. In the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce,<sup>58</sup> Milton seems to agree with Wolleb in holding that the Mosaic Law is still binding on Christians. In Book II of the De doctrina, however, Milton denies the bearing of the Decalogue on Christian ethics and rejects Wolleb's classification of the virtues according to their relationship to the individual commandments. Between the composition of these two works, therefore, Milton appears to have experienced a change in belief; and Book II of the De doctrina must consequently be dated after 1644. Through this comparison, moreover, the connection of Milton's theology with the thought of the Protestant reformation becomes even more pronounced. Milton's inclusion of the virtue urbanitas, for example, which Tillyard<sup>59</sup> took to be evidence of a debt to the classics, testifies rather to an obligation to the Compendium.<sup>60</sup> This treatise, likewise, appears to have contributed those views on the Scripture which Fletcher<sup>61</sup> pronounced echoes of Ibn Ezra. The analysis of the fall, if not dependent on Wolleb, at least belongs to an established tradition. The comparison moreover, would seem to throw some light on the manner in which Milton wrote his treatise. The appearance of two close parallels in widely separated portions of Book I of the De doctrina from two equally separated places in the Compendium suggests notes in a commonplace book. The continued similarity of Book II seems to indicate elaborate notes or constant consultation of the Compendium while this portion of the De doctrina was being written. Milton's habits of borrowing revealed by this study, finally, make it probable that we shall find the true sources of much of the De doctrina not in passages embodying general conceptual similarity but rather in those presenting close verbal parallelism.

MAURICE KELLEY

Princeton University

<sup>58</sup> Compare Prose Works (Bohn Edition), III, 253-254 and Dd. p. 303.

<sup>59</sup> E. M. L. Tillyard, Milton (London, 1930), p. 280.—The fact that Ursinus (op. cit., p. 761) included urbanitas in his discussion of Christian ethics, indicates that at least one other theologian considered it a Protestant virtue.

<sup>60</sup> Dd. 501; Comp. 280-281.

<sup>61</sup> H. F. Fletcher, Milton's Rabbinical Readings (Urbana, Ill., 1930), pp. 61-62, and the parallels printed above, p. 158.

XII

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE RHETORIC AND METRE OF THE HEROIC COUPLET, ESPECIALLY IN 1625-1645

THE purpose of this paper is to point out certain elements in the development of the rhetoric of the "classical" pentameter couplet in the middle seventeenth century and to show how the development of this rhetoric is bound up with the establishment of its formal metrical pattern. The rhetoric and metre interacted and helped to shape each other into the integral form which we know in Dryden and Pope. The paper proceeds as follows:

After defining the tendencies of metrical and rhetorical form in the early closed couplet, which derives from the elegiac distich, I shall trace the marked development of this form during the first quarter of the seventeenth century, when the pentameter couplet of some sort won great popularity and became the recognized form for familiar verse such as Donne's letters, and for the steadily increasing output of reflective and occasional verse, critical, complimentary, or topical. Then I shall show in detail how the couplet became almost prescriptively associated with the verse of definition and with occasional verse, and as it became thus established, it gained strength in its distinctive form in the twenty years from 1625 on. In order to show how this final form took shape, I shall analyse the couplet in detail in two separate groups of minor occasional verse; namely, the laudatory poems which accompanied the volumes of George Sandys, 1636-40, and the occasional verse in a minor volume of 1646, the Men-Miracles of Martin Lluelyn, both that written by Lluelyn himself and that written for his volume. The first of these I choose because the work of Sandys himself is important in the history of the couplet, and chiefly because the laudatory verse includes that of Falkland, of whose literary circle at Great Tew Waller was a member; the second, because it is significant to see to what point the couplet had developed in some very minor writers by the time Waller and Denham were reaching maturity. And finally, I shall compare the occasional poems with the verse of Waller and Denham. Thus we can form an idea how far the couplet had taken shape in minor poets, as well as in Waller and Denham, and how far the general effort and the general literary taste helped in the shaping of it.

The closed couplet originated as a naturalization of the Latin elegiac distich, the single largest influence being that of Ovid. Beginning with Nicholas Grimald's contribution to Tottel's Miscellany in 1557,<sup>1</sup> we can trace a continuous direct influence of the distich on the English form; in Grimald in 1557, with translations from Ovid, Martial, and the neo-Latin epigrammatists; in Marlowe's translation of Ovid's Amores, <sup>1</sup> See G.P. Shannon, "Nicholas Grimald's Heroic Couplet and the Latin Elegiac distich," PMLA, xlv (1930). 532-542. My quotations follow the text of Hyder Rollins.

1587-88 (?);<sup>2</sup> in Thomas Heywood's translations of Ovid's Heroides, xvi and xvii, and of The Art of Love, 1596<sup>3</sup>—these all direct translations; and in 1597 in Hall's Virgidemiarium, which owes much to the distich in the Latin satiric epigram,<sup>4</sup> and again in Drayton's Heroicall Epistles, which is modelled on the Heroides of Ovid.<sup>5</sup>

Drayton's work demands special treatment with the coming of the couplet into dominance at the turn of the century. Here we must define what the couplet achieved at its inception among the other men we have listed. They show no coherent advance, but were all aiming at the same effect under the same influence. Perhaps Grimald is the most purposive of them. In sixteen sets of his occasional verse and epigrams, giving a fair body of continuous couplets, 97 per cent of the couplets are end-stopped; the lines have masculine rhymes on strongly accented syllables; and balance and antithesis are frequent.<sup>6</sup> All these qualities are suggested by the originals, but balance and antithesis, both in Grimald and in others, exceed that in their originals.<sup>7</sup> But the balance and contrast are present in Grimald more often in possible idea than in explicit form; and where present in actual syntax, they are primarily the decorative balance and antithesis so almost universally pervasive in Renaissance literature, neo-Latin and vernacular, verse and prose. One or two examples are:

But of the deed, throughout the life, the shame
Endures, defacing you with fowl defame.

Hereto heap vp vndaunted heed, stiff hart,
And all the rest; eche spouse can tell a part.

To rid my wo, and pull these pangs away.

Measure forbids vnmeasurable prayse.

<sup>2</sup> See C. E. Knowlton, "The origin of the Closed Couplet in English," The Nation, xcix (July 30, 1914), 134. Professor H. B. Lathrop, of the University of Wisconsin, has pointed out to me also how closely Marlowe's couplets preserve the couplet units of his original.

<sup>3</sup> See J. S. P. Tatlock, "The Origin of the Closed Couplet in England," The Nation, xcvm (April 9, 1914) 390 and A. M. Clark, "Thomas Heywood's Art of Love Lost and Found," The Library, Fourth Series, III, 210-222 (Transactions of the Bibliographical Society, Second Series, III (1923).

<sup>4</sup> See Knowlton, op. cit.

<sup>5</sup> See Tatlock, op. cit.,—I do not know of any discussion of the elegiac distich as found in the Greek and Latin and neo-Latin epigrams upon the form of the English epigram in pentameter as a whole, and then more particularly in the work of Ben Jonson, and from his time on through the first half of the seventeenth century. But that influence is obviously very great.

<sup>6</sup> For valuable tables and comparisons with other poets, see Shannon's article.

<sup>7</sup> See the articles already cited, especially Shannon's and Tatlock's. Shannon points out, on the distich as a model for the couplet, that half of the hexameters and all the pentameters in the lines from which Grimald translates end in monosyllables or dissyllables, and the pentameter, moreover, gives a strong analogy for the masculine ending.

Yet this balance had certain design to suggest for the future development of the couplet; and we may note several cases where the balance, such as it is, depends on the double adjective:

But pleasant ayr in quiet countrie sought.

. . . . .
Thee, Nero stern, rigor extreem did kill.<sup>8</sup>

The presence of balance and antithesis thus ties up with the significance of the end-stopping and the formation of pattern in the couplet; for in defining the classical couplet we imply by the term not merely that there shall be a distinct pause, but that the two lines shall form an organic and distinct unit of thought. In these early couplets, the sentences are so unfolded as to give a rhetorical separateness to each two-line unit. But as yet these couplets have not consistently anything like the syntactical distinctness, or anything like the terse completed thought that marks the fully developed couplet.

The same thing is true of the metrical form. The basic element of the two-line pattern is made neat by firm rhymes, and there is a tendency to divide the line by medial pause, but no distinctive rhythms or patterns. The structure of the balance is not specifically related to anything in the structure of the line. But the presence of the pause is structurally important for both metre and rhetoric. For the tendency toward such a pause sometimes helps to give form to both elements by relating the rhetoric to an elaboration of the two-line metrical pattern into lines or half-lines. And thus, though there is no principle of pause either rhetorical or metrical, Grimald, for instance, sometimes strikes into so definite a form and rhythm as,

But my good syre gaue, with soft woords, releef:
And clokes, with outward chere, his inward grief:

In the realization of this tendency, the development of the rhetoric and of the metrical form help to further each other; but there is as yet nothing like the completeness of mutual pattern which they finally attained. And the couplet still lacks, except by occasional accident, any distinct organic musical form.

1. THE TURN OF THE CENTURY: THE DEFINITE FORM ESTABLISHED

In the first quarter of the new century the closed couplet in its distinctive rhetoric developed rapidly as a mode of continuous verse and at the same time took on a new type of line movement.<sup>9</sup> This growth is marked by the rise and increase of the explicitly sententious and didactic element in poetry, an increase abundantly shown not only by tables of contents of the old collections of the poets of the period, but by study of the contemporary manuscript collections and commonplace books. In the development of couplet music and elaboration of the rhetoric three men call for consideration—Drayton, Fairfax, and Ben Jonson. Drayton in his England's Heroicall Epistles, 1597, wrote narrative couplets. Fairfax, in his translation of Tasso's Gerusalemme, 1600, wrote narrative in ottava rima; yet through Waller, the movement of his stanzas, in both rhetoric and musical pattern, contributed significantly to the development of the couplet. In both, this development owes much to the prevalence in their narrative of reflective, moralizing, and sententious elements. In Drayton we find, especially in passages where rhetoric and sentiment prevail, an analytical balance and antithesis marked by alliteration, related to the movement of line and half-line, emphasized by balanced musical patterns. In him these developments are sporadic. Fairfax is more sententious than Drayton; and in him such elements are more frequent and hit upon with more steady success. They still do not form, however, the warp and woof of his verse. In the occasional work and epigrams of Ben Jonson, from about 1600 to 1630, with his style definitely formed by 1603, we have a large body of couplets specifically devoted to the purpose of reflective and satiric verse and shaped up by a conscious master. He is by far the most important of the three. In defining his work we shall rely heavily on Professor Felix E. Schelling's article on Ben Jonson and the Classical School.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>8</sup> In both instances the italicized adjectives are in Grimald's originals, as Shannon notes.

<sup>9</sup> The importance of certain men and works has been so widely noted, in general terms,

We take up Drayton first. Professor Schelling in his article on Jonson shows that in many respects, if studied by an analysis according to the standard tests of the proportions of run-on couplets, run-on lines, overflowing lines, and medial cæsura, Drayton in his use of the couplet looks back to the school of Spenser rather than forward to the classical school. This is true particularly in the respect that he does not use the medial cæsura, "although a certain rigidity of manner . . . caused him almost to give up the run-on couplets and lines."<sup>11</sup> But, as we have already seen, a strong conscious impetus to the couplet would be given to Drayton by Ovid, whom he was imitating. We find in him, where sentiment and reflection prevail, a very marked elaboration of rhetoric and metrical pattern as compared with the simple forms of Grimald.

It may be noted as a principle of method in making this examination in the commentaries, that I cite no individual comments unless they have suggested particular points.

---

<sup>10</sup> PMLA, xiii (1898), 221-249.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., p. 237.—The article is full of valuable tables and of essential definitions.

that the study of the proportion of lines with medial cæsura to those without, or the proportion of lines and couplets with parallelism and antithesis to those without, does not tell the whole story. Even though couplets with a striking and characteristic new couplet movement and rhythm do not form the prevailing pattern of Drayton's Heroicall Epistles, the presence in the poem of a good number of such couplets, emerging with a clear emphasis in a general pattern of end-stopped couplets, might serve as a very influential model to later writers. It will be remembered how large a part of the seventeenth and eighteenth century discussion and imitation of Denham's much admired "strong" couplets centres around two couplets. As Professor Schelling's statistics are readily available, I do not here give any proportional figures, but turn to a detailed consideration of some striking lines, using for study "Rosamond to Henry" and "Queen Isabel to Mortimer."

The most important trait of their form is, of course, the development of the thought in couplet sentiments. In this Drayton but takes the basic element of the form already developed. In comparison with Grimald, however, not only does he use a sharp rhetorical pause, but his two-line units coincide with more complete sentiments. In addition to this more incisive syntax, balanced pairs of lines and balanced half-lines are common enough to give color to the whole. The origin of this balance is various. Word-play and conceit upon the pros and cons of an idea or feeling are common devices of Renaissance literature, particularly of the literature that expresses the set and self-conscious analysis of a sentimental situation. They are frequent, to name only one example, in the Rime of Petrarch. And where, as here in Drayton's poem, this word-play and conceit are cast into the couplet mould, it is natural that they should incline to a sharp rhetorical balance expressed in a pattern of line set against line, of half-line set against half-line. Such lines as the following at once strike the eye and mind:

Punish my fault, or pitie mine estate;
Reade it for loue, if not for loue, for hate.<sup>12</sup>

As this pure ground whereon these letters stand
So pure was I ere stained by thy hand.<sup>13</sup>

Lights on the ground, themselues doe lessen farre
But in the ayre, each small sparke seemes a starre<sup>14</sup>

Fatall my birth, vnfortunate my life,
Vnkinde my children, most vnkind my wife.<sup>15</sup>

<sup>12</sup> Michaell Drayton, Esquire, Poems, Printed for the Spenser Society (Manchester, 1888), Part I, p. 170.

<sup>13</sup> Idem.

<sup>14</sup> Idem.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., p. 178.

What doth auaile vs to be Princes heires,
When we can boast, our birth is only theirs?<sup>16</sup>

The letters italicized in these examples show alliteration definitely parallel to the balance and emphasizing it.

Then there is the matter of metrical pattern, perhaps even more important. Strong and great verse, it is recognized, must have not only firm and unmistakable pattern, but rich variation from that pattern, harmoniously subdued, but still so insistent and so organically melodious as to suggest counter-pattern. Professor P. F. Baum states with great clarity this principle.<sup>17</sup> Now if we examine further into the æsthetics of established pattern and variation in verse, we find in large stanzas, in blank verse, or in run-on couplets that, where a number of lines form the unit of perception and give the design, there is room for ample and subtle variation from pattern in the individual line; whereas if the unit of perception be limited to two lines, the pattern, to be firmly kept, must be more sharply and formally perceptible in the two individual lines on which the sense of design depends. This law of the relation of secondary-pattern to basic design is illustrated in the seventeenth-century emphasis on the need for smoothness in the couplet, and in the consequent evening out of the beat of its pentameters. In the second place, the counter-patterns may, in verse of large units such as the long stanza, blank verse, and the run-on couplet, move with a good bit of sweep and may themselves employ large melodic units in their phrasing. Mr. Baum points out the successively varied secondary-patterns of four-beat or other patterns against the five-beat patterns in the lines of Paradise Lost; Mr. Johannes Andersen points out very interestingly that in Paradise Lost, by his use of the cæsure combining with the run-on line, Milton frequently puts a second iambic pentameter pattern across the span of the first.<sup>18</sup> And we may note Chaucer's use of the same device; out of the four run-on lines in the first paragraph of the Prologue, three yield, with the pauses, beautiful pentameter lines.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., p. 204.

<sup>17</sup> Paull Franklin Baum, The Principles of English Versification. (Cambridge, 1924), pp. 18-19.—As Professor Scheilling reminds me, syncopation as used by Mr. Baum is not syncopation in the strict musical sense; and I shall, accordingly, in referring to this aspect of verse use the term counter-pattern or secondary-pattern.

<sup>18</sup> For example:

Wherefore do I assume
These royalties, || and not refuse to reign,
Refusing to accept as great a share
Of hazard as of honour, due alike
To him who reigns, || and so much to him due
Of hazard more, || as he above the rest
High honour'd sits? || Go therefor mighty Powers,

But with the closed couplet, if we are to have vigorous music, these counter-patterns must find new patterns designed within the confines of the couplet pattern itself. Looking in detail at Drayton's verses in the light of this æsthetic principle, we find in many lines and couplets just such metrical patterns emerging. The colorlessness of other couplets reaffirms the need of this secondary design. We shall consider first the general effect of the first two paragraphs (eighteen lines) of "Rosamond to Henry" and the first paragraph (sixteen lines) of "Queen Isabel to Mortimer," and than we shall examine certain outstanding lines and effects throughout these epistles.

- 1 If yet thine eies (great Henry) may endure
- 2 These tainted lines, drawn with a hand impure,
- 3 (Which fain would blush, but feare keeps blushes back,
- 4 And therefore suited in despairing black,
- 5 This in loues name, O that these lips might crave.
- 6 But that Sweete name (vile I) prophaned haue;
- 7 Punish my fault, or pitie mine estate;
- 8 Reade it for loue, if not for loue, for hate.
- 9 If with my shame mine eies thou fain wouldst feed,
- 10 Heere let them surfeit, of my shame to reede.
- 11 This scribled paper which I send to thee,
- 12 If noted rightly, doth resemble mee;
- 13 As this pure ground, whereon these letters stand,
- 14 So pure was I, ere stained by thy hand;
- 15 Ere I was blotted with this foule offence,
- 16 So cleere and spotlesse was my innocence:
- 17 Now like these marks which taint this hatefull scroule,
- 18 Such the blacke sinnes which spot my leprous soule.

- 1 Though such sweet comfort comes not now from her
- 2 As Englands Queene hath sent to Mortimer.
- 3 Yet what that wants, which might my power approue,
- 4 If lines can bring this shall supply with loue.
- 5 Me thinks affliction should not fright me so,
- 6 Nor should resume these sundry shapes of woe;
- 7 But when I faine would finde the cause of this,
- 8 Thy absence shewes me where the error is.
- 9 Oft when I think of thy departing hence,
- 10 Sad sorrow then possesseth eu'ry sence:

---

Terror of Heav'n, || though fall'n; || intend at home,
 While here shall be our home, || what best may ease
 The present misery, || and render Hell
 More Tolerable: || (P.L. 2, 450 et seq.)

- 11 But finding thy deere blood preseru'd thereby,
- 12 And in thy life, my long-wisht liberty,
- 13 With that sweet thought myself I only please
- 14 Amidst my griefe, which sometimes gives me ease;
- 15 Thus doe extreamest ills a ioy possesse,
- 16 And one woe makes another woe seeme lesse.

The variations from the norm of the verse are few, not sufficient to produce counter-patterns or melodic phrases. Most common are trochaic substitution in the first or third foot (first foot, seven times: R. to H., 7, 8, 10, 17, 18; I. to M. 9, 15; third foot three times: R. to H., 2; I. to M., 2, 4.); and the line of four main beats with one light beat on a preposition (which occurs four times in the thirty-four lines: R. to H., 4, 7, 10, 14.). In these cases (all except line 7 in I. to M.) the variation gives a weak pattern rather than a contrasting pattern, for it is musically perfectly casual or accidental and, on the other hand, has no relation to the rhetorical rhythm of the line as distinct from the metrical rhythm. It registers, therefore, simply as a failure to complete the full rhythmic motion. Moreover, it is so infrequent that we can have no sense of contrast arising from the shift of this light or suppressed beat from line to line. Only two lines have two variations: R. to H., 7 and 10, which combine a trochaic substitution with a light beat. The lines are, lastly, very largely monosyllabic and dissyllabic, and there is, accordingly, very little variation by secondary stress.

A few lines call, however, for special comment. In line 6, R. to H., which scans perfectly regularly, the metrical pattern and the rhetorical patter of antithesis in sweet and vile pull so strongly in different ways that they almost cancel each other out.

*   '   *   '   *   '   *   '   *   '
But that sweet name (vile I) prophaned have;

Name and I lose their antithesis, which tries to assert itself in sweet and vile by forcing the words into prominence in the metrical pattern and which thus leaves two weak hovers in succession over sweet name and vile I. Line 7 offers a striking contrast. First, the rhetorical antithesis is strongly stated in verb-object parallels; second, this rhetoric is underscored by a strong caesura and by alliteration; third, the metrical pattern still further marks the rhetoric.

'   *   *   '   '   *   '   *   *   *   '
Punish my fault, or pitie mine estate;

The trochaic substitution in the first place and the suppressed beat in the fourth, combining with the caesura, give a distinct new pattern offering in itself both repetition (in the design of unstressed syllables included within the stressed) and variation (in the number of unstressed syllables). Here is a distinct case in which Drayton designs a counter-pattern within the scope of the main pattern. It is the product not of rhetoric, nor of metre, but of the two working upon each other. The secondary-pattern does not weaken but rather gives strength and firmness to Drayton's usually languid pentameter line. It is first vigorous music and then effective rhetoric.—Lines 17 and 18 again offer something of the same strength derived from the same source.

' * * ' / * ' * ' * '
Now like these marks which taint this hateful scroule,
 ' * \ ' / * ' * ' * '
Such the black sinnes which spot my leproous soule.

In these lines the parallel rhetorical and syntactical elements repeat metrical and rhythmical pattern, and this balance in turn selects certain elements of the metrical pattern for emphasis and thereby gives energy to the music of the line. By contrast lines 15 and 16 in I. to M. show blurred rhetoric and casual metre. Other outstanding passages in the poems deserve comment. In R. to H. lines 25 and 26, we find again rhetorical parallelism with contrast between the two lines sustained by alliteration and by a distinct metrical emphasis on the outstanding elements of the contrast.

' * * ' / * \ * ' * '
Lights on the ground themselves do lessen farre,
 \ * * ' / ' * ' \ ' * '
But in the ayre, each small sparke seemes a starre.

Notable are the trochaic substitution in the key word light and the strengthening of lessen by alliteration in line one; in line two the cluster of beats; and in the two lines together the rhythmic and syntactic parallelism of the second, third, and fourth syllables. A little later in the same poem comes the line:

* ' \ \ * ' * (*) * '
My lookes should be the index to my fault;

Here the suppressed beat makes a single strong phrase of index to my fault, '****', and brings out the rhetorical emphasis of the subject and its complement. In such a line as the trochaic substitution of the first place in the opening phrase is repeated in effect in the second phrase by the feminine cæsure, which causes that phrase likewise to begin with a beat and sets up a secondary pattern; and thus the line is made vigorous by a syncopation that moves with the rhetoric. In the lines from I. to M.:

' * * ' * / ' * ' * '
Here in the garden wrought by curious hands,

' * * ' * /(*) * ' * '
 What doth auaile us to be Princes Heires,
 ' * * ' / * ' * * '
 When we can boast, our birth is only theirs?

the suppressed beat with the cæsura in the first line puts the peak of the metrical variation on the rhetorical key words avail and Princes heires. In the second line the key words which parallel the first line are marked out by alliteration. Here in the first line we note again that the suppressed beat is not casual but forms an integral element in the patterning of the line, operating with the cæsura to divide it into a two-part counter-pattern to the pentameter design. Here too the suppressed beat is compensated by the cæsural pause or hover, and hence the time movement of the line is maintained. The same element of pattern marks more continuously the fine lines beginning:

* \ * ' * ' * ' * '
 That after all this feareful massacre,
 * ' * ' * / ' * / ' * '
 The fall of Beauchamp, Lacy, Lancaster,
 * ' * ' * ' * (*) * '
 Another faithlesse fauorite should arise,
 * ' * ' * (*) * ' * '
 To cloude the sunne of our Nobilities?
 * ' * ' * ' * * ' '
 And glory'd I in Gauestons great fall,
 * ' * ' * (*) * ' * '
 That now a Spenser should succede in all?

In lines 5 and 6 the peak of metrical emphasis is thrown upon the antithetic element in the two contrasting lines,—first, by the shift of beat at the end; second, once more by the suppressed beat, stressing Gaueston and Spenser. The lines beginning—"When minions heads must wear our monarchs crowns," very strongly reminiscent in rhetoric of Henry VI, have a line movement like that of Shakespeare's early blank verse rather than a couplet movement. And yet the balance of the two half-lines in the adjective- (or possessive-) noun, adjective-noun arrangement anticipates the double adjective half-line movement later so characteristic of the Popean couplet.

One last example I wish to take from the "Epistle of Henry to Rosamond" because it offers so interesting a definition both positive and negative of what Drayton was feeling for. In the couplet:<sup>19</sup>

' * * ' / * ' * \ * '
 Fatall my birth, vnfortunate my life,
 * ' * ' * / ' * ' * '
 Vnkinde my children, most vnkinde my wife;

<sup>19</sup> Op. cit., p. 198.

the first line is strong both metrically and rhetorically, the second insignificant. In the first, the two half-lines have patterns distinct and interplaying. These patterns are created first by the beat shift in fatal giving the pattern ' * * ' and by the very secondary stress on the fourth syllable of unfortunate, which, working with the alliteration, gives the repeated but varying pattern (*) ' * ' * ' ; and secondly by the rhythmic repetition in my birth and my life. Again the metric and rhythmic forms underscore the rhetorical. In the second line, on the contrary, the half-lines have no sort of distinct metrical or rhythmical pattern to sustain either by parallel or by contrast the rhetorical pattern, and the most which gains whatever point of emphasis is gained through rhythmic movement, by beginning the second element of the line after a feminine cæsure, is rhetorically the weak point of the line. Thus rhetorical and metrical design obliterate each other.

Drayton's Heroicall Epistles, then, are written at their average pace in a series of end-stopped couplets with masculine endings, which incline to rhetorical statement, and which are marked by new elements of possible design, but which remain defective and colorless in rhetoric and languid in metre. Among these average lines, however, are other lines and passages strikingly vigorous both in music and in expression. These passages, though sporadic, show certain definite principles of technique. The rhetorical structure uses either line or half-line as the rhetorical unit element, balancing exactly the syntactic elements, either large or small, so as to give completeness of form to the rhetorical balance and contrast. And this arrangement gives structural form to the music of the couplet by using the same line and line of the end-stopped lines within the couplet, or the same two half-lines given by the medial cæsure, to form within the pentameter line new metrical unit-elements. That is, they shift the regular iambic pentameter rhythm in such a way as to gain within the compass of the couplet a fresh distinct musical design or counter-pattern suspended in the main pattern. To secure these new designs they turn such devices as the trochee or the suppressed stress into integral elements of pattern, obviating casual variation. Clearly these designs we thus trace are of the formal order. The rhetorical movement which defines endstopped couplet, line, and cæsure serves as the framework or oak panelling within which the metrical design is worked out and vice-versa.

Within the new structure Drayton suggests roughly a number of possible designs. But in fact, of the 184 lines of "Rosamond" only about 6 per cent have well-formed counter-pattern and of the 164 lines of "Isabel" only 11 per cent. Around these counter-patterns, too, the remainder of the line is often rough. To Fairfax's Tasso (1600), which Waller named to Dryden as the model for his own style, the new verse-movement owes an important advance in smoothness and fixity of purpose. Fairfax has less energy than the best of Drayton, but he creates a line and two-line movement much more even in its tension and much more obvious. His poem has a more sententious and generalized tone than that of Drayton, and consequently the frequency of lines and pairs of lines built on co-ordinated parallelism and phrases with secondary-pattern is higher. Indeed, it is no longer sporadic but standard for sententious passages. He suggests fewer patterns than Drayton, but he perfects the few he does realize, and he gives to the line rhythm as a whole a smooth, evened, neat flow against which the line and half-line designs stand out clearly.

The Tasso is, like its original, in ottava rima, and we look first to the concluding two rhymed lines for a succession of couplets that might give the pattern of the heroic couplet.<sup>20</sup> These lines often summarize a special point reached by a whole stanza, or describe a figure applicable to the whole stanza somewhat as the Alexandrine does in Spenser. Moreover, as to musical quality in relation to the whole stanza, they are remarkable, in sharp contrast to the swelling music of Spenser, for their low-pitched evenness of texture.

So if with drought endangered be their grain,
Poor plowmen joy when thunders promise rain.<sup>21</sup>

But such summarizing couplets are not predominant or characteristic and are rarely distinct from the movement of the stanza as a whole. Fairfax's contribution is to be found in his poem as a whole. The closed line is the rule with him, not in general a closed line created by strong rhetoric in the line units, but the end-stopped lines of the metrical beginner whose basic need is to secure the primary metrical form. Then considering the thought periods built up on these metrical closed lines we find that a two line units prevails not only in the final couplet, but throughout. If we divide the first fifteen stanzas into their thought-units and represent the number of lines in each unit by a digit, with sub-division where there is a longer unit composed of two distinct lesser ones, they run thus:

I: 4 & 4; II.  $\frac{4}{2 \& 2}$  &  $\frac{4}{2 \& 2}$ ; III.  $\frac{4}{2 \& 2}$   $\frac{4}{3 \& 1}$ ; IV: 4 &  $\frac{4}{2 \& 2}$ ; V:  $\frac{6}{2 \& 2 \& 2}$  & 2; VI: 2 & 2 & 2 & 2; VII. 2 & 6; VIII. 2 & 4 & 2; IX. 2 & 2 & 2 & 2;

<sup>20</sup> Any previous study that I have seen has merely noted the statement of Waller and referred to the epigrammatic nature of some of Fairfax's concluding couplets.

<sup>21</sup> Edward Fairfax, Jerusalem Delivered, ed. Henry Morley, Revised edition (London, n.d.) p. 17.

X: 2 & 2 & 2 & 2; XI: 2 & 2 & 2 & 2; XII: 4 & 1  $\frac{1}{2}$  & 2  $\frac{1}{2}$ ; XIII: 2 & 2 & 2 & 2; XIV: 2 & 2 & 2 & 2; XV:  $\frac{4}{2 \& 2}$  & 4. In this movement the rhyme words have no distinct importance, and the final rhymed couplet has generally nothing to define its two-line movement more sharply than that of the ab, ab, "couplets." Stanza nine is typical.<sup>22</sup>

In Baldwin next he spied another thought,
Whom spirits proud to vain ambition move:
Tancred he saw his life's joy set at naught,
So woe-begone was he with pains of love;
Boemond the conquered folk of Antioch brought,
The gentle yoke of Christian rule to prove:
He taught them laws, statutes, and customs new,
Arts, crafts, obedience, and religion true.

If we compare Fairfax with his original, we find in this stanza of Tasso a distinct two-line movement in lines 1-2 and 3-4, but not in the second half of the stanza.<sup>23</sup> A second important fact is that, although Fairfax follows Tasso closely in general stanza movement, his lines are end-stopped; whereas in Tasso the run-on line is highly characteristic. In this Spenser's movement is the one that is like Tasso's. Thus in Fairfax the two-line thought-movement is composed again and again of two equal elements or units of pattern, and hence the simple "couplet" effect is by this second fact also made very much sharper in him.

già non lasciammo i dolci pegni, e 'l nido nativo noi (se'l credo mio non erra) ne la vita esponemmo al mare infido ed a i perigli di lontana guerra, per acquistar di breve suono un grido vulgare, e posseder barbara terra:
che proposto ci avremmo angusto e scarso premio, e in danno de l'alme il sangue sparso.<sup>24</sup>

"But not for this our homes we first forsook,
And from our native soil have marched so far:
Nor us to dangerous seas have we betook,
Exposed to hazard of so far sought war,
Of glory vain to gain an idle smook,

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., p. 3.

<sup>23</sup> For so general a comparison as this, the question of variations in Tasso's text and of the relation of Fairfax's work to them seems unimportant.

<sup>24</sup> Torquato Tasso Gerusalemme Liberata (Opere, v. 2) a cura di Luigi Bontigli (Bari, 1930), Canto I, stz. 22, p. 6.

And lands possess that wild and barbarous are:
That for our conquest were too mean a prey,
To shed our bloods, to work our souls' decay.<sup>25</sup>

In rhetoric the style of Tasso is marked by compressed energy and by sharply defined statement which sometimes uses contrast and balance.

opre nostre non già, ma del Ciel dono furo,<sup>26</sup>
a la fatica invitti, al cibo parchi:<sup>27</sup> mostra in fresco vigor chiome canute:<sup>28</sup>

Fairfax makes this contrast and balance more explicitly verbal.

By Heaven's mere grace, not by our prowess done:<sup>29</sup>
On diet spare, untired with labor long:<sup>30</sup>
His looks were gray, yet was his courage green,<sup>31</sup>

And he underlines this explicitness by the epigrammatic effect of line pattern as is shown in line five of the twenty-second stanza quoted above. He sacrifices the energy and narrative zest of Tasso, but creates on his own score a certain sententious quality that is his distinctive note. Further he often uses balance and contrast where it is not in his original.

Usa a temperar ne' caldi alberghi il verno,
And pass cold days in baths and houses hot,<sup>32</sup>

O più bel di maniere e di sembianti,
O più eccelso ed intrepido di core.

With majesty his noble countenance shone,
High were his thoughts, his heart was bold in fight,<sup>33</sup>

Ove rinovi il prisco onor de gli avi,
O mostri al men, ch' a la virt latina
O nulla manca, o sol le disciplina,

So to revive the Romans' old renown,
Or prove at least to all of wiser thought,
Their hearts were fertile land although unwrought.<sup>34</sup>

<sup>25</sup> Fairfax, Jerusalem Delivered, Canto I, stz. 22, p. 6.

<sup>26</sup> Tasso, Canto I, stz. 26, l. 3.

<sup>27</sup> Ibid., Canto I, stz. 53, l. 6.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., Canto I, stz., 50, l. 6.

<sup>29</sup> Tasso and Fairfax, Canto I, stz. 42, l. 5.

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., Canto I, stz. 45, ll. 3-4.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., Canto I, stz. 50, l. 6.

<sup>32</sup> Fairfax, Canto I, stz. 26, l. 3.

<sup>33</sup> Ibid., Canto I, stz. 53, l. 6.

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., Canto I, stz. 64, ll. 6-8.

This is often a merely verbal balance, as in line 2 of the ninth stanza already cited, the original of which reads, "ch' a l' umane grandezze intento aspira:" or on stanza 16, line 6:

tu al fin de l'opra i neghittosi affreta,
Comfort the feeble, and confirm the strong.

Yet it strongly increases the epigrammatic effect of his poem. To this increase in rhetoricalness of expression, Fairfax adds an explicitness of sentiment which must have been particularly interesting to Waller. Thus line 6 of stanza nine contains an explicit sentiment not expressed in the original. The same is true of stanza sixty-four, lines 6-8 just cited, and of stanza twenty-two as a whole. As we have suggested in the example of stanza fifty-three,<sup>35</sup> Fairfax increases the whole sententious tone by moulding all his rhetorical effects to the pattern of the single line. This practice further tends to create the line with a medial cæsura as a common type. With particular frequency, we find the last line of the stanza built on parallelism and divided by the cæsura.

The general movement of Fairfax is a very even one, as a result in a large measure of its monosyllabic and dissyllabic quality. In the sixty-four lines of the first eight stanzas, there are two monosyllabic lines; eighteen lines contain only one word other than a monosyllable; thirty-three lines contain only two words other than a monosyllable, of which twenty-six contain two dissyllables; in all there are eleven trisyllables, mostly verbs in ed, and one word of four syllables. So prevailing a use of monosyllables just relieved with dissyllables gives, in the nature of verse music, beats of very equal value and irons out the line. This evening process is strengthened by the rhymes, which are masculine. Moreover, of the one hundred and twenty rhyme words in the first fifteen stanzas, ninety-nine are monosyllables and nineteen dissyllables.

There is distinct patterning between the half-lines of the sort we have seen in Drayton. A frequent type of pattern is the syllabic parallel made identical with the rhetorical parallel, which is sometimes strengthened by alliteration.

His fellows late shall be his subjects now.<sup>36</sup>

Comfort the feeble and confirm the strong<sup>37</sup>

On every footman and on every knight.<sup>38</sup>

Few golden hairs to deck his ivory chin.<sup>39</sup>

<sup>35</sup> See p. 179.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., stz. 16, l. 6.

<sup>36</sup> Fairfax, Canto I, stz. 12, l. 6.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., stz. 35, l. 8.

<sup>39</sup> Ibid., stz. 60, l. 8.

Here more definitely than in Drayton the pattern is often further emphasized by the suppressed medial beat, as in the first example above, and very markedly the third example, where the balance is deliberately made to sustain the whole structure and almost the substance of the line. A common extension is the balanced antithesis with reversed order.

1   2   2   1
And pass cold days in   baths and houses hot<sup>40</sup>

1   2   2   1
High were his thoughts, his heart was bold in fight.<sup>41</sup>

1   2   2   1
In diet spare, untired with labor long.<sup>42</sup>

More subtle variations are less common in Fairfax than in Drayton. But we may note the clustered beats in stanza 26, line 33.

*   '   ,   '   ,   *   *   '   *   '
By Heaven's mere grace, not by our prowess done:

and the trochaic substitution with alliteration in the fourth line of stanza forty-five, "High were his thoughts, his heart was bold in fight."

Thus Fairfax's Tasso, though not written in couplets, made a distinct contribution to the development of the heroic couplet. The development of its form seems to result in large measure from interest in the sententious and in generalized reflection, which impels him to seek and find a rhetoric and a music to harmonize with it. Nor was his the only case in which such an interest contributed to the development of the couplet style. This suggests a stream of possible influence, kindred to Fairfax's, which deserves further study. There was in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries a great deal of translation of poetry, and it is possible that two factors on the very work of translation, operating hand in hand with the general interest in moral sentiment, tended to accelerate this development toward the didactic and the generalized reflection. A translator has before him a concentrated expression which exhibits as a whole an organic reality and scope of meaning larger than the sum of its parts. Thus it is natural that as a translator, in his endeavor to get this whole, he should, in seizing the concept or expression which he is to translate, state it to himself in more explicit and logically complete terms than the original. The original gathers much in one creative flash; any other statement seems tenuous beside that flash and accordingly tends to explain itself in order to gain completeness. This fact produces in translations a tendency to paraphrase and to sententious generalization. Indeed, the theory of paraphrase came to be specifically discussed<sup>43</sup>; but the tendency was operative long before the theory. The point is illustrated by the opening lines of the Second Day of the First Week of Sylvester's Du Bartas.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., stz. 42, l. 6.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., stz. 45, l. 4.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., stz. 50, l. 6.

Tous ces doctes esprits, dont la voix flateresse Change Hecube en Heleine, & Faustine en Lucesse:
Qui d' vn nain, d' vn bastard, d' vn archerot sans yeux
Font, non vn dieutelet, ains le maistre des dieux.<sup>44</sup>

Those learned spirits whose wits applyed wrong,
With wanton Charms of their enchanting song,
Make of an olde, foul, frantike Hecuba,
A wondrous, fresh fair witty Helena:
Of lewd Faustina, (that loose Emperess)
A chaste Lucretia, loathing wantonness:
Of a blinde Bowe-Boy, of a Dwarf, a Bastard,
No petty Godling, but the Gods great Master;<sup>45</sup>

It is also seen in Drummond's translation of Tasso's O vaga tortorella.

Misera vedovella,
Tu sovra il nudo ramo
A pié del secco tronco io la richiamo.
Ma l' aura solo e 'l vento
Risponde mormorando al mio lamento.<sup>46</sup>

Unhappie widow'd Dove,
While all about do sing,
I at the Roote, thou on the Branche above,
Even wearie with our Mones the gaudie Spring.
Yet these our plaints we do not spend in vaine,
Sith sighing Zephyres answer vs again.<sup>47</sup>

Innumerable other examples might be given.

In the case of the English translations, in the second place, where the writer keeps to the metrical pattern of his original, but where English words have fewer syllables than Greek or Latin or Italian, the pattern must be filled out, and the explicitness in sentiment or in form of state-

<sup>43</sup> See the whole seventeenth-century discussion of the theory of paraphrase in translation and the many works which are distinctly conceived of and titled paraphrases.

<sup>44</sup> G. de Saluste, Sr. Du Bartas, Les Œuvres Poétiques et Chrétiennes, (à Geneve; M. DC. XXXII.), p. 31.

<sup>45</sup> Du Bartas. His Devine Weekes and Workes Translated: . . . by Joshua Sylvester. Now thirdly corrected and augm. (London, 1611), p. 24.

<sup>46</sup> Torquato Tasso, Le Rime, a cura di Angelo Solerti (Bologna, 1898), II, 439.

<sup>47</sup> William Drummond of Hawthornden, The Poetical Works, with a Cypress Grove, ed. L. E. Kastner (Edinburgh and London, 1913), I, 30.

ment we have just spoken of thus becomes the material for the necessary amplification. The passages from Fairfax already considered bear witness to this fact, or, to take only one other example, the first line of Drummond's translation of Marino's sonnet to night.

O del Silenzio figlio, e della Notte,<sup>48</sup>
Sleepe, Silence Child, sweet Father of soft Rest.<sup>49</sup>

It is perhaps a virtue in Fairfax at this stage of the couplet development that he should be so obvious and so simple and thereby so insistent on the new verse and rhetorical structure. But the simplicity and sameness of his line structure hardly allow for energetic forward movement or larger design even had he not been confined to occasional reflective lines and couplets scattered through narrative verse. When we turn to Ben Jonson, we come to a master craftsman deliberately evolving a style for continuous occasional and reflective verse. In him balance and contrast are the instruments of analytical definition with a steady forward drive of thought; and on these forms he builds up, on the simple basic units we have defined, a verse-movement with the subtlety and variety necessary to scope and progression.

Professor Schelling in the article already referred to has so fully defined the position of Ben Jonson as the founder of "classicism" as a whole that I shall for the most part simply summarize his argument and refer the reader to his article for more ample consideration. As to substance, Mr. Schelling points out, Jonson was the first poet to give occasional verse that variety, and that power and finish, which made it for nearly two centuries the most important form of poetical expression. As to style, drawing his conclusions from several tables, Mr. Schelling shows that in the matter of run-on couplets, Jonson falls somewhat nearer than Spenser and Sandys to Dryden and Pope, though not so near as Waller to these masters; and in the matter of medial caesura, Jonson, Waller, Dryden, and Pope fall into one group. In regard to the caesura, Jonson had a distinct theory that "couplets be the bravest sort of verses, especially when they are broken like hexameters";<sup>50</sup> i.e., exhibit a regular caesural pause. Next Mr. Schelling states that although Pope names Sandys's Paraphrase upon Job as one of the sources of Waller's versification, more significant in the formation of Waller's style is the classical manner, with the crisp diction, set figures, parallel constructions, contrasted clauses, and inversions, all of which he found in Jonson. Jonson uses the couplet in the epigram tersely, in the epistle more fluently.

<sup>48</sup> Giambattista Marino, Poesie Varie, a cura di Benedetto Croce (Bari, 1913), p. 104.

<sup>49</sup> Drummond, op. cit., I, 7.—I have considered the effects of these tendencies in the work of Drummond in an article on Drummond of Hawthornden, PMLA, XLVIII, 1090-1107.

<sup>50</sup> Quoted by Professor Schelling from Discoveries, ed. Schelling, p. 28.

We have already seen how bound together are the "classical manner" or rhetoric of the couplet and its characteristic musical form. It is essential to our study to go into Jonson's musical form, which Professor Schelling does not touch upon. The relation between the rhetoric and the musical pattern we may see by a glance at epigram xxv, To King James<sup>51</sup> which Professor Schelling especially notes as characteristic of Jonson's rhetoric and at the lines on Shakespeare.<sup>52</sup> In the epigram the first two lines contain double parallelism; first between the two lines; then between the two halves of the second line.

Who would not be thy subject, || James t' obey
A Prince that rules by example, || more than sway?

In the first line, the key words of the parallel receive emphasis by position just before the cæsure and at the close in the rhyme word. In the second line the antithetic words receive the same emphasis. The third catches up and states more explicitly the idea of the preceding line.

Whose manners draw, || more than thy powers constrain,

This development is focused by being carried on a sharper musical pattern; not only do the key words of the antithesis come on cæsure and rhyme, but they repeat musical pattern, manners <sup>2</sup> draw, <sup>1</sup> powers <sup>1</sup> constrain <sup>2</sup> with reversal of verbal rhythm in the repetition to give variety. The effect of the three lines taken together is akin to that achieved in musical composition when a composer tries out and suggests the melodic phrase with variations before he states it fully. The result is important. For in it Jonson not only uses the terse and epigrammatic power of the couplet, but also supplies forward movement beyond the couplet. Within the closed couplet, the half-line becomes the basic unit of design, and patterns built up on these half-lines preserve and give definition to the couplet form even when the actual stop at line-end and couplet-end is for the moment slight. This form is highly characteristic of Jonson's music and seems to have exerted a strong influence on Falkland and Denham. In the next line the balance of the adjective-noun rhetoric is given musical emphasis again by cæsure and end position and then by clustered beats and clustered unstressed syllables, secured through the trochaic foot in the third place.

<sup>51</sup> Ben Jonson, Poems (London, 1910), p. 294.—Italics in quotation are mine.

<sup>52</sup> Ibid., p. 398.

*   *   '   '   || *   *   '   *   '
And in this short time of thy happiest reign,

The whole of the lines on Shakespeare offers interesting patterns, both musical and rhetorical. Lines 7-12 are typical and will serve our study.

For silliest ignorance on these may light,
Which, when it sounds at best, but echoes right;
Or blind affection, which doth ne'er advance
The truth, but gropes, and urgeth all by chance;
Or crafty malice might pretend this praise,
And think to ruin, where it seemed to raise.

These three couplets contain three parallel clauses beautifully varied. Each of the three begins with the subject: "silliest ignorance," "blind affection," "crafty malice"; and in each the adjective contains the germ of the idea of the whole. In each this idea is developed by antithesis. But among the three the detail of the rhetoric and the music varies. The first couplet states the antithesis in the second line, not sharply, but still using the two half-lines to make the contrast. The second couplet sharpens the rhetoric: gropes reiterates blind more distinctly than the idea is formally pursued in the preceding couplet, and the antithesis is more explicit. In this couplet the first line is run-on. The consequent loss of sharpness in line-pattern, however, is more than compensated by the effect of the antithetic truth and chance at the beginning and end of their line. More, the run-on line in the middle of the three couplets saves the balanced movement of the whole from monotony. The third couplet is completely definite in both rhetoric and musical pattern. The whole idea is stated in the first line, and with rhetorical sharpness underscored by musical secondary-pattern, * ' ' ' (*) ' ' '. Finally, the antithesis already defined in "pretend this praise," and underscored by the secondary-pattern and by alliteration, is completed by the perfectly balanced syntax and musical phrase of the second line:

*   '   *   '   *   || (*)   *   '   *   '
And think to ruin, where it seems to raise.

Thus again Jonson builds up to a musical and a rhetorical climax that are mutual. His strength lies in the fact that the perfected pattern of half-line, line, couplet, balance, antithesis, repeated musical phrase, is always suggested, but actually realized only often enough to create form without imposing rigidity. Although such effects are not as continuous in him as they are in later men, they are what give character to his couplets.

2. THE RELATION OF WALLER AND THE SANDYS GROUP. THE COUPLET OF SANDYS AND THE SANDYS COMPLIMENTARY VERSE

The dates of Waller's work and of that of Sandys and of the Sandys complimentary verse overlap. And doubtless these poets influenced each other, as the following analysis of dates will show. Waller was an intimate of the Falkland circle at Great Tew, where he presumably showed his verse and would be likely to have read that of Sandys and Falkland even before publication. Sandys's Ovid was probably first published in 1626, though written in part by 1623;<sup>53</sup> the second edition revised came out in 1632. I have not seen the first edition, and my comment will therefore be based on the second edition. As to the relation of the two editions, Hooper in his edition of Sandys says that the alteration is not great; the first lines which he quotes from the original edition suggest that the changes were in the direction of smoothness. Thus "Of formes, to other bodies changed, I sing," becomes "Of bodies changed to other shapes I sing."<sup>54</sup> The Paraphrase upon the Psalms was published in 1636, the Paraphrase upon Job in 1638, and Christ's Passion in 1640. These give the dates of both Sandys and Falkland, for the last three volumes all contain complimentary poems by Falkland.

Waller's first collected publication, including most of the occasional verse we are to consider, came in 1645. But much of the verse was written and read many years before. The poems of Waller that we shall consider are: Of the danger His Majesty (being Prince) escaped in the road at St. Andrews, Of His Majesty's receiving the news of the Duke of Buckingham's death, Upon His Majesty's repairing of St. Paul's, At Penshurst (While in the park I sing), The battle of the Summer Islands, A Panegyric to my Lord Protector. The first occasion of the St. Andrews poem was 1623, and Mr. Thorn Drury inclined to place it at that date.<sup>55</sup> Mr. Henry Wood has shown, however, that the lines containing the reference to Henrietta Maria at least cannot have been written before early in 1625.<sup>56</sup> The occasion of the Buckingham poem was 1628, of the St. Paul's poem 1633. The lines on Penshurst were written during the Sacharissa episode, 1635-39; The battle of the Summer Islands is placed by tradition at the close of that episode, that is, late 1639 or after, although the late Professor Alden 1638.<sup>57</sup> The Cromwell lines were written in 1652 or 1654.

The style of the poems offers some further evidence as to dates.

<sup>53</sup> On the dates of Sandys's Ovid, see George Sandys, The Poetical Works, with an Introduction and Notes by the Rev. Richard Hooper (London, 1872) I, xxvii.

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., Introduction, p. xxiv.

<sup>55</sup> Edmund Waller, The Poems, ed. G. Thorn Drury (London, n.d.), Intro. p. lxxiv.

<sup>56</sup> Henry Wood, "The Beginning of the Classical Heroic Couplet," AJP, XI (1890), 554-579.

<sup>57</sup> Raymond M. Alden, English Verse (New York) 1903, p. 187.

Although these poems are written in the closed couplet, only the St. Andrews poem in some lines, To Penshurst in some lines, The Summer Islands and the Cromwell poem are distinguished by strongly developed contrast and balance and by such distinctive music as we have previously defined. The following table is interesting to study.

	% closed couplets	% closed first line	% cæsure	% medial cæsure
St. Andrews (1623?)	84 75	61 2	61 2	53.53
Buckingham (1628)	89 47	58.	52.6	42 1
St. Paul's ll. 1-26 (1633)	77.	46 15	42 3	42.3
Penshurst (1635-39)	66 67	25.	66 67	54.16
Summer Is (ca. 1639)	89.18	73.	74 32	64.86
Cromwell (1652-54)	95 75	70.21	66.	52.66

Although due allowance must be made for different effects aimed at in different poems, the figures in columns 2, 3, and 4, especially the last two, taken in conjunction with the general rhetorical qualities of the poems, suggest that the St. Andrews poem may have been revised when Waller's style was maturing, some years after it was first written, and while Waller was part of the circle at Great Tew. Thus no priority can be assigned, and we must, as we have already said, think of the work of Sandys, Waller, and Falkland as interactive.

We shall take up first Sandys and the Sandys volumes. In the work of Sandys himself we return to narrative verse and directly to the roots of the closed couplet in the Latin elegiac distich. In the complimentary verse of his volumes we see, in the verse of one distinguished writer and a number of minor versifiers, the first standardization of the couplet in occasional verse. In the detailed study of the relation of Sandys's Metamorphosis to Ovid we shall see that Sandys in his whole verse and not merely in sententious passages, with a deliberate technique translated the rhetoric of Ovid into forms suited to the idiom of English speech and built upon the structure of the closed and epigrammatic couplet. He shows an advance over Drayton then in a system of closed couplets with prevaillingly closed lines and medial cæsure. And much more completely than Drayton, and more simply, obviously, and constantly than Jonson, he moves his rhetorical expression in close lock-step with the metrical units. In the development of this style he is highly original, for although he found in Ovid many suggestions for this rhetoric and design, what is in Ovid a general method of thought, Sandys has stylized into a pattern of rhetorical and musical expression. In music, he is less fertile in patterns than Ben Jonson, but makes these patterns the basic pattern of his verse; and as compared to Drayton's narrative, he shows a gain in evenness.

The Paraphrase upon Job has fewer closed couplets and fewer rhetorical lines than the Ovid. Its style varies widely with the substance of particular passages, the passages of general reflection such as the wail of Job's wife in Chapter II, or Job's own lament in Chapter III containing a large number of terse epigrammatic lines and more balance and contrast, together with more medial cæsura and more metrical design within the line and couplet, than do narrative passages. Professor Schelling suggests in his article on Jonson that there is no more antithesis than would naturally arise from the metrical parallelism of the Hebrew; but so far as one can gauge by the Authorized Version or the Vulgate—the Latin from which Sandys appears to have translated I have not seen—Sandys has increased the antithesis and made it more external and explicit, just as he did with his Ovid. And for us the important fact is that the antithesis is there, with all that it implies of both rhetorical and metrical structure. In a somewhat low-pitched style, it is the outstanding characteristic, and is more emphatic than would appear in any table of the proportion of lines with parallelism or antithesis. The types of pattern are less varied than in the Ovid, and in their often purely formal development they carry on and enlarge the technique of Fairfax.

In the translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, we shall consider as typical passages the introduction and the incident of Apollo and Daphne. Here we must deal, we have already said, not merely with the character of Sandys's style, but with his relation to his source. His translation keeps close to its text; thus the first twenty lines of Ovid are rendered in the first eighteen of Sandys, and in general each of Sandys's couplets renders approximately the two corresponding lines in Ovid. Occasionally but not commonly, Sandys expands by floriate decoration, as in the account of the winds:

His quoque non passim mundi fabricator habendum aera permissit; vix nunc obsistitur illis, cum sua quisque regat diverso flumina tractu, quin lanient mundum; tanta est discordia fratrum.
Eurus ad Auroram Nabataeaeque regna recessit
Persidaeque et radiis iuga subdita matutini

Yet not permitted every way to blow;
Who hardly now to teare the World refrain

<sup>58</sup> Ovid, Metamorphoses, with an English Translation by Frank Justus Miller (London and New York, 1916), Book I, ll. 57-62, 6.

(So Brothers jarrel) though they divided raigne,
To Persis and Sabbaea, Eurus flies;
Whose gums perfume the blushing Mornes up-rise.<sup>59</sup>

Occasionally he fills out with a general, intellectualized, abstract, expression inclined toward periphrasis.

Quae, diversa locis, partim sorbentur ab ipsa, in mare perveniunt partim campoque recepta liberioris aquae pro ripis litora pulsant.<sup>60</sup>

Of these not few Earth's thirsty jawes devoure:
The rest, their streams into the Ocean poure;
When, in that liquid plaine with freer wawe,
The foamie cliffes, instead of Banks, they lave.<sup>61</sup>

This expansion is also not common. He is in general more literal.

Sandys's couplets are closed and rhetorical in structure. Of forty-one couplets in a characteristic passage of the Daphne episode, thirty-seven are strongly end-stopped; moreover twenty-six first lines are stopped, or sixty-three lines in all out of eighty-two. Of balance and antithesis there are seven instances where line balances line; five more where there is balance within a couplet although not in line parallels; nine very sharply defined instances of balance and contrast within a line, and a number of further instances of implicit antithesis.

How is this style related to the original? The style of Ovid is rhetorical and balanced and in that characteristic had much to suggest to Sandys, but the character of its rhetoric in relation to the form of its line is somewhat different from that of Sandys. In the description of the origin of the world, where Ovid describes how the distinct elements take their places, he inclines to closed lines, and in naming the antithetic pairs of elements he balances the elements in antithetic half-lines. Here Sandys follows him closely.

Nulli sua forma manebat, obstatque aliis aliud, quia corpore in uno frigida pugnabant calidis, umentia siccis, mollia cum duris, sine pondere, habentia pondus.<sup>62</sup>

No certaine forme to any one assign'd:
This, that resists. For, in one body joyn'd,
The Cold and Hot, The Drie and Humid fight;
The Soft and Hard, the Heavie with the Light.<sup>63</sup>

<sup>59</sup> Ovid's Metamorphosis. Englished Mythologiz'd and Represented in figures by G. S. (Oxford, 1632), p. 3.—The italics are mine.

<sup>60</sup> Ovid, op. cit., ll. 40–43, p. 4.

<sup>61</sup> Sandys, op. cit., p. 3.

<sup>62</sup> Ovid, op. cit., ll. 17–20, p. 2.

<sup>63</sup> Sandys, op. cit., p. 3.

Often, however, the Latin style characteristically halves the line musically by cæsura and then binds the two halves together by noun-adjective or noun-verb phrase or phrases suspended between the halves (often, because of inflectional endings, with rhyme effect).

Nec nova crescendo reparabat cornua Phoebe, nec circumfuso pendebat in aere tellus.<sup>64</sup>

This type of balance is unsuited to the idiom of English, since English is an analytical and not an inflectional language, and in its place Sandys substitutes the balance of separated half-line units with antithesis.

Nor waxing Phoebe fill'd her wained hornes:
Nor hung the self-poiz'd Earth in thin Ayre plac'd;<sup>65</sup>

In lines 44 and 45 of the description of the shaping of the earth, Ovid gives rapidity to his narrative by the four stoccatto phrases of the four parallel half-lines.

Iussit et (1) extendi campos, (2) subsidere valles,
(3) fronde tegi silvas, (4) lpidosos surgere montes,<sup>66</sup>

The rhetoric is further enhanced by a suggestion of cross-line parallel in verbal rhythm between the active and passive verbs, an arrangement which makes the two lines parallel each other, and this effect is again increased by the antithesis of units two and four. Sandys cannot, because of the English verb-forms, use the actives and passives for balance; instead, he shifts the phrases in these two lines, with the result that he makes the antithesis more obvious.

Bid's Trees increase to Woods, the Plaines extend,
The rocky Mountaines rise, the Vales descend.<sup>67</sup>

Through these passages, explicit contrast is characteristic of Sandys's translation. For this contrast certain suggestions lie in the original, but not nearly so many nor such obvious instances. Finally whereas Ovid, though he tends to the line unit, uses the run-on line frequently, Sandys very definitely uses the stopped line. In general where Ovid uses two, three, or four line periods, Sandys levels these first to line units and then to couplet units. One further example, with the passages already cited, will make this very clear.

Principio terram, ne non aequalis ab omni parte foret, magni speciem glomeravit in orbis.<sup>68</sup>

<sup>64</sup> Ovid, op. cit., ll. 11-12, p. 2.

<sup>65</sup> Sandys, op. cit., p. 3.—Italics mine.

<sup>66</sup> Ovid, op. cit., p. 4.—Italics and figures mine.

<sup>67</sup> Sandys, op. cit., p. 3.—Italics mine.

<sup>68</sup> Ovid, op. cit., ll. 34-35, p. 4.

First, least the Earth vnequall should appeare,
He turn'd it round, in figure of a Spheare,<sup>69</sup>

A few further examples from the Daphne episode will show, in a different type of material, the same insistence upon antithesis, the same line-movement.

Primus amor Phoebi Daphne Peneia, quem non fors ignara dedit, sed saeva Cupidinis ira.

“quid” que “tibi, lascivi puer, cum fortibus armis?”
dixerat: “ista decent umeros gestamina nostros, “quantoque animalia cedunt cuncta deo, tanto minor est tua gloria nostra.”

ille quidem obsequitur, sed te decor iste quod optas esse vetat, votoque tuo tua forma repugnat:<sup>70</sup>

Peneian Daphne was his first belou'd,
Not Chance, but Cupid's wrath that fury mou'd.

And said: Lasciuious Boy, how ill agree
Thou and these Armes! too Manly far for thee.

So farre as Gods exceed all earthlie powr's:
So much thy glorie is exceld by ours.

But thee, thy excellencie countermands:
And thy owne beautie thy desire with-stands.<sup>71</sup>

In the development of the couplet melodies, the chief contribution of Sandys's Ovid is his evenness, varied by the shift of cæsura. Of other counter-pattern, we find occasionally such emphasis as is given by parallel phrase rhythm:

Nor waxing Phoebe fill'd her wained hornes:

When in that liquid Plaine with freer wave,

This emphasis is sometimes strengthened by alliteration; sometimes, but rarely, there is a pattern between line and half-line through varied beat, as in

<sup>69</sup> Sandys, op. cit., p. 3.

<sup>70</sup> Ovid, op. cit., ll. 452-453, 456-457, 464-465, 488-489, pp. 34 and 36.

<sup>71</sup> Sandys, op. cit., pp. 10-11.

'       ' *   ' *       *       '   ' *   '
 Bright Constellations, and faire-figured Gods.<sup>72</sup>

a line in which the effect of the polysyllables (uncommon in Sandys) increases that of the varied beat. Of the suppressed beat there is very little effective use.

In the Paraphrase upon Job, as we have suggested, the balances and contrasts are worked out in a few very obvious and very definite patterns. Sandys frequently states a thought or action in two parallel elements or defines a thought by contrast, with detailed balance of the contrasting units.

Th' invited sisters with their graces blest
 Their festivals, and were themselves a feast.<sup>73</sup>

. . . . .

Shot through the spheres, and stood before His throne.<sup>74</sup>

. . . . .

   much people won
 From Thy strict rule to my indulgent reign;<sup>75</sup>

. . . . .

"Is this the purchase of thy innocence?
 O fool, thy piety is thy offence.
 He whom thou serv'st hath us all bereft,
 Our children slain, and thee to torments left. . . .<sup>76</sup>

Else had I an eternal requiem kept,
 And in the arms of peace forever slept:
 With kings and princes rank'd, who. lofty frames
 In deserts raised, t' immortalize their names;
 Who made the wealth of provinces their prey;
 In death as mighty, and as rich as they;<sup>77</sup>

Another type of parallelism is the more purely verbal sort in which the line is built on the double adjective structure.

Three beauteous daughters and sev'n hopeful boys<sup>78</sup>

With sober banquets and unpurchas'd food.

. . . . .

<sup>72</sup> Ibid., p. 3.

<sup>73</sup> Sandys, ed. Hooper, Vol. I, A Paraphrase upon Job, Chap. II, p. 2.

<sup>74</sup> Idem. Italics in these quotations mine.

<sup>75</sup> Idem.

<sup>76</sup> Ibid., Chap. II, p. 6.

<sup>77</sup> Ibid., Chap. III, p. 8.

<sup>78</sup> Ibid., Chap I, p. 1.

Like sweet perfumes from golden censers rise;

From bleating flocks unblemish'd fatlings chose,<sup>79</sup>

In the development of rhythm, the Job stands about with the Ovid, although there is more variation and perhaps somewhat more frequent realization of pattern in the variation. But perhaps it just misses pattern as often as it achieves it. Thus in "Affected virtue more, vice more abhorr'd."<sup>80</sup> vice, by force of the antithesis and alliteration, tries to take the stress and make the pattern, but as the second more is also part of the contrast, the normal line pattern prevails, and metre blurs rhetoric. In the line the clustered beat in broad-tailed is lost because casual, and the line really compels a sing-song reading by the violation of normal word-rhythm, as does also the slightly wrenched accent of un-purchased in the line.

Sev'n thousand broad-tail'd sheep graz'd on his downs;<sup>81</sup>

* ' * ' * (·) * ' * '
With sober banquets and unpurchas'd food.

although in this line the structural parallel gains metrical emphasis from the suppressed beat. Sandys is less casual than Drayton and more vigorously even, but his chief metrical strength here as in the Ovid lies in the emphatic units of verbal parallel repeated in two halves of a divided line.

Sandys's Paraphrase upon the Psalms and his Ovid were both dedicated to the King, with dedicatory verse in heroic couplets. The verse in the first volume is end-stopped, but with little rhetoric; that in the second decidedly end-stopped in line and couplet, and with medial cæsura. A few lines will show the rhetorical quality.

Love, whose transcendent Acts the Poets sing
By men made more then Man, is found a King:
Whose Thunder and Inevitable Flame,
His Iustice and maiestick Awe proclaime.<sup>82</sup>

<sup>79</sup> Ibid., p. 2.—The double-adjective-substantive line is in itself no new thing; indeed it is common in Spenser. It is differentiated here, however, both by substance and form. Spenser's adjectives are either directly sensuous adjectives or qualifying adjectives of sentiment, in either case wrought into his picture as a whole. These adjectives, on the other hand, incline to become words of intellectual or sententious definition, or in some cases hardly more than empty adjectives or fillers. And on the formal side, the end-stopped line, and even more when it is joined with the medial cæsura, throws them into a perspective and gives them an insistent balance which they did not have in the run-on line of Spenser.

<sup>80</sup> Ibid., p. 1.

<sup>81</sup> Idem.

<sup>82</sup> Sandys, Ovid, etc., "A Panegyricke to the King."

We come now to the occasional verse which accompanied the Sandys volumes. The Paraphrase upon the Psalms has two sets of commendatory verse, one in closed couplets by Falkland, and one in alternate rhyming tetrameters and dimeters by Dudley Digges. There are nine sets of commendatory verse prefixed to the Paraphrase upon Job of which six are in closed couplets, one by Falkland, one by Henry King, one by Dudley Digges, one by Francis Wiatt, one by Henry Rainsford, and one anonymous; one by Carew in run-on couplets; one by Waller in lyric measure; one by Wintour Grant in heroic quatrain; and one in triplets by Sidney Godolphin. And finally, there is another poem by Falkland prefixed to Christ's Passion.

Of these thirteen poems, the most important are the three by Falkland, the first of seventy-four couplets written by 1636, the second twenty-two couplets written by 1638, the third of fifty-four written in 1639 or 1640, one hundred and fifty couplets in all. They are bold, vigorous, and artistically mature work. Their balance and contrast are much less simple than the rhetoric in most of the work we have been looking at, with the exception of Jonson; they are the incisive instrument of definition. As compared with the 6-11 per cent in Drayton, about 50 per cent of his lines show counter-pattern; and there is a continuous forward movement of the verses. He is free of his pattern.

First as to the formal outlines of his couplet. In the whole body of verse, 82 per cent of the couplets are end-stopped. In the first 104 lines of the poem on the Psalms,<sup>83</sup> 90.4 per cent of the couplets are closed, 51.9 per cent of the first lines are closed, 62.5 per cent of the lines have cæsuras, and 52.9 per cent medial cæsuras. But the figures, once more, reveal little. We must look at the deeper aspects of form to see the true power of Falkland's verse. Let us note first the terse energy of the expression, the tough, condensed, penetrating wit of the images, to which line and couplet frame add cleanliness of outline.

And need I say more than my thoughts indite,
Nothing were easier then not to write;

. . . . .

And more a wonder, scorns at large to show
What were indifferent if true or no:

. . . . .

Doth each land's laws, belief, beginnings show;
Which of the natives but the curious know:

. . . . .

<sup>83</sup> Falkland, "To my noble Friend, MR. GEORGE SANDYS, upon his Excellent Paraphrase of the Psalms," in Sandys, ed. Hooper, I, 83-87.

What state than theirs can more unhappy be,
Threaten'd with hell, and sure of poverty?

. . . . .

Business and war, ill midwives to produce
The happy offspring of so sweet a Muse:

The energetic condensed definition flashes upon us in balance and contrast in line after line. The variety in forms of these balances and contrasts is remarkable, and all are clear-cut and sure. Amid the variety, certain types are repeated, as the line with complete parallel of syntax marked by repetition of words and scored by medial cæsura.

Where Theseus govern'd, and where Plato taught;
. . . . .
Owes all her arts and her civility,
. . . . .
Whom the west damns, and whom the east devours.
. . . . .
. . . . . whatsoever most they raise
In private, that they most in throngs dispraise.

This complete balance of syntax is varied, as in the last example, by the form in which the contrast is suspended in the whole couplet, instead of being equally poised in two half-lines, a form which is strengthened by focusing the antithesis in the two rhyme words; and again in other cases it is varied by stating the contrast in two brief elements pivoting sharply around a grammatical center.

Their fortunes not more slavish than their souls
. . . . .
Though scarce a part; yet to be all doth claim
. . . . .
Or thinks it fit we should not leave obtain
To learn with pleasure what we act with pain.

The modes are so varied that instead of a sense of monotony arising from the oft-repeated balance and contrast, there springs up a sense of design that gives forward movement. Just as great verse must always suggest its pattern, yet avoid rigidity, so it is manifest as we read over these illustrations that a rhetoric of this sort, which is to give intellectual order and not a mere formal verbal pattern, must likewise have constant design moving in constant variety.

Besides this variation of parallelism, another source of continuous movement in Falkland is the way in which the second line grows out of the first and often completes the contrast begun by it, yet does this without blurring the independent terse vigor of each separate line. Thus,

We know that town is but with fishers fraught Where Theseus governed and where Plato taught.
. . . . .
Lie now distress'd between two enemy pow'rs
Whom the west damns and whom the east devours.

What state than theirs can more unhappy be,
Threaten'd with hell and sure of poverty?

Contrast between line and line is present in illustrations already given. Falkland makes each individual phrase, half-line, or line, terse and finished and yet constructs each with a periodic forward drive to the larger unit of line or couplet. So too he has the art of finished and epigrammatic couplets which, however, in their turn do not break the whole apart into two-line units of thought, but are integral elements in a larger whole. The balance and contrast building steadily up to larger units of thought are well illustrated in the following passages:

That spring of knowledge to which Italy
Owes all her arts and her civility,
In vice and barbarism supinely rolls,
Their fortunes not more slavish than their souls.

Next Ovid called me; which, though I admire
For equalling the author's quick'ning fire,
And his pure phrase; yet more, remem'bring it
Was by a mind so much distracted writ:
Business and war, ill mid-wives to produce
The happy offspring of so sweet a muse:

In the second passage it is interesting to note how the couplet is, for the moment, lost, but how the general pattern is sustained by the half-line movement, and how this form of variation adds to the forward drive. Another interesting example of the same movement is found in the following from the lines prefatory to Christ's Passion.<sup>84</sup>

Ulysses, if we trust the Grecian song,
Travell'd not far, but was a prisoner long,
To that by tempest forc'd; nor did his voice
Relate his fate: his travels were his choice,
And all these numerous realms, return'd again,
Anew he travell'd over with his pen,

<sup>84</sup> Falkland, "To the Author," in Sandys, ed. Hooper, II, 412-415.

In melodic handling Falkland shows the same power. The secondary patterns which we have seen in Drayton and Sandys, present in them, however, infrequently and uncertainly, are in him sustained and sure. A few types of pattern will illustrate this. For suppressed beat giving metrical balance to parallel elements,

* ' * ' * (*) * ' * '

A lofty poet and a deep divine

* ' * ' * (*) * ' * '

Correct an author and uphold a state<sup>85</sup>

* ' * ' * (*) * ' * '

To learn with pleasure what we act with pain<sup>86</sup>

* ' * ' * (*) * ' * '

The happy offspring of so sweet a muse<sup>87</sup>

It will be noted here and anywhere that we look that Falkland's repetition is close enough to make constant pattern and yet not exact enough to dull pattern to monotony.

' * ' * ' * ' *

learn with pleasure act with pain

* ' * ' * * ' * ' *

Where Theseus govern'd where Plato taught

A slight shift to secure clustered beat is also well handled by him.

' * ' * * ' ' * '

Sharp-sighted Envy and blind Ignorance:

* ' * ' *

The small beginning of the Turkish Kings,

* * ' '

And their large growth, show us that diff'rent things<sup>88</sup>

Common is the trochaic inversion in the first place by virtue of which both the balanced elements start with a strong beat

' '

Nothing were easier than not to write

' * * ' ' * ' * '

Threat'nd with hell and sure of poverty<sup>89</sup>

2 1 1 1 1 3

In the last example the variety secured both in the phrase as a whole and between word-rhythms in the two balanced elements is notable. Finally, Falkland uses rhyme very pithily, a fact which needs no further illustration than that supplied in the couplets already quoted. Each of

<sup>85</sup> Falkland, "To My Noble Friend, MR GEORGE SANDYS," Ibid., I, 83-87.

<sup>86</sup> Idem.

<sup>87</sup> Idem.

<sup>88</sup> Idem.

<sup>89</sup> Idem.

these devices gains firmness and interest because while some one of them is always present, they are yet constantly varied and juxtaposed in new ways. The reader may refer to almost any continuous passage to illustrate this fact more fully. In sum, Falkland has less smoothness than Waller or than Denham, but he has both in basic pattern and in secondary-pattern a full and unflagging hold of the closed couplet design and of the integration of its rhetoric and music, and rapid energy and freedom.

The other commendatory couplets, though they have not so much to say as Falkland, or anything like his firm mastery of design, show that the essential form of the reflective couplet is well established by this date. The first, unsigned, lines upon Job have less vigor and variety than Falkland's verse but the use of balance, of line and half-line units, of counter-pattern, is clearly established, as a few lines will show.

Even I (no yielding matter) who till then Am chief of sinners and the worst of men, (Though it be hard a soul's health to procure, Unless the patient do assist the cure)
Suffer a rape by virtue, whilst thy lines
Destroy my old, and build me new designs.<sup>90</sup>

King's couplets have many more run-on lines and much less definite neatness in balance and contrast than these. They often, when they come close to the characteristic couplet rhetoric, yet just miss or just refrain from it. But it is evident that they tend to clothe their clear-cut distinctness of definition in neat rhetorical and metrical patterns.

Or in this service that 'twas my intent
T' exclude your person from your argument.
. . . . .
Whose choice acquits you from the common sin
Of such who finish worse than they begin.<sup>91</sup>

Dudley Digges has not distinction, but in him too the formed couplet of Falkland is seen to be well established. Of his twenty couplets, sixteen are closed and almost all have balance and contrast, for which they often employ the epigrammatic single stopped line and frequently the half-line, half-line balance. He has less variety of detail of pattern within the couplet than Falkland and less strength in the whole because many lines lack distinctive form. He also lacks continuity. But where his thought is clearly focused and succinct it falls into just such couplets and lines as we have been describing.

<sup>90</sup> "To my noble Friend Mr. Sandys, Upon His Job . . .," in Sandys, ed. Hooper, pp. lxxxv-lxxxviii.

<sup>91</sup> Henry King, "To My Much Honoured Friend Mr. George Sandys," ibid., pp. xc-xciv.

Francis Wiatt also writes in closed couplets. He is less succinct even than Digges, and to secure the couplet he sometimes slurs his syntax.

Thy living works since oft have pass'd the test,
And every last (to wonder) prov'd the best.<sup>92</sup>

He also rarely succeeds in single epigrammatic lines. Metrically he is characterless, and not either smooth or strong. But, once more, it is clear that he aims throughout at the couplet we have defined, and the passages which strike us as strongest are those in which he achieves it.

Henry Rainsford's eighteen lines are the last in closed couplets with balance and antithesis. They are, however, hardly reflective verse, but merely an argument of the volume. Being such, it is notable that they too are invaded by balance and antithesis.<sup>93</sup>

3. WALLER AND DENHAM

Of Waller we may take the St. Andrews lines, the Buckingham lines, the lines on St. Paul's, To Penshurst, and the Cromwell panegyric as representative of Waller both in the type of subject for which they were used, and in his style from its beginning till the time it had reached its maturity and was widely enough known to exert its full influence. Denham is adequately represented by Cooper's Hill, his chief work, and that in which he had most to say. Waller's "smoothness" is on the whole an evenness of tension beyond what we have seen in any one else. Floating on the level surface of this, his rhetorical and musical patterns are the perfection and systematization of the basically simple and formal units created by Fairfax and Sandys. His development is the progress of this systematization until the whole ground is filled with design. In his mature work, as in Falkland's verse, 50 per cent of the lines have perfected counter-pattern. His basic line rhythm is smooth and even. For counter-pattern he depends principally on the play of line, half-line, couplet, with the variation of melody found in the varied length and phrasing of half-lines, a variation produced by the shifting cæsura, together with the indivisibility of the line into two equal halves, which causes the two-beat half to play against the three beat. Some slight further musical pattern results from the increased emphasis upon the balanced words. More subtle melodic phrasing and variation than this are rare. Musically, Waller has nothing like the scope and force of design of Falkland. In rhetorical design he is somewhat richer and more varied than in metrical mode, but still he is monotonous and has nothing like the fecundity and range of Falkland. Of Jonson's neat and flexible phrase he seems to have learned much; of his boldness and scope nothing. Of Falkland's secret of perfectly establishing the closed couplet in the reader's ear and then varying this basic unit itself while still suggesting it firmly in the half-lines, he is not possessed. The secret is Denham's. So much of Denham's mature work in Cooper's Hill is descriptive or narrative that percentage figures are not useful. In the sententious and reflective passages the classical couplet in both music and syntax strides forward on the bold and keen-edged lines laid down by Jonson and Falkland. He is "strong" because more subtle and more free than Waller.

<sup>92</sup> Francis Wiatt, "To My Honoured Kinsman MR. GEORGE SANDYS, On His Admirable Paraphrases." ibid., pp. c-ciii.

<sup>93</sup> Waller's lines to Sandys are in lyric measure and so they must not be compared with the others. But in neat rhetoric, succinctness, and strong rhymes they surpass all the others except Falkland, and in smoothness they excell him. Obviously in making a study of this sort, we must keep to the body of material which can be defined in common terms, namely, poems in pentameter in two line units. But we have seen how much the development of the special and distinctive music of the closed couplet depends upon the formation of a rhetoric lucid in expression, and of a verse-system even in texture, and one which uses small elements as the basic units of its design. The lyric measures of Ben Jonson, Waller, and Sandys may well have been as influential upon the metrics of their successors as were their couplets. We can here only suggest that a study of this lyric verse must form part of any complete history of the heroic couplet in the seventeenth century.

The first three of Waller's poems may be grouped together without much differentiation. Their oft-noted smoothness is dependent first upon the almost constant repetition of the twenty-syllable unit in the closed couplet, and upon the prevalent repetition of the half-line pattern with medial cæsura (an element present also in Drayton and Sandys, and typical of Jonson and Falkland) and upon the flexible syllabization<sup>94</sup> and the little variation in stress. All this is sustained in a way not quite found in any previous case we have been considering, by the unemphatic, direct, smooth-flowing, conversational ease of the expression, deliberate and perfectly neatly defined, which makes every word duly weighty, though it prevents any word from attaining a thrilling emphasis. This type of expression is truly the base in which the color of the melody is mixed. More condensation of feeling, more rapidity of movement from concept to concept, would create points of energy in the rhetoric which must sweep the music with them. But Waller's music has no such impetuosity. It finds its emphasis rather in the just neatness of its analysis. And this in turn seeks its own becoming decoration in metrical patterns which are low-pitched, but very neat and definite. The perceptions, which are without emotional shade or complexity, fall into simply moulded syntax that easily leaves neat, balanced centers of thought to form the centers of interest in line and half-line. Indeed, in these three poems on the whole the balances and antitheses are as simple in expression and in musical pattern as those of Sandys and Drayton, though the effect is stronger because more sustained.

<sup>94</sup> On this point of flexible syllabization, see the anonymous preface to the edition of 1690 conveniently available in Alden's English Verse. See also the discussion of this preface by Canon Beeching in "A Note upon Waller's Distich" in An English Miscellany Presented to Dr. Furnival (Oxford, 1901), pp. 4-9. Waller has, in fact, fewer monosyllables than Spenser, but much less variation as to syllabization in successive lines.

He rent the crown / from vanquished Henry's head,
 Raised the White Rose, / and trampled on the Red;
 Till love, / triumphing o'er the victor's pride,
 Brought Mars and Warrick / to the conquered side;
 . . . . .
 Proud with the burden / of so brave a charge,
 . . . . .
 These surges ruin, / those our safety bring.
 . . . . .
 But that their wonder / did divert their care.<sup>95</sup>
 . . . . .
 At once it threatens / and obliges Heaven!
 . . . . .
 To frame no new church, / but the old refine;<sup>96</sup>

A very common form of rhetoric is the mere verbal balance we have already noted in Sandys and Fairfax. This is the line built on two centers in the double-substantive-adjective.

With the sweet sound of this harmonious lay
 . . . . .
 On the smooth back of silver Thames to ride
 . . . . .
 The hated relics of confounded Troy;
 . . . . .
 And dear remembrance of that fatal glance,<sup>97</sup>

These simple turns are much more common in the St. Andrew's lines than in the other two. The reader will observe how the last two examples emphasize thought and structure by the suppressed beat. Metrical variation is, however, rare in these early poems. The whole tone is so low-pitched that the balance itself rises to the force of emphasis, as a bit of red paint here and there might pick out certain lines in a set of smooth silver whorls without adding any new element of form. The lines which are balanced stand out distinctly, but on the whole the lines do not form notable units, and most of the couplets are closed by sheer pause for intellectual breath, rather than by any organic structure. Then too the couplets stand apart and rarely build up a continuous effect of style, though the narrative moves forward with ease.

<sup>95</sup> Waller, op. cit., I, 2, 4, "Of the Danger . . ." ll. 15-18; 40; 72; 78.

<sup>96</sup> Ibid., I, 18, "Upon His Majesty's repairing of Paul's," l. 56.

<sup>97</sup> Ibid., I, 2-5, "Of the Danger," ll. 34; 62; 88; 101. Italics mine.

The lines to Penshurst are less reflective in substance than these first three and more pensive. Yet in these lines the style is more terse, and Waller builds a simple but definitive syntactic structure more organically constructed on the pattern of half-line, line, and couplet than in the earlier poems. For this reason he is also able to mass his units to a larger whole.

- a) While in the park I sing, b) the listening deer
- c) Attend my passion, and forget to fear.
- a) When to the beeches I report my flame,
- b) They c) bow their heads, as if they felt the same.
- b) To gods appealing, a) when I reach their bowers
- With loud complaints, c) they answer me in showers.
- To thee a wild and cruel soul is given,
- More deaf than trees, and prouder than the heaven!<sup>98</sup>

Numbers "a," "b," and "c" suggest the repeated elements in the first three couplets and their variation. In the third couplet there is also a parallelism of elements between the two first half-lines and the two second. Couplet four catches up and applies the ideas of the first three, thereby securing forward movement; further, it emphasizes the fact that it gathers up the meaning, in that it makes an explicit statement of the parallelism which the other lines only suggest, and shapes this statement to an epigram. As to musical pattern, the first six lines have half-line movement with the cæsura varied in position to 6, 5, 5, 4, 5, 4. Line 2 creates secondary-pattern by the suppressed beat between the parallel units. Then in couplet 4, the unbroken first line, with its double key-elements in the center, wild and cruel, forms a pattern with the emphatic half-lines of the second line into which the key thought spreads. Line 8 sets syntactical variation against metrical variation in repetition.

*	'	*	'	'	*	*	*	*	'
More deaf than trees and prouder than the heaven!
1	1	1	2	1	2

This is richer in design and ampler in movement than anything in the earlier three poems.

<sup>98</sup> Ibid., I, 64, "At Penshurst," ll. 1-8.—If the reader wishes to see both how far formalization had progressed, and how purely formal Waller is, he may compare this with Grimald's "The Lover asketh pardon of his dere . . ." from Beza (Tottel, ed. Rollins, I, 94), which may have been in Waller's memory.

In The battle of the Summer Islands Waller exploits to the full this ampler skill. The lines and half-lines are distinct units, and there is much cross-patterning between the lines. Lines 31 and 32 of Canto I offer an interesting example of variation worked up into greater complexity of pattern.

Such is the mould, that the blest tenant feeds
On precious fruits, and pays his rent in weeds.<sup>99</sup>

Here for repetition the order of balanced parts in verb, preposition, object is repeated, but for variation the rhyme falls first on part "a" and then on part "c," thus giving an effect of transposition which is further enlarged by syllabic weight.

a	b	c	a	b	c
feeds	on	precious fruit ;	pays his rent	in	weeds
1	1	3	3	1	1

In general by inversion and by other kindred sharpenings of outline, Waller in this poem achieves more strength and variation of the sort we find in Falkland. Lines 42-45 will give a further example.

Ripe fruits and blossoms on the same trees live;
At once they promise what at once they give.
So sweet the air, so moderate the clime,
None sickly lives, or dies before his time.

The chief technical metrical variation is the suppressed beat falling after cæsura and compensated by cæsural pause, which leaves the parallel elements very distinct, or which in one case moulds a phrase into an organic unit by leaving the first and last beats very emphatic.

' * (*) * '
The prince of trees! is fuel to their fires,<sup>100</sup>

But in the sixteen typical lines beginning "Bermuda walled with rocks," there are only three instances of this variation. In the same lines there are two examples of the trochaic first beat, one example of trochaic beat after cæsura, and one instance of suspended beat in line 10.

* * ' '
On the rich shore, of ambergris is found.

This last seems to strengthen the effect of the suspended rhetoric. These metrical variations altogether are of the sort used by Drayton and Sandys and established by Falkland. They are less frequent than in Falkland, and hence they give to the whole less sustained energy of design, but they are handled very deftly and neatly.

<sup>99</sup> Waller, op. cit., I, 66 ff.

<sup>100</sup> Ibid, I. 12.

The Cromwell poem is more vigorously reflective in substance than any of the other poems of Waller we are considering except the St. Andrews lines, and also stronger in style and music. It is almost wholly in end-stopped couplets, an effect greatly sharpened by the quatrain arrangement with full period at the end of every quatrain but one; the lines, too, are very sharply closed, and the medial cæsura a fixed rule; the table on page 34, indicating cæsura in 66 per cent of the lines, takes account only of very heavy pauses; there is some pause in practically every line, usually medial. In mode of development the definition proceeds almost wholly in terms of moral sentiment and epigram, and there is hardly a line without balance or balance and contrast. These devices are artfully used to give the forward movement sometimes lacking in Waller's earlier work. The two couplets of the quatrain are integrated; the first may give a figure which is applied in the second, or the second expands and particularizes a general truth stated in the first. The dance of the balanced phrases of repetition is varied by cross-patterning between phrases and from line to line.

- a, 1) Your drooping country 2) torn with civil hate,
- b, 1) Restored by you, 2) is made a glorious state,
- c, 1) The seat of empire, 2) where the Irish come,
- d, 1) And the unwilling Scotch, 2) to fetch their doom.<sup>101</sup>

Here line "a" parallels line "b" as a whole. Half-line "a, 2" explains "a, 1," "b, 2" explains "b, 1"; but "a, 2" also crosses to "b, 1" and "b, 2" crosses to "a, 1." "C, 1" as an appositive gathers up "b, 2." Then the cross-patterning of idea is repeated between "c, 1" and "d, 2," and "c, 2" and "d, 1."

The influence of Waller and Denham, as Mr. T. H. Banks points out in his edition of Denham,<sup>102</sup> was interactive. To this interaction, as we have seen, should be added that of other poets writing contemporaneously. Denham's style, like Waller's, was a gradual growth. Mr. Banks states<sup>103</sup> that the original version (1636) of Denham's Virgil abounds in run-on lines. One example which he cites indicates how the development of the closed couplet and of the antithetic rhetoric went hand in hand. "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes" was translated in 1636, "The Grecians most when bringing gifts I fear." But in 1653 this was revised to, "Their swords less danger carry than their gifts." Cooper's Hill was written in 1643, although the famous Thames lines were not added until 1655.<sup>104</sup> But Denham's manner is pretty well formed in even the early version of

<sup>101</sup> Waller, op. cit., I, 10, "A Panegyric to My Lord Protector," ll. 13-16.

<sup>102</sup> John Denham, Poetical Works, ed. T. H. Banks Jr., (New Haven, 1928), p. 35.

<sup>103</sup> Ibid., pp. 43-44.

<sup>104</sup> Ibid., p. 52.

On the Earl of Strafford's Tryal and Death though less chiseled than later.<sup>106</sup> If, as seems natural, we may suppose that poem written just after the event in 1641, Denham had the technique in hand by 1641.

To examine Cooper's Hill in some detail we may select a few outstanding passages, lines 1-88, lines 125-134, and the Thames lines.<sup>106</sup> He has more run-on lines than Waller, not because of less fixity of aim and method but because he is, like Falkland, more free of his technique. The half-line is the basic unit of design, through which the couplet may be always suggested so that it may also be formally broken. We have noted in Waller the occasional play of an unbroken line against a line with two sharply marked halves. Denham sometimes extends this form to give the unbroken line effect in the end of one line and the beginning of the next,<sup>107</sup> instead of line by line, an effect used twice in the first lines.

Which did never dream
Upon Parnassus, || Nor did tast the stream
Of Helicon, ||

The effect is the stronger because the two syncopated lines (end-stopped, if I may use the phrase) are themselves balanced; and yet we feel the basic original pattern very distinctly because the two rhyme words, the true line ends, are strongly emphasized in being the centers of the balanced phrases. Line 7 is again run on. Here the parallel structure bridges the line, but a new metrical parallelism in a new stopped line effect, arises in the two tetrameter units thus created.

Parnassus stands; || if I can be to thee
A Poet, || thou Parnassus art to me.

The variety is carried further by inversion. Lines 11 and 12 have more regularized balance, but 11 in the two halves, 12 within the second half. Such variation in the particular form of balance is common, although simple half-line parallelism is also frequent. Of further melodic phrase, we find in the parallel phrases Upon Parnassus and in Helicon reversal of metrical pattern in the two names thus balanced. In lines 4 and 5 there is inversion; in 4 suppressed beat and repeated-varied pattern; and in 5, repeated-varied pattern:

$$\begin{array}{cccccccc} & / & * & * & / & * & & * & / & * & / \\ \hline \text{Those made not Poets, but the Poets those,} \\ & * & * & & / & / & * & / & * & & / \\ \hline \text{And as Courts make not Kings, but Kings the Court} \end{array}$$

<sup>106</sup> Ibid., p. 153-154.

<sup>106</sup> Ibid., pp. 63-87.

<sup>107</sup> Compare this with the examples of counter-pattern from Milton and Chaucer ante p. 171 and note 11.

In 11 the parallel repeats the pattern exactly, *un‘trac*’t ways*, and *a‘ery* paths**; but 12, continuing the same parallel, varies the phrase, *in my* fancy: than my eye.*

Lines 125–134 are more regular in their form of balance, with almost exact balance in lines 128, 129, 130, 132, 134, strengthened by alliteration; yet with cæsura and varied stress, no two lines are alike. Line 130 emphasizes the antithesis by the suppressed medial beat and the repeated initial heavy beat in both phrases, and then introduces variation by the alliteration inverted from adjective to noun, an alliteration which further marks off the beginning and end of the phrase and ties together what other devices have separated.

I would not rashly endeavor to explain the secret of the Thames lines where Dryden refrained. Yet certain points are worth noting. In line 190 the two balanced elements are set off by the suppressed beat and the secondary stress.

*   ‘   *   ‘   * || (*)*   \   *   ‘
My great example, as it is my theme

Lines 190 and 192 have sharp cæsuras and distinctly molded half-lines; line 191, set between these, doubles the effect by four almost distinct quarter-lines.

Though deep, || yet clear; || though gentle || yet not dull

Lines 191 and 192 both contain two balanced halves within which there is again balanced antithesis; but in this reiterated design, 191 repeats syntax exactly, 192 inverts it. The lines are also rich in metrical variety. In 191 the second half-line repeats the pattern of the first but doubles the proportion,

‘   *   ‘   ‘   *   \   *   ‘
deep yet clear   gentle yet not dull
1                    1                    2                    2 and binds the whole together by initial-final alliteration; 192 offers the same kind of repetition with variation, but dies down to the smaller pattern where 191 rises to the larger.

‘   *   *   ‘   (*   *   *)   ‘   *   ‘
Strong without rage, without o’erflowing full

Put the two lines together, and you get a swelling and receding wave.

(*)   ‘   ‘   ‘ / (*)   ‘   ‘   ‘   ‘
‘   ‘   ‘   ‘ / (*** )   ‘   ‘   ‘

Denham's substance and expression have more boldness and edge than Waller's. A similar sweep is given to his form, too, by these devices and elements of form, although in truth they do not explain his music any more than a course in harmony accounts for Purcell.

One more little collection of occasional verse written at about the same date will show, finally, how widely the couplet had established itself by this time. In 1646, the year after Waller's first volume, and between the two versions of Cooper's Hill, appeared Men-miracles with other Poemes by M.LL.St. of Ch. Ch. in Oxon.<sup>108</sup> Lluelyn's chief power in this sort of verse lies in the intellectual vigor of his condensed definitions and sententious observations, and his form accordingly is fittingly that of the couplet we have now defined, with balance and contrast built on the two halves of the divided line, and with frequent metrical shift that gives emphasis to the essential point of the analysis. The best lines are perhaps these from the Elegie on the Death of Sir Horatio Vere.

Valour's not borne of Nature, but the Will,
They only conquer that with Judgement kill.

. . . . .
The mind, not the tough flesh was his defence,
He lost the feare of Wounds, but not the Sence;<sup>109</sup>

They show maturity in the variety with which they use the formula. Another interesting example is his Elegie. On the death of Master H. C.

As Clouds of Incense 'bove the Altars come,
Yet all those Clouds lay treasur'd up ith' Gumme.

. . . . .
So was thy life, it might gaine breadth, and rise,
And purchase more Extent, but not more prise.
Good parts in Youth and Manhood are the same,
They're the same Picture in a smaller frame.<sup>110</sup>

Metaphysical in its analysis of its thought through scientific image, this poem is in form classical; epigrammatic and terse in statement, with balance and contrast as its instruments of definition, phrased in closed couplets.

<sup>108</sup> This M. LL. is Martin Lluelyn. His volume contains among other things, ranging from comic folksongs to religious lyrics, a number of occasional poems and elegies. Of these the majority of the occasional poems and all the elegies are in closed couplets. It is not remarkable poetry—not at all Lluelyn's greatest—but it is firm and clear-cut in movement, and it takes the classical couplet for granted.

<sup>109</sup> Lluelyn, op. cit., p. 122.—Italics in the original.

<sup>110</sup> Ibid., p. 126.—Italics in the original.

The work which accompanies Lluelyn's verse shows even more emphatically how widely the couplet was established. His poems were introduced, as was customary, by sets of complimentary verse, seven in number, from his friends, men unknown to us, and presumably very minor authors. Of these seven poems, five are in closed couplets. One, by J. F., is so assured in its form that it is worth illustrating at some length. Indeed, one wonders whether Denham had not seen it between 1642 and 1655.

A poet's then exact in every part
That is borne one from Nature, nurst by Art.
Whose happy mixture both of skill and fate,
Makes the most suddaine thought Elaborate.
Whose easie straines a flowing sense doth fit,
Unforc'd expression, and unravisht wit.
Words Fill'd with equall subject such as brings
To chosen Language high and chosen Things.
Harsh reason cleare as day, as smooth as steepe.
Glide here like Rivers, even still though deepe.
. . . . .
Those wretched soules, whose Cold and Hunger writes,
That in their Inke-hornes weare their Appetites.
Whose labours still ride Post, and for their Toile, Receive the Hackney hire, a groate a Mile.<sup>111</sup>

This verse lacks even tension between unstressed syllable and beat; but it is terse and pungent, and it uses line and medial pause and pithy rhyme very effectively to give sharp emphasis to its balance and contrast. The placing of the pause is, too, skilfully varied. It is classical, also, in the force given to each syllable by the terse beat of the half-line units in the couplet. Note particularly the sixth couplet of those cited. This musical definiteness is as apparent as the weight of meaning given to each word by the epigrammatic compression. Then both in this couplet and in the following one, the way in which the second line grows out of the first into a stinging lash-tip is remarkable. And this effect again is dependent on the condensed definiteness of the couplet form with its neat regular parts tied together in organic formality. As was plain in Waller, the inevitable rhetorical weight of the words, too, in such a style focuses the sharpest beat of the music on the balancing elements. This work of an unknown J. F. in 1646, thus, at its best, contemporaneously with the mature work of Waller and Denham, speaks with almost the weight of Dryden; speaks so chiefly as the result of a steady process of growth since Tottel's Miscellany, through the mastered technique of the didactic and satiric couplet.

<sup>111</sup> Ibid., sig. A 5 verso,—Italics in the original.

I put down my pen to read with a class the close of Lycidas.

In solemn troops, and sweet Societies
That sing, and singing in their glory move, . . .

The difference here is not that between skilled poets and a supreme musician. Nor is it merely one of technique. It is a difference of modes, of the fundamental nature of the experience aimed at. Melodic phrasing in verse is, in the very nature of the case, conditioned by syntactic development; but even if we could secure with the terse and formalized epigram of this poetry the liquid flow of Milton's music, or with the Miltonic period, the neat tunes of Waller, we should experience from the result a psychological confusion. The effects which we have described sprang from no mere loss of skill or failure of musical ideas. Even those who feel most keenly the narrowing of horizons, and the loss of emotional power in the music of this period will feel, too, that the new expression and the new metrical form have as much an organic imaginative harmony with the substance they embody as has the sublimity of Milton's music with his vision. The Greeks, with their lucid sense of fact, recognized, without explaining, the absolutely fundamental differences in æsthetic and ethical effect of the several modes of music. So here we see the formal mode changing with the change in spirit. It was because they were artists that these craftsmen strove, consciously and unconsciously, as they formed a new standard of expression, to create new metrical designs both technically realizable within the new medium and æsthetically harmonious with its meaning.

RUTH WALLERSTEIN

The University of Wisconsin

XIII

THE SATIRIC BACKGROUND OF THE ATTACK ON THE PURITANS IN SWIFT'S A TALE OF A TUB

IN a previous article<sup>1</sup> I pointed out that Swift's analysis of Jack the Dissenter had been in part anticipated by earlier satirists. Some references to plays, poems, and prose attacks were then given to substantiate my contention. In this brief bibliography of non-dramatic satire from the Anatomy of Melancholy, 1621, to Tom Brown, ca. 1700, further evidence will be presented that before Swift's time there was a long tradition of satire of the Puritans, and one which in many ways was much like his own attack. Since the work of presenting the dramatic satire of the Puritans has, in part at least, been done,<sup>2</sup> no titles of plays will be included. The bibliography will also confine itself to citation of satires on the Puritans. The year 1621 was chosen as a starting point, for I believe that with the Anatomy of Melancholy there began a new era of satire, and especially of analysis of cause and effect in the problems of religious enthusiasm, a subject upon which Swift wrote some of his best passages. That this bibliography is in any way complete is not claimed; it is hoped, however, that it will present some satires which have been neglected by students of the strife between the Puritans and their satirists, and will also help to clarify the problems of the literary background of A Tale of a Tub and the Discourse on the Mechanical Operation of the Spirit

The Anatomy of Melancholy. Robert Burton, 1621. (Part 3, "Religious Melancholy," contains a very interesting analysis of religious enthusiasm, with special reference to the Puritans. Burton was one of the first seventeenth-century students of the causes of religious zeal.)

The Interpreter, Rev. Thomas Scott. 1622.—in Stuart Tracts, 1603–1693, An English Garner, ed. C. H. Firth. (A rather peculiar reaction to the religious parties of the day is found in this poem. Scott, one of the chaplains of James I, reviles the Puritan, i.e., the Brownist, Separatist, or Independent, less than the "Protestant" who is pictured as even more hypocritical, seditious, and dishonest than the hated Papists.)

<sup>1</sup> "Swift's Tale of a Tub compared with Earlier Satires of Puritans," PMLA, XLVII (1932), 171.

<sup>2</sup> Thompson, E. N. S., Controversy Between the Puritans and the Stage; Wright, Rose A., The Political Play of the Restoration; "The Quakers in English Stage Plays before 1800," Maxfield, E. M., PMLA (March, 1930); "Political Satire in London Stage Plays, 1680–83," Whiting, George W., Mod. Phil., xxviii.

- A Discovery of the Errors of the English Anabaptists*, Edmond Jessop. 1623. (One of the first, if not the first, of a long line of exposés of the hated Anabaptists who made themselves famous in the Munster uprising.)
- The Art of Thriving, or the Plaine Path-Way to Preferment*. Tho. Powell. 1635.—in Somers Tracts, vii, 187–208. (Advice is given for advancement in all professions. Unambitious piety and study are discounted as aids to ecclesiastical advancement, for one must use servility and flattery. Swift, in his Letter to a Young Clergyman, expressed much the same cynicism.)
- A True Subject's Wish*. Martin Parker. 1640.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan.
- The Poet's Blind mans bough, or Have among you my blind Harpers*. Martin Parker. 1640.—in Ashbee Reprints. (Both of Parker's poems satirize the men who make a show of zeal and conscience while they are really working against the Church and State.)
- Vox Borealis: or, The Northern Discoverie*. 1641.—in Harleian Miscellany, iii, 219–232. (If no explanatory note is given, it may be assumed that the satires are merely statements of the Puritans' combined hypocrisy, sedition, and heresy, with perhaps a few side glances at their morality.)
- English Puritanisme, containing the maine opinions of the rigidest sort of those that are called Puritans*. Williams Ames. 1641.—in Stuart Tracts, vol. xv. (This is another of the early collections of Puritan heresies and is very much like Jessop's Discovery of the Errors of the English Anabaptists.)
- A Warning for England, especially for London; in the famous History of the frantick Anabaptists, their Wild Preachings and Practices in Germany*. 1642.—in Harl. Misc., vol. vii. (The title is explanatory of this, one of the most complete of all the histories of the Anabaptists.)
- A Description of the Sect called the Family of Love*. 1641.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. iii. (This is an unique account of the Family, here pictured as a group of licentious intellectuals, headed by a magnetic genius who quotes the classics, leads the revels, and seduces country girls. The meetings are semi-public, and no pious excuses are made for the debauchery. The plot deals with the story of an innocent girl led astray by the leader. It is hard to explain this tract, unless it were written for the story's sake, rather than as a satire of the real Family of Love. Cf. Middleton's Family of Love.)
- A Tract of Puritans*. William Sheeres. 1641.
- Heads of All Fashions, Being a Plaine Desection or definition of diverse, and sundry sorts of heads*. 1642.—in Ashbee Reprints. (Of course the "roundheads" are stressed.)
- Madfashions, od Fashions, all out of Fashions, or, the Emblems of these Distracted times*. John Taylor. 1642. (This poem has the popular ridicule of the lowly social status and ignoble occupations of the Puritans.)
- A Three-fold Discourse betweene three Neighbours, Algate, Bishopgate, and John Heyden the late cobbler of Hounsditch, a professed Brownist*. 1642.—in Ashbee Reprints. (John, the Brownist, distorts Bible passages, preaches absurd sermons, and has foolish and violent scruples. The satire emphasizes the Puritans' hatred of all forms and ceremonies relating, however remotely, to Catholicism.)

A Godly Exhortation to this Distressed Nation. Humphrey Crouch. 1642.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan. (Mr. Rollins says of this poem: "It is difficult from this sheet to determine Humphrey Crouch's political affiliations. Perhaps his poem is a fair reflection of the state of mind of ordinary men in the street. Such persons always find themselves vaguely disturbed by wars, which interrupt their business and happiness for causes that are obscure and inexplicable." Cavalier and Puritan, p. 144. Crouch was, however, very much convinced that the Puritans were hypocritical.

("When people stumble at a straw,
An make their own self will a law.
When people maketh Sanctity
A cloak to hide hypocrisie.")

The Puritan and Papist, A Satyr, by Mr. Abraham Cowley. 1643.—in Stuart Tracts. Vol. v. (Both sects are reviled for being holy cheats, for publishing false news, and for conducting unintelligible services. Included here is "The Character of a Holy Sister," which is most vulgar mockery of Puritan Women.)

The Rebel's Catechism. 1643.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. vii.

Mock-Majesty: or, the Seige of Munster. 1644.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. viii. (Another of the tales of the atrocities of the Anabaptists.)

A Nest of perfidious vipers: or, the Second Part of the Parliament's Calendar of black Saints. 1644.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. v.

The Souldiers Catechism. 1644.—in Stuart Tracts. Vol. iv. (Chiefly political propaganda among the soldiers of the Puritans, but it contains some religious satire.)

The Dippers Dipt: or, the Anabaptists Duck'd and Plung'd over Head and Ears. Dr. Daniel Featly. 1645. (This book was published in January of 1645 and was undoubtedly the inspiration for the later works of Edwards, Baillie, Paget, and Prynne, all of which appeared in 1645. The first part of The Dippers Dipt was a reprint of the 1642 A Warning for England. Other sections told a complete history of present Anabaptist practices and theories. The book also contained some rather good passages dealing with the causes of religious fanaticism. Featly was a rather half-hearted Presbyterian, but he was like the more ardent of his fellow-churchmen in hating and despising all Independents.)

Gangrena: or, a catalogue and discovery of many of the Errors, Heresies, Blasphemies and Pernicious Practices of the Sectaries of this time. Thomas Edwards. 1645. (The Gangrena is a dull listing of the "Errours" of the Sectaries. Edwards was a staunch Presbyterian.)

Dissuasive from the Errours of the time. Robert Baillie. 1645.

Heresiography; or, A Description of the Hereticks and Sectaries of these latter times. Ephraim Paget. 1645.

A Fresh Discovery of some Prodigious new Wandering-Blazing-Stars and Fire-brands, styling themselves New Lights, firing Our Church and State into new combustions. Wm. Prynne. 1645. (The books of Baillie, Paget, and Prynne are mere continuations of Featly or Edwards. The five 1645 attacks on the - Independents by Presbyterians are part of a very interesting chapter in the religious history of the period )

- The World is Turned Upside Down.* 1646.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan.
- The Anabaptists out of order.* 1646.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan.
- Pseudodoxia Epidemica: or, Enquiries into very many received Tenents and Commonly presumed Truths.* Thomas Browne. 1646. (Browne gives a very uncomplimentary estimate of the intelligence of the common people.)
- Two Humble Petitions of the Apprentices of London and parts Adjacent, for Lawfull Recreations.* 1646 and 1647; printed 1647. (These petitions show a vigorous reaction against the Puritan scruples which banned "honest recreation." The apprentices ask for the annual festivals once more or the granting of one more day each month for recreation. These petitions are non-satiric but significant.)
- Anabaptism, the True Fountaine of Independency, Antinomy, Brownisme, Familisme and most of the Errours which for the time doe trouble the Church of England.* Robert Baillie. 1647. (This tract is a continuation of Baillie's 1645 Dissuasive. It contains many quotations from Edward's Gangrena.)
- The Old Protestant's Library.* 1647.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads, Vol. I.
- The Cities Welcome to Colonel Rich and Colonel Baxter.* 1647.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads, Vol. I.
- The Character of a London Diurnall: With severall select Poems.* 1647.—in English Historical Tracts, Vol. xxvi. (One of the poems, "A New Letanie for our New Lent," is in some lines much like Crouch's "A Godly Exhortation." Another poem mentions the "wrought-cap" of the Puritans, cf. the quilted caps in the Discourse on the Mechanical Operation of the Spirit, p. 201, T. Scott edition.)
- The Dominion of the Sword.* 1649.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads, Vol. I.
- The Fame, Wit and Glory of the West.* 1649.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan.
- The Credit of Yorkshire, or the Glory of the North.* 1649.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan. (The two last-named poems use the old substituted-bride theme. The poor Puritan is in each case the victim of a conspiracy to rob him of a bride who prefers the gallant Cavalier.)
- Hosanna: or, a Song of Thanksgiving, sung by the Children of Zion, and set forth in three notable speeches at Grocers-Hall, on the late solemn Day of Thanksgiving, Thursday, June 7, 1649.* (The mock speeches represent the Puritans as uttering the most seditious remarks. Hugh Peters is one of the speakers. This is, as far as I can discover, one of the first satires to employ the method of the mock Puritan sermon. It is also one of the first appearances of Peters, who was to become the "typical Puritan" in the eyes of Royalists.)
- Gallant News from Ireland.* 1649.
- A Hymne to Cromwell.* 1649. (Both these poems are from Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan, and are insults to Cromwell.)
- A brief Relation of an Atheisticall creature, living at Lambert.* 1649.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan.
- The Wiltshire Rant: or, a Narrative . . . of Thomas Webbe.* 1652. (An exposé of a hypocritical Puritan preacher and his affairs with the Sisters. It is rather unique because it presents a new type of preacher—the rather clever and partially educated evangelist who today would be more easily recognized than would many of the other Puritans who had been pictured.)

The Character of a Time-Serving Saint. 1652.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan.

The Life and Death of Stephen Marshall. 1653. (Marshall, like Webbe, was the product of the new opportunities for popular preachers who had little or no religion but who could sway rural audiences. Miss Richardson, English Preachers and Preaching, 1640-1676, quotes references to Marshall in Cleveland's Rebel Scot and in Fuller's Worthies; both references are highly uncomplimentary.)

Bibliotheca Parliamenti. 1653.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. VII. (This is the first of the mock libraries which I have found. Some of the titles of books are: 17. "The Ginger-bread Prophet, or the Akharan of Oliver Mahomet, explained and expounded by Hugh Peters, late pastor to a hunger-starved Flock at Salem, in New England." A note explains—"Hugh Peters was for a time a preacher in New England; the general country of refuge for the wilder Fanatics in the earlier part of Charles I's reign." 39. "Carnis Resurrection, or the Exaltation of the Flesh by the Power of the Spirit to the Comfort of the Dejected. . . by Hugh Peters." Most of the titles indicate that the Puritans were lustful, hypocritical, and utterly depraved. Certain "Acts and Orders" of the Puritan Parliament were added, most of them as coarse as the titles of books.)

A Free Parliament Litany. 1655.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads, Vol. I.

A Treatise Concerning Enthusiasme as it is an Effect of Nature; but is mistaken by many for either Inspiration, or Diabolical Possession. Meric Casaubon 1655. (This is a rather important analysis of Enthusiasm and may have influenced Swift. See Notes & Queries (June 6, 1931) CLX, 405, for my brief note calling attention to the fact that Sir William Temple admired this work. He may have called Swift's attention to it.)

Enthusiasmus Triumphatus; or, A Brief Discourse of the Nature, Causes, Kinds and Cure of Enthusiasme. Henry More. 1656. (This little-known analysis of religious enthusiasm was probably the best seventeenth century work on the subject. The usual ridicule of the Puritans is found here, but there is also a clear statement that religious zeal and ecstasy are caused by natural forces, chief in importance of which is the sexual excitation to which the Puritans were supposed to be peculiarly prone. Swift's Discourse on the Mechanical Operation of the Spirit seems to owe much to this work of More.)

The Grand Impostor examined: or, the Life Trial, and Examination of James Naylor, the seduced and seducing Quaker; with the manner of his Riding into Bristol. 1656.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. VI. (Hume, Hist. of Eng., VII, 336, has a very good account of this Quaker, who, impersonating Christ, rode into Bristol, accompanied by worshipping followers. See also Gooch and Laski, English Democratic Ideas in the XVII Century, 1927, pp. 237-238. Naylor, with Hugh Peters, became a standard type of Puritan. Swift mentions him in one of his last poems, "The Yahoo's Overthrow." See L.T.L.S. (May, 14, 1931) for my brief study of this poem.)

- The Quakers Catechism*. Richard Baxter. 1656.—in English Historical Tracts, Vol. xxxix. (Baxter wrote very leniently of the Quakers, although he accused them of too great spiritual pride. Their "proud, scornful, ranting language" also offended him.)
- The Quakers Fear*. Laurence Price. 1656.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan. (This is the account of the hunger strike of a Quaker, James Parnel. Evelyn mentions this man in his entry for July 10, 1656, Diary.)
- A New Prophetie*. 1657.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan.
- The Protecting Brewer*. 1657.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads, Vol. i. (An attack on Cromwell and the hypocrisy of the Saints.)
- Fast and Loose; or, the Armies Figgaries*. 1659.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli.
- James Nailor's Recantation*. 1659.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. vi. (Satire is achieved by quotation of the recantation. The apology is so fantastic and absurd that one wonders if it were not composed by some satirist of the Puritans. If the text is authentic—then the scoffers were justified in their ridicule of Puritan rhetoric.)
- Peters Pattern: or, the Perfect Path to Worldly Happiness: as it was delivered in a Funeral Sermon, preached at the Interment of Mr. Hugh Peters, lately deceased*. By I. C. [Joseph Caryl.] 1659.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. vi. (A neglected masterpiece of presentation of a most complete Puritan. The entire mock sermon is delivered in the "Language of the Saints.")
- Democritus turned Statesman*. 1659.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. vi.
- A Copie of Quarries, or, a Comment upon the Life, and actions of the Grand Tyrant and his Complices: Oliver the first and last of that name*. 1659.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli.
- The Leveller*. 1659.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. iv.
- A Character of England, as it was lately presented in a Letter to a nobleman of France*. 1659.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. vii. (This purported translation from a French letter is devoted almost entirely to ridicule of the service, sermons, and "canting" of the Puritans.)
- The Interest of England stated: or, a faithful and just account of the Aimes of all Parties now Pretending*. 1659.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli.
- Sir Harry Vane's Last Sigh for the Committee of Safety*. 1659.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli.
- Decrees and Orders of the Committee of Safety of the Commonwealth of Oceana*. John Harrington, Clerk to the Committee. 1659.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli. (Here is found a mention of the "flatuosities" of the Puritans, a theme used by Swift in the Aeolist section of A Tale of a Tub.)
- Bibliotheca Militum: or, the Souldiers Publick Library*. 1659.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. vii. (This tract is a little less coarse than the similar mock library previously mentioned. Hugh Peters is again ridiculed.)
- The Lamentation of a Sinner, or Bradshaw's horrid Farewel, together with his last Will and Testament*. 1659.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli. (This tract includes another hit at Oceana.)
- A New King anointed*. 1659.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli.

- An Alarum to Corporations.* 1659.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli. (A belated retelling of the Anabaptist practices.)
- A Review and Further Discovery of the late Disorderly and Rude carriage of some persons at the meeting of Quakers at Sabridgeworth.* 1659 —in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli. (After mild reproof of the people who broke up the Quakers' meeting, the tract accuses the Quakers of sedition, rebellion, vain pride, and practicing witchcraft. James Naylor is mentioned.)
- Questions Propounded to George Whitehead and George Fox, who disputed by turns against one University-man at Cambridge.* 1659.—in Cromwellian Tracts, Vol. ii. (The two Quakers were of course defeated in argument. Some most embarrassing questions were asked. One concerns lewdness, another sex perversion, and the 94th is "Can you name any sin either of omission or commission, that one eminent Quaker or other hath not been notoriously guilty of?")
- Gagg for the Quakers.* 1659.—in Cromwellian Tracts, Vol. xli. (As in an earlier tract, the Quakers are here accused of witchcraft.)
- England's Joyfull Holiday.* 1660. (Another attack on Hugh Peters.)
- Englands Object: or, Good and true newes to all True-hearted Subjects, for the taking and apprehending of that horrid deluding Sower of Sedition Hugh Peters.* 1660.—in Rollins, Cavalier and Puritan. (Swift's Jack may not be Hugh Peters, but the task of creating a Puritan was made easier for Swift by the repeated specific attacks on Peters, who was chosen to be the scapegoat for the Puritans. Naylor represented the crazed Independents or more erratic sectaries; Peters the seditious leader of the Cromwellian party's religious activities. Here, in one man, the satirists often pictured all the despicable traits they found in the Puritans.)
- Win at First and Lose at Last.* 1660.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads, Vol. i.
- Physician Cure thy Self: or, an Answer to a seditious Pamphlet Entitled Eye Salve for the English Army, etc.* 1660.—in English Historical Tracts, Vol. xlv.
- No Blinde Guides: In answer to a seditious Pamphlet of J. Milton's.* Roger L'Estrange. 1660.—in English Historical Tracts, Vol. xlv. (Milton is grossly insulted in this tract.)
- Bradshaws Ultimum Vale. Being the Last Words that are ever intended to be spoke of him. As they were delivered in a Sermon preach'd at his Interment.* 1660.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xli. (Another mock sermon preached by some Puritan. The influence of Caryl's Peters Pattern, 1659, is evident.)
- The Acts and Monuments of the Late Rump.* 1660.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. vii.
- A Ballad.* 1660.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads, Vol. i. (Jack Presbyter, talking through his nose, is one of the characters.)
- The qualifications of Persons, declared capable by the Rump Parliament, to elect, or be elected, members to supply their House.* 1660.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. v. (A clever satire of the uses and profits of Godliness. The Puritans are also accused of gross immorality.)
- Don Juan Lamberto; or, a Comical History of the late times.* 1661.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. vii. (This satire is in the form of a mock romance, telling of the activities of public men in the period between the death of Cromwell and the Restoration. Religious satire is introduced through the almost inevitable attack on Hugh Peters.)

A Short History of the English Rebellion. Compiled in Verse, by Marchamont Nedham, author of Mercurius Pragmaticus. 1661.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. II.

Semper Eidem; or, a Parallel betwixt the ancient and modern Fanaticks. 1661.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. VII. (This tract was written primarily to discuss a disturbance made in London by the "fanatics." After telling of the occurrence, the author gives a history of fanaticism from the days of Oldcastle. The Quakers, and especially James Naylor, are fiercely attacked. The writer shows some historical ability, makes an attempt to explain the causes of fanaticism, and seems to have a partial realization of the abnormal character of some of the fanatics. It is one of the good minor studies of religious enthusiasm.)

The History of the Life and Death of Oliver Cromwell. J. H. Gent 1663.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. I

The Old Cloak. 1663.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads, Vol. I. (The "Old Cloak" is the hypocritical and vicious Presbyterian party.)

Cabala, or an Impartial account of the non-conformists Private Designs, actings and wayes. From Aug. 24, 1662 to Dec 25, 1662. 1663.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. XLI.—Note in pencil—"Sir John Birkenhead." (This tract is in the form of the minutes of a secret committee of ejected ministers who have met to draw up plans for a history of the sufferings of the faithful. The stock phrases of the Puritans, the senseless sermons, the foolish scruples, the hypocritical excuses for lapses from virtue, and, of course, the immorality of the Puritans are all mocked.)

A Proposal Humbly Offered for the Farming of Liberty of Conscience. 1663.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. V. (This tract gives an elaborate system, with tables of rates, by which the Dissenters may sell the right to believe. Swift also proposed a swearers' bank, and the attention to detail and the general plan of this Proposal may have caught his eye.)

Hudibras. Samuel Butler. Part 1, 1663. (Parts 2 and 3, 1664 and 1679, will not be listed separately. The problem of Swift's indebtedness to Hudibras is too complicated a one to be even attempted here. It should, however, be stated that Butler clearly distinguished between the Presbyterians and the Independents and gave definite characteristics to each. I have noted attacks on either Presbyterians alone or Independents alone, but the average satire made little or no pretense to separate the various groups of Dissenters. Of course the Quakers were almost outside the pale of even the Independents; i.e. the Brownists, etc., and were given special and detailed attention.)

The Life and Death of Ralph Wallis the cobbler of Gloucester: together with some inquiring into the mystery of Conventiclistism. 1670.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. LXXX. (This tract contains a rather good account of why women flock to the conventicle, and also attempts to find the causes of religious zeal.)

Some undated tracts will be listed here as they seem to be closely related to others of the dates of cir. 1670.

- A Catalogue of Books, of the Newest Fashion, to be sold by Auction, at the Whigs Coffee-House, at the Sign of the Jackanapes, in Prating-Alley.*
- The Last Will and Testament of Fathers Peters, as it was found quilled into my Lord Chancellor's Cap.*—in Harl. Misc., Vol. v.
- Some small and simple Reasons, . . . By Aminadab Blower, a devout Bellowsman-der of Pimlico.*—in Harl. Misc., Vol. vii.
- The Old Pharisee, with the New Phylacteries of Presbytery.*—in Harl. Misc., viii.
- The Last Will of George Fox, the Quakers Great Apostlc.*—in Harl. Misc., Vol. ix.
- The Grounds and Occasions of the Contempt of the Clergy and Religion Enquired into, in a letter written to R.L. [Roger L'Estrange.] John Eachard. 1670.* (This was a very popular work, as the ninth edition came in 1685. Swift mentions this book twice: in the 1710 Apology to A Tale of a Tub; in Thoughts on Various Subjects. Eachard wrote wittily of the methods by which the clergy of the Dissenters aroused zeal in their hearers.)
- The character of a Quaker, in his true and proper Colours; or the Clownish Hypocrite Anatomized.* By R. H. 1671.
- An Assembly Lecture, or a Sermon held forth at a Conventicle.* 1674.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. XLVIII. (This is clearly a poor imitation of Caryl's Peters Pattern. The same text is used, and the same points of satire are made.)
- The Character of a Fanatic. By a Person of Quality.* 1675.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. vii. (Here the fanatic mistakes the maggots in his brain for inspiration. Cf. same idea in Tale of a Tub, p. 52; Discourse on the Mechanical Operation of the Spirit, p. 201, T. Scott edition.)
- A Modest account of the Wicked Life of that Grand Impostor, Lodowick Muggleton.* 1676.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. i. (Swift mentions Muggleton in his poem, "The Yahoo's Overthrow.")
- Geneva and Rome; or, the Zeal of Both Boiling over.* 1679.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads. (Inspired by the Popish Plot of 1678 and the feared combination of the Catholics and Puritans.)
- A True and exact copy of a treasonable and bloody paper, Called the Fanaticks New Covenant.* 1680.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. vii. (This tract tells of the plans of the Scottish sect called the Cameronians. If quoted accurately, the paper is certainly piously seditious.)
- The last Speech and dying words of Thomas Lord, alias Colonel Pride; being touched in Conscience for his inhuman murder of the Bears in the Bear-garden.* 1680.—in Harl. Misc., Vol. iii.
- The Casuist uncas'd in a Dialogue betwixt Richard and Baxter, . . .* 1680. Roger L'Estrange. Stuart Tracts, Vol. iv. (In this tract L'Estrange began his work of compiling and publishing the idiocies spoken and written by the Puritans. Mixed with the quotations are satirical comments on Baxter and all Dissenters. It is here that the term "Holy Dialect" is used to characterize the language of the Saints. L'Estrange borrowed many phrases from Edwards' Gangrena, another compilation of Puritan, but only Independent, idiocies.)
- A Dialogue betwixt Sam. the Ferriman at Docket, Will, a Waterman of London, and*

- Tom, a bargeman of Oxford upon the Kings calling a Parliament to meet at Oxford.* 1681.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. iv.
- Presbytery Truly Displayed: or, an Impartial Character of the Presbyterian. To which is annexed the Ballad of the Cloak.* 1681.—in English Historical Tracts, Vol. XLVI.
- The Character of a modern Whig or an alamode True Loyal Protestant.* 1681.—in English Historical Tracts, Vol. XLVI.
- A Dialogue between the Pope and a Phanatick, concerning affairs in England.* 1681. A Second Dialogue was also published in 1681.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. iv.
- The Dissenter's Sayings, in Requital for L'Estrange's Sayings. Published in their own words, for the Information of the people.* Roger L'Estrange. Second Edition. 1681.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. iv. (The Puritans had apparently published a tract called L'Estrange's Sayings. As in the Casuist Uncas'd, L'Estrange makes many quotations from Edward's Gangrena.)
- The Dissenter's Sayings The Second Part.* Roger L'Estrange. 1681.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. iv.
- The Shammer Shamm'd.* Roger L'Estrange. 1681.
- Vox Lachrymae, A Sermon Newly Held Forth at Weavers-hall upon the funeral of the Famous T. O. Doctor of Salamanca. By Elephant Smith, Clasp-maker, an unworthy Labourer in the affairs of the Good old Cause.* 1681.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. iv. (The text for this sermon is taken from Hudibras. Canto. 1; 1, 2, 3, 4. The tract is another imitation of the Puritan Holy Dialect.)
- Remarks on the Growth and Progress of Non-conformity.* Roger L'Estrange. 1682.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xcii.
- A most learned, conscientious and devout Exercise, or Sermon of Self-Denyal, Preached or Held forth—by Lieutenant-General Oliver Cromwell.* 1682.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. iv. (Cromwell is represented as making very obscene remarks about the women of "the flock of Saints.")
- The Roundheads Resolution.* 1682.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. v.
- Mercurius Menippeus, The Loyal Satirist; or, Hudibras in Prose, written by an unknown hand in the time of the late Rebellion, but never till now published.* 1682.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. vii. (A note says: "This tract was probably written either by Butler or Birkenhead." This tract has the usual themes of satire of the lowly positions of the Puritans, pious hypocrisy, sexual irregularities.) Cf. Lamar's ed. of Butler, Satires and Misc. Poetry and Prose, (1928).
- Religio Laici.* John Dryden. 1682. (This poem is too well-known to need more than the comment that it contributed few new themes to the attack on the Dissenters.)
- Sphinx Lugduno—Genevensis Sive Reformatore Proteus containing the True Character of Sanctified Legion.* 1682.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xvii.
- Beaufrons: or, a New Discovery of Treason under the Fair-face and Mask of Religion and of Liberty of Conscience.* David Jenner. 1682.
- Considerations upon a Printed Sheet Entitled the Speech of the Late Lord Russell to the Sheriffs.* Roger L'Estrange. 1683.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. iv.

- The Character of an Honest Man; whether stiled Whig or Tory, and his opposite, the Knave* 1683.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. iv.
- Vox Clamantis; or, a cry to Protestant Dissenters, calling them from unwarrantable ways.* 1683.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xcii.
- Third Dialogue Between the Pope and A Phanatick.* 1684.—Stuart Tracts, xcii.
- An Awakening Work in Season to the Grand-Jury-Men of the Nation.* 1684.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xcii.
- A Christian Caveat to all Loyal Subjects: or, a Looking-Glass Displaying the foul face of Phanaticism.* 1684.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xcii.
- The Hind and the Panther.* John Dryden. 1687. (Unlike the Religio Laici and most of the satires, this poem differentiates between the various groups of Puritans.)
- A Letter to a Dissenter, upon occasion of his majesty's late gracious Declaration of Indulgence.* By George, Marquis of Halifax. 1687.—Somers Tracts, Vol. ix.
- A Short Litany.* 1687.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads.
- A Litany Recommended to the Ecclesiastical Commisioners.* 1689.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads.
- An account of the Design of the late Narrative: Entitled, the Dissenters New Plots.* 1689.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xcii.
- Pandora's Box; or, the Mischievous Effects of the word "Abdicate."* 1689.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads. (In the years 1687 and 1689 there was an increasing number of political tracts. However, these also said that the Puritans were using religion as a cloak hiding the most treasonable schemes. This later period lost some of the earlier interest in the heresies and evil practices of the religious bodies, although we shall soon see that Tom Brown brought back the old traditional type of attack. Unifying the religious and political attack on the Puritans is the emphasis placed by the Royalists and Anglicans upon the supposed utter hypocrisy of the Saints. As we approach the time of Swift we must keep in mind the varying changes in the convention of attack on the Dissenters. Certainly we can say that it was becoming more political in most instances.)
- Brethren in Iniquity; or, the Confederacy of Papists with Sectaries.* 1690.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xcii.
- The Trimmer.* D'Urfey. 1690.—in Wilkins, Political Ballads.
- A True and Impartial Narrative of the Dissenters New Plot, with a large and exact Relation of all their old ones.* 1690.—in Stuart Tracts, Vol. xcii.
- The Character of the Wisest Man.* 1696.—in Somers Tracts, Vol. ix.

It is rather fitting to close the bibliography with the works of Thomas Brown, since, as has been said, he marks a singularly reactionary tendency in satire of the Puritans. A contemporary of Swift, he may have had an important bearing upon the latter's ideas.<sup>3</sup> With Brown we have once more, except in one poem perhaps, the old ridicule of a people who must have changed greatly since the days of Peters and the Quaker Christ, James Naylor. Although satire of the Puritans was becoming political in nature, the presence and popularity of Brown's traditional attacks may point to a firm conviction in some English minds that the Dissenters were the same lustful hypocrites as of old. Therefore, the satires of Brown are presented here, for, although there is no clear proof that all of them antedate A Tale of a Tub, at least some of them are part of the English scene in the last years of seventeenth century and were undoubtedly available to Swift.

<sup>3</sup> See E. N. S. Thompson, "Tom Brown and the Eighteenth Century Satirists," MLN. xxxii; "Tom Brown and Gulliver," MLN, xxxiii.

Novus Reformator Vapulans; or, the Welch Levite Tossed in a Blanket. 1691 (Here is shown a new Puritan—David J—nes, the burly, blustering evangelist who is ready to reform anyone and fight against any sin. The old insults are hurled against him, but Brown cleverly represents him as better educated than the old-type zealot; in fact, he is quite a recognizable figure. But I must emphasize the fact that he still has the old faults )

The Moralist: or, a Satyr upon the Sects 1691 By the author of the Weesil. (The tract is undoubtedly Brown's. The Dict. Nat. Biog. gives Brown as he author of the Weesil. The Moralist is an attack on all the clergy. To the "moralist" a "hypocrite in black" means Vicar as well as Priest, Presbyter, or Independent Preacher. A better and broader type of religious satire was here promised by Brown—but his early promise was not kept.)

From J. Naylor, to his Friends at the Bull and Mouth. From Letters from the Dead to the Living. (Writing from Hell, Naylor sends greetings to his Brothers. It is reasonable to assume that Quakers had changed since the days of Naylor, but Brown assumes that they as fanatic as ever. Those critics who believe that Swift was coarse are invited to read many of the satires previously cited and then the attacks of Brown. After this course in reading, they will perhaps realize the background which created the undeniably coarse poems and prose satires of the Dean.)

The Quakers Answer to James Naylor. From the Letters.

Mr. Brown's Sermon at a Quaker Meeting.

The Continuation of the Quaker's Sermon. (In this tract is found the mock Puritan blessing: "Water us, young shrubs, with the Dew of thy Blessing, that we may grow up into tall oaks, and may live to be saw'd out into Deal-boards, to wainscoat thy New Jerusalem." The Family of Love, Middleton, 1608, has somewhat the same prayer: "men of his coat might grow up like cedars to make good wainscoat in the House of Sincerity." It is obvious that Brown is often drawing upon a long-established tradition of satire.)

Quaker's Meeting. From A Walk round London and Westminster. (In his Amusements Serious and Comical Brown tells of visits to the Quakers and to the Presbyterians. The latter are accused of using the repute of religion and holiness to get them business credit and trust. The adoration of God, sincere and humble prayers, and grateful Thanksgiving are the least of the business of the church. At times Brown had a keen insight and serious thought that made his satires almost the equal of Swift's.)

Letter of News from Mr. Joseph Haines of Merry Memory, to his Friends at Will's Coffee-House. From the Letters.

Second Letter from Mr. Haines.

Alsop's State of Conformity; or, an account of a Conversation between a Gentleman of Oxford, and Mr. Alsop, the Great Rabbi of the Dissenting Party, about his Majesty's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, in the year 1687. (Mr. E. N. S. Thompson (see references to articles in note 3) believes that this tract "resembles in all respects the story of the will in A Tale of a Tub.")

A Dialogue betwixt Sir Roger L'Estrange, Harry Carr, and a Dissenter.

Jo. Haine's 3rd Letter to Will's Coffee-house.

Madam Creswell to Moll Quarles. From the Letters. (Madam Creswell, decreased keeper of bawdy-houses, advises Moll, still a proprietor, to keep an atmosphere of deep piety. The Puritans are satirized for their carnality and equally pious excuses.)

Answer of Moll Quarles to Madam Creswell.

The Widow's Wedding: or, a True account of Dr. Oat's Marriage with a Muggletonian Widow.

From Hugh Peters to D——l, B——s, of Covent-Garden. (James Naylor is mentioned. Certainly Brown went far back into the history of fanaticism.)

It may be said in concluding that with Tom Brown we are faced with a problem. Was he alone in his reversion to the old type of satire, and the calling to life of the figures of Peters and Naylor, or had this tradition never died and the enemies of Puritanism never forgotten these men? The Dissenters had most assuredly become less fanatic than in the days of the Rebellion; but had the people of England forgotten their old concepts of the seditious, hypocritical, and lustful Puritans? If Brown were but catering to the public taste, then we have established one important phase of the immediate background of Swift's treatment of Jack. If the satires of Brown did not reflect the public reaction, then Swift's background will be quite different. This question can never be solved until we are sure we have examined all the religious satires of the last two, at least, decades of the seventeenth century. It has been proven, I believe,<sup>4</sup> that parts of Swift's Tale of a Tub were very much in keeping with earlier traditions of satire; it is, therefore, possible that Brown was the spokesman for a large group of English people who looked upon the Puritans in much the same way as had their fathers and grandfathers in the days when Dissenters were really quite fanatic.

No startling deductions can be drawn from this bibliography. It has been proven that in the seventeenth century there was a very active attack on the Puritans, but we knew that before. However, certain interesting aspects of the satire can be pointed out.

<sup>4</sup> See reference to article, note 1.

The attack changed gradually in so far as Puritan sedition and rebellion sometimes took the place of heresy as a favorite theme for denunciation, but certain fundamental concepts of the Dissenters were apparently consistently held by their enemies.<sup>5</sup> The scoffers were at all times convinced that almost utter hypocrisy motivated the actions and thinking of the less stupid Puritans. At times Puritanism was active in political rebellion; at others in heretical and blasphemous practices, but at no time was it sincere—it always sought for personal gain and glory, or so said the majority of the satirists. It is true that a few men indirectly freed the Puritans from the stigma of conscious hypocrisy when their studies led them to believe that physiological forces caused fanaticism, but such men, however great their influence may have been on Swift, were in the vast minority. There was also a firm conviction that the common people were incurably stupid. Upon these two basic ideas of Puritans: (1) their hypocrisy and relative cunning; (2) their abysmal stupidity and irrationality, was built a century of satire. Along with these themes of attack was the almost universal<sup>6</sup> accusation that the Puritans were grossly immoral and, furthermore, sinned even more grievously in hypocritically excusing their lust.

This then is what Swift inherited. Coarse though most of the satires were, many were hard-hitting, clever, and witty, and the developing satirist must have read them with joy. We can better understand the coarse humor of Swift, his many themes of attack, and the figures of Jack from the Tale of a Tub and the sex-ridden enthusiasts of the Discourse on the Mechanical Operation of the Spirit by realizing how powerful and traditional was the satiric background from which he developed.

C. M. WEBSTER

Brown University

<sup>5</sup> It scarcely need be pointed out that they still exist in many writings about modern zealots. <sup>6</sup> Butler, Eachard, and Dryden seem exceptions.

XIV

THE RELATION OF COLERIDGE'S ODE ON DEJECTION TO WORDSWORTH'S ODE ON INTIMATIONS OF IMMORTALITY

IT is well known that Coleridge had Wordsworth in mind when he wrote his Ode on Dejection<sup>1</sup>—the poem is addressed to Wordsworth,<sup>2</sup> mentions Wordsworth's Lucy Gray, and was first published on the day of Wordsworth's wedding; but that Coleridge's Ode may have been influenced by Wordsworth's great Ode on Intimations of Immortality has been generally overlooked.<sup>3</sup> If the date of Wordsworth's Ode is 1803–1806, as it is often given in the anthologies and histories, such influence is impossible, because we know Coleridge's Dejection was composed April 4, 1802.<sup>4</sup> The date 1803–1806, however, is not accepted by most scholars;<sup>5</sup> Professor John D. Rea emphatically states, "It is known that the date 1803 is wrong; the Ode was begun 1802."<sup>6</sup> The passage in Dorothy Wordsworth's Journal, written March 27, 1802, "At breakfast William wrote part of an ode,"<sup>7</sup> refers, it is now believed, to the Ode: Intimations of Immortality. On March 27, 1802, Wordsworth was writing his great Ode; and a week later, on April 4, 1802, Coleridge wrote his.

Some interesting contrasts occur in the two odes. In Wordsworth's Ode grief finds relief and ends in joy; in Coleridge's, grief finds no relief and ends in dejection. It is morning in Wordsworth's Ode, midnight in Coleridge's. In the former it is May and the "sun shines warm"; in the

<sup>1</sup> See Alfred Ainger's article in Macmillan's Magazine (June, 1887) called "Coleridge's Ode to Wordsworth."

<sup>2</sup> See Coleridge's letter to W. Sotheby, written July 19, 1802. This letter contains the earliest version of the Dejection Ode, but omits parts of the poem. The Letters of S. T. Coleridge, ed. by E. H. Coleridge (Boston, 1895), I, 376–384.

<sup>3</sup> John D. Rea, in an article "Coleridge's Intimations of Immortality from Proclus," Mod. Phil., xxvi, 201 ff., noticing a similarity between the two poems calls them "twin odes." Professor Rea, however, is concerned with pointing out not Wordsworth's influence upon Coleridge, but Coleridge's influence upon Wordsworth. He shows that the idealism in Wordsworth's Ode is derived from Coleridge.

<sup>4</sup> It was printed in the Morning Post, Oct. 4, 1802, with the title, Dejection: An Ode, Written April 4, 1802.

<sup>5</sup> George M. Harper, William Wordsworth: His Life, Works, and Influence (New York, 1916), p. 122; H. W. Garrod, Wordsworth: Lectures and Essays (Oxford, 1922), p. 112; Arthur Beatty, William Wordsworth: His Doctrine and Art (Madison, 1927), p. 82; Ernest Bernbaum, Guide and Anthology of Romanticism (New York, 1930), III, 174.

<sup>6</sup> Op. cit.

<sup>7</sup> Journals of Dorothy Wordsworth, ed. by William Knight (London, 1897), I, 104.

latter it is the "month of showers." Wordsworth hears the happy shouts of children; Coleridge hears the wind raving and "screaming of agony."

Notice the following parallel passages:<sup>8</sup>

There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream,
 . . . . .
 To me did seem Apparelled in celestial light,
 . . . . .
 It is not now as it hath been of yore (Immortality, 1-6).

There was a time when, tho' my path was rough,
 . . . . .
 . . . Hope grew round me, . . .
 But now afflictions bow me down to earth (Dejection, 77-83).

In both poems the passage begins, "There was a time when," and in both there is a contrast between what was and is. Wordsworth says:

The earth . . . . .
 . . . . . did seem
Apparelled in celestial light,
 The glory and the freshness of a dream (Immortality, 2-5), and Coleridge:

Ah! from the soul itself must issue forth,
 A light, a glory, a fair luminous cloud
 Enveloping the earth (Dejection, 54-56).

In both poems "the earth" is apparelled or enveloped in a "light" and "glory." Coleridge's "luminous cloud" may be compared to the "celestial light" or the "clouds of glory" of Wordsworth's Ode (65).

Wordsworth describes the moon when the "heavens are bare" and "the waters on a starry night" as "beautiful" and "fair" (Immortality, 12-15). Coleridge uses the same adjectives when he describes the stars and the moon "in its own cloudless, starless lake of blue" as "fair" and "beautiful" (Dejection, 33-39). Wordsworth says:

The things which I have seen I now can see no more (Immortality, 9), but he adds a little later:

The fulness of your bliss, I feel—I feel it all (Immortality, 42), <sup>8</sup> Quotations from Coleridge's poem are from the Morning Post version of Oct. 4, 1802, the first published version. It may be found in The Poetical Works of Coleridge, ed. by J. D. Campbell (Macmillan, 1893), pp. 522-524; and in Coleridge's Poems, ed. by E. H. Coleridge (Oxford, 1912), II, 1076-1081.

He can see no more, but he can feel; and now notice that Coleridge says (the italics are his):

I see, not feel how beautiful they are (Dejection, 39).

Wordsworth:

To me alone there came a thought of grief:
A timely utterance gave that thought relief (Immortality, 22-23), but there is no relief for Coleridge:

A stifled, drowsy, unimpassion'd grief,
Which finds no nat'ral outlet, no relief (Dejection, 22-23).

It is a curious coincidence that these lines, so alike in wording, and catching as they do the essential moods of the two poets, should in both poems be lines 22-23.

These lines have a similar sound:

The sunshine is a glorious birth (Immortality, 16).
And may this storm be but a mountain-birth (Dejection, 123).

The following parallel passages when taken separately have little value, but when taken together, in conjunction with the parallelisms noted above, all of them found in 58 lines of Wordsworth's Ode and 139 lines of the Dejection Ode, they merit consideration:

The Immortality Ode

"Doth the same tale repeat" (56).
"I hear the echoes" (27).
"The freshness of a dream" (5).
"Fields of sleep" (28).
"The cataracts blow their trumpets"
(25).<sup>9</sup>

The Dejection Ode

"It tells another tale" (111).
"The echoes of that voice" (74).
"Dark distressful dream" (89).
"The sleeping earth" (126).
The wind a "Mad Lutanist" (98).

The motto at the head of Wordsworth's Ode is taken from his poem, The Rainbow, and there is mention of the rainbow in the tenth line of the Ode. Coleridge has as his motto four lines from Sir Patrick Spence about the "new moon with the old moon in her arms," and the first twenty lines of his poem deal with this sign and the storm it portends. The rainbow is a sign in the heavens that the rain is over and the sun will shine—a symbol of hope. The "new moon with the old moon in her arms" is a sign in the heavens indicating a storm, a "deadly storm." True, the motto of Wordsworth's Ode was not added until 1815, but we believe that in the spring of 1802 The Rainbow was closely connected with the Ode. It was written, according to Dorothy Wordsworth, on March 26,<sup>10</sup> and on March 27 "William wrote part of an ode." Harper says, "The ode was probably conceived in the spring of 1802, immediately after he had written the nine lines which are its germ, and of which he used the last three as its motto."<sup>11</sup> Garrod, too, closely associates the Ode and The Rainbow: "When in lines 22-23 of the Ode Wordsworth says:

<sup>9</sup> Compare also "This sweet May-morning" (Immortality, 45) with "this sweet primrose-month," in the poem as sent to W. Sotheby, op. cit., p. 381.

To me alone there came a thought of grief:
A timely utterance gave that thought relief, the timely utterance may very well be the Rainbow poem itself."<sup>12</sup> Rea believes the two poems "are really part of one poem."<sup>13</sup> So Coleridge may have regarded them when he composed his Dejection.

I consider these parallelisms too numerous to be mere coincidences, and I think there has been imitation, conscious or unconscious, on the part of one of the two poets. I think Coleridge was the borrower for the following reasons: first, we have Dorothy Wordsworth's statement to the effect that Wordsworth was writing an ode, now considered the Immortality Ode, a week before Coleridge wrote his; secondly, it is well known that Coleridge was the more imitative of the two poets. Lowes has shown in The Road to Xanadu<sup>14</sup> that Kubla Khan and The Ancient Mariner are full of phrases Coleridge had read or heard. In Coleridge "we have to do," says Lowes, "with one of the most extraordinary memories of which there is record."<sup>15</sup> Dykes Campbell says "there are more distinct traces of Wordsworth's influence on Coleridge's poetry than of the converse, for Coleridge by virtue of his quicker sense, was the more imitative."<sup>16</sup> When Wordsworth read to Coleridge the Ode, the phrases probably struck deep.<sup>17</sup>

These parallelisms occur in the 139 lines of Coleridge's ode and the first four stanzas (fifty-eight lines) of Wordsworth's. According to the Fenwick note, "two years at least passed between the writing of the first four stanzas and the remaining part" of Wordsworth's Ode. With regard, however, to the accuracy of the notes Miss Fenwick took down from Wordsworth's dictation, most scholars agree with Harper when he says that "they should not be too unquestioningly depended upon."<sup>18</sup> Wordsworth was seventy-three when he dictated the notes, many years

<sup>10</sup> D. W. Journals, I, 104.

<sup>11</sup> Op. cit., II, 122.

<sup>12</sup> Op. cit., p. 113.

<sup>13</sup> Op. cit.

<sup>14</sup> John Livingston Lowes, The Road to Xanadu, (Boston, 1927).

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., p. 50.

<sup>16</sup> Op. cit., p. xxxvii

<sup>17</sup> Lowes quotes C. V. Le Grice, one of Coleridge's fellow-students at Cambridge. According to Le Grice, Coleridge could read a book in the morning, and in the evening repeat whole pages verbatim. Op. cit., p. 45.

<sup>18</sup> Op. cit., II, 408.

had passed since the poems were written, and Miss Fenwick was an "overexcitable lady."<sup>19</sup> Perhaps all that Wordsworth said, or intended to say, was that at least two years passed between the writing of the first and the last parts of the Ode. Rea<sup>20</sup> gives reasons for thinking that Wordsworth wrote the first 129 lines in 1802. Let us look, therefore, for echoes in the Dejection Ode of lines in Wordsworth's Ode after the fourth stanza.

Wordsworth tells of a "little child,"<sup>21</sup> a boy, so happy he seems in Heaven; and this child is, according to the usual interpretation of the poem, Coleridge's own child, Hartley. Coleridge tells of a "little child,"<sup>22</sup> a girl who "hath lost her way" and "now moans low in utter grief"; this child is Wordsworth's—that is to say, a child of his imagination, the Lucy Gray of his poem.

Wordsworth speaks of the child as "The little actor" (103), addressing him as "Thou best philosopher" (111) and "Mighty Prophet! Seer blest!" (115). Coleridge addresses the wind as "Thou Actor" (102). "Thou mighty Poet" (103).

In his Biographia Literaria Coleridge objects to Wordsworth's regarding a "six years' darling" as a philosopher. "In what sense," Coleridge asks, "is a child of that age a philosopher? . . . or so inspired as to deserve the splendid title of a mighty prophet, a blessed seer?"<sup>23</sup> Is he in the Dejection Ode saying that the wind is a better actor and more deserving of the splendid title "mighty prophet," because it speaks the truth, telling of the "groans of men"? It tells a tale of a child, not so happy as the child in the Immortality Ode, an unhappy child who "hath lost her way."

Observe that the child in Wordsworth's poem acts his part on a "humorous stage," but the wind is a tragic actor, "perfect in all tragic sounds." Observe also that these passages, in which child and wind are called actors, philosophers, poets, and prophets, occur at the same places in the poems, ll. 100–115.

Wordsworth thinks of life in terms of weddings and funerals; Coleridge in terms of wedding-garments and shrouds.

A wedding or a festival,
A mourning or a funeral (Immortality, 94–95).

And in our life alone does Nature live:
Ours is her wedding-garment, ours her shroud (Dejection, 49–50).

But he beholds the light, and whence it flows (Immortality, 70).

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., II, 408.

<sup>21</sup> Intimations of Immortality, 122.

<sup>23</sup> Biographia Literaria, ch. XXII.

<sup>20</sup> Op. cit.

<sup>22</sup> Dejection, 115.

And thence flows all that charms or ear or sight,
 . . . . .
 All colours a suffusion from that light (Dejection, 73-75).
 Thou best philosopher, who yet dost keep
 Thy heritage, thou eye among the blind (Immortality, 111-112).
 And still I gaze—and with how blank an eye (Dejection, 30).
 Full soon thy soul shall have her earthly freight,
 And custom lie upon thee with a weight
 Heavy as frost (Immortality, 127-129).
 And what can these avail,
 To lift the smoth'ring weight from off my breast (Dejection, 41-42).

If we accept the Fenwick note as authentic, then we must say that since lines 59-129 of Wordsworth's Ode were written after April 4, 1802, whatever resemblances we have found between this part of the Ode and Coleridge's Dejection Ode are due rather to Coleridge's influence upon Wordsworth. The accuracy of the Fenwick notes, however, is questioned, and if we reject the date 1803, given by Wordsworth, as inaccurate for the first four stanzas, perhaps we can reject as inaccurate, also, the statement with reference to the break coming after the fourth stanza. These parallels, I believe, show that on April 4, 1802, Coleridge had become acquainted with a good part of the first 129 lines of Wordsworth's Ode. I say "a good part," for Wordsworth may have added or changed a few lines during the summer.<sup>24</sup> I find no resemblances between Coleridge's Dejection and lines 130-204 of Wordsworth's Ode.

We can only conjecture with regard to the reason for the similarity between the two odes, but let us turn to the lives of the two poets in the spring of 1802. Wordsworth was then doing some of his best work; he had entered upon what has been called his "second period of productive energy."<sup>25</sup> Furthermore, he was carrying on a courtship with Mary Hutchinson, which was to end during the year in a marriage that "completed the circle of his felicity."<sup>26</sup> All was well with Wordsworth in the spring of 1802. But it was otherwise with Coleridge. On account of poor health he had become a slave to the opium habit; he had lost his self-respect as well as "the shaping spirit of Imagination." He was unhappily married and therefore not free to marry Sarah Hutchinson, Mary's sister, whom he loved.<sup>27</sup> He had gone to London in November

<sup>24</sup> D. W. Journals, I, 132; and see Rea, op. cit.

<sup>25</sup> Thomas Hutchinson, Wordsworth's Poetical Works (Oxford, 1904).

<sup>26</sup> John Morley's introduction to the Works of Wordsworth (Macmillan, 1898), p. LVI.

<sup>27</sup> For an account of Coleridge's love for Sarah Hutchinson see Thomas M. Raysor, "Coleridge and 'Asra,'" SP, xxvi, 305 ff.

hoping a change would do him good, but returned in low spirits to the Lake District on March 18 and spent the next two days with the Wordsworths.<sup>28</sup> The week after Coleridge returned to Keswick, Wordsworth worked upon some of his happiest poems, The Cuckoo, To a Butterfly, The Rainbow, and an ode which we believe was the Immortality Ode.<sup>29</sup> On April 4, the date of the Dejection Ode, Dorothy and her brother visited Coleridge, and "William repeated his verses to them."<sup>30</sup> The verses must have been those Wordsworth had been recently writing, and as Coleridge listened, he heard numerous phrases testifying to Wordsworth's joy in life—"I hear thee and rejoice" (The Cuckoo), "my heart leaps up" (The Rainbow), "with joy I hear" (Immortality Ode). Happy Wordsworth, unhappy Coleridge! Perhaps Wordsworth talked about his approaching marriage, for he was leaving next day for Yorkshire to spend a week with the Hutchinsons.<sup>31</sup> How Coleridge would have liked to go with him to visit Sarah.

After Dorothy and her brother depart, Coleridge cannot help contrasting his own condition with that of his friend. Once they were both writing poems; those were happy days when they planned the Lyrical Ballads. Now Wordsworth is composing one good poem after another, experimenting with new verse forms, writing his first ode; but Coleridge's best work is behind him.<sup>32</sup> Happy love and marriage are for Wordsworth, but Coleridge's domestic life is a failure. If only he were free to marry Sarah! Certainly to him alone come many thoughts of grief, but unlike Wordsworth's experience as described in the Ode to which he has been listening, he cannot find relief. Let us suppose that Coleridge in this mood reviews the poems he has heard Wordsworth recite, and as he does so a poem begins to take form.<sup>33</sup> The following account of Coleridge's mental processes is, of course, conjectural, and is offered merely as a suggestion as to what may have occurred, while at the same time it points out parallels. Let us suppose, then, that Coleridge with the contrast between his own situation and that of Wordsworth in mind and with the phrases from the poems Wordsworth had recited resounding in his ears, meditated thus:

My heart does not leap up [The Rainbow] whether I contemplate a rainbow or a storm. Would that the storm now on its way might "raise me" and "send my

<sup>28</sup> D. W. Journals, I, 103.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., I, 103-104.

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., I, 105.

<sup>31</sup> Harper, op. cit., II, 22.

<sup>32</sup> "I think it may be said Coleridge the creative poet died about 1802."—William Knight, The Life of William Wordsworth (Edinburgh, 1889), II, 165.

<sup>33</sup> As several years later, after Wordsworth had read to him The Prelude, Coleridge wrote the poem called To a Gentleman, Composed on the Night after his Recitation of a Poem on the Growth of an Individual Mind.

soul abroad" [Dej. 17-18] as it once did. In my case the child has not been "father of the man" [The Rainbow], for once I could feel these things. Wordsworth, too, says that "it is not now as it hath been of yore" [Im. 6], that nature is less "fair" and "beautiful," that there are things which he "can see no more" [Im. 9]. I can see they are "fair" and "beautiful," but I can not feel as he does [Dej. 39]. When such a thought of grief comes to Wordsworth he can find relief. He hears the cuckoo and rejoices because it brings him "a tale of visionary hours," it begets "that golden time again," he hears it and rejoices [The Cuckoo]; "while the birds thus sing a joyous song" [Im. 19] he can find relief. "Yonder thristle" has been trying to woo me to happier thoughts [Dej. 26], but in vain. "A timely utterance" gives Wordsworth relief, and again he is strong [Im. 23-24], but I find no relief, "in word, or sigh, or tear" [Dej. 24]. I can not from "outward forms" [Dej. 46]—from the rainbow, the cuckoo, the butterfly, the happy shouts of children—win the passion and the life whose fountains are within [Dej. 47]. Whether nature wears for us a wedding-garment or a shroud [Dej. 50] depends upon one's soul. For Wordsworth nature wears a wedding-garment, for me a shroud. "In our life alone does Nature live" [Dej. 49]. If the child is happy, if to him the earth seems "apparelled in celestial light and glory" [Im. 4-5], it is because there is joy in his heart, because his soul is right. If Wordsworth can share the joy of children, it is because he is "pure of heart" [Dej. 60], he has the "simple spirit" [Dej. 136] of the child, there is joy in his heart. If a thought of grief comes to him, he can become "strong" again [Im. 24], because there is "strong music" [Dej. 61] in his soul. Wordsworth has much to say of joy in his ode: "the birds sing a joyous song" [Im. 19], "thou child of joy" [Im. 34], "with joy I hear" [Im. 51], ["he sees it in his joy," Im. 71]<sup>34</sup> ["with new joy and pride"—Im. 102]. Joy is the "beauty-making power," Wordsworth. "Joy, blameless poet! Joy that never was given save to the pure" [Dej. 65-66]. "If the earth we pace, again appears to be an unsubstantial, faery place" [The Cuckoo], ["if Heaven lies about us in our infancy"—Im. 67], "Joy, William, is the spirit and the power that gives in dower a new Earth and a new Heaven" [Dej. 67-69]. If the birds sing "a joyous song" [Im. 19], if the "wandering voice" of the cuckoo makes one rejoice [The Cuckoo], if the earth seems "apparelled in celestial light" [Im. 4], if the heart leaps up when one beholds a "rainbow in the sky" [The Rainbow], "Joy is the sweet voice, Joy the luminous cloud—we, we ourselves rejoice" [Dej. 71-72].

And if Coleridge had become acquainted with more than the first four stanzas of Wordsworth's Ode, he might have proceeded:

Wordsworth says, "Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting—trailing clouds of glory do we come—the growing Boy beholds the light—at length the Man perceives it die away and fade into the light of common day" [Im. 59-77]. Rather say, "each visitation of afflictions suspends what nature gave me at my birth, my shaping spirit of Imagination" [Dej. 85-87]. Wordsworth says that because "Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her own" [Im. 78] man forgets the glories he has known [Im. 83-84]; rather say that because earth fills her lap with afflictions, I have lost that early glory. "Afflictions bow me down to earth" [Dej. 83]. "There was a time when" I, too, out of misfortunes could make dreams of happiness [Dej. 79-80] as Wordsworth shows he can in his ode. Wordsworth says, "Heaven lies about us in our infancy" [Im. 67]. "Hope grew round me" [Dej. 81], too, when I was a boy. Wordsworth says that the child because he keeps his heritage is an "eye among the blind" [Im. 112]; I have lost my heritage and now "I gaze—and with how blank an eye" [Dej. 30]. Because of inner joy, that beauty-making power, Wordsworth sees a "little child" [Im. 122] happy in his "mother's kisses" [Im. 89]. The "little actor" [Im. 103] on the stage of life is to him a "mighty prophet, seer blest" [Im. 115] because on him rest truths "which we are toiling all our lives to find" [Im. 117]. Thus Fancy makes for Wordsworth a dream of happiness [Dej. 80], but viper thoughts "haunt my mind" [Dej. 88-89]. Instead of rainbows I see signs of storm. The raving wind outside is my "actor" [Dej. 102], my "Mighty poet" [Dej. 103], and speaks not of immortality but of the "groans of men" [Dej. 106]. It tells a tale not of a little child happy in his mother's kisses but of a "little child" [Dej. 115]—Wordsworth knows her—who has lost her way and screaming "hopes to make her mother hear" [Dej. 119]. Wordsworth does warn the child that as he grows older his soul shall have her earthly freight and custom lie upon him with a weight heavy as frost" [Im. 128-129]. And Wordsworth can point to the boy's father as an example, for what can there avail "to lift the smothering weight from off my breast"? [Dej. 41-42]. Seldom does Wordsworth feel this weight, but if he does, may he rise with "light heart" [Dej. 126] and "gay fancy" [Dej. 127] to join the children who when "all the earth is gay" [Im. 29] "give themselves up to jollity with the heart of May" [Im. 31-32]. "Joy lifts his spirit, joy attunes his voice" [Dej. 135].

<sup>34</sup> Bracketed, to show that it is not included in the first four stanzas.

In some such way Coleridge's poem may have outlined itself in his mind. He would compose an Ode on Dejection. It was late, but Coleridge found night the best time for composition.<sup>35</sup> He would write a companion piece<sup>36</sup> to Wordsworth's "L'Allegro."

There is nothing to show that Wordsworth recognized in Coleridge's Ode a companion piece to his own. We are not told when he first became acquainted with it. Dorothy writes on April 21, "Coleridge came to us, and repeated the verses he wrote to Sara. I was affected with them, and in miserable spirits."<sup>37</sup> Knight<sup>38</sup> thinks these verses may have been the Dejection Ode even though the earliest known version shows the poem was addressed to Wordsworth. The poem was inspired, let us say, by Wordsworth's Ode and the contrast between Wordsworth's success and Coleridge's failure; but the mood of dejection was inspired in part

<sup>35</sup> Lowes, op. cit., 176.

<sup>36</sup> Both odes are irregular. The closest resemblance in structure is found in the second section of Wordsworth's ode and the third section of Coleridge's.

<sup>37</sup> D. W. Journals, I, 110.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., I, 110, footnote.

by Coleridge's hopeless love for Sarah. Therefore, he had the choice of addressing the poem to Wordsworth or to Sarah; and perhaps he addressed the poem to both in two different versions.<sup>39</sup> An explanation somewhat like this is suggested by Raysor when he says that the verses repeated to Wordsworth and his sister "may in reality be a second draft developing the poem and adapting it to a different purpose in order to conceal its original application."<sup>40</sup>

Perhaps Coleridge did not wish his friend to feel that the contrast between Wordsworth's success and his own failure was a cause of his dejection; it would look as if he were begrudging Wordsworth his happiness. In reading the poem to the Wordsworths, therefore, Coleridge decided to address the poem to Sarah, as the great reason for his unhappiness.

Wordsworth may have felt, nevertheless, that the contrast was troubling Coleridge, and therefore decided to write a poem giving his friend some advice in regard to success and happiness. The Leech Gatherer was begun on May 3,<sup>41</sup> when the new moon appeared again with the old moon in her arms; if Wordsworth had become acquainted with Coleridge's Dejection Ode, he must have thought of it at this time. The Leech Gatherer, sometimes called Resolution and Independence, could have been written as a reply to the Dejection Ode:

As high as we have mounted in delight
In our dejection do we sink as low (24-25)

We Poets in our youth begin in gladness;
But thereof come in the end despondency and madness (48-49).

Yet Coleridge himself is to blame; what he needs is some of the resolution and independence of the old leech gatherer.

But how can he expect that others should Build for him, sow for him, and at his call
Love him, who for himself will take no heed at all? (40-42)

And what if there is a storm as the new moon foretells, and what if the wind does rave as Coleridge says in the Dejection Ode, tomorrow the sun will shine again,

There was a roaring in the wind all night;
The rain came heavily and fell in floods;
But now the sun is rising calm and bright (1-3).

<sup>39</sup> Could the version published in the Sibylline Leaves, 1817, with its "Dear Lady" in the place of "Wordsworth," be the "verses to Sara"?

<sup>40</sup> Op. cit.

<sup>41</sup> D. W. Journals, I, 116.

This poem was started by Wordsworth on May 3. Two days later Dorothy writes: "The moon had the old moon in her arms, but not so plain to be seen as the night before. When we went to bed it was a boat without the circle."<sup>42</sup> Lowes<sup>43</sup> thinks that Dorothy must have become acquainted with Coleridge's poem, for there is reference not only to the new moon with the old moon in her arms, but also to Coleridge's comparison of the moon to a "sky-canoe."<sup>44</sup>

Why did Coleridge publish his ode in the Morning Post on Wordsworth's wedding day? Harper says, "He doubtless chose that date out of compliment to his friend."<sup>45</sup> It was a sort of wedding gift. Dykes Campbell calls it "a sad enough Epithalamium."<sup>46</sup> I believe it was Coleridge's way of emphasizing his own great disappointment. When Wordsworth was bound for the Hutchinsons, probably to make arrangements for his marriage, Coleridge wrote the poem; when the marriage took place he published it. Wordsworth was marrying Mary Hutchinson, but Coleridge, alas, was not marrying Mary's sister. Nevertheless, "he rejoiced," Harper thinks, "that what he lacked his friend possessed,"<sup>47</sup> and ended his poem with the lines in praise of Wordsworth:

O lofty Poet, full of life and love,
Brother and friend of my devoutest choice,
Thus may'st thou ever, evermore rejoice!

Along with his rejoicing at Wordsworth's happiness there was, I believe, a feeling of "It might have been,"<sup>48</sup> and just a little envy because his friend through marriage to Mary will be closer to Sarah than he can ever hope to be.<sup>49</sup>

FRED MANNING SMITH

West Virginia University

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., I, 118.

<sup>43</sup> Op. cit., 175.

<sup>44</sup> In the Morning Post version. The line is omitted in the 1817 version.

<sup>45</sup> Op. cit., II, 39.

<sup>46</sup> Op. cit., p. lxii, footnote.

<sup>47</sup> Op. cit., II, 39.

<sup>48</sup> As in a letter written in 1819 to a friend about to be married, Coleridge wrote: "O! that you could appreciate by the light of other men's experience the anguish which prompted the ejaculation, Why was I made for love, yet love denied to me?" [Coleridge's poem, The Blossoming of the Solitary Date Tree.] See Campbell's note, op. cit., p. 633.

<sup>49</sup> By 1807 judging from his notebook for that year Coleridge has become "jealous of Sarah's admiration and affection for Wordsworth"—Raysor, op. cit. Coleridge writes in his notebook, "He [Wordsworth] does not, he does not pretend, he does not wish to love you, as I love you.—I alone love you so devotedly, and therefore love me!"—quoted from Raysor's article.

SCOTT'S THEORY AND PRACTICE CONCERNING THE USE OF THE SUPERNATURAL IN PROSE FICTION IN RELATION TO THE CHRONOLOGY OF
THE WAVERLEY NOVELS

THE question has recently been raised as to whether or not the order of the publication of the Waverley Novels is also, as Lockhart implies, the order of writing. Dame Una Pope-Hennessy, writing in the New York Saturday Review of Literature for April 23, 1932, (p. 686), appeals to lovers of Scott for help in the solution of the problem of the chronology of his novels. She states her reasons for believing that St. Ronan's Well, though later revised, was written seventeen years before Waverley. In a similar communication published in the London Times Literary Supplement for April 28, 1932, Dame Una Pope-Hennessy outlines the genesis of her skepticism as to the usually accepted chronology of Scott's novels:

Hitherto it has been assumed that novels issued from Scott's head much as Athena issued from the head of Zeus, full-panoplied for action. . . . Now, after re-reading and consideration, I incline to think that in Scott we have a novelist from boyhood, temporarily diverted by the study of ballads and the fashions of the hour to writing poetry, and then, when the poetic vein had been sufficiently worked, going back to his first love, prose.

The writer goes on to reiterate her argument concerning the early composition of St. Ronan's Well, and also asserts that Redgauntlet and Guy Mannering show signs of immaturity, and that they must have been written early and reworked not long before publication. She closes her communication with the following statement by Havelock Ellis:<sup>1</sup>

The novelist only attains skill in his work after failure, perhaps a long series of failures like Balzac and Zola, rarely indeed at a bound. The novelists whose force has developed in a night have perished in a night.

Also Mr. Donald Carswell<sup>2</sup> "accepts and extends" without stating his reasons the conclusions of Dame Una Pope-Hennessy. He writes:

[Scott's] first essay seems to have been The Black Dwarf. Next came—though in what order it is hard to say—Guy Mannering, St. Ronan's Well, Redgauntlet, and The Monastery. All that can be conjectured is that The Monastery was the latest of the 'prentice works and was written about the same time as The Lay of the Last Minstrel.

<sup>1</sup> Views and Reviews, p. 95.

<sup>2</sup> "The Legend of Abbotsford," The Nineteenth Century and After (1932) cxii, 374-384.

An approach to the study of Scott's chronology, employed by neither Dame Una Pope-Hennessy nor Mr. Carswell lies in an examination of his use of the supernatural. Scott tells us in the general preface to Waverley Novels (dated 1829):

About this time (now alas! thirty years since) I had nourished the ambitious desire of composing a tale of chivalry, which was to be in the style of The Castle of Otranto, with plenty of Border characters and supernatural incident.

In 1799, therefore, Scott must have been in sympathy with the aims and practices of the Gothic romancers. Yet, before he had published any of the Waverley Novels, he had shown dissatisfaction with the products of this school of fiction; and in his critical writing from 1805 onwards, he set up his own theories concerning the use of the supernatural in prose fiction—theories in some respects at sharp variance with the practices of the Gothacists. If then, as seems probable, there are novels earlier than Waverley,<sup>3</sup> we should be able to detect them by the manner in which the supernatural is handled. It is conceivable, of course, that an author might in practice revert to a mode which he in theory had repudiated, but it would be simpler and more plausible to assume that those novels which are near the Gothic tradition, or in which Scott violates his own rules concerning the use of the supernatural, are early compositions, reworked, perhaps, at a later date. It is not claimed that the method of investigation which I propose can, in itself, lead to certainty. As will be pointed out later, minor infractions of Scott's rules occur in novels known to be late. Yet, as the infractions in these novels differ in kind from those found in the books which are probably early, an examination of Scott's use of the supernatural cannot be without bearing on the question of the chronology of the Waverley Novels.

At no one place has Scott treated exhaustively the subject of the technique appropriate to the use of the supernatural in prose fiction; but it is a subject to which he gave considerable thought, and he has touched upon it several times in his critical writings from 1805 to 1828. I find in his expressions of theory five principles, not delivered with dogmatic assurance, but with sufficient clearness to admit of restatement.

The first of these is that The Supernatural must be accompanied with an appropriate and continuous atmosphere.<sup>4</sup> In the essay on Horace Walpole, <sup>3</sup> The probability of such an assumption is increased by the facts that Waverley, though begun in 1805, did not reach its final form until 1813 or 1814; and that The Bridal of Triermain, though begun in 1797, as has been shown by Dame Pope-Hennessy in her book, The Laird of Abbotsford, pp. 52 ff., was not completed until shortly before publication in 1813.

<sup>4</sup> I use here the phraseology of Charles Edward Whitmore in The Supernatural in Tragedy (Cambridge, Mass., 1915), p. 9.

in Biographical Notices of Eminent Novelists (1820)<sup>5</sup> Scott writes:<sup>6</sup>

Indeed, to produce, in a well-cultivated mind any portion of that surprise and fear which are founded on supernatural events, the frame and tenor of the whole story must be adjusted in perfect harmony with this mainspring of interest. He who, in early youth, has happened to pass a solitary night in one of the few ancient mansions which the fashion of more modern times has left undespoiled of their original furniture, has probably experienced, that the gigantic and preposterous figures dimly visible in the defaced tapestry,—the remote clang of the distant doors which divide him from living society,—the deep darkness which involves the high and fretted roof of the apartment,—the dimly-seen pictures of ancient knights, renowned for their valor, and perhaps for their crimes,—the varied and indistinct sounds of a half-deserted mansion,—and to crown all, the feeling that carries us back to ages of feudal power and papal superstition, join together to excite a corresponding sensation of supernatural awe, if not of terror. It is in such situations, when superstition becomes contagious, that we listen with respect, and even with dread, to the legends which are our sport in the garish light of sunshine, and amid the dissipating sights and sounds of everyday life.

Scott goes on to say that it is almost impossible to build a modern Gothic structure that will impress us in the way described above, and gives Walpole credit for "attaining in composition what, as an architect, he must have felt beyond the power of his art."<sup>7</sup> He continues:<sup>8</sup>

It was, therefore, the author's object, not merely to excite surprise and terror, by the introduction of supernatural agency, but to wind up the feelings of his reader till they became for a moment identified with those of a ruder age, which "Held each strange tale devoutly true."

A second principle which Scott states is that the Phenomena that have been presented to the reader as supernatural in the first part of the story, should not be explained by natural causes in the later chapters. It was chiefly on this point that Scott found fault with the Radcliffian school. He says as early as 1810, in his review of Maturin's Fatal Revenge:<sup>9</sup>

... we disapprove of the mode introduced by Mrs. Radcliffe, and followed by Mr. Murphy and her other imitators, of winding up their story with a solution by which all the incidents, appearing to partake of the mystic and marvellous, are resolved by very simple and natural causes. This seems, to us, to savour of the precaution of Snug the Joiner; or, rather, it is as if the mechanist, when the pantomime was over, should turn his scenes "the seamy side without," and ex-

<sup>5</sup> I have not had access to the 1820 edition. My references are to the edition entitled Lives of Eminent Novelists and Dramatists (London, n. d.).

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., pp. 539, 540.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., p. 540.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., p. 540. In the same work (p. 556) Scott praises Ann Radcliffe for her effective use of setting in The Italian.

<sup>9</sup> Miscellaneous Works, xviii, 166-168.

pose the mechanical aids by which the delusions were accomplished. In one respect, indeed, it is worse mismanagement; because the understanding spectator might be in some degree gratified by the view of the engines which, however rude, were well adapted to produce the effects which he had witnessed. But the machinery of the Castle of Montorio, when exhibited, is wholly inadequate to the gigantic operations ascribed to it. There is a total disproportion between the cause and effect, which must disgust every reader much more than if he were left under the delusion of ascribing the whole to supernatural agency. . . . We can . . . allow of supernatural agency to a certain extent and for an appropriate purpose, but we can never consent that the effect of such agency shall finally be attributable to natural causes totally inadequate to its production. We can believe, for example, in Macbeth's witches, and tremble at their spells; but had we been informed, in the conclusion of the piece, that they were only three of his wife's chamber-maids disguised for the purpose of imposing on the Thane's credulity, it would have added little to the credibility of the story, and entirely deprived it of interest. In like manner we fling back upon the Radcliffe school their flat and ridiculous explanations, and plainly tell them that they must either confine themselves to ordinary and natural events, or find adequate causes for those horrors and mysteries in which they love to involve us.

A more systematic statement of Scott's objections to explanations of phenomena that have been presented to the reader as supernatural is found in the essay on Walpole, where Scott compares the methods of Walpole with those of Mrs. Radcliffe:<sup>10</sup>

In the first place, the reader feels indignant at discovering that he has been cheated into sympathy with terrors, which are finally explained as having proceeded from some very simple cause; and the interest of a second reading is entirely destroyed by his having been admitted behind the scenes at the conclusion of the first. Secondly. The precaution of relieving our spirits from the influence of supposed supernatural terror, seems as unnecessary in the work of professed fiction, as that of the prudent Bottom, who proposed that the human face of the representative of his lion should appear under his mask, and acquaint the audience plainly that he was a man as other men, and nothing more than Snug the joiner. Lastly, These substitutes for supernatural agency are frequently to the full as improbable as the machinery which they are introduced to explain away and support. The reader, who is required to admit the belief of supernatural interference, understands precisely what is required of him; and, if he be truly a gentle reader, throws his mind into the attitude best adapted to humour the deceit which is presented for his entertainment, and grants, for the time of perusal, the premises on which the fable depends. But if the author voluntarily binds himself to account for all the wondrous occurrences which he introduces, we are entitled to exact that the explanation shall be natural, easy, ingenious, and complete.

<sup>10</sup> Lives of Eminent Novelists and Dramatists, p. 541.

If the novelist does not wish boldly to avow the supernatural, he may present his phenomenon without committing himself as to its objective reality. This advice Scott gives in his essay on Ann Radcliffe:<sup>11</sup>

There are some modern authors, indeed, who have endeavoured, ingeniously enough, to compound betwixt ancient faith and modern incredulity. They have exhibited phantoms, and narrated prophecies strangely accomplished, without giving a defined or absolute opinion, whether the apparitions were produced (no uncommon case) by an overheated imagination, and the presages apparently verified by a casual, though singular, coincidence of circumstances. This, however, is an evasion of the difficulty, not a solution; besides, it would be leading us too far from the present subject, to consider to what point the author of a fictitious narrative is bound by his charter to gratify the curiosity of the public, and whether, as a painter of actual life, he is not entitled to leave something in shade, when the natural course of events conceals so many incidents in total darkness. Perhaps upon the whole, this is the most artful mode of terminating such a tale of wonder, as it forms the means of compounding with the taste of two different classes of readers; those who, like children, demand that each particular circumstance and incident of the narrative shall be fully accounted for; and the more imaginative class, who, resembling men that walk for pleasure through a moonlight landscape, are more teased than edified by the intrusive minuteness with which some wellmeaning companion disturbs their reveries, divesting stock and stone of the shadowy semblance in which fancy has dressed them, and pertinaciously restoring to them the ordinary forms and commonplace meanness of reality.

As a third principle, Scott held that The incidents involving supernatural agency must be relatively brief and infrequent. In his review of The Fatal Revenge (1810), he writes:<sup>12</sup>

The taste for the marvellous has been indeed compared to the habit of drinking ardent liquors. But it fortunately differs in having its limits: he upon whom one dram does not produce the effect, can attain the desired degree of inebriation by doubling the dose. But when we have ceased to start at one ghost, we are callous to the exhibition of a whole Pandemonium. In short, the sensation is generally as transient as it is powerful, and commonly depends upon some slight circumstance which cannot be repeated.

Similarly, in his essay on Hoffmann, Scott notes that "the marvellous, more than any other attribute of fictitious narrative, loses its effect by being brought into view."<sup>13</sup> He maintains that "the exhibition of supernatural appearances in fictitious narrative ought to be rare, brief, indistinct, and such as may become a being to us incomprehensible, and so different from ourselves, of whom he cannot justly conjecture whence he comes, or for what purpose, and of whose attributes we can have no regular or distinct perception."<sup>14</sup> The second entrance of the ghost in Hamlet he thinks less impressive than the first.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., pp. 568, 569.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., 273.

<sup>12</sup> Miscellaneous Works, XVIII, 170.

The machinery of The Castle of Otranto, Scott thought, was open to the objection that it placed the wonderful too often before the reader:<sup>15</sup>

Its action and interference is rather too frequent, and presses too hard and constantly upon the same feelings in the reader's mind, to the hazard of diminishing the elasticity of the spring upon which it should operate. The fund of fearful wonder is much diminished by the present habits of life and modes of education. Our ancestors could wonder and thrill through all the mazes of an interminable metrical romance of fairyland, and of an enchantment, the work perhaps of some "Prevailing poet, whose undoubting mind/Believed the magic wonders which he sung." But our own habits and feeling and belief are different, and a transient, though vivid impression, is all that can be excited by a tale of wonder, even in the most fanciful mind of the present day. By the too frequent recurrence of his prodigies, Mr. Walpole ran, perhaps, his greatest risk of awakening la raison froide, that "cold common sense," which he justly deemed the greatest enemy of the effect which he hoped to produce.

A fourth canon, closely akin to the principle that the supernatural must be briefly and infrequently exhibited, is that The manifestation of the supernatural force must not be made too definite. Scott observes in his essay on Hoffman:<sup>16</sup>

The incidents of a supernatural character are usually those of a dark and undefinable nature, such as arise in the mind of the Lady in the Masque of Comus,—incidents to which our fears attach more consequence, as we cannot exactly tell what it is we behold, or what is to be apprehended from it. . . . Burke observes upon obscurity, that it is necessary to make any thing terrible, and notices "how much the notions of ghosts and goblins, of which none can form clear ideas, affect minds which give credit to the popular tales concerning such sorts of beings."

The detailed account of the self-education of the monster in Frankenstein Scott finds:<sup>17</sup> not only highly improbable . . . but injudicious, as its unnecessary minuteness tends rather too much to familiarize us with the being whom it regards, and loses, by this lengthy oration, some part of the mysterious sublimity annexed to his first appearance.

Walpole's ghost would have been more effective if less definite:<sup>18</sup>

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., xviii, 273.

<sup>15</sup> Lives of Eminent Novelists and Dramatists, p. 542.

<sup>16</sup> Miscellaneous Works, xviii, 274.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., p. 203.

<sup>18</sup> Lives of Eminent Novelists and Dramatists, p. 542.

A mysterious obscurity seems congenial at least, if not essential, to our ideas of disembodied spirits, and the gigantic limbs of the ghost of Alphonso, as described by his terrified domestics, are somewhat too distinct and too corporeal to produce the feelings which their appearance is intended to excite.

The point is further developed in the essay on Mrs. Radcliffe:<sup>19</sup>

In working upon the sensations of natural and supernatural fear, Mrs. Radcliffe has made much use of obscurity and suspense, the most fertile source, perhaps, of sublime emotion; for there are few dangers that do not become familiar to the firm mind, if they are presented to consideration in all their open and declared character; whilst, on the other hand, the bravest have shrunk from the dark and doubtful.

Supernatural powers, then, must be made relatively indefinite.

The fifth principle can be stated negatively: Although the human characters are bound by the ordinary laws of probability, the supernatural realm is not fettered by the laws of the physical universe, by the rules of human conduct, nor by popular superstitions. In narratives making use of the supernatural for the purpose of exhibiting its effects upon the characters:<sup>20</sup> the author opens a sort of account-current with the reader, drawing upon him, in the first place, for credit to that degree of the marvellous which he proposes to employ; and becoming virtually bound, in consequence of this indulgence, that his personages shall conduct themselves, in the extraordinary circumstances in which they are placed, according to the rules of probability, and the nature of the human heart. In this view, the probable is far from being laid out of sight even amid the wildest freaks of imagination; on the contrary, we grant the extraordinary postulates which the author demands as the foundation of his narrative, only on condition of his deducing the consequences with logical precision.

It would follow, however, from principles three and four that the supernatural beings themselves are not to be so fettered; for if such beings were bound by the laws of human probability, or by the reader's or character's preconceived ideas, they would lose their indefiniteness, and hence their literary appeal. The judicious author will be cautious in putting speeches into the mouths of ghosts, lest the spirit creatures become commonplace and familiar. "We have indeed," said Scott, "grave doubts whether an author acts wisely in permitting his goblin to speak at all, if at the same time he renders him subject to human sight."<sup>21</sup> But if the ghost is allowed to speak, the author is not obliged to have him speak in any definite, preconceived manner.

Scott's point may be illustrated by his comment on a case tried in the

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., p. 567.

<sup>20</sup> Review of Frankenstein, Miscellaneous Works, xviii, 253, 254.

<sup>21</sup> Miscellaneous Works, xviii, 276.

Scottish courts in 1754. One of the witnesses testified that the ghost of a murdered man had asked him to bury his body and had revealed to him the names of his murderers. When asked what language the ghost spoke, the prisoner, who was a Highlander ignorant of English, replied, "As good Gaelic as I ever heard in Lochaber."—"Pretty well for the ghost of an English sergeant," answered the counsel.—"The inference," says Scott, "was rather smart and plausible than sound, for, the apparition of the ghost being admitted, we know too little of the other world to judge whether all languages may not be alike familiar to those who belong to it."<sup>22</sup> a ghost . . . to be admitted as an ingredient in romance, must behave himself like ghosts of sober demeanor, and subject himself to the common rules still preserved in the grange and hall as circumscribing beings of his description.

Scott's most extended comment on the conduct of other-world creatures was called forth by the statement of Clara Reeve:<sup>23</sup>

Scott does not insist that the supernatural appearance should violate the rules of conduct traditionally laid down for it. He praises Miss Reeve for confining her flight "within those limits on which her pinions could support her";<sup>24</sup> but declares that her rule need not be followed by writers of bolder imagination and greater skill. He asks:<sup>25</sup>

Where then . . . is the line to be drawn? or what are the limits to be placed on the reader's credulity, when those of common sense and ordinary nature are once exceeded? The question admits of only one answer, namely, that the author himself, being in fact a magician, shall evoke no spirits whom he is not capable of endowing with manners and language corresponding to their supernatural character. Thus Shakespeare, drawing such characters as Caliban and Ariel, gave them reality, not by appealing to actual opinions which his audience might entertain respecting the possibility or impossibility of their existence, but by inventing them with such attributes as all readers and spectators recognize as those which must have corresponded to such extraordinary beings, had their existence been possible. If he had pleased to put into language the "squeaking and gibberings" of those disembodied phantoms which haunted the streets of Rome, no doubt his wonderful imagination could have filled up the sketch, which, marked by these two emphatic and singularly felicitous expressions, he has left as characteristic of the language of the dead.

There is, then, no external rule governing the behavior of supernatural beings introduced into fiction, but the writer must endow them with

<sup>22</sup> Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft, p. 372.

<sup>23</sup> Lives of Eminent Novelists and Dramatists, p. 547.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., p. 548.

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., pp. 547, 548.—In his essay on Hoffmann (Miscellaneous Works, xviii, 276) Scott again praises Shakespeare's skill in finding appropriate speeches for ghosts, but notes that the attempts "would probably have been ridiculous in any meaner hand."

speech (if he has them talk) and with action appropriate to the nature of the beings he has conjured up.

These, then, are the theoretical principles concerning the literary use of the supernatural which Scott expresses in his critical writings:

1. There must be an appropriate and continuous atmosphere.
2. What is presented to the reader in the first part of the plot as supernatural must not be explained away at the end of the story.
3. The incidents involving the supernatural must be relatively brief and few.
4. The manifestation of the supernatural force must be relatively indefinite.
5. Although the human beings in a tale of the supernatural are bound by the ordinary rules of probability, and the supernatural appearances must be self-consistent, the latter need not follow traditional modes of conduct.

Let us now turn to those novels which have been thought to antedate Waverley. Our present method of investigation is hardly applicable to St. Ronan's Well. In that story several characters think themselves in contact with supernatural beings, but the marvelous plays too slight a part in the story to throw any light on our present problem.

The Black Dwarf, on the other hand, suffers greatly from the author's inconsistent handling of the supernatural. Scott's original purpose seems to have called for a Gothic novel,<sup>26</sup> and an analysis of the story indicates that the supernatural was to be one of the sources of terror in the work as it was originally planned:

The introductory chapter prepares the reader for prodigious events. The second chapter is designed to build up an atmosphere of supernaturalism. Mucklestane Moor, the principal scene of the action, was "in extremely bad fame as haunted by supernatural appearances" (pp. 32, 33).<sup>27</sup> A witch legend gives the place its name. Elshie, who builds his hut upon this ill-famed moor, is immediately associated with sorcery. His appearance is conducive to the awe with which the natives regard him. He is less than four feet tall; he is deformed in body, his voice is harsh and grating. His strength seems preternatural, for the walls of his hut contain stones which it would have required two men's strength to move. He gives advice on diseases of men and cattle, and he even answers queries upon matters "beyond bodily complaints." When Hobbie Elliot goes to Elshie for help, the dwarf offers him gold, an offer which to the farmer resembles a satanic compact. Elshie's language is equivocal. When he tells Earnescliff, "and my blood be on yours [head], if you touch the skirt of my garments, to infect them with the taint of mortality" (p. 41), his speech may be nothing more than an expression of his mean opinion of humanity; or it may imply that the speaker belongs to a superhuman world.

<sup>26</sup> In the 1830 introduction Scott says: "The story was intended to be longer, and the catastrophe more artificially brought out; but a friendly critic, to whose opinion I subjected the work in its progress, was of the opinion that the idea of the Solitary was of a kind too revolting, and more likely to disgust than interest the reader."

<sup>27</sup> All references to the Waverley Novels are to the edition published by P. F. Collier and Sons, New York, n.d. The text of the Collier edition is that of the Dryburgh Edition, published by A. and C. Black, London, 1892.

It is obvious both from the introduction<sup>28</sup> and from the handling of Elshie (or Sir Edward Mauley, as he turns out to be) in the first few chapters, that Scott originally intended the character to be an agent of terror. As the book now stands, Mauley is, in the latter part of the story, made the instrument of good upon which the action depends. Scott's revision must not have extended to the pages earlier than page 70, for there Elshie refrains from warning Elliot for no other reason than his delight in human suffering. Yet later, notwithstanding an altercation at which angry words are exchanged, Elshie restores Hobbie's loss, saves the heroine from a repulsive marriage, and otherwise arranges the awards at the end of the tale.<sup>29</sup> Thus the wizard-like misanthrope, without adequate reformation, plays the rôle of providence.

In his treatment of the character of Ratcliffe, Scott remains even nearer the Gothic tradition, and does greater violence to his rules.

The people believed that Elshie was in league with the devil. They reported "that from the heights which commanded the moor at a distance, passengers often discovered a person at work along with this dweller of the desert, who regularly disappeared as soon as they approached closer to the cottage. Such a figure was also occasionally seen sitting beside him at the door, walking with him on the moor, or assisting him in fetching water from the fountain" (p. 53). When it is suggested that the figure is the dwarf's shadow, it is remarked that the person is taller than Elshie, and that he has been seen to come between the dwarf and the sun.

At one point the reader is allowed a view of the mysterious companion:

Two human figures (if that of the Dwarf could be termed such) issued from the solitary abode of the Recluse, and stood as if in converse in the open air. The taller form then stooped, as if taking something up which lay beside the door of the hut, then moved forward a little way, and again halted, as in deep conference. All Hobbie's superstitious terrors revived on witnessing this spectacle.

<sup>28</sup> Writing of David Ritchie, the original of Elshie, Scott says: "He did not altogether discourage the idea [that he commanded supernatural powers;] it enlarged his very limited circle of power, and in so far gratified his means of giving terror or pain."

<sup>29</sup> Professor Wilmon Brewer, in Shakespeare's Influence on Sir Walter Scott (Boston, 1925), pp. 258-261, argues that the character of the dwarf is modeled upon that of Timon of Athens. There is, however, this essential difference: Timon dies in his misanthropy, and gives his gold only with the object of increasing human misery, whereas Mauley aids both Hobbie and Isabella Vere from motives of humanity. Scott's original plan must have called for Mauley's playing the rôle of Timon to the end.

That the Dwarf would open his dwelling to a mortal guest was as improbable as that any one would choose voluntarily to be his nocturnal visitor; and, under full conviction that he beheld a wizard holding intercourse with his familiar spirit, Hobbie pulled in at once his breath and his bridle, and resolved not to incur the indignation of either by a hasty intrusion on their conference. They were probably aware of his approach, for he had not halted for a moment before the Dwarf returned to his cottage; and the taller figure . . . glided round the inclosure of the garden, and seemed to disappear from the eyes of the admiring Hobbie (p 105).

Whether Scott meant for his reader to share in Hobbie's conjecture is not clear. In the first sentence quoted above he refers to both figures as human, and in the qualifying clause eliminates the dwarf; but as the visitor disappears, he is said to have glided, a mode of locomotion usually thought to be peculiar to inhabitants of the spirit world. Notwithstanding Scott's theory, clearly set forth in 1810, that explanations of prodigious phenomena should not be deferred until the later chapters, the figure is not identified until the end of the story, where we learn that the man is Ratcliffe, and that near the pillar is a subterranean passage which served to conceal him when anyone approached his master.

It seems probable, therefore, that in the first version of The Black Dwarf Scott created a tale of terror in the tradition of Ann Radcliffe. He reworked the manuscript, but was not thorough enough in his revision to rid the tale of all vestiges of the original version. I know of no external evidence to contradict this conjecture. According to Lockhart (I, 235)<sup>80</sup> Scott held his first and only interview with David Ritchie, the original of Elshie, in the summer of 1797. The book, therefore, could have been written at any time after that date.

Guy Mannering is another novel which, according to Scott, underwent considerable alteration in design during the course of its composition. The source of the plot, he tells us in the 1828 introduction, was an old legend he had heard told by a servant in his father's family. The legend as told by Scott is essentially as follows:

An astrologer is by chance present at a country seat when an heir is born. He casts the nativity of the son, and foresees a boyhood fraught with danger, and an extreme crisis at twenty-one. That crisis safely past, a happy life is in store for the infant. The dangers seem to be of a spiritual kind, and the astrologer recommends that great care be exercised in the religious education of the boy, and that he be sent to pass his twenty-first birthday with the astrologer himself. After an excessively gloomy youth, the heir goes to the astrologer's. There, on his twenty-first birthday, he is left alone in a room and is tormented by a host of fiends, among whom the Prince of Darkness is bodily present. Because of his Christian training and his consequent firm reliance on truth and prayer, the young man comes off victorious, and afterwards marries a beautiful maiden and is "consigned over at the last of the story to domestic happiness."

<sup>80</sup> All references of Lockhart are to the five-volume edition published by Houghton, Mifflin Company, Boston, 1901.

Scott continues:

The Author of Waverley had imagined a possibility of framing an interesting, and perhaps not unedifying tale out of the incidents of the life of a doomed individual, whose efforts at good and virtuous conduct were to be for ever disappointed by the intervention, as it were, of some malevolent being, and who was at last to come off victorious from the fearful struggle. In short, something was meditated upon a plan resembling the imaginative tale of Sintram and His Companions, by Mons. de la Motte-Fouque, although if it then existed, the Author had not seen it.

The fact that astrology was no longer accredited, doubts of his own talents, and the desire to avoid "doctrines and discussions of a nature too serious for the purpose and for the character of the narrative" induced Scott to abandon the plan. To quote Scott further: "In changing his plan, however, which was done in the course of printing, the early sheets retained the vestiges of the original tenor of the story, although they now hang upon it as an unnecessary and unnatural incumbrance."

In mere incident, however, Scott's departure from his first plan is not so wide as his language implies. Guy Mannering is by chance present when the hero, Bertrem, is born. He casts the infant's nativity, and observes that three periods will be "particularly hazardous,—his fifth, his tenth, and his twenty-first year" (p. 49). In accordance with the prophecy, young Bertrem is in his fifth year kidnapped by smugglers; in his tenth year he attempts with another boy to escape on the open sea in a stolen skiff; he is then befriended and educated, and after numerous hardships, at the age of twenty-one, regains the sequestered estate of his fathers, and is rewarded with domestic happiness. Ten short chapters get the hero over the first crisis; the second is only casually mentioned in retrospect. It is about the third that the plot is constructed.

The plot is so constructed, however, that the hero is not of prime importance. The intrigues carried on for and against him are the work of others, and they chiefly furnish a narrative thread for the pictures of Scotch life and characters which give the book its charm. Yet the hero is not entirely forgotten, nor is the fact that astrology has predicted a severe crisis for him at the age he has now reached. References or allusions to the prophecy occur at intervals throughout the story (pp. 106, 107, 109, 115, 116, 229, 319, 376, 399, 465).

It is not, then, that Scott eliminates astrology from all but the earlier chapters of the book. It is that he has changed his attitude toward it, and does not allow his readers to take it seriously. Sampson, although afraid of ghosts and witches, looks upon astrology as "altogether vain, frivolous, and unsatisfactory" (p. 44); Guy Mannering calls it "foolery" (p. 59), and ever afterwards he refers to it in a spirit of banter. Malignant stellar influence is thus kept from being felt as potent in the action.

Scott, however, does not avoid the question of destiny. He merely conceals it. The fate of Bertrem is as fully determined as ever. The most significant change which Scott makes is to shift the emphasis from the all-pervasive, supernatural force implied in the original plan to the merely natural force of circumstance and environment, which may be supposed to be the instruments of the all-pervasive power. Bertrem's struggle, in so far as he struggles at all, is an external one. He is apparently unaware of the fate predicted for him. He is passive to circumstances. As he wandered into Cumberland in search of his sweetheart—

The first three of four miles were rather melancholy, for want of the society to which he had been accustomed. But this unusual mood of mind soon gave way to the influence of his natural good spirits, excited by the exercise and the bracing effects of the frosty air. He whistled as he went along, not "from want of thought," but to give vent to those buoyant feelings which he had no other mode of expressing (p. 172).

After he was lodged in jail—

The strangeness of his destiny, and the mysteries which appeared to thicken around him, while he seemed alike to be persecuted and protected by secret enemies and friends, arising out of a class of people with whom he had no previous connection, for some time occupied his thoughts. Fatigue, however, gradually composed his mind, and in a short time he was as fast asleep as his companion (p. 368).

The reader can have no great dread for an unknown power whose worst decree can only deprive the hero of a few minutes' sleep.

Thus, by belittling astrology and by throwing the emphasis upon circumstance and environment as the determining forces in Bertrem's life, Scott was enabled to fill the book with superb pictures of Scottish life and character, and to make it more nearly like Waverley. That Scott should have planned a work on the order of Sintram and His Companions so soon after the success of his first published novel is unlikely. He did not have at this time a host of imitators forcing him to seek "novelty."

Although Scott does not tell us what part Meg Merrilies was to play in the plot of Guy Mannering as the work was originally planned, it seems clear that the supernaturalism of her rôle, like that of Guy Mannering, has been toned down. She has many characteristics suggestive of witches. She "spaes" the fortune of the hero at birth, making a prophecy in substantial agreement with that of the astrologer. Later, in a moment of wrath, she curses the house of Ellangowan, and looks upon the subsequent misfortunes of the hero as a fulfillment of her malediction. Repentant of her words, she dedicates her life to the restoration of the heir. She is able to be the instrument of his restoration primarily because she is in possession of the secret of his kidnapping and has the means of identifying him, but her reputation for witchcraft stands her in good stead. Smugglers send for her to bless their ships. She is greatly feared by the commonalty because of her reputed league with the devil (pp. 104, 105, 106, 107, 177, 269, 365, 373).

Her means of extricating the hero, however, are purely natural, and Scott does not even for purposes of suspense suggest that they are not. Being under a sentence of banishment, she must of necessity move in secret, but her movements are accounted for. There is little of the conventional mystification, such as we have noticed in The Black Dwarf. She makes a prophecy, and it is fulfilled; she curses a house, and it falls. She is a demented gypsy wife who thinks herself an instrument of Weird. She may be the instrument she believes herself to be; but if so, the fate whose tool she is employs only natural means. The rôle of Meg Merrilies has been brought into harmony with Scott's theories relative to the use of the supernatural in fiction. The chief evidence of the early composition of Guy Mannering, as revealed by our present investigation, lies in the obvious toning down of the supernatural.

The conjecture that Redgauntlet belongs to the 'prentice period of Scott's career as a novelist is based, I suppose, upon the chaotic structure of the novel,<sup>21</sup> despite which the plot does hang together. The book, however, associates itself with Guy Mannering in the metaphysical implication of its theme as well as in its execution. Fate is again prominent, but the implications of that fate are again obscured. The prophecy takes the form of a curse which is reinforced by a birthmark placed upon the fated members of a family.

Long before the action opens, the first Redgauntlet to bear the name, in one of the civil broils of Scotland, was the unwitting slayer of a rebellious son, whom he had cursed. Redgauntlet had pursued his enemy into a narrow pass, when a youth threw himself between the pursuer and his intended victim, and was unhorsed. Redgauntlet recognized his son and attempted to leap over him. The horse's hoof struck the youth's head and killed him instantly. On the forehead of an infant son, born prematurely immediately after the misfortune, there appeared a birth-mark in the form of a miniature horseshoe. The father did penance and confessed himself to a holy monk. Then (p. 259):

<sup>21</sup> As a contributor to the London Times Literary Supplement (April 14, 1928), pp. 529-530, has pointed out, the story is made up of thirteen private letters, plus two chapters of author's narrative, plus seven chapters from a journal, plus eleven chapters of author's narrative, plus a two-chapter epilogue.

It was foretold to Redgauntlet that, on account of his unshaken patriotism, his family should continue to be powerful amid the changes of future times; but that, in detestation of his unrelenting cruelty to his own issue, Heaven had decreed that the valour of his race should always be fruitless, and that the cause which they espoused should never prosper.

The Redgauntlet of the novel is a leader in a foredoomed attempt, in 1766, to place Charles Edward upon the throne. The hero of the story is Redgauntlet's young nephew, known as Darsie Latimer, heir of the house. Latimer is loyal to the Hanoverian prince, and after the collapse of the rebellion, the leader is in some measure consoled with the hope that, now since a Redgauntlet has espoused the winning side, the curse is lifted and the sin of his ancestor expiated.

Both characters bear the fatal mark, though their attitudes toward it differ. To Redgauntlet the symbol has a mysterious solemnity, if not sacredness, as is evidenced by the following speech to Darsie (p. 420):

The spirit of Sir Alberick is alive within me at this moment [he continued], drawing up his stately form and sitting erect in his saddle, while he pressed his finger against his forehead; "and if you yourself crossed my path in opposition, I swear by the mark that darkens my brow, that a new deed should be done—a new doom should be deserved."

It is clear, then, that, though Redgauntlet's fate has been thrust upon him, he does not rebel against it, but rather accepts it with pride; nay, announces that it is the fate he would choose if choice were possible to him. Darsie discovers the mark on his brow by catching a reflection of his countenance in a large antique mirror, and concludes that, "Surely my fate is somehow strangely interwoven with that of this mysterious individual" (i.e., Redgauntlet) (p. 246).

The theme of Redgauntlet is one of exquisite metaphysical possibilities. Hawthorne would have reveled in it. The sin of an ancestor brings upon his descendants a curse, announced by prophecy, which extends over centuries, subverting their highest resolutions and endeavors, and branding their foreheads with the symbol of their progenitor's guilt. It is the House of Seven Gables motif, with a hereditary scarlet letter. What should be the feelings of a member of this fated family who knows its history and is conscious of sharing its doom? In Scott's novel he accepts his fate and loses himself in political intrigue. Perhaps, without being profound, he chances upon a profound solution. What should be the feelings of a young man reared in ignorance of his birth and family connections, who suddenly learns that he is a member of the doomed race, by glancing into an antique mirror and seeing the mark upon his own forehead? Scott makes little attempt to answer the question. Redgauntlet is not interested in the expiation of sin. Darsie is more concerned with the identity of a mysterious lady with a green mantle (his sister she turns out to be) than with the implications of the fatal mark upon his forehead. Because of the externality of Scott's treatment of character, the question of fate does not assume the importance in Redgauntlet that the theme would lead us to expect. In this respect Redgauntlet is to be associated with Guy Mannering, rather than with The Bride of Lammermoor and A Legend of Montrose.

If, however, as seems probable, the first conception and perhaps a first draft of Redgauntlet belong to the pre-Waverley period of Scott's career, "Wandering Willie's Tale," inserted in the narrative, is a late addition or has been carefully revised. Andrew Lang, in his Border Edition of Redgauntlet notes four additions to the tale made by Scott on the proofsheets, and according to the present owner of the sheets, Lang has not enumerated all the changes.<sup>32</sup> This external evidence, however, is hardly necessary to prove the late writing or careful reworking of the tale. Not only is it in complete harmony with Scott's theories, but it is managed with such skillful attention to detail that as late as 1925 a critic (C. R. L. Fletcher, London Quarterly Review, CCXLIV, 30) asks, "And when Scott blended humor with his terror, as in 'Wandering Willie's Tale' in Redgauntlet, where will you find his equal?" and Mr. Edward J. O'Brien includes Willie's narrative in his list of the twenty-five best short stories in the world.<sup>33</sup>

Concerning Redgauntlet our results are not conclusive. The management of the supernatural in "Wandering Willie's Tale" shows Scott in his maturity. The supernatural element in the novel proper suggests that Scott first selected, as in Guy Mannering, a metaphysical theme such as was popular in Germany, and that he later revised the story so as to obscure some of the metaphysical implications of the theme. In 1828 (January 9) Scott wrote to Terry concerning the translation of German <sup>32</sup> David MacRitchie, "The Proofsheets of Redgauntlet," London Times Literary Supplement (September 14, 1924). I have not had access to Mr. MacRitchie's longer article on the same subject in Longman's Magazine for March, 1900. The manuscript of Redgauntlet has been described in the London Times Literary Supplement for April 14, 1924.

<sup>33</sup> Twenty-five Finest Short Stories, New York, 1931.

novels into English: "There is in the German mode of narration an affection of deep metaphysical reflection and protracted description and discussion, which the English do not easily tolerate."<sup>34</sup> When Scott first arrived at this conclusion is not clear, but he must have reached it between the planning of Guy Mannering, which was to resemble the later-published Sintram and His Companions, and the final execution of the book. Redgauntlet seems to belong to the period of Guy Mannering.

In The Monastery are to be found the most serious violations of Scott's theories concerning the use of the supernatural in fiction, as well as the most radical departure from his usual practice. In this work the visible manifestation of the supernatural is not the instrument of some less definite higher power, or an all-pervasive force, like fate; it is rather the actual force itself, which arranges the human events of the plot, not in accord with an ascertainable predestined course, but as impulse and caprice may dictate.<sup>35</sup> The one element of consistency in the supernatural force is that it is uniformly friendly to the hero, and in this respect, also, The Monastery is exceptional. There are other examples of such friendliness, as for instance Divine Providence in The Heart of Midlothian and fate in Quentin Durward; but generally in the Waverley Novels when a supernatural power influences the action, it is inimical to the desires of the character, if not to his best interests, and its messengers bring, not good news, but bad. The supernatural force in The Monastery, however, becomes nothing more than a protecting force, without apparent allegorical meaning, which carries the hero through a series of loosely connected events, and in the end rewards him with the high-born maiden and the customary estate.<sup>36</sup> Scott must have been aware that he had let the rôle of the White Lady so degenerate when in the introduction he wrote of supernatural machinery as "the last resort of distressed authors since the days of Horace."

In his introduction of 1830 Scott gives some account of the origin of the White Lady. He rejected, he says, the fairies of popular superstition because the folk no longer believed in them, and had "recourse to the beautiful, though almost forgotten, theory of astral spirits." The White Lady is represented as an imitation of Fouque's Undine.<sup>37</sup> The author

<sup>34</sup> Lockhart, iv, 84.

<sup>35</sup> N. W. Senior, Essays on Fiction, p. 55, had ample warrant for asserting that the White Lady acted "with no assignable objects"

<sup>36</sup> I am aware of the fact that in her last speech the White Lady professes to have protected Halbert and sent him out of the valley to prevent his marriage to Mary. But her uniform kindness to him during the first part of the action contradicts her words. I doubt if Scott had any idea of giving her this speech when he wrote the first part of the book.

<sup>37</sup> Scott's words are: "In imitation of an example so successful, the White Lady of Avenel

goes on to speak of Shakespeare as the "first of authorities" in describing the attributes of elementary spirits, and cites Ariel as the superb example. Despite what Scott says, however, the conception is obviously modified by, and has perhaps originated from the fairies of Scottish folklore. The introduction notes that the Dale of Allan, the Glendearg of the story, had long been believed to be haunted by these creatures. Martin in The Monastery, like Jarvie in Rob Roy and Hobbie in The Black Dwarf, refers to the supernatural beings as the "Good Neighbours" (p. 77). And the scene in which Halbert visits the underground chapel is reminiscent of the experiences of Thomas the Rhymer and other characters mentioned in Scott's Essay on Fairies and in his Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft. Moreover, the rôle of the White Lady bears a close resemblance to that of the Celtic banshie, or (to quote from Scott's Letters on Demonology and Witchcraft, p. 351) "household fairy whose office it is to appear, seemingly mourning, while she announces the approaching death of some one of the destined race." "The Highlanders," continues Scott (p. 352), "contrived to exact from them other points of service, sometimes as warding off dangers in battle; at others, as guarding and protecting the infant heir through the dangers of childhood; and sometimes as condescending to interfere even in the sports of the chieftain, and point out the fittest move to be made at chess, or the best card to be played at any other game."

Of the prototypes mentioned by Scott, Ariel is clearly the most important, and Professor Brewer (Shakespeare's Influence on Sir Walter Scott, pp. 305, 306), has pointed out many parallels between the two characters. Yet the White Lady differs from Ariel as well as from the other analogues mentioned. The influence which Fouque's Undine exerts on the human personages in the story is confined to the man whom she loves and to his immediate associates. Nor is her power in that limited sphere extensive, for she cannot command the love of her mortal husband. She is constantly circumscribed by her kindred, and she cannot avert the catastrophe which her earthly love-affair entails. Nor is the White Lady properly a sylph of the Paracelsian system, for she works without intelligent direction, whereas Paracelsus and his associates sought to control nature through the control of elementary spirits.<sup>38</sup> was introduced into the following sheets." If the first conception of the White Lady came from Fouque, The Monastery could not have been written before 1813, the date of the publication of Undine. Scott's words, however, could well apply to a change in the character, for example that from fairy to elementary spirit, rather than to her origin.

---

<sup>38</sup> Frank Thilly's History of Philosophy (New York, 1914), p. 285; Wilhelm Windelband's A History of Philosophy, translated by James H. Tufts (second edition, New York, 1901), p. 378.

Ariel's activities are directed to useful and human ends by an intelligence which acts consistently, but there is no Prospero in The Monastery. The first conception of the White Lady, then, came from popular tradition; this conception was later modified by a literary tradition descending from the renaissance theory of astral spirits.

The powers of the White Lady are extensive. Primarily she is the guardian spirit of the Avenel family. But it is chiefly through the hero, Halbert Glendinning, that she protects the heroine, Mary Avenel. She teaches him a charm by which he may summon her; she leads him into a subterranean chapel, and heals his wound when he is burned there; she gives him the means of insulting his adversary, Shafton; and when, in a duel, Halbert runs his opponent through, she raises the fallen duelist from the dead. In none of these activities is the White Lady directed by Halbert. Generally she comes without summons. On the two occasions when Halbert initiates the interview, he merely seeks advice, which he blindly follows. More important than the mere direction of Halbert's conduct was the White Lady's bringing about in him a sudden maturity of character. After his first conference with her, it is said that "it was evident to all that from that day, young Halbert was an altered man; that he acted with the steadiness, promptitude, and determination which belonged to riper years, and bore himself with a manner which appertained to higher rank" (p. 194).

Although the White Lady has had her defenders, she has been generally condemned from Scott's day to this, and Scott himself, in the introduction to The Fortunes of Nigel, admitted that she was a failure, "but rather in the execution." He regrets his inability to evoke an "esprit follet, at the same time fantastic and interesting, capricious and kind; a sort of wildfire of the elements, bound by no fixed laws or motives of action, faithful and fond, yet teasing and uncertain." Such a conception doubtless has its poetic possibilities, but an esprit follet of this type could hardly provide the motivating force of a coherent plot unless motives were imposed upon her from without. Moreover, as Adolphus pointed out in his Letters to Heber (London, 1821, pp. 12, 13), there are elements in the conception that are essentially contradictory. They "are joined," says Adolphus, "but they refuse to blend." Particularly he objects to "this ethereal personage's" descending to "clownish pranks" and promoting a "frivolous jest about a tailor's bodkin." Another inconsistency he might have pointed out. Scott in his essay on fairies (1802) had noted that the Christian religion admitted "only of two classes of spirits exclusive of the souls of men—angels, namely, and devils." Scott later insisted, as we have seen, that the author employing supernatural beings was not bound to treat them in a conventional way, provided he raised no spirits that he could not lay. Scott's theory, therefore, did not demand that he make the White Lady either an angel or a devil. But she certainly becomes incongruous when at one moment she is solemnly recommending the study of the Bible and at the next engaging in horseplay becoming a London apprentice. These tricks become further incongruous when we consider that her miracles are wrought in the Biblical manner, that is, without visible or known means.

It is true, however, that the chief flaws in the use of the supernatural in The Monastery are those of execution, and they arise from Scott's violation of the theoretical principles he had set forth as regulating the use of the supernatural in fiction. He needed only to explain away the mystery of the White Lady at the end of the story in order to break all five of his rules. I have shown that he made the White Lady essentially inconsistent, and thus set at defiance the fifth rule, as I have numbered them. He violated the first in not providing an appropriate and continuous atmosphere. Fouque, whom Scott professed to imitate, placed the action of Undine in an enchanted forest, where brave knights venture only to prove their hardihood and win their ladies. The action of The Tempest takes place on a little-known island, noted for marvels. The action of The Monastery takes place on the Tweedside, near Melrose. Manners are realistically described. It is true that Glendearg is noted for fairies, but the duel there is too realistic for a combat in fairyland.

The necessity of an appropriate atmosphere Scott stresses in his essays on Walpole and Ann Radcliffe, essays written some months after the publication of The Monastery, and the reception of that novel may account for the emphasis placed on atmosphere in the essays; but the remaining principles were enunciated earlier. In his review of Godwin's Fleetwood (1805) Scott had said:<sup>39</sup>

After Caleb Williams it would be an injustice to Mr. Godwin to mention St. Leon, where the marvellous is employed too frequently to excite wonder and the terrible is employed till we have become familiar with terror.

I have quoted a passage of identical import from Scott's review of Maturin's Fatal Revenge (1810). When, therefore, in 1820, Scott wrote much about the necessity of making the incidents involving supernatural agencies brief and infrequent, he could not have been, as Miss Ball implies, making a deduction from his "blunder" in The Monastery.<sup>40</sup>

<sup>39</sup> Miscellaneous Works, xviii, 119.

<sup>40</sup> Miss Ball's statement (Sir Walter Scott as a Critic of Literature, p. 117) is as follows: "That he was deeply impressed with his blunder in managing the White Lady of Avenel may be surmised from the fact that in several later discussions of the effect of supernatural apparitions in novels, he emphasized the necessity of keeping them sufficiently infrequent to preserve an atmosphere of mystery."

The extent of Scott's offense against his own twice-stated principles becomes obvious upon the presentation of a few facts. If one consults the index of the edition of The Monastery which I am using, he will find the following pages listed after the entry, "White Lady": 79, 90, 101, 136, 161, 232, 261, 307, 396, 466. The first fifty-seven pages are occupied with the introductions to the first and 1830 editions, so that the novel proper begins with page 59. Thus when the reader has perused twenty pages of the story, he meets the White Lady, and from that point until Halbert's departure from his native valley (p. 278), he may not read more than seventy pages without encountering the White Lady. On the average he will meet her once in thirty pages. Twice only eleven pages intervene between appearances. These figures are based on the index and do not take account of the fact that the White Lady is often on the stage for a number of pages. Approximately twenty-five of the first two hundred and fifty pages of the novel proper deal directly with the White Lady. At one time (Chapter XII) she is the chief personage in a dialogue extending through ten pages. It is evident, therefore, that in The Monastery Scott kept the supernatural much before the reader.

It is also evident that he violated another of his own previously stated principles in making the White Lady definite. In a review of Frankenstein (1818) Scott had taken exception to the monster's "lengthy oration" on his self-education, on the ground that the creature lost "some part of the mysterious sublimity annexed to his first appearance" (Miscellaneous Works, XVIII, 203). Yet in The Monastery there are seven occasions upon which the White Lady talks, or rather sings, since song is her manner of communication. On one of these occasions her songs total 104 lines of poetry. In all, she delivers 814 verses, an average of slightly more than forty-five to the appearance. The thirty lines in which she describes herself are more definite than necessary to identify her as belonging to a class of elementary spirits. But in another way than by much speaking the White Lady loses the indefiniteness which Scott theoretically held essential to the proper treatment of the supernatural. She usually appeared as a mist, gradually assuming shape and "corporeal consistency"; and when in that form, she was as corporeal as the miller's daughter. It was by a "firm hand" that she detained Father Philip in the saddle (p. 102), and it was by physical strength that she "pitched him out of the saddle into the stream, where, still keeping her hand on his collar, she gave him two or three souses in the watery fluid, so as to ensure that every part of him had its share of wetting" (p. 103). Father Eustace was "pushed from the saddle with gentle but irresistible force" (p. 139). She struck Christie down, he says, "as I might strike down a child of four years old with an iron mace" (p. 144). The White Lady's technique at times resembles that of a village hoiden. There is little that is indefinite in her treatment of monks and mossstroopers.

In The Monastery, then, either Scott violated principles of composition previously and emphatically stated by him, or he wrote the book before he stated the principles, and in his revision was unable to bring the work into harmony with his rules. The latter alternative is the more probable; for the White Lady is so woven into the fabric of the book that to bring the treatment of her into complete accord with Scott's rules would have necessitated a virtual rewriting of the book, and, what probably had more weight with Scott, the discarding of a great deal of pleasing verse. Offenses against one of Scott's rules, the one condemning post-climactic explanations of supposedly supernatural phenomena, occur in three other novels, two of which (Woodstock and Anne of Geierstein) are known from Scott's journals to be late, and one of which (Peveril of the Peak) is not surely dated from external evidence.

In Peveril of the Peak (1822) a character, Fenella, is endowed with many fairy-like traits, and the superstitious Manxians regard her as an elf. She was reputed to be deaf and dumb, but the populace declared that "she had been heard talking, and singing, and laughing most elfishly with the invisibles of her own race." They alleged that she had a double who performed her duties in the household of the Countess of Derby "while the real Fenella joined the song of the mermaids . . . or the dance of the fairies" (p. 222). The better informed characters do not share in these beliefs, nor is the reader asked to. Not long after Fenella is introduced, Scott gives a partial account of her life through the mouth of a sea-captain, who scoffs at the idea of her being allied to the spirit world. He explains her remarkable agility by the fact that she has been trained as a rope-dancer. The captain's speech is a preparation for the two visits which Fenella pays Julian while he is in prison. The circumstances not only bewilder Julian, but puzzle the reader as well. On the first of these occasions, Julian's prayer is echoed by "Amen" in a "voice as sweet and 'soft as honey dew,' which sounded as if the words were spoken close by his bedside" (p. 473). Julian attempts to seize the speaker, but grasps "nothing save thin air." He awakens his companion, who lights a candle: There was no one in the room save Sir Geoffrey Hudson and himself; . . . all the fastenings of the door were so secure that it seemed that they could not have been opened without a great deal of noise, which, on the last occasion at least, could not possibly have escaped their ears, . . . seeing they must have been employed in searching the chamber when the unknown, if an earthly being, was in the act of retreating from it (p. 476).

The second visit of Fenella removes any doubt the reader may have had as to the identity of the visitant, but it is not until the end of the story that her method of access and egress is explained. The explanation is lame and improbable. The "most Protestant peers," it is said, "in order to obtain perfect knowledge of the Popish Plot had contrived . . . ingenious apertures" for visiting the witnesses (p. 645).

Although this explanation is an infraction of Scott's rule if strictly interpreted, the author of Peveril has not adopted the method of Ann Radcliffe, which he had condemned in 1810 and in 1820; for during the greater part of the narrative Scott has caused the reader to believe that Fenella is mortal. He has prepared for her entry into the prison, which comes relatively late in the story, by revealing her agility; yet clearly, as Lockhart admits, there is a "condescension to the practice of vulgar romance in his treatment of trial scenes . . . which outraged every feeling of probability with those who had studied the terrible tragedies of the Popish Plot" (iv, 86).

This improbable explanation, however, does not prove that Peveril of the Peak is an early work. For Scott's treatment of Fenella, as well as other supernatural phenomena, through the greater part of the book reveals Scott as the social historian, recording the popular superstitions of the Manxians as he had found them recorded in Waldron's Description of the Isle of Man. His fondness for mystification led him into an improbable explanation of an improbable incident

The same type of blunder occurs in Woodstock (1826) and in Anne of Geierstein (1829), both of which are known from Scott's journals to be late. Woodstock borders on the type of Gothicism which Scott had repudiated, but Scott maintained with justice that James Ballantyne was wrong in calling the work an imitation of Mrs. Radcliffe. He wrote in his journal (i, 103):

I have taken a wide difference: my object is not to excite fear of supernatural things in my reader, but to show the effect of such fear upon the agents of the story.

The emphasis of the narrative is clearly on the characters, though the novel has many of the trappings of the Radcliffian tradition. These trappings Scott retained from his sources, which must have had a historical basis.<sup>41</sup> According to contemporary accounts, when commissioners of the Commonwealth went to Woodstock in 1649 to take possession of the royal lodge by that name, loyalists, by a series of pranks, reputed to be the work of supernatural beings, frightened the commoners away and prevented the destruction of the lodge. Though Scott throws the emphasis upon the reactions of the characters, and does not attempt to arouse ghostly fears in the minds of his readers, he does let the narrative lead him into complications from which he cannot extricate himself. Various pranks are played which seem to the commissioners to be the work of supernatural beings; but Scott does not, like Mrs. Radcliffe, suggest strongly to the reader that the fears of the characters are just. As the mysteries in Woodstock occur, strong and repeated suggestions are made to the reader that they are to be referred to natural causes, and in the latter part they are, with one exception, so explained.

<sup>41</sup> See Scott's introductions and appendices to Woodstock.

These suggestions are so frequent that they need not all be pointed out. Joceline believes that the servants who have left Lee's service at Woodstock have not, as they claim, been driven away by their fear of ghosts, but that they have left because of Sir Henry's inability to pay them (p. 54). We know that one object of fear supposed to be the devil is Wildrake (p. 88), and knowing the identity of this devil, the reader is reluctant to believe that other pranks are the work of supernatural beings. Moreover, though the lodge was supposed to be haunted, members of the family had not been disturbed (p. 251). We early get hints of blind stairways and secret passages. As the story progresses, we learn more details of the maze-like arrangement of the building. In making these hints Scott departed from the tradition of Mrs. Radcliffe.

He adhered to that tradition, however, in making explicit explanations after the climax. The light in Rosamond's Tower loses its mysteriousness when Albert Lee is seen to leap the chasm separating this turret from the adjacent one (p. 492). The ghost which had driven Harrison to temporary insanity was Joceline dressed as Robison used to dress (p. 419). Albany's ghost is Albany himself, who, despite his fall from a four-story tower, yet lived and plotted (pp. 504-505). Other phenomena are similarly explained; the explanation is cumbersome, unsatisfactory, and open to all the objections which Scott had urged against those of Mrs. Radcliffe. Worse than the resurrection of Albany after his four-story fall is the fact that, after Everard had examined minutely the portrait of Victor Lee and had satisfied himself that it had no concealed spring, and that it was firmly fixed in the wall, Scott, to explain the presence of the ghost-players in the room, must say that there was a secret spring after all, but that it was so well concealed that Everard could not find it (p. 482). And we never learn why the character who impersonated the ghost of Victor Lee was not killed when Everard fired at him point-blank from a distance of six feet. Scott's explanation, then, is both incomplete and improbable.

Yet, Woodstock, unlike The Black Dwarf, shows no evidence of having been Gothic in design. The confusion arises largely from the fact that, when Scott wrote the first part of the novel, he knew only in a general way how it was to end (Journal I, 114, 117, 157).

The last novel in which Scott encroaches upon his theories concerning the use of the supernatural is Anne of Geierstein. The heroine of this tale bears some resemblance to the White Lady of Avenel and to Fenella. Fenella is a girl thought to be a fairy; the White Lady is an elementary spirit frankly portrayed as such; Anne of Geierstein is a girl thought to have descended from an elementary spirit. In plot the tale is not greatly unlike Fouque's Undine. The German romance is concerned with the love and marriage, and with the consequences of that marriage, of a mortal man and a water spirit. Anne of Geierstein has for its main plot the love of a mortal man and a woman thought to be a fire spirit. Fouque's romance ends pathetically. Scott escapes such an ending by showing that the heroine is not the other-world creature she is popularly supposed to be, and that she is therefore a suitable mate for the hero. The story, then, shows the conflict between the hero's love for the girl and his fear that she is not a mortal maiden.

In building up this fear in the mind of the hero, Scott conveys to the reader a suggestion that it is not without grounds. He endows Anne with an agility rivaling that of Fenella. He retells an old legend which makes the grandmother of Anne a salamander. In the course of the action Anne makes numerous sudden appearances and disappearances. Militating against these suggestions, however, is the fact that Arthur on several occasions touched Anne and found her substantial. Yet she is no more corporeal than the White Lady of Avenel could be on occasion. In the first half of the book, therefore, the reader is likely to share, in some degree, the uncertainty of the hero.

A strict adherence to Scott's theory concerning explanations would have demanded that this uncertainty remain at the end of the story. Such indefiniteness, however, could not well obtain in a plot depending upon a love affair between a mortal man and a creature thought to belong to the spirit world. There could be nothing conclusive in the marriage of a man to a being that may or may not be mortal like himself. The reader must know that the maiden is a spirit or that she is not.

Scott, therefore, attempted a compromise. The explanation comes at the center of the book and is the climax of the plot. During the first half of the action the hero is fascinated but in doubt. After the explanation there remain only certain external difficulties to be removed before the marriage can be effected.

The explanation, however, is not satisfactory. Many of Anne's mysterious movements depended upon her father's being a high official in a powerful secret organization. Once she left a castle by a secret passage and later reported that she had not been absent. When the reader discovers this falsehood, he feels that he has been imposed upon. She retells the legend of her grandmother, divesting it of most supernatural elements, but vouches for the efficacy of the opal as a detector of poison.

The offense in Anne of Geierstein, like those in Peveril of the Peak and Woodstock, is not of the exact type of those in the books that I have classified as probably, in their first form, earlier than Waverley. In The Black Dwarf the repeated hints concerning the identity of the mysterious character are absent, and the object of the explanation seems to be probability. In Peveril of the Peak and in Woodstock numerous hints have indicated that the fears of the characters are unfounded, but when Scott comes to make a detailed explanation of the events which have caused these fears, he becomes trite and improbable. How he was led into these blunders is shown by a journal entry about Woodstock (I, 114): "The devil of a difficulty is, that one puzzles the skein in order to excite curiosity, and then cannot disentangle it for the satisfaction of the fiend they have raised." Guy Mannering was confessedly revised in such a way as to tone down the supernatural, and the execution of the work obscures the metaphysical implications of the theme. It is unlikely that Scott would have chosen the theme after the success of Waverley. Redgauntlet in both theme and execution resembles Guy Mannering rather than The Bride of Lammermoor and A Legend of Montrose, in both of which latter novels supernaturally revealed fate is prominent. The Monastery is so completely out of harmony with Scott's theories concerning the use of the supernatural in fiction that it is difficult, even after making due allowance for Scott's lack of "artistic conscience," to believe that the novel was written after the criticism in which these theories are expressed.

So far, therefore, as the treatment of the supernatural furnishes a means of determining the chronology of Scott's novels, The Black Dwarf, Guy Mannering, Redgauntlet, and The Monastery would seem to antedate Waverley. The evidence is strongest in the cases of The Black Dwarf and The Monastery, where occur serious violations of rules governing the use of the supernatural in prose fiction, which were laid down by Scott previous to the publication of these novels. There are no such violations in Guy Mannering, but Scott confesses that the book underwent considerable change in plan, and the changes show that Scott planned the work before he had reacted against the practices of the romancers in England and Germany. There is no documentary evidence of such a change of plan in Redgauntlet, but the intermittent use of the epistolary style indicates that the book has been revamped, and the treatment of fate and foreknowledge associates the work with Guy Mannering. These conjectures are not invalidated by the fact that minor infractions of one of Scott's rules occur in novels known to be late, for the infringements are of a different kind from those in The Black Dwarf and The Monastery.

MODY C. BOATRIGHT

University of Texas

XVI

THE CAMPAIGN OF PERIODICALS AFTER THE WAR OF 1812 FOR NATIONAL AMERICAN LITERATURE

AMERICAN triumphs on the sea in the War of 1812 tempered the American mind into a belief in its power to express itself in a literature independent of any foreign influence. Previously America had shown only a faltering confidence in herself as a literary nation. No great protestations of literary strength had appeared in the periodicals. But with America's victory in this second war with the mother country, a new-found note of confidence came into literature. This new confidence was not, however, a nation-wide experience. It was a political phenomenon, Democratic rather than Federal. Federalists believed that American letters:<sup>1</sup> must wait for all improvements from abroad, acquire a literary tone from the mother country, . . . and wait for decision on its merits or demerits, from the higher authorities of London.

Democratic writers, on the other hand, thought it a just and easy transition to pass from victorious warfare against the claims of British supremacy on the sea to victories equally impressive in national letters.

The history of this connection between naval success and confidence in the power to produce a national literature reveals itself in the enthusiasm that such Democratic magazines as Niles' Register, the Analectic Magazine, and to some degree the North American Review and the Port-Folio manifested in our naval prowess, the victories of Perry, Hull, Bainbridge, and Decatur. These magazines exalted, as regards our fortunes, the downfall of British ships and sailors. And with equal enthusiasm they encouraged native writers to rise against foreign interference, to owe no further intellectual homage to Great Britain. They prophesied a great and independent future for the republic both in government and in literature. This confidence was mainly Democratic, the Federalists not having been in sympathy with the action of the Democratic administration in entering into a maritime contest with Great Britain. The Federalists not only opposed the war but openly denounced it, asserting that it was "unholy—wicked—base—perfidious <sup>1</sup> North American Review, I (1815), 312-313.—The same tone was evident as late as 1829. The American Quarterly Review, VI (1829), 240-262, stated that "Dependent we are, and must continue to be for some time. . . ."—See also the Portico's attack on Robert Walsh in III (Jan., 1817), 352.

—and corrupt.”<sup>2</sup> Accordingly, it does not seem surprising that Federalists manifested little or no enthusiasm over naval victories. For instance, the State Senate of Massachusetts went on record as follows:<sup>3</sup>

. . . it is not becoming a moral and religious people to express any approbation of military or naval exploits which are not immediately connected with the defense of our sea-coast and sail.

On the occasion of a naval victory, as the triumph of the Constitution over the Guerriere, the whole nation, at least the Democratic portion of it, broke forth into gladness, and public happiness became contagious. The Democratic magazines rejoiced to see the flag of our country “encircled with glory” and to behold our nation elevated to a dignified rank among the nations of the earth.<sup>4</sup> The Portico went into ecstasies in celebrating American successes. It spoke of the “favourite bird” soaring above the ocean, of victory “thundering beneath him,” of the flag of Britain “drooping from the mast-head.” So great was the Portico’s exuberance that it told its readers how these colonies “ascended on high to lead captivity captive.” The whole world, it went on, gazed in amazement at the deeds of “free-born heroes prospering in the pleasure of the living God.” It predicted that the deeds of the American sailor would be transmitted to posterity as the subjects of panegyrics.<sup>5</sup>

As a result of naval victories a growing feeling of confidence in our strength as a nation manifested itself.<sup>6</sup> The most immediate consequence of sea victories on American morale seems to have been the awakening of a sense of capacity for conquest, in addition to the conviction that we had demonstrated our ability to take care of ourselves. A citation from one of the Democratic magazines aptly illustrates the point. Niles’ Register, for August, 1816, pages 76–78, elated over the successes of the

<sup>2</sup> Mathew Carey, Olive Branch (Middlebury, Vermont, January, 1816), p. 242.—See also the following references. American Review of History and Politics, iv (Oct., 1812), 243.—Annals of Congress, 12 Cong., 1 Sess., xxiii, 242 (May 18, 1812), 300 (June 22, 1812); xxiv, 306 (June 26, 1812), 309 (June 30, 1812), 314 (July 3, 1812), 1478 (June 1, 1812), 1570 (July 1, 1812).—S. F. Bemis, The American Secretaries of State and Their Diplomacy (New York, 1927), iii, viii–ix; K. C. Babcock, The Rise of American Nationality (New York, 1906), vi, 150–157; Henry Adams, History of the United States (New York, 1909), vi, 171–174; S. E. Morison, Maritime History of Massachusetts (Boston, 1921), p. 198.

<sup>3</sup> Edward Channing, History of the United States (New York, 1917), iv, 558–559.—See also Homer C. Hockett, Political and Social History of the United States (New York, 1925), p. 314; Morison, op. cit., pp. 198–199.

<sup>4</sup> Analectic Magazine, ii, 494.

<sup>5</sup> Portico (August, 1816), pp. 144–147.—See also Niles’ Register, (Dec., 1815), p. 43, (Aug., 1813), pp. 76–78, (Sept., 1812), p. 31, (Nov. 7, 1812), p. 159, (Feb. 20, 1813), p. 397, (Dec. 26, 1812), p. 27, (Jan. 9, 1813), p. 302; Analectic Magazine (Nov., 1813), p. 390, (Jan., 1814), p. 57, (Sept., 1814), p. 232, (Nov., 1813), p. 402, (Jan., 1817), p. 38, (Nov., 1815), p. 414; Port-Folio (May, 1816), p. 446.

<sup>6</sup> Hockett, op. cit., p. 325.

first few months of the war, exclaimed with self-assurance: "We are a world of ourselves, and can live independent of any other place on earth."

In view of this enthusiasm, it does not seem at all surprising that America should feel a growing confidence in her ability to cast off the intellectual homage she had paid so long to the mother country, to gain by vigorous combat the same high and dignified rank in letters which she had so lately acquired in the more dangerous contentions of the martial field. A citation from one of the Democratic magazines evidences this connection. The Port-Folio for January, 1816, I, 76, said:

But lately, and we were without an honourable name in arms: and so should we have been but for the preëminent assiduity of our naval and military characters in acquiring a knowledge of the art of war.

We are yet without a name distinguished in letters. But this reproach must also pass away. In forming their style and manner, let our writers emulate the ambition, diligence and zeal that have so eminently characterized our gentlemen of the sword, and the object for which they contend must be inevitably attained. Many years cannot run their course, till our country shall have become as renowned in literature, as she is in arms.

This desire to identify naval success and the rise of national literature may be further illustrated by the fact that Democratic periodicals often referred to the strength of American authors in terms of naval combat. For instance, Niles' Register spoke of native writers who "'point to point' and 'yard arm to yard arm' will 'meet the enemy and make them ours'." And it added that our writers must be encouraged so that they will not be compelled "to retire from the contest, without a shot in the locker. . . ."<sup>7</sup>

While Democratic periodicals in general participated in this effort to "set up" a national American literature, one magazine in particular, the Portico, of Baltimore, threw all of its resources into this movement.<sup>8</sup> A native American periodical, with national American ideals, it strove for the cause of American letters with the same valiant spirit that characterized our victorious tars in battle with the seamen of Britain.

The Portico professed a courageous and determined policy to improve, diffuse, and encourage American literature, in general. Very frequently, in its endeavors to further this policy, it struck a note reminiscent of naval combat and valiant seamen. It believed that the enthusiasm and the consciousness of power, following the success of the War of 1812, should be a sufficient impetus to urge the patriotic author to attempt excellence and brave criticism in order to advance the national character and place the genius of the country on a permanent basis.<sup>9</sup> It endeavored to excite an ambition for excellence, to extend the cultivation of letters, to espouse the existence and improve the formation of native genius.<sup>10</sup> It stated that the chief aim of its labors was:<sup>11</sup> to promote a taste, and inspire an ambition, for the beauties of original composition; to explode prevailing errors, peculiar to American literature, to correct the perversions of vanity, check the aberrations of genius, and discountenance the follies of affectation.

<sup>7</sup> XII (May 24, 1817), 197-198.

<sup>8</sup> The Portico, A Repository of Science and Literature, Stephen Simpson, Tobias Watkins, and John Neal, editors (Neale, Wills and Cole, Baltimore: 1816-1818).

With sympathies deeply concerned in the cause of American letters, it wished to impress upon the minds of its readers a true value of the national dignity, upheld, as it said, by nothing more than literature, learning, and liberality. "The importance of improving the literature of America," it remarked in August, 1816, "should be realized by every American or they ought to relinquish their title to freedom and forgo their pretensions to valor."<sup>12</sup> A more pernicious illusion was not to be found, it went on, than the prevailing opinion that literature and learning were inconsistent with wealth, adverse to industry, or opposed to the general interest. It asserted that even the interests of the tradesman, the merchant, and the mechanic were furthered by the success of polite literature.<sup>13</sup>

For the success of its avowed policy, the Portico boldly designated certain things which must be accomplished. It appears that the periodical, having made a research into the state of letters in America, had found that the "flow of mind," as it termed it, was small among us, in fact, "a mere rivulet of thought."<sup>14</sup> Nevertheless, it believed that the American people possessed physical, intellectual, and moral materials of future greatness superior to those of any other country. To make the United States the greatest nation in the world, contended a writer in the magazine, it was only necessary to extend the dimensions and raise the standard of literature, art, and science, in addition to improving the nation's economic and political status.<sup>15</sup>

Moreover, the Portico was firmly convinced that a general prevalence of reading was necessary to form a "national character for elegant literature."<sup>16</sup> It maintained that a general desire for sound reading, a discriminating and pure taste, must prevail among the people. It said:<sup>17</sup>

<sup>9</sup> Portico, II (Aug., 1816), 111-112.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., II (Dec., 1816), i, ii, iii.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., II, 120.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., p. 120.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., I (Jan., 1816), 47.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., II, 119.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., V (April, May, June, 1818), 252-257.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., II (Aug., 1816), 115.

The habit of reading must become incorporated with the wants of the people, and every man must deem a book as necessary to his happiness as a dinner or an estate.

It pointed out certain other things which must be done. It insisted that popular encouragement and individual financial assistance should be given to native literature. It said that the people must become known for liberality of patronage and delicacy of taste, that they must give a ready reception to works of merit, incite and reward genius, throw down the standard of wealth, and foster the spirit of emulation.<sup>18</sup> A citation from the issue for December, 1816, will illustrate the point. It said:<sup>19</sup>

Men of Letters, unhappily, form but a small proportion of society and as long as the other classes remain dead to the noble emulation, that would struggle to secure for us a literary character, the Portico, in common with other works, must encounter difficulties, and suffer the consequences of insufficient encouragement.

The Portico endeavored to excite the ambition of native writers by appealing to their love of fame and by drawing prophetic visions of the honor and immortality to be gained in American letters. It desired to arouse the ambition of American scholars to a worthy display of their talent and erudition. "Here, then," it said in June, 1816, "a clear path invites the successful enterprise of genius to ascend to the summit of beauty, sublimity, and renown."<sup>20</sup> With reference to its design of inciting native genius to attempt to reach the heights of classical composition, one of its editors said:<sup>21</sup>

If, in the pursuit of this object, I should only chance to impel one mighty mind, to stir up the expiring embers of correct and genuine criticism, I should derive the highest satisfaction from this undertaking.

To the Portico, it seemed that every mind possessing a trace of ambition should have felt a thrill of ecstasy when contemplating the immortality of literary fame. In the issue for August, 1816, the editor asked:<sup>22</sup>

Who does not wish to live in after ages, in the mouth of praise, and the mind of admiration, when the frailty of the body shall have crumbled to dust, and the fire of fancy shall be wafted to an unknown region?

Desirous of beholding an enlarged culture of polite learning in this country, the Portico spurred on the ambition of native writers by indulging in visions of the renown to be gained in American letters. Pointing to the fact that our literary reputation was yet to be established, it called the attention of native writers to the excellent chances of acquiring

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., 294.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., pp. i, ii, iii.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., I (June, 1816), 474.

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., II (Aug., 1816), 123-126.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid.

immortal fame and of having a share in forming the literary character and glory of the nation. Indeed, it assured its readers that we could not fail of a brilliant accomplishment in the end, if we but availed ourselves of the advantages within our grasp. "Let genius be cherished, and taste promoted, and an Augustan Age of learning may yet crown our ambitions, and reward our labours," exhorted and prophesied the editors.<sup>23</sup> In the same spirit, a writer in a later number of the periodical declared with confidence that, at some future time, the productions of our poets would bestow a charm and inspiring influence upon our country, "equal, if not superior, to this favoured region [Italy] where poetry has gathered her choicest flowers."<sup>24</sup>

Believing that the time was ripe for the production of native genius and that interest in polite literature was increasing, the Portico tried to exert a guiding influence over the rising young authors of the country. It set as its goal an American literature of the first rank, one that could stand a fearless competition with the most excellent performances of the veteran writers of Europe. A contributor to the issue of August, 1816, well stated the program of the Portico in this respect by assuring his readers that the country was already crowded with geniuses eager for distinction, who only required the direction of taste, and, of course, the support of the public to produce a literature that would be a worthy asset to America's reputation.<sup>25</sup> The Portico feared that the unrestricted sway of indolence and caprice in the "republick of literature," where no literary critic ruled with despotic authority, would result in the general prevalence of every species of absurdity and imperfection.<sup>26</sup> To avoid such a contingency, the Portico, through its policy of assuming a sort of guardianship over the best interests of national letters, was especially zealous that the taste of native writers be uncorrupted and pure. It insisted on the cultivation of high attainments, judgment, delicacy and correctness of taste in general literature.<sup>27</sup> Its editors, Watkins and Simpson, thus stated their position in the issue for December, 1816: "We are no panegyrists—we are stern, impartial criticks, whom no selfish motive can influence, to disregard the dictates of truth and justice. . . ."<sup>28</sup>

In line with this policy, the Portico in its reviews of native works, sought to point out the faults of our literateurs, to rectify the errors of conceit, and to restrain the whims of genius. For example, a reviewer in the number for January, 1817, suggested means of improving a certain poem from the pen of "An American." He advised the author of the necessity of independent thought, of the avoidance of slavish imitation, and of the need for careful revision. He warned the poet to restrain the luxuriance of his imagination.<sup>29</sup> Relative to a book dealing with researches among the aborigines of America, of which notice was given in a previous issue of the Portico, one of the editors commended the author's purpose, theory, and philosophy, but adversely criticized his style. The critic remarked on the extreme defectiveness of the plan of the work. He said that the diction was often low and unsuited to the subject, that the construction of the sentences was frequently ungrammatical, and the phrasing sometimes vulgar. But he was careful to assure the author that his remarks were intended not as a disparagement of the work, but as an inducement for the publishing of another edition of the book, with careful attention to the avoidance of the mistakes called to his notice.<sup>30</sup> Likewise, in its review of Delapaine's Repository of the Lives of Distinguished Americans (Philadelphia, 1816), the Portico could say little that was favorable concerning the author's style. It declared that it had never reviewed a work with a more eager desire to be pleased, nor ever was more completely disappointed. As a word of advice it said:<sup>31</sup>

<sup>23</sup> Ibid.<sup>24</sup> Ibid., v (April, May, June, 1818), 225-227.<sup>25</sup> Ibid., II (Aug., 1816), 123-126.<sup>26</sup> Ibid., I (May, 1816), 381.<sup>27</sup> Ibid., I (April, 1816), 329; IV (Feb., 1817), 95, 98, 157.<sup>28</sup> Ibid., II, 449.

Of the proprietor's objects and views, too much cannot be said, in praise: but we would strenuously advise him, for his own profit, as well as for the credit of our country, to recall the edition of this first volume, and commence anew.

But the Portico went even farther than to point out the errors of native writers. In the issue of December, 1816, it criticized the work of an English bookseller and writer named Castle. This English author's work, satirically characterized as "Castle's Effusions," afforded the periodical the opportunity of calling to the attention of our rising young poets many examples of this author's faults, absurdities, bombast, and puerilities. It warned aspiring authors to avoid the mistakes of Mr. Castle, "in order that their taste may not wilfully or blindly become corrupted, by the rankest perversions that disgrace our language."<sup>32</sup> In like manner, another writer in the Portico expressed regret that American poets had fallen into the habit of the English of appending notes to their poems. "A poem which cannot be written intelligently without the necessity of explanatory notes," he said, "had better not be written at all."<sup>33</sup> He wished to see this practice of enlarging and encumbering volumes of poetry abolished by American poets.

But it must not be supposed that the Portico was overcritical of native

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., III (Jan., 1817), 29-32.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., II (Oct., 1816), 293.

<sup>33</sup> Ibid., III (March, 1817), 172.

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., II (Aug., 1816), 110-111.

<sup>32</sup> Ibid., II (Dec., 1816), 486.

works. On the contrary, with a spirit as fearless as ever characterized our seamen, it encouraged American authors with praise. Despite the fact that it found many evident faults in native works, it made a practice of zealously "puffing" native literary efforts. Through its reviews it intended to accomplish the twofold purpose of augmenting the literary glory of the country and of inducing greater confidence among American authors. Quite often, it seems, the most important, if not the only, reason for its favorable notice was the fact that the book or poem being reviewed was by an American or that it contained national American sentiments. For certain native productions it claimed everlasting fame. To certain of our authors it assigned most of the attributes of genius. A consideration of the Portico's bombastic review of Crystalina, A Fairy Tale, by an American, will corroborate this contention. In the issue for January, 1817, the reviewer stated that Crystalina was "one of the most splendid productions of the age," and that it contained passages never surpassed in the language.<sup>34</sup> In his opinion, Spenser himself had never exceeded such flights of imagination as this American author employed in this native poem. "Had this poet written before Shakespeare and Spenser, he would have been acknowledged as the Child of fancy," declared the reviewer. He went on to assure his readers that if the author had thought more independently and had omitted some passages, the remainder would have done credit to the fancy of any poet, living or dead. It was not his intention, he admitted, to run a parallel between the author of Crystalina and Shakespeare, Spenser, Dryden, or Milton, although, the reviewer maintained, he occasionally resembled them all. In his opinion, neither Shakespeare nor any other brilliant spirit of past ages ever showed greater genius in writing of the beauties of morning than did the author of Crystalina in the following lines:

Thrice hath yon moon her pearly chariot driven,
Across the starry wilderness of Heaven,
In lonely grandeur; thrice the morning star
Danced on the eastern hills before Hyperion's car.

The reviewer said, moreover, that the poet's line, "The clouds sailed by like a routed fleet," had never been surpassed. In like manner he said that the opening of the second canto was so masterful and so entirely beyond the range of common invention that he forbore to make any remarks. Again, he described a certain picture in the poem as containing more fire and fancy than any other modern production of which he knew. He even went further to tell the readers of the periodical that "there is enchantment in the language, it never was excelled."<sup>35</sup>

<sup>34</sup> Ibid., III (Jan., 1817), 33.

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., III (Jan., 1817), 23-33.

In the same manner, the Portico highly praised Airs of Palestine, a poem by John Pierpont, Esquire, of Baltimore. Its review of this poem was characterized by an exuberance of style and spirit in which the Portico's design of encouraging the confidence of native writers was plainly discernible. In regard to Mr. Pierpont's poem, the Portico said:<sup>36</sup>

Welcome as the caravan that brought life and renovation, to the exhausted frames of Ali Bey and his followers, in the desert sands of Morocco—Sweet as the music of the feathered songsters, that swept through the groves of his beloved Scmelalia, were the Airs of Palestine, to our enraptured ears.

The review went on to say that this poem would bring a transport of delight, unfelt before, to the patriotic American critic, who has had to depend upon imported materials for the exercise of his trade. The author wrote with an invention wholly original, an imagination truly poetical, and had graced his effort with an introduction artful and imposing in the highest degree.<sup>37</sup> Of a certain four lines, the magazine assured its readers that they were inexpressibly sweet, and in regard to a certain Alexandrine it challenged any of the bards of the age to surpass its dignity and sublimity.<sup>38</sup> The Highland scenery of the poem, the Portico found to have been a "continued blaze of poetick fire," with every line breathing the melody of music. To Mr. Pierpont the magazine paid the following tribute:<sup>39</sup>

. . . but, though we should draw upon our backs, the whole host of English and Scotch critics and Reviewers, we are not afraid to go still further, and pronounce that no poet of the present day, of any country, has evinced stronger powers of genius, clearer perception, a more chastened fancy, or a more correct and refined taste. . . .

In like manner, the Portico said that Washington or Liberty Restored was a poem in which the author, Mr. Northmore, in the employment of the device of Milton's host of infernal angels had not disgraced his master's tools by an unskillful use of them and had imitated Milton with great skill.<sup>40</sup> It also declared that Poems by William Maxwell, Esquire, published by Moses Thomas in 1816, were, for measure and correct rhyme, a volume of "homemade" poetry that was "an example of more scrupulous purity, than almost any native production that we have seen. . . ."<sup>41</sup> In its review of the History of the Late War between the United States and Great Britain, "by an American," published in Baltimore, 1816, by Joseph Cushing, it described the author as the faithful

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., II (Dec., 1816), 448-449.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., II, 449.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., II, 453.

<sup>39</sup> Ibid., II, 454.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., V (April, May, June, 1818), 261-264.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., II (Oct., 1816), 341.

recorder of facts, a historian upon whose fidelity posterity might rely with confidence.<sup>42</sup>

Moreover, to assist even further the development of national American literature, the Portico suggested certain definite native themes for the exercise of American genius. In the very first issue, that of January, 1816, the Portico addressed an earnest exhortation to American scholars to attempt the execution of a "Desideratum in Literature," which should show "the connection between languages and the manners of nations. . . ." It said that a better occasion for the display of American learning could not be desired.<sup>43</sup> The number for February, 1816, suggested the battle of New Orleans as an excellent subject for a drama. The battle was so recent, urged the Portico, its results so glorious, and its consequences so important to the United States that nearly every person was already well acquainted with the interesting facts. It directed that a dramatic representation of that battle should only embody the principal events and most interesting scenes so as to make the reader, in imagination, a vivid witness of the action.<sup>44</sup>

The Portico saw another opportunity for the exercise of native genius in the production of a history of the late maritime contest with Great Britain. The Portico considered the War of 1812, next to the Revolutionary War, the most important event in our history. It required a careful writing of that struggle, involving an investigation and disclosure of motives, causes, and consequences. It advised a history directed by sober reason and free from factional prejudice. The historian must also treat, it added, of the diplomatic correspondence, the political history, and the incidents of the war.<sup>45</sup>

Likewise, this periodical encouraged American writers to attempt to produce a worthy piece of literature built upon the popular theme of Washington. Declaring that a subject more grateful to the American reader could not well be chosen, it expressed disappointment that, in the past, nothing of value on the theme had been given to the public. But it told its readers that it still considered "this great national subject, as open to the charms of song." And it hoped "to see it elegantly embellished by a native poet of sterling genius; whose fancy shall command admiration, and whose taste shall preclude faults and defy censure."<sup>46</sup>

The Portico also pointed out to native writers the desirability of a national biography of the lives of distinguished Americans. In October, 1816, it criticized the lack of a regular system of American biography to

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., II (Nov., 1816), 423-424.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., I (Jan., 1816), 75.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., I (Feb., 1816), 494.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., III (June, 1817), 429, 430, 434.

<sup>46</sup> Ibid., V (April, May, June, 1818), 261-263, 274.

which one could refer for information or for evidences of national distinction. It maintained that in the short period of forty years from its existence as a nation, the United States, more so than any other country, could boast of a greater number of illustrious men in every branch of useful knowledge, whose lives deserved to come under the notice of the biographer. Of many of these men it lamented that no record was to be found except in their own works. And so it urged our scholars to overcome this evident penury of biographical memoirs and to assist in making this species of writing an interesting and important part of national literature.<sup>47</sup>

But a favorite topic of the Portico for the employment of native writers was the subject of the American Indian. Believing that the Indian was not only gradually disappearing but was in danger of eventual extinction, the Portico told its readers in March, 1818, that "A strict attention to the history of the aborigines of our country becomes, at every hour, more and more indispensable."<sup>48</sup> In another article, entitled American Indians, it was extremely desirous, the periodical said, of calling the attention of its readers to the situation of our Indian neighbors. The author of the article said:<sup>49</sup>

It is a subject which well deserves to call forth the talents of our politicians and statesmen, as well as philosophers and devines—and if any of our readers feel sufficient interest in it, we promise them a welcome reception to their remarks in the Portico.

As examples of the sort of thing it was suggesting and encouraging, the magazine itself published a short history of the Beoga Indians of Dauphin County, Pennsylvania,<sup>50</sup> the legend of the Carmogee or Dove Indians in the early settlement of the United States,<sup>51</sup> an account of the Pondondees, a tribe living between the St. Peter and the Missouri Rivers, hitherto unnoticed by an historian,<sup>52</sup> and it discussed and discounted the theory that the American Indians were descended from a lost and wandered tribe of Jews.<sup>53</sup>

Finally, the Portico endeavored to give a wider field to the exercise of native genius by devoting its Repository to the publication of the original poetry of American authors. In July, 1816, it assured its readers of its "infinite pleasure" in being able to present in that number a Repository

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., II (Oct., 1816), 382–383, 293.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., V (Jan., Feb., March, 1818), 123.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., V (April, May, June, 1818), 439.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., V (Jan., Feb., March, 1818), 123.

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., V, 63–66.

<sup>52</sup> Ibid., II (Sept., 1816), 237.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., V (April, May, June, 1818), 245.

entirely of original poetry, "all of which may stand a fearless competition with that of any foreign journal that comes before an American public."<sup>54</sup> From the increasing number of poetical contributors the editors ventured to promise that soon they no longer would be compelled to resort to the collectanea of other countries—all of which, they said, displayed a determined and highly gratifying zeal in the cause of national literature.<sup>55</sup>

Thus, Democratic periodicals, the Portico in particular, enthusiastic over American naval victories in the War of 1812, felt confident of their power to emancipate America from undue subservience to England in literary matters. Our naval victories having shown the world that we no longer were dependent upon England politically, these periodicals demanded intellectual and literary independence as well. This new national consciousness, then, spurred on these periodicals to attempt the establishment of a national American literature.

JOHN C. McCLOSKEY

University of Oregon

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., II (July, 1816), 92.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid.

XVII

LYTTON'S THEORIES OF PROSE FICTION

IN 1838 Lytton published in the Monthly Chronicle an essay entitled "On Art in Fiction." This essay is ignored by those who have written on Lytton's narrative art, yet, as it is reprinted in the volume, Pamphlets and Sketches, it takes up thirty-five closely printed pages and deals explicitly with the various parts of the novelist's craft. In it Lytton defines, in terms that apply to prose fiction, the aims of art and the means by which the aims may be achieved.<sup>1</sup> By 1838 he had written twelve novels. The essay represents an experienced novelist's conclusions about the potentialities of his chosen form; and, moreover, it provides us with a measuring stick to set up against his later if not his earlier novels.

This act of judgment is not without precedent in Lytton's intellectual life; for the years 1830-38 (the period of Lytton's greatest activity as a magazine editor, social interpreter, and historian) were years in which he recombined ideas into a highly personal system of thought, and applied these concepts to various fields of human activity. Concepts applied to various fields—contemporary England or ancient Athens—remained much the same. Society, the individual, art—all of these constituted a unity that had organic life. Like the nerves, veins, and arteries, these aspects of life were so closely united that only a skilled operator can separate one from another. Even then, the thing under inspection is best explained by defining it in terms of its relationship to the general system of Lytton's thought. So with the ideas in the essay, "On Art in Fiction."

Art in fiction, as Lytton saw it, was for the sake of making the writer's intention clear to the reader. Such an attitude towards the art of fiction as is found in Percy Lubbock's Craft of Fiction would be incomprehensible to Lytton. In the Craft of Fiction, though the author tries to avoid it, the emphasis leads one to believe that Madame Bovary is a greater book than War and Peace because the French novel is superior in form to the great Russian one. For Lytton the formal virtues were virtues as long as they advanced the clarification of a great conception, but, if they were addressed to the exploitation of vicious and immoral aims, were no longer virtues but instruments of the devil. Vicious subject matter blinded him to the artistic lessons lying in the French novel.

Lytton draws his rules from works which are objects of his moral approval. The definition of art with which he begins his essay—"Art is that process by which we give to natural materials the highest excellence they are capable of receiving"<sup>2</sup>—excludes from the realm of art imaginative efforts that do not serve the ideal. A book that does not have the right aim or (in William Godwin's term) the right moral tendency, is not a work of art. Great art demands the intensest application of intellectual faculties; for it is, Lytton considers, an approach to the Sublime, either by the Greek method—that of giving the highest perfection to natural objects—or by a method mentioned in Lytton's Student—that of bringing the ideal into the world.

<sup>1</sup> Lytton made an earlier and much briefer attempt to codify the rules for the writing of fiction in a sketch, "On the Different Kinds of Prose Fictions . . .," which is prefaced to The Disowned in the Works of Edward Lytton Bulwer, 2 vols. (Philadelphia, 1836) I, 118 ff. This sketch, dated July 20, 1835, to anticipate the points made in the later essay.

Lytton repeats a formula for criticism that was behind his earlier New Monthly reviews. In estimating a work of art, the critic does not look for surface imperfections but acquaints himself with the writer's conception and judges whether or not the writer has employed the proper means of developing it. Lytton points out that we expect a different excellence in the work of a watchmaker and in the work of an artist. The first we value for its utility; the last for the nearness of its approach to the sublime.<sup>3</sup>

Rules for governing the writer in such an effort cannot be made a priori; they can be drawn up only when great embodiments of the ideal in a particular form have been made. The time has come, Lytton believes, for the drawing up of an "art of fiction," since great examples of it are fairly numerous. But even these rules are not meant to constrict the activity of genius; but they may save beginning novelists from error. It is with this reservation that Lytton commences his investigation.

A. THE SOURCES OF THE NOVELIST'S INTEREST

Lytton begins by stating, "The novelist has three departments of his art—Manners, Passions, Character."<sup>4</sup> He discusses each department separately. But, though Lytton may establish a system of categories, he seldom keeps one from overlapping on another. Thus, there might be novels of manners which did not at times become novels of character or of passion; but if so, so much the worse for the novel of manners. And novels of passion that were not also novels of character would be inconceivable to Lytton.

1. Manners

Manners, Lytton judges, is the simplest "department" of the novelist's art. "The delineation of manners," he says shortly, "embraces both past and present; the Modern and Historical Romance."<sup>5</sup> Here Lytton is using the word "manners" to indicate not only social customs but all <sup>2</sup> Pamphlets and Sketches, (Knebworth edition) xxxiv, 318.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., 319.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., 320.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid., 320.

that goes to distinguish one era from another. The need of this variety of manners in the historical romance is obvious.<sup>6</sup>

In the tale of Notre Dame de Paris by Victor Hugo, the description of the Cathedral of Notre Dame is not only apposite, but of deepest interest; for the cathedral is, by a high effort of art, made an absolute portion of the machinery of the tale.

But the long description of the spectacle is merely a parade of such scholarly learning as burdens many another historical novel and causes it to sink beneath too great a load of erudition. Quaintness in the medieval novel and frigidity in the romance of antiquity—both move the reader to boredom and distress.

The historical novelist must, then, overcome the reader's unfamiliarity with a landscape and an age. He must stress those things which will lead the reader to conclude that, although the tale is of ancient Greece or early England, the people of that age were human and "as close to life as if they were drawn from the streets of London."<sup>7</sup> The author who does not place too much confidence in his genius will avoid a period of history which has been skillfully worked by the hand of a master. He who would write another novel of the Elizabethan era will inquire first what phases of Elizabethan manners were neglected by Scott in Kenilworth.<sup>8</sup>

But, if you find the shadow of the previous work flinging itself over your own . . . you will only invest your genius to unnecessary disadvantages, and build edifices, however graceful and labored, upon the freehold of another.

In historical novels descriptions of dress and ways of taking snuff are not repugnant. But in modern novels they are, for there the manners are as familiar to readers as to the author. "There would be, indeed, something inane and trifling, or mean and vulgar, in Dutch copies of the modern still life."<sup>9</sup> Creation of "Dutch copies" lowers the modern novel of manners to the level of the latest fashion sheet. The reader does not wish, Lytton judges, to know what the heroine is wearing or what poverty the hero is suffering; for he very likely has ample experience of his own on either point.

The interest, then, in a novel of modern manners is best sustained by the use of humor instead of trifling descriptions of fashions. Such is the method of modern masters such as Fielding and Sterne, who, in their tracing of manners, have worked in service of the "Ideal of the Ludicrous." "For as the Serious Ideal requires a certain exaggeration in the proportions of the Natural, so also does the Ludicrous." There was never a country so phantastic as Cloud Cuckoo Land nor a knight so ridiculous

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., 321.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., 321.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., 322.

<sup>9</sup> Idem.

as Don Quixote—"the art of the portrait is in the admirable exaltation of the Humorous by means of the Exaggerated."<sup>10</sup> Frequently, indeed, when an author wishes to make observations upon contemporary manners so severe as to be offensive, he artfully moves the scene of his story to another country and lets those read between the lines who will.

But the delineation of manners, Lytton concludes, whether it is historical or modern, is only of secondary interest to a novelist of power. To him who feels deeply about life and tries to describe those feelings, manners must always seem a kind of froth that rides on the surface of a deep and rushing stream. The more enduring interests at a novelist's command are those of character and the passions.

2. Character

Lytton quotes with approval another's saying: "Give me the character, and I will find the play."<sup>11</sup> A great character is remembered long after the plot and the "manners" developed in the story are forgotten. In drawing a character, however, an author must first ask himself in what way the projected character will aid in clarifying the central conception—always the important thing in Lytton's mind. What kind of interest will a character stimulate? To have, for example, a book with two heroines equally sweet and gentle is to destroy the effect of either one. Where there is a great figure, the author will, as Scott did with Rebecca and Rowena, sacrifice the minor character to the character of greater importance. Nor will the author so fill his books with vivid characters that the result is confusion. Characterization, like any other part of the novelist's art, must be subservient to conception.

With this idea in mind, Lytton judges, the author will draw his characters by a delicate process of toning down the high lights, not permitting individual character to "obtrude itself, naked and unrelieved."<sup>12</sup>

It was a very cheap purchase of laughter in Sir Walter Scott, and a mere trick of farce, which Shakespeare and Cervantes would have disdained, to invest a favorite humorist with some cant phrase, which he cannot open his mouth without disgorging.

Instead of simplifying the problem, the novelist will ask himself—if, for example, his novel extends over a long period of time—what changes the character of the hero would be likely to undergo. Lytton praises Thomas Hope's forgotten Anastasius for this; the hero passes from youthful ebullience to the reserved sadness of middle age. He is a real man and not two or three selected details worked to death.

There are times, to be sure, when the character is the conception behind a work of art. The incidents in Hamlet are after-thoughts. Shakespeare used the duel as the most convenient catastrophe; but there are many others that would have done as well. The central figure of the undecided and unhappy prince, Lytton believes, appeared to Shakespeare, and the poet then looked about for incidents to exhibit the phases of the prince's character.<sup>13</sup>

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., 323.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., 324.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., 324.

On the other hand, character-drawing must at times be given a decidedly subordinate place in the novel. If the interest of the author lies in creating an allegorical effect, he will soften down the real outlines of his character until they have an indistinctness about them that harmonizes with the story. Thus, Scott's Master of Ravenswood, whose fate is mysterious, is left indistinct, in striking contrast to Scott's other heroes, who are hearty and simple creatures. The formation of grotesque figures, in contrast to those merely mysterious, is not a very good occupation for the writer who is trying to embody the ideal—unless the writer has Shakespeare's genius to take the readers to an enchanted island, where all is avowedly different. The result of Quasimodo, Hugo's essay in the grotesque, is fatiguing and unreal. "... we see no reason why Quasimodo should not have been as well-shaped as other people," says Lytton closing his remarks on grotesque and mysterious characterization.<sup>14</sup>

Indeed, the largest section of the character dicta is given over to the place in fiction of figures of evil. "In the portraiture of evil and criminal characters lies the widest scope for an author profoundly versed in the philosophy of the human heart."<sup>15</sup> Great verse has been consecrated to criminals—why should the novel not contain similar efforts? Lytton maintains throughout his critical writings that it is the aim of highest genius to stir pity and terror; the example of Greek tragedy convinced him of that. Guilt of a leading character, more than anything else, arouses the emotions of pity and terror. The audience is terrified by the act itself and struck with pity for the man who has, willingly or unwillingly, become involved in the consequences of an evil act.

... it is chiefly, though not solely, in the machinations of guilt that may be found the source of the one [terror] and in the misfortunes, sometimes of the victim of the guilt, nay, sometimes of the guilty agent himself, that we arrive at the fountain of the softer passion [pity].<sup>16</sup>

This is reminiscent of Lytton's statement<sup>17</sup> that the "softer passion" of pathos is needed to offset the horror of the Sophoclean tragedy.

<sup>13</sup> Although Lytton said that the great examples of prose fiction would furnish him with his rules, he turns to the drama, where the effect of the sublime has been more often encompassed.

<sup>14</sup> Pamphlets and Sketches, 326.

<sup>15</sup> Idem.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., 326.

<sup>17</sup> Athens (Knebnorth edition) xxix, 520.

Also reminiscent of Lytton's praise of Attic tragedy is his commendation, in this essay, of Macbeth because the deed of guilt is done off the stage and we are allowed to see only the tumult that the act occasions in the heart of the criminal. It is not the deed itself but the consequent emotions that arouse terror in us; and the artist, whether dramatist or novelist, is most happy when he unites in his protagonist qualities that stir our pity and yet terrify us. We feel terror at the crime Oedipus, Lytton considers, yet compassionate his fate. Similarly, Shakespeare, in causing Macbeth to soliloquize, near the end of the tragedy, on his way of life, draws our attention from the crime, revolting in itself, to the heart of Macbeth, which is not unlike our own.

In addition to this, the novelist may, if he wishes, take care to expose the details of the criminal's life, showing how the criminal is entirely formed by early environment.<sup>18</sup>

[The novelist] will suit the nature of the criminal to the state of the society in which he is cast. Thus he will have occasions for the noblest morality. By concentrating in one focus the vicious influences of any peculiar error in the social system, he will hold up a mirror to nations themselves.

This aim, it must be noted, is not exactly that of tragedy, even as Lytton understood tragedy. Here the novelist's treatment would not be a source of pity and terror but of social improvement. As we see elsewhere, Lytton does not consider that the existence of one aim keeps the novelist from satisfying another.

Lytton concludes by contemplating the opposite of the sinner, the nearly perfect person. In delineating such a one, the novelist will include the imperfections that experience teaches him must be there; and says weightily: ". . . no man can be an artist who does not prefer experience and human nature to all criticism. . . ." <sup>19</sup> There he will be touching the source of all great writing.

One sentence deserves singling out: "Youth without a fault would be youth without a passion."<sup>20</sup> The seriousness of this lack appears when we see how large a place the passions occupy in Lytton's conception of the ideal novel. A perfect character, one without passions, would furnish little material for the experimenting novelist.<sup>21</sup>

3. The Passions and Sentiment

"Delineation of passions is inseparable from the delineation of character." For Lytton "the passions" were always in the plural. Emotion

<sup>18</sup> Pamphlets and Sketches, 328.

<sup>19</sup> Idem.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., 329.

<sup>21</sup> See infra Lytton's idea that a great novel may have both moral aim and moral tendency.

that is expressed singly becomes, because of that circumstance, a sentiment and diffuses itself over the intellectual landscape. It is emotions of contrasting character that are expressed at the same time which become, as they struggle for dominance, "the passions."<sup>22</sup>

You will recollect that in the novel, as in the drama, it is in the struggle of emotions that the science of the heart is best displayed; and in the delineation of such struggles, there is ground little occupied hitherto by the great masters of English fiction.

To substantiate this point, Lytton contends that, although the passions are few in number, the possibilities of artistic use of them is nearly endless. It would not be so if the novelist were to be limited to the depiction of types of passion. But the passions, experience teaches, are never pure and simple but exist in particular characters with other passions.<sup>23</sup>

The elementary passions themselves, like the elements, are few; it is the modifications they take in passing through different bodies that give us so inexhaustible a variety of light and shadows of loveliness and glory.

It is not the duty of the novelist to describe the passion in an analytic way as he would if he were a lecturer exhibiting a germ he has isolated. The passion is shown as it works in an individual. The essence of the passion remains—fortunately, for the sake of variety and verisimilitude—beyond the novelist's grasp. All he can do is to record the accidents of the passion's existence in a certain character.

The reflections should be of value, Lytton considers, to a writer who wishes to avoid the obvious and hackneyed. Thus, painfully old is the story of the soldier torn between love and duty; and likewise the story of the antique-dealer who is consumed by miserliness. A new combination could be effected by taking a great soldier and plaguing him with the passion of avarice.<sup>24</sup>

In drawing the newly-conceived figure, the novelist must avoid overestimating the influence of any one passion on the life of his hero, for the result would be caricature.<sup>25</sup>

Not so Shakespeare when he created Shylock. Other things, other motives occupy the spirit of the Jew besides his gold and his argosies; he is a grasping and relentless miser, yet he can give up avarice to revenge. He has sublime passions that elevate his mean ones.

Whether or not revenge is to be considered a sublime passion, we see here the application of Lytton's formula, Emotions plus character.<sup>26</sup>

The truth of Lytton's statements seem to him obvious; and yet he has

<sup>22</sup> Pamphlets and Sketches, 331.

<sup>25</sup> Idem.

<sup>23</sup> Idem.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid., 331.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., 330.

to note that few great English novelists have turned their attention to the passions—content, instead, with a delineation of manners or humors. This new kind of effort was<sup>27</sup>

... not in the province of Fielding or Smollett, and Scott but rarely indulges, and still more rarely succeeds in the metaphysical operations of stormy and conflicting feelings. He rather seems to have made it a point of art to imitate the ancient painter and throw a veil over passions he felt inadequate to express.

Thus the depth of Ravenswood's grief is indicated only by his pacing.

This "metaphysical interest," here plainly a process of emotional analysis to be pushed forward intuitively, is a department that deserves the attention of the gifted novelist. It is a comparatively new field and one in which the subtlety of the writer's intelligence will be put to a high test, and the novelist's success will depend on the skill with which he combines passion and character. He may, however, win minor laurels in the depiction of strong sentiments, like those of "Awe and Pleasing Melancholy." These, it is to be noted, could never become passion, for, in contact with the passions, they would be either shattered or transformed into passions by some process of metaphysical chemistry.

Yet sentiment, when it is the unifying principle of a book, is the feature of composition least amenable to the efforts of a codifying critic.

It emanates from the moral and predominate quality of the author—the perfume from his genius; and by it he unconsciously reveals himself.<sup>28</sup>

The lack of such sentiment, Lytton judges, cannot be corrected by subterfuges on a writer's part who err when they employ superficial devices to supply this want in their natures. "As the charm of sentiment in a fiction is that it is latent and indefinite," Lytton concludes his remarks on the kinds of fiction, "so the charm vanishes directly it becomes obtruding and importunate."<sup>29</sup>

B. MEANS OF USING THE MATERIAL AND WORKING OUT THE CONCEPTION

These are the materials—manners, character, and the passions—which the novelist has at hand, and it is Lytton's opinion that the novelist who wishes to advance his art toward what it might ideally be will place less reliance upon manner and more upon passion and character. Two-thirds of Lytton's essay, however, is given over to the study of the means by which a novelist may develop a worthy conception. It is apparent at every turn that the ideal conception involves a study of the passions, since they and not manners are at the bottom of behavior.

<sup>27</sup> Iidem.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., 331.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., 332.

1. Failure of Novelists through Faulty Conception

Lytton wishes to establish first the comparative failure of novelists who do not inquire strictly into the nature of the effect which they wish to create, and he turns to Scott to find an example of a novelist who began with no conception at all and had, as a result, to expend much of his energy in pulling wool over the reader's eyes—convincing him that indefatigable complexity is the same thing as an august conception. But, Lytton insists, Scott never appears to say to himself, "Such a tale will throw a new light upon human passions, or add fresh stores to human wisdom; for that reason I select it."<sup>30</sup>

The Waverley novels were too full of striking landscapes, harrowing scenes, and illustrations of ancient manners for the workings of the passions to be exhibited. We do not see the passion of jealousy run a full gamut, as in Othello. "For with Shakespeare the conception itself is visible and gigantic from the first line to the last."<sup>31</sup> Fielding often had a conception previous to his setting pen to paper. He must have determined, in writing Jonathan Wild, "to tear the mask from False Greatness" and in Blifil and Jones to dethrone "that popular idol—False Virtue."<sup>32</sup> Fielding, Lytton judges, may not have foreseen each step of his narrative, but he accepted and rejected what his mind turned up in the light of his first conception—a thing that Scott could not do because he lacked a point of reference.

The conceptions of Shakespeare had, in the Godwinian distinction, a "moral tendency," since they were throughout the products of a great soul. The conceptions of Fielding were on a lower plane and had a "moral end." Lytton may place the "moral tendency" (product of a significant Weltanschauung) above the "moral end" (conventionally, "the moral"); but his theories at this point almost insist on the inclusion of a moral aim as a part of a great conception.

Lytton would almost deny that either of these existed in the fictions of Scott. Scott had "no grandeur of conception, for he had no strong desire to render palpable and immortal some definite and abstract truth."<sup>33</sup> English criticism is at a low ebb when it places him on a level with Shakespeare. Lytton calls the climactic scene of Kenilworth an elaborate piece of stage carpentry, a carefully staged tableau. Scott tries by external effects to suggest hidden emotions, the exposition of which Shakespeare would have proceeded to immediately as the task indicated by his conception. Lytton concludes, with an antithesis that he qualifies later:<sup>34</sup>

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., 334.<sup>32</sup> Ibid., 335.<sup>31</sup> Idem.<sup>33</sup> Idem.<sup>34</sup> Ibid., 340.

Shakespeare could have composed the most wonderful plays from the stories of Scott; Scott could have written the most excellent stage directions to the plays of Shakespeare.

Only novels in "the secondary order of Art in Fiction" will come from such conceptions as Scott's. It is not that they have a low aim—they hardly have any at all. The aim need not always be the same, but it must be in the novelist's mind, clearly defined. The rest of Lytton's remarks are meant only for those writers who have at heart the careful development of a worthy conception. These very means would, in the hands of writers who did not worry about their ideals, be empty formulae.

2. Character of Interest

Lytton, then, first asks the novelist to determine the character of the interest he wishes to excite. Does he wish the more startling claptrap of the Mysteries of Udolpho or the sustained and noble interest of Hope's Anastasius? The one requires the skill of a clever workman; the other, in which the course of a bold and insolent life is followed, requires, on every page deep knowledge of human life.

3. Terror and Horror

Lytton, as has been pointed out, derived his tragic theory from a study of the Greek plays, and now he applies it to the writing of novels, using, moreover, the Greek tragedies to illustrate his points. His reason for this is that true tragedy, in which the passions are exhibited fully, has not been worked out in a modern novel of which he approves.

He says: "True art never disgusts." Elsewhere he has distinguished between the horror that the blood in Philoctetes arouses in us and the terror that Oedipus arouses. Horror is physical and plays on the weakest parts of our nature. Terror appeals to the highest part, the moral sense.<sup>35</sup> It is not, it appears here, so much the theme as the treatment that determines our reactions.

A modern French writer, if he had taken the subject of Oedipus, would have disgusted us by details of the incest itself, or forced us from the riven heart to gaze upon the bloody and eyeless sockets of the blind king . . .<sup>36</sup>

The German writers whom Lytton admired stop before terror becomes mere horror. Schiller believed that the final effect of a work of art should not be entirely one of pain. "According to him," Lytton adds, "pleasure of the art should exceed the sympathy with the suffering." Our terror is intellectual, and it is mitigated by the effect of pathos. We may be certain about the mechanism of tragedy, although we have to hesitate when we describe the actual effects of it on modern man.

<sup>35</sup> Athens, op. cit., 519.

<sup>36</sup> Pamphlets and Sketches, 340.

4. Description

From terror and horror Lytton turns to description, which is almost the main support of the novelist who begins his novel with no definite conception at all, and it is a great aid, Lytton admits, to the novelist with a great idea; for in description lies the novelist's advantage over a dramatic poet. Things on the stage are to be things done, but between the covers of a novel, they are to be things described. This is the first time, it should be noted, that Lytton points to a fundamental distinction between the novel-form and the drama-form.

In narrative, the writer is his own scene painter. Scott has never been outdone at this. It will be recalled that Lytton's earlier complaint was not direct at the quality of Scott's scene-painting but at the quantity of it. "We only lament that Scott did not combine with external description an equal, or, at least, not very inferior, skill in metaphysical analysis."<sup>37</sup>

The novelist who knows where he is going will use description as a definite means. If a climatic scene is to take place on a moor, the writer will take care to dwell on the sinister features of the otherwise unimportant place. Similarly, if there are natural objects that are to have bearing on the denouement, they should be described early, as in Oedipus in Coloneus. Description may also serve to indicate the passage of time; Lytton here points to his Eugene Aram, which contains indications of the passing seasons.

But—and this is the point that Lytton insists on—the description the novelist employs is not only that of landscape. He may describe feelings, whereas the dramatist must throw them into dialogue. It is the novelist's privilege to go straight to the heart and, with no indirection at all, tell what he finds there. Godwin has done this elaborately and Goethe most successfully. Lytton's theory, at this point, undoubtedly looks in the direction of the later psychological novel.

Conduct us to the cavern of the heart, light the torch, and startle and awe us by what you reveal; but if you keep us all day in the cavern, the effect is lost, and our only feeling is that of impatience and desire to get away.

5. Arrangement of Incidents

We now come to the beginning of Lytton's sustained distinction between the novel and the drama as art-forms. The only previous appearance of this distinction in Lytton's criticism was in certain criticism of Miss L. E. Landon's Romance and Reality. There Miss Landon was advised to go to school to the drama and learn to show her characters in action instead of talking about them interminably.<sup>38</sup> So far in the present essay, it would seem that the novel is sent to drama to learn its higher lessons; for in the drama are the examples of the sublime and of the play of passions that Lytton did not find in the English novel of his day.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., 342.

Now comes an almost too definite parting of the ways. The novelist must use one kind of technique (such sometimes seems to be Lytton's reasoning) because the dramatist uses another kind.<sup>39</sup> The basis of the distinction lies in the physical limitations of each form; it is the auditorium opposed to the closet. Some of the individual distinctions, however, do not follow so closely as one might wish.

This is true of the first one. In a play, Lytton states, each incident must be the logical outcome of the one which has gone before. In the novel, the plot is allowed to shift backward and from the chief persons to the minor ones. How this corollary is connected to the fundamental contrast to the media appears as Lytton's discussion advances. The reader in his closet would be overcome by the rush of incidents that the multitude at a theater desires. The individual is more likely to be pleased by the type of interest which is not oratorical. The theatre is but a step from the hustings; the closet is a long way. For this reason, the interest of a novel must be finer and more subtle in appeal.

The novelist can appeal to those delicate and subtle emotions, which are easily awakened when we are alone, but which are torpid and unfelt in the electric contagion of popular sympathies. The most refining among us will cease to refine when placed in the midst of a multitude.<sup>40</sup>

The plot of a drama must be logical and "tight" in the extreme. Because of the constrictions of time and space, which hold a play within four walls, the drama must win the audience by presenting a representation of life in which all that is constrained and consequential is made to seem natural. The novel, because it has few bounds, is able to stress those features of life which convince us that chance rules our destinies.

From this same "law of accident" Lytton deduces other conclusions about the arrangement of incident in a novel. In a novel, he contends, a hero may break his neck by falling from a horse, whereas in a drama a hero's fate must be the upshot of previous deeds. Don Quixote's death was not the necessary result of any particular deed of his—as would have had to be the case had his story been told in dramatic form.

<sup>38</sup> New Monthly Magazine, xxxii, 545.

<sup>39</sup> A similar opposition of the two forms, drama and novel, appears in various German critical writing—notably in Book v, Chapter vii of Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, a book that Lytton was constantly citing in his defense of metaphysical fictions. A comparison of the two theories will show that, though the English writer probably took his cue from Goethe, Lytton's working out of the distinction is the result of his own taste and experience.

<sup>40</sup> Pamphlets and Sketches, 344.

Lytton admired Schiller's opposition of the laws of drama to those of fiction. He praises Schiller's account of incidents in Fiesco, where the German poet substituted for the accidental death of the commander, as history relates it, a logical death that is in accord with the laws of drama. Had Fiesco been a novel, Lytton observes, the hero could have slipped off a board into the waters (historical fact), but since Fiesco is a tragedy, the hero must perish by the hand of a patriot he has angered. Lytton quotes Schiller: "The nature of the Drama does not admit the hand of chance."<sup>41</sup> Lytton adds an illustration of his own. The hands of chance may work the death of Ravenswood because he is the hero of The Bride of Lammermoor, a novel. But if he had been the hero of a drama, his death would have had to be the result of a previous deed. It is evident that Lytton trusts, at this time, implicitly this distinction which he found in German esthetic speculation and modified to suit his purpose—the writing of the esthetic of prose fiction.

6. Diction

The distinction leads to a contrast of the diction of the two forms. The diction of the drama, addressed to many, must attract the attention of large audiences. But the novel, addressed to one reader at a time, must have a style that is pitched in a lower key, save when the novelist is trying for an effect of the poetical. Here Lytton is a little kinder to Scott and admits that the lower tone of his diction was partially the result of the form he worked in.

If the dialogue of Macbeth were the dialogue of a romance on the same subject, it would be equally good in itself, but it would seem detestable bombast. If the dialogue in Ivanhoe, which is matchless of its kind for fire and spirit, were shaped into blank verse, and cut up into a five act play, it would be bald and pointless.<sup>42</sup>

The demands of verisimilitude in the novel are great. The reader has only his own enthusiasm to consult; and is seldom ready for great flights.

7. Mechanism and Conduct

Since the interest of a novel is not, like that of the drama, centered on one deed and its consequences, the mechanism and conduct of a novel may be more casual. It was the picture of a whole society that Lesage wished to paint in Gil Blas. Consonant with this conception are the excursions, stories within stories, and the recapitulations in that novel.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., 345.—Lytton gives in his summary the essence of Schiller's remarks on catastrophe in the drama. The sentence in the Foreword to Fiesco reads: "Die wahre Katastrophe des Komplotts, worin der Graf durch einen unglücklichen Zufall am Ziel seiner Wünsche zu Grunde geht, musste durchaus verändert werden, denn die Natur des Dramas duldet den Finger des Ohngefährs oder der unmittelbaren Vorsehung nicht."

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., 346.

They all serve to complete and furnish out the conception and the whole would be less rich and consummate in its effect without them. They are not passages which lead to nothing, but conduce to many purposes we can never comprehend, unless we consider well for what end the building was planned.<sup>43</sup>

If a novelist wishes to demonstrate the various aspects of a character, he will enter upon divagations that appear awkward to the person who is used to the laws of the drama. Cervantes and Fielding worked out their conceptions perfectly—if we judge them by the laws of the novel.

Lytton adduces still another argument for the casualness of the novel. It is, he says, more like life than the drama is. Scarcely even in life are issues so clear-cut and retributions so sure as they are represented in the drama. In life many times an incident that we thought of no consequence at last catches up with us, bringing behind it a train of results that is truly amazing and that would never be permitted in the drama. But the novel, because of its casualness, can adapt itself to such a hit-or-miss progression.

Lytton regards Scott as the master of the mechanical manipulation of external incidents. He has the right amount of action, of longeurs, of change of scene, and the correct complication of superficial incident. The student "will learn more of the art of mechanical construction, than by all the rules that Aristotle himself, were he living, could lay down."<sup>44</sup>

8. The Catastrophe

The concluding pages of the essay, dealing with the catastrophe, are important in themselves and in their relation to Lytton's novels. "The distinction between the novel and the drama is usually very visible in the Catastrophe."<sup>45</sup> The final curtain of the drama, with characters lined up or lying on the ground, is very displeasing when applied to the novel, where the appeal is to the individual judgment of the reader. If, in the novel, the last chapter be "a palpable delusion and a trick," our pleasure is diminished. This is true of many of Scott's last chapters. Sometimes the novel avoids the effect of a final curtain by "epilogical chapters," telling that "Miss Lucy died an old maid, and how miser Grub was found dead on his money-chest"—"a custom that we think might now give place to less hacknied inventions."<sup>46</sup>

"Less hacknied inventions" are as follows, derived, for the most part, from the contrast of drama and fiction. The drama can stand only one

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., 347.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid. 348.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., 350.

<sup>46</sup> Idem.

catastrophe, but the novel may have several. Scott, with his technical excellence, affords us examples of this in Ivanhoe. The death of Bois Guilbert is the "apparent catastrophe," but the marriage of Ivanhoe and Rowena, the visit of Rowena to Rebecca, and Rebecca's farewell—all these incidents are needed to round out the novel.

But a novel should have a moral conclusion, in addition to the structural conclusion which we find illustrated in Scott. To illustrate this, Lytton points to his own recently published novel, Alice. The external or apparent catastrophe lies in Caesarini's act of vengeance, "but the complete denouement and completion of the more typical meanings, and the ethical results of the fiction, are reserved to the moment when Maltravers recognizes the Natural to be the true Ideal, and is brought, by faith and beauty of simple goodness, to affection and respect for mankind itself."<sup>47</sup> In a drama, Lytton states, so many concluding episodes would be simply insufferable, but in a novel they are crowning excellences.

A last distinction is drawn. In a play, the catastrophe is an event that has been foreshadowed by previous events. Comes the opposite: in the novel "it will often be highly artistical to revive in the consummating effect many slight details—incidents the author had but dimly shadowed out—mysteries that you had judged till then he had forgotten to clear up. . . ."<sup>48</sup> Lytton has pushed his formula a step farther, and he denies that the practice he suggests is an ill-considered trick. It has a fidelity "to the natural and life-like order of events." Our own lives are colored by influences that we can hardly trace; an accident will spell our fate, and a chance word once remembered will move us to action.

The Proustian air of this explanation is shattered by an example Lytton gives of what he has in mind. "The feather the eagle carelessly sheds by the wayside plumes the shaft that transfixes him." In this the accident is unbelievable coincidence which disgusts us rather than pleases. Not even Lytton's concluding remarks can dispel our doubts about the artistic value of this particular form of "catastrophe." "In this management and combination of incidents towards the grand end, knowledge of human nature can alone lead the student to the knowledge of Ideal Art."<sup>49</sup>

Lytton puts these technical details aside and concludes his study of the art of fiction by saying that we ought to feel, when we close a book, that it is a whole. "The book itself should be a thought."<sup>50</sup> Rules in the hands of him who has a great thought will be valuable. Lytton sees clearly the limitations of his present essay. "Genius will arrive at fame

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., 361.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., 352.

<sup>48</sup> Idem.

<sup>50</sup> Ibid., 351.

by the light of its own star."<sup>51</sup> His essay, perhaps has suggested an intellectualization of the art of writing fiction; if so, his last words are devoted to counteracting such an impression.<sup>52</sup>

We must let the heart be a student as well as the head. No man who is a passionless and cold spectator will ever be an accurate analyst of all the motives and springs of action. Perhaps if we are to search for the true secret of Creative Genius, we should find that secret in the intenseness of the sympathies.

CONCLUSION

Lytton's theories of prose fiction are at once extensive and explicit, dealing as they do with the aim of fiction (presenting the great conception, the ideal) and the means by which the aim may be achieved. It is a body of theory which looks beyond the practice of fiction in his own day, which was, in the current phrase, "dramatic" and toward later fiction which is "metaphysical" in Lytton's sense—the fiction that deals with the secret life of the spirit. The most interesting single point in Lytton's theories is his distinction between the drama and novel, with the need for different technique for the working out of different forms. He sensed the necessity of presenting the devious and non-dramatic forms of existence and the fitness of prose fiction as a medium for such efforts. Some of his particular distinctions seem to us petty from the vantage-point of the present. Lytton suffered the limitations of all who pioneer—the blindness that is the complement of ambitious vision.

HAROLD H. WATTS

Purdue University

<sup>51</sup> Ibid., 352.

<sup>52</sup> Idem.

XVIII

THE COSTUMBRISTA MOVEMENT IN MEXICO

WHEN the liberal journalist Fernández de Lizardi found himself barred from further discussion of political conditions, at the close of the first brief term of freedom of the press in Mexico in 1812, he turned to descriptions of manners and customs as a means of reaching his public, not with the intention of furnishing entertainment but, like Larra two decades later,<sup>1</sup> with the hope of effecting reforms. Under cover of this type of material, which seemed perfectly harmless to the censors, he portrayed in his El Pensador mexicano, during 1813 and 1814, social and educational conditions as they then existed in the capital of the viceroyalty. When this avenue of expression was gradually closed to him after 1814 by the absolutist régime, Lizardi resorted to fiction; in his three realistic novels, picaresque in form but replete with costumbrista material, he accomplished for Mexico City what Mesonero Romanos futilely planned some years later to do for Madrid through the picaresque novel.<sup>2</sup> Under the free press in 1820 Lizardi turned from fiction to a defense of the constitution; in El Conductor eléctrico he published many articles similar in tone and purpose to Miñano's Cartas, which appeared in Madrid in the same year; but he contributed nothing further toward the development of the satirical sketch on manners. When the more finished costumbrista article made its appearance in Mexico almost twenty years later, the revival of the form was due, not to native initiative, but to Spanish models. The Mexican literary periodicals in which these were published coincided both in content and in point of time with their Spanish prototypes; those in which fully developed costumbrista essays appear date, in the mother country from the opening, in Mexico from the close, of the third decade.

Mesonero Romanos was the first model. In 1838 the Ensayo literario reprinted his "El romanticismo y los románticos," and in 1840 other periodicals published "El amante corto de vista" [17], "La político-manía" [29], "Una visita a San Bernardino" [33], "La posada" [25], and "Antes, ahora, y después" [18], as well as translations of two of Addison's essays [1-2].<sup>3</sup> Imitators were soon busy. In that year appeared four Mexican articles based on traditional Spanish themes: "Un domingo" by "D. Benedetto" [118]; "Ensayo histórico sobre las modas" and

<sup>1</sup> For many valuable suggestions concerning the terminology employed and parallels in Spanish costumbrista literature, I am indebted to Prof. F. Courtney Tarr of Princeton University.

<sup>2</sup> Memorias de un setenón (Madrid, 1880), pp. 185-186.

<sup>3</sup> The bracketed numbers refer to the corresponding citations in the bibliography.

"Lecciones a un periodista novel," both signed "B." [191-192]; and "Las doncellas," which bears the signature of "D. Benedetto I. del F." [204]. Guillermo Prieto was probably the author of all, although he admits the use of only the first of these pseudonyms.<sup>4</sup> In the essay so signed, which is by far the best, "D. Benedetto" visits the home of a widow and her three daughters who maintain themselves by their needles, takes a stroll along Bucareli Street, and ends the day by attending a dance given by servants, whom he describes as aping the manners of their masters. Incidentally he gently satirizes the various types that caught his eye—those dressing to go out for the evening and those dining at the then famous Veroli restaurant.

We are left in no doubt concerning the model Prieto followed in these early sketches, for he tells us frankly:

Por aquellos tiempos llegaron a México, coleccionados, algunos artículos de "El Curioso Parlante," comenzados a publicar en 1836.

Yo, sin antecedente alguno, publicaba con el seudónimo de Don Benedetto, mis primeros cuadros, y al ver que Mesonero quería escribir un Madrid antiguo y moderno, yo quise hacer lo mismo, alentado en mi empresa por Ramírez mi inseparable compañero.

Emprendía mis paseos de estudio, tomando un rumbo, y fijando en mi memoria sus circunstancias más características.<sup>5</sup>

In 1841 other foreign costumbristas were introduced through Mexican periodicals to the reading public. Jouy was discussed in a brief article<sup>6</sup> which accompanied a translation of one of his essays [12]. Larra's death was announced in an article, "Fígaro," previously published in the Spanish Revista nacional and El Español; this was followed by Zorilla's poem, "A la memoria del joven y desgraciado autor D. Mariano José de Larra,"<sup>7</sup> which had been read at his funeral. Three of Mesonero's articles were reprinted—"Hablemos de mi pleito" [27], "La almonera" [15], and "El espíritu de la asociación" [26]—and one by Augusto Ochoa—"Día de San Juan" [35], which had earlier appeared in Spain in El Artista.

In the same periodicals which reprinted these are twenty-two costumbrista articles by Mexican writers, which may well be considered in three groups. In the first are those that treat of themes more or less traditional in Spanish costumbrista literature. In two unsigned essays, a practical

<sup>4</sup> Memorias de mis tiempos: 1828-1840 (Paris-Mexico, 1906), p. 375, Ibid., 1840-1853, p. 72.—Guillermo Prieto (1818-1897) was important as writer, editor, cabinet minister, senator, and professor. He contributed regularly to Mexican periodicals from 1840 until his death. Further details of his early life are given in his Memorias, which cover the years 1828-1853.

<sup>5</sup> Memorias de mis tiempos: 1840-1853, p. 72.

<sup>6</sup> "Juicio de Jouy sobre la mujer," Semanario de las señoritas mejicanas, 1 (1841), 208.

<sup>7</sup> El Apuntador (1841), pp. 241-246.

joker [209] and the daily occupations of a dandy of Mexico City [205] are presented. A writer who styles himself "Uno de tantos" [232] recounts a visit to a gambling house and the manner in which he was fleeced; another, whose nom de plume is "Imitación del Estudiante"—"El Estudiante" being the pseudonym of the contemporary Spanish writer Antonio María Segovia—ridicules the too numerous class in Mexico that passed its existence doing nothing [215]. Ten of the essays of the year bear the name of Fabricio Núñez [93–102]; in seven of these he describes diversions of the populace on saints' days, the life and animation characteristic of certain parts of the capital, the tertulias of the middle class in contrast with those of the aristocracy, the opening of the opera season, and the daily life of rich young men about town. All of this group are objective in nature and have no apparent purpose but that of picturing manners and customs. In the second group are four sketches marked by concrete, detailed, picturesque realism. One describes in this fashion the customs peculiar to Mexico in regard to St. John's Day [212]; another, the Corpus Christi Day festivities of the Indians of a suburb of the capital [201]; in the third, the peculiar customs observed in connection with the masquerade in Campeche and Mérida [214] are recounted; while the fourth portrays certain festivities indulged in by the lower classes when sitting up with the corpse of a child [233]. Ochoa's "Día de San Juan" [35] furnished the inspiration for the first of these; and the same writer's "Velatorios" [El Artista, II, 57], for the last.

In the essays of the third group—three by Núñez and four by "Verdad," the authors reveal the deeper and more subtle purpose which distinguishes the work of Larra. The former criticizes the general lack of progress in Mexico, the slowness of the mails, and the poor lighting, filthy condition, and bad manners of the audience of the Coliseo, the principal theater [93, 99]; while the latter in "Quiero ser poeta" [237], modeled on Larra's "Yo quiero ser cómico," devotes himself primarily to ridiculing romantic literature while giving advice to an ignorant youth concerning a literary career; but incidentally the author gives us an insight into the intolerable political corruption then prevalent under the dictator Santa Ana. In advising the youth against attempting the social essay, he asks:

¿Quién sería el guapo que se atreviera a representar a uno de nuestros generales in partibus, a uno de nuestros agiotistas, sin que fuera a pagar su audacia a la Acordada?

He strikes again at political corruption in "Un destino" [235], in which a traditional character type is depicted—a down-and-out individual with a leaning to literature, who finally secures, through influence, a position for which he has no qualifications. The author, disgusted with the recital of the ne'er-do-well's career, concludes the story by telling how he got rid of him:

Y dándole con la puerta en la cara, le despedí, compadeciendo a la pobre república, tan llena de sanguijuelas, que sin mérito ni honradez ocupan destinos de toda clase, mal obtenidos y peor desempeñados.

In another essay, for which he took as his model Larra's celebrated "Día de difuntos de 1836," "Verdad" recounts how he spent that day in 1841 [236]: a visit to San Fernando cemetery left him melancholy and dejected, for all he saw there made him realize more fully the frailty of humanity; in the city, the inscriptions on the public buildings glared at him as so many monstrous falsehoods; and even the Portal de Mercaderes at the hour of the paseo failed to bring peace, for on the foreheads of the passersby he seemed to see the inscriptions he had earlier read in the cemetery. Less satirical is "Crédito público" [234]—an account of the various types that gathered at the Veroli restaurant; but in all of these articles both Núñez and "Verdad" have a deeper purpose than the mere description of manners and customs per se.

The year 1842, owing perhaps to greater restrictions placed upon the press, saw the publication of very few costumbrista sketches. The only periodical, of even humble literary pretensions, was the rather inane Semanario de las señoritas mejicanas; in it are four very second-rate articles of this nature. One, signed "Observador" [220], deals with customs peculiar to the carnival season in Mexico; and another, "Las Edades" [221], satirizes those individuals that try to conceal their age—a time-worn theme. To a subscriber who complained that no artículos had appeared lately, the editor of the periodical replied [211] that the difficulty in regard to this type of literature was not in the writing—the only requirement for that being an ability to read French—but in the fact that every individual guilty of the vice satirized thought himself the subject; here he is probably following Larra who had steadily and bitterly bewailed this same fact. In a fairly clever article, in which a device popular with the Spanish costumbristas is employed, the writer, probably "I.G.," the editor, pretends that while he was trying to write such an artículo a young lady arrived who wanted to tell him how to do it without offending individuals; to every one of the many subjects he suggested, she objected; but after she had gone, he found that the conversation itself had furnished him with an article of the desired type.

Early in 1843 there appeared in Mexico a periodical<sup>8</sup> which gave considerable impetus to the costumbrista movement, although it contained no articles of this type by Mexicans. In it were reprinted a large number of Spanish articles which had appeared in periodicals of the peninsula at an earlier date; among these were costumbrista sketches by Clemente Diaz, Antonio Flores, Enrique Gil, Antonio de Iza Zamácola, José Somoza, José de Vicente y Carabantes, Larra [13-14] and Mesonero Romanos [16, 19-24, 26, 28, 30-32]. The spirit of the publication is epitomized in the extract from Larra which serves as an epigraph:

<sup>8</sup> España pintoresca, artística, monumental, literaria y de costumbres, México, 1843-1844. Vol. I (Imp. de Vicente García Torres, 1843) has 582 pages; Vol. II (Imp. de la Hesperia, 1844) has 312.

Nada nos queda nuestro, sino el polvo de nuestros antepasados, que hollamos con planta indiferente; segunda Roma en recuerdos antiguos y en nulidad presente, tropezamos en nuestra marcha adonde quiera que nos volvamos con rastros de grandeza pasada, con ruinas gloriosas . . .

A few lines in the introduction to the first volume<sup>9</sup> give evidence of the realization of the loss sustained by Spanish letters in the death of Larra:

Un hombre, un solo hombre falta en ese principio de movimiento general: el profundo filósofo, que tan exactamente anatomizaba el arte en sus partes mas íntimas, yace mudo para siempre en un féretro sangriento . . . No! nadie en España heredó el espíritu de Figaro; la pluma de Larra, como la péñola del Gran Cervantes, permanecerá sobre su tumba sin que nadie la levante!

That interest in the costumbristas and especially in Mesonero Romanos had already been aroused is suggested by the publishers' note which prefaces the installments of his Recuerdos de Viaje, 1840-1841; in this they predict that the forthcoming articles will be enjoyed as much as his Escenas matritenses, "que han sido leídas en México con avidez."

With the establishment of El Museo mexicano, a far more ambitious literary journal than any that had yet appeared in Mexico, an increasing local interest in the sketch of manners and customs became evident. In its first two volumes (1843) are six such sketches, all of which, with the exception of a rather insignificant one by Manuel Payno [107], were contributed by Guillermo Prieto, who then began to use the pseudonym of "Fidel," by which he has since been known. In three of these he presents contemporary but by no means original types: the old woman who tries to keep young by the use of cosmetics, who eats up all the food at every gathering she attends, and who especially delights in bringing bad news [135]—one of the most satiric of his essays; the girl of the middle class, poor but proud of her ancestry [127]; and the old hypocrite who poses as a saint but is at heart a rake [121]. In others, "Fidel" devotes himself mainly to manners and customs: the diversions of a party that spends the day at Chapultepec [123], and scenes in the restaurants and second-rate boarding houses, in the churches, the morgue, and the theater [113].

<sup>9</sup> This is taken from Recuerdos y Bellezas de España (Barcelona, 1839).

To the third volume of El Museo (1844) Prieto contributed four essays: these are concerned with the Teatro de Nuevo México before and during a performance [114]; customs in the carnival season [111]; coachmen [115]; and venders of a drink called "chia" [130]. In the last of these he shows a trend toward the genuinely local and contemporary type. Interest in such material was growing, but the attitude of the editor, in the introduction to this volume, suggests nothing original:

Pero como además el objeto de este periódico consiste en mezclar lo útil con lo agradable, sus editores han resuelto insertar en el Museo la colección que con el nombre de Costumbres y Trajes nacionales, habían anunciado publicar separadamente en un album. Las costumbres y usos de la república, tan curiosos como interesantes, serán descritos con toda la exactitud que nos fuere posible, y sus láminas iluminadas todas, o en su mayor parte, se procurará que tengan la corrección y belleza necesarias para cumplir debidamente su objeto.

As a result, the names of many new costumbristas appear. These take for their subjects various aspects of life in the capital and in rural districts. "I. de L." longs for the pen of "El Curioso Parlante" in order to describe the various species of Mexican fops [210]; "Tristán" ridicules the fashionable youth who has returned to Mexico after being educated in Europe [231]; "L. R.," probably following Mesonero, describes his visit to an insane asylum [216]—all traditional themes; while "Yo," in recounting the daily life of the typical water carrier [105], and an anonymous writer who concerns himself with the life and customs of various classes of artisans in the city are presenting more original cuadros. The trend toward the local and picturesque shows itself also in "Los rancheros," which describes the life of the laborers on the haciendas [227]; in "La jarochita" [65] by José M. Esteva; and in three sketches [138–140] in which Angel Vélez pictures the dress, manners, and customs of the lower classes in and about Vera Cruz. Only two foreign costumbristas are represented: Bretón de los Herreros by "La nodriza" [4] and Washington Irving by "La noche buena" [10].

In El Liceo mexicano, of which two volumes were issued in 1844, are thirteen costumbrista essays, all except one—"Los aficionados" by Antonio M. Segovia [37]—by Mexican writers. Five are anonymous and treat in the main of traditional types: the landlord [202];<sup>10</sup> the romantic poet [224]; the amorous old woman [206]; the individual that boasts of knowledge in all fields [199]; and the coquette [207]. A profoundly satiric observer, identified by Iguñiz<sup>11</sup> as Luís Martínez de Castro, recounts a visit to a sick friend whose wife is so occupied with religious activities that she neglects him—a new variation of the mojigata theme; portrays the type that fattens through dishonesty in both public and private life; and ridicules a supposed friend for the excessive use of certain phrases in his conversation [90–92]. "Calamocha" writes of the periodicals of the day and the trials of a newspaper man [198]; "El Licenciado Vidriera" takes manias as his theme and uses as an example a poverty-stricken gentleman whose obsession consisted of going daily at the hour of the paseo to the Alameda, where he saluted, as if on intimate terms with them, the elegant folk who passed [217]. "El Reptil" portrays the pedant type [228] and A.A. Franco calls attention, in an amusing style, to the avariciousness of the day by telling the story of a young woman who rejected her suitor when one more affluent appeared, while the jilted one consoled himself by looking for another rich girl [67].

<sup>10</sup> The reference to Larra in this article is the earliest by a Mexican writer noted. Articles on him by Spaniards and similarities in topic and style have been commented on in connection with earlier articles.

In 1845 conditions in Mexico, from whatever angle observed, were deplorable. Owing to twenty-three years of political struggle, the country was bankrupt; the monarchists were watching their chance to bring in a foreign ruler; governmental positions had been filled with henchmen who used their offices solely as a means of profit; and war with the United States, over Texas, was imminent.<sup>12</sup> Men who realized the situation were naturally disheartened and pessimistic. Under these conditions it is small wonder that such a writer as Larra should have a strong appeal; and it was in that year that the first Mexican edition of Fígaro was published.<sup>13</sup> His influence seems possible in an article on the cuadro de costumbres published that same year by Prieto,<sup>14</sup> for in setting forth the characteristics that the costumbrista essayist should reveal—profound observation, knowledge of the country, tact, and ability to so present types as to cause amusement rather than anger—he is expressing in the main the ideas concerning the artículo that Larra voiced in his review of Mesonero's Panorama matrilense. Then, under guise of explaining why it was difficult to write such articles in Mexico, but in reality passing judgment with critical insight on the nation itself, Prieto points out that there are wide divergences between the races in Mexico; that the Indians, as in colonial days, are the slaves of the creoles, who despise everything native and favor only foreign importations. Neither are the creoles entirely proud of all their legacy from Spain: "El resto de las costumbres españolas también lo ocultamos con vergüenza mientras el anciano venerable de una familia representa al célebre castellano viejo de Fígaro." In urging the costumbrista writer to continue his work in spite of the difficulties, Prieto reveals his conception, suggestive of that of Mesonero, of the ultimate function of the artículo de costumbres:

<sup>11</sup> Juan B. Iguñiz, Catálogo de seudónimos, anagramas e iniciales de escritores mexicanos (Paris-Mexico, 1913).

<sup>12</sup> In this year Juan Bautista Morales published in book form, under the title of El Gallo pitagórico, a series of articles satirizing Santa Ana and the extravagances of his government, some of which had been published in El Siglo XIX, a newspaper of liberal tendencies. In the prologue to an enlarged edition which appeared in 1857, the author explains the full significance of the articles of 1845, and F. Zarco, in a sketch of the author's life, which ended that year, gives the following estimate of him as a satirist and costumbrista: "Como escritor de costumbres tenía chispa, gracia y originalidad, no faltándole esa malicia inofensiva que da gracia a la sátira, aunque en sus escritos nunca se encuentra la amarga hiel de la malevolencia. Describe a veces como El Curioso Parlante, y si no tiene la escéptica filosofía de Fígaro, ni la exuberancia festiva de Fidel, lo distinguen una perspicacia y un candor que lo asemejan al célebre Swift, con cuyo genio tiene más de una analogía."

<sup>13</sup> Obras completas de Fígaro. México, Impreso en papel mexicano en la calle de la Palma núm. 4 [Imp. de José Mariano Lara], 1845. 2 vols.—This edition is almost exactly a reprint of the Madrid edition of 1843. In the Mexican, the life by Cortés is at the end of Vol. II; under artículos, "El dogma de los hombres libres" is omitted; and "Un desafío," "Partir a tiempo," and "Tu amor o la muerte" are omitted from the Teatro.

Pero no . . . debe desmayar el escritor de costumbres; sus cuadros algún día serán como las medallas que recuerdan una época lejana . . .

Entonces el escritor de costumbres, auxiliar eficaz de la historia, guardará el retrato del avaro que se enriqueció con las lágrimas del huérfano; entonces la caricatura del rastrero aspirante será una lección severísima; y el chiste cómico derramado en la pintura de esos enlaces mercantiles y disímbolos influirá en la ventura doméstica.

In spite of this encouragement to other writers, Prieto continued for some years to be the chief contributor of such articles to the literary periodicals of the capital. In 1845 the second volume of El Ateneo contained only one costumbrista essay, "La manía de los albums," translated from the French of Henri Monnier [34]. The leading literary journal during 1845–1846 was La Revista científica y literaria, to which Prieto contributed three articles on customs. One, in the first volume, deals with a trip to Cuernavaca [129]; another, in relating the trials of a writer who has to serve as a godfather, describes certain baptismal practices [124]; while the third [110] reveals the difficulties of a middle-class youth obsessed with a taste for society above his own station. The second volume contains six essays, one each by Payno and R. de la Sierra, and four by Prieto, three of which are of interest: a description of the popular pelota game to which the author ascribes an Indian origin [119]; an entertaining account of a family row [125]; and one in which Fidel, like Fígaro in "Todo es máscaras," describes certain types seen at a ball.

<sup>14</sup> "Literatura nacional. Cuadros de costumbres," Revista científica y literaria de Méjico, I (1845), 27–29.

While Prieto was thus describing life at the capital, Manuel Barbachano, who signed himself "D. Gil de las Calzas verdes," was performing a similar service for his native city, Merida, in Yucatan. Thirteen such articles appeared in the Registro yucateco during 1845 and 1846 [44-56]. Some of these picture types more or less universal—the tiresome person who cannot be gotten rid of [56]; the dutiful wife who acquires a penchant for romantic literature [53]; the individual whose learning consists solely of memorized quotations from classic authors [45]; and the person who takes upon himself the task of solving all the problems of society [44]. Others deal with certain phases of social life modified to conform to the special environment of Merida—the topics of conversation in the tertulia [50]; the methods by which gamblers fleece newcomers [46]; the difficulties that beset a stranger who attempts to locate any one in Merida, where the streets are unnamed and the houses unnumbered [48]; and the impositions of those who regard themselves as confidential friends [51].

In 1846, owing to the political situation and the invasion of the United States army, both La Revista and El Museo suspended publication, and during the next two years no periodical of a similar nature appeared. But only a few months elapsed after the withdrawal of the foreign troops before the first number of El Album mexicano was issued, January 6, 1849; and two volumes appeared during that year. To this Payno contributed two articles, one of which [109] describes customs in Mexican homes during Holy Week; and Prieto, at that time minister of finance, contributed eight, among them "Enero" [122], which describes the Christmas celebration termed the nacimiento, extending from Christmas Eve to Epiphany on January 6, when it is ended with the celebrated "rifa de compadres" and a ball. Quite different in tone are three articles inspired by Larra. In "Para mañana" [108] which, as the title suggests, is based on Larra's "Vuelta Vd. mañana," Payno's theme is procrastination in Mexico—that everything that should be done today is left for the morrow. In conclusion the author remarks:

Si veis algunos pobres que de repente se han hecho ricos; si veis a muchos hombres oscuros que han llegado a ser generales y ministros; si veis a ciertos revolucionarios que triunfan, o a gobernantes que se conservan en el poder, pensad que la razón capital es que esos hombres no han dejado para mañana ninguna de las cosas que debían hacer hoy.

Two of Fidel's essays of that year, "Un convite inesperado" [116] and "Vaya unas personas obsequiosas" [134], both of which deal with the type that makes himself a nuisance with his efforts to please, show the influence of Larra's "El castellano viejo." Other familiar types that Prieto delineates include the middle-aged woman, loose of tongue and as full of proverbs as Sancho Panza, who recounts in homely parlance the annoyances that arise from moving from one house to another [128]; old women whose conversation ranges from religion to scandalous gossip [133]; the dandy, in reality hated by women, that boasts of his imagined conquests in love [120]; and the female go-between, who profits by arranging marriages for girls who attend her tertulias [132]. In his eighth essay Fidel describes a Sunday morning in Mexico City—the strollers in the Alameda and along the Portal, and those on horseback and in carriages on their way to Tacubaya or to San Cosme [126].

Far less literary in nature was El Tío Nonilla, of which the first number appeared on August 19 of the same year. In this there are three artículos de costumbres: “Un baile de candil” [194] describes the manners and customs noted at a dance attended by servants; “La suegra” [197] recounts in a humorous vein the part played by the typical mother-in-law when her daughter gives birth to a child,<sup>15</sup> and “Don Amadeo” [203] an excellent artículo based in part apparently on Larra’s “El castellano viejo,” recounts a boresome dinner at the home of an acquaintance whose dominant passion was love for his children.

In the 1851 issues of El Veracruzano are two essays. “Un viaje en sueños” [193], a satiric essay in the manner of Larra, to whom the author refers directly, satirizes government officials who claim to promote the happiness of all but are actuated only by selfish motives. The second [195] describes a typical “baile de cruz” which took place in a tenement house occupied by laboring folk in Vera Cruz.

During 1851 an important literary journal, La Ilustración mexicana, began publication in Mexico City. It consists of five volumes, the first two bearing the date of 1851; the third, 1852; and the fourth and fifth, 1854. In the introduction to the first volume the traditional concept of the function of the artículo de costumbres is clearly set forth by the editors.

Para corregir los vicios y los defectos de que por desgracia adolecen las sociedades, no bastan a veces los consejos, ni son suficientes los preceptos, hay, sí, una arma terrible: el ridículo. En todos los pueblos ha sido necesaria la sátira más o menos amarga, y es inmenso el número de escritores de esta clase, desde Aristófanes y Juvenal, hasta Fígaro y Bennecke. Producciones satíricas, estudios de costumbres, etc., etc., verán la luz en La Ilustración, y siempre se atacarán defectos generales, sin dirigirse jamás a persona determinada.

In the introduction to the second volume this further statement occurs:

<sup>15</sup> In this the writer refers both to Los Españoles pintados por sí mismos and Les français peints par eux-mêmes.

Los escritos de costumbres son generalmente estimados por la ligereza de su estilo y por las sanas miras que envuelven. En este género, todavía naciente en México, nuestros ensayos tenderán a ser una pintura fiel de nuestra sociedad, si bien en ellos es preciso dejar pasar algunos rasgos de exageración, pues sin esto no se logra hacer ridículos ciertos defectos u odiosos los vicios que carcomen a todos los países.

While the number of costumbrista articles in the publication is comparatively large, that of the contributors is small. Four essays were probably taken from Spanish periodicals—one by Vicente Sánchez Ocaña [36], two by Silvela [38–39], and one by Juan de Ariza [3]. Of those by Mexican writers, Fernando Orozco y Berra contributed two; Fernando Martín Redondo, one; anonymous writers, three; and Francisco Zarco, fifty. Some of these are purely descriptive: "Revista del desayuno" [104] tells of breakfast menus in the various cafes, especially in "El Progreso," whose patrons are described as they are breakfasting on a Sunday morning; "Filarmonismo" [136], suggested possibly by Bretón's "El furor filarmonico" or Mesonero's "La filarmonía," treats humorously of the opera, at that time enjoying great popularity in the capital; and "Rancheros" [226] describes the manners and customs peculiar to the haciendas of Mexico. "Por dinero baila el perro" [181] strikes a different key; it reveals at once the sordidness and avariciousness of the age. Before a young woman accepts a suitor, the essayist states, she finds out how much he is worth. The venality of all he illustrates in his remarks about the deputies in the national congress—here the writer combines general social satire and political satire in a manner characteristic of Larra.

Oíd a esos que desde el puesto que ocupan en una cámara, gritan ¡libertad! ¡patriotismo! ¡independencia! ¡buena fe! Vedlos hoy hacer la oposición al ministerio; pero el secretario de estado acaba de darles una palmada en el hombro; acaba de decirles dos palabras al oído; ha llegado la hora de votar, y los que antes eran de la oposición, se han convencido de que estaban en un error, han cedido a razones de gran peso, y han votado en favor del ministerio.

Although unsigned, this essay is probably the work of Francisco Zarco, better known under his pen name "Fortún," so striking is its satiric and pessimistic tone. A friend of Prieto, like him a foe both to conservative republicans and monarchists, an active participant on the side of the liberals in politics, Zarco displays in his essays a critical insight unequaled in its keenness by any Mexican writer of the period.<sup>16</sup> In this, as in his irony and sarcasm, he is comparable to Larra, who was doubtless his model and to whom he makes frequent reference.

<sup>16</sup> For further details of the life of Zarco, see "Discursos" by Felipe Sánchez Solís and G. Prieto in Velada pública celebrada por el Liceo Hidalgo, la noche de 13 de abril de 1874 para honrar la memoria del señor Francisco Zarco (Mexico, 1875).

Zarco's essays, like Larra's, reveal the personality, the temperament, and power of reflection of the writer, and his ability to emphasize the inner rather than the external significance of a subject. In these artículos, in contrast with those of the less gifted costumbristas who treat manners and customs purely objectively, the personal reflections of the author are of primary interest, for he was concerned with manners and customs only as a basis for his own reactions. His outlook on life, as expressed in his essays, is pessimistic, and justly so, for at the time he wrote the future of Mexico appeared dismal indeed. In his first essay in La Ilustración [183]—written in his admirably discursive vein—he explains why he is unwilling to write on the theater, and describes, in a style very similar to that of Larra, some of the conditions then prevailing in Mexico:

¿Qué más teatro que el mundo, qué más farsa que nuestras cosas, qué mejores actores que el patriota el honrado, el valiente, el entusiasta, el modesto, la pudibunda, la devota y otros mil?

In "El payaso" [178] he states that there are clowns not only in the circus, but also in the house of deputies; and in "Vendutas" [189] he describes the two kinds of auctions and the tricks of the Mexican auctioneer; but he comments pointedly that the auctioneer's cry, "¿No hay quién da más?", is characteristic of all phases of life, for the one who gives most gets "aplausos, elogios, celebridad, amistad, amor," and he who gives most to the ministers gets the government contracts. Two articles, both entitled "El palacio nacional" [175–176], use the palace and the life about it as a basis for satire on existing conditions. In the first he contrasts the reception accorded two men who enter the treasury department—one an army officer, come to collect the salary justly due him, whom all disregard; the other, a merchant profiting from money-lending to the government at an excessive interest rate, whom the ministers themselves serve as lackeys. The description of the quarters of the president serves as a background for an account of how that dignitary spends the day [176].

Por la mañana es cuando los presidentes suelen concebir grandes medidas, como quitar asientos del patio, o plantar un árbol, o que haya tres centinelas en vez de dos, o que la guardia nacional añada a su vestuario una o dos tiras coloradas, o que las mochilas de la tropa se llenen de paja en una procesión, o que se les hagan guantes con brin o con calcetines.

In "Del trabajo y la pereza" [155] he explains the absence of enthusiasm for thrift and industry among the Mexicans.

Donde nada se puede hacer, donde todo lo útil encuentra obstáculos, donde el talento y el mérito son cuasi delitos, donde la masa del pueblo vive oprimida por unos cuantos, la indolencia y la apatía son el resultado del estado de cosas que llegan a formar el carácter nacional. Si la propiedad no está segura, si no hay señal alguna de estimación, si todo es visto con indiferencia ¿podrá haber amor al trabajo? . . .

Un triste ejemplo de ese contagio presenta Méjico de algunos años a esta parte . . .

Por fin, mientras la adulación, las bajas intrigas, la corrupción y el vicio sean medios seguros de hacer fortuna, poco estímulo habrá para el trabajo, y el menor defecto del hombre será ser perezoso.

Less pungent than his essays dealing directly or indirectly with political conditions are those that treat of certain features of social life in the Mexican capital. Among these are the diversions of various classes in the late afternoons [153]; the passion of the majority of the people for charades, logogriphs, and puzzles, so great that questions of major importance are left to the few [146]; the idiosyncrasies of certain individuals in the crowds attending the exposition of 1851 [154]; funeral customs among the well-to-do [158]; the habit of certain individuals of opening an interview by stating they wish only a word, and then of proceeding at length [174]; the feigned anxiety with which some await the arrival of boats from Europe [177]; the trials of a family that goes to the country to spend the vacation [164]; certain prejudices in regard to honor that have been inherited from the Spaniards [163]; and the incongruous taste of the Mexican equally passionate over bullfights and operas [173].

In other essays "Fortún" presents the characteristics of certain types, universal rather than peculiar to Mexico; these include the absent-minded person who lets his thoughts divert him from the world [156]; the man who never dares express an opinion of his own [162]; the youth who falls in love with every girl he meets [187]; the libertine [167]; the man so subjected to the will of his parents that he becomes a machine [166]; the frank person continually getting into hot water by saying exactly what he thinks [144]; and the tactless individual who voices every idea that occurs to him [141].

During 1854-1855 there appeared, probably in installments, Los Mexicanos pintados por sí mismos, which contains thirty-three essays, each devoted to some familiar type of figure.<sup>17</sup> Three are signed by Juan de Dios Arias; one, by Feva Irisarri; sixteen are unsigned; and thirteen bear only a single initial, which in no case is identified in the various works on Mexican pseudonyms. The whole was probably the work of that group of liberal writers headed by Altamirano, Prieto, and Zarco. Arias, Rivera, Ramírez, Tovar, and Frías y Soto are mentioned by the last named as collaborators.<sup>18</sup> The participation of Ignacio Ramírez, the radical liberal known as the Mexican Voltaire, is further substantiated by the fact that two of the unsigned articles—"La Coqueta" and "La Estanquillera"—are included in the edition of his works issued in Mexico City in 1889. In spite of the popular appeal of these articles, they differ from their Spanish prototypes in that political satire occurs in many. In "El Mecero," a dry-goods peddler takes French leave of a family with whom he had spent the night, with the remark:

<sup>17</sup> Los Mexicanos pintados por sí mismos. Tipos y costumbres nacionales, por varios autores. México: Imprenta de Murguía, 1854.—The first article bears the date of 1854; the later ones, 1855. The titles, one-third of which are substantially those of the Spanish work, are as follows: El Aguador, La Chiera, El Peluquero, El Barbero, El Cochero, El Cómicó de la Legua, La Costurera, El Cajero, El Evangelista, El Sereno, El Alacenero, La China,

Por lo mismo, entonces, comprendí lo que más tarde han llegado a conocer los presidentes, y a ejemplo de ellos saqué en limpio, que lo más sencillo y económico era desaparecer repentinamente, como el ratón que ha dejado bien arreglados sus cuentas con el queso.

In "El Ministro," cabinet officers are ridiculed; in "El Cargador" a parallel is drawn between a porter and the government; and in "El Tocinero" various gibes are directed at the reactionaries.

During the next decade the liberals had little time to devote to literature, for late in 1855 they forced Santa Ana from the country, took over the reins of government, drafted a new constitution, and resisted in turn the repeated attempts of the reactionaries—the Church and great landed proprietors, the combined forces of the European nations to whom Mexico was indebted, and, finally, Maximilian with the French troops and monarchists. In March, 1862, while the liberals were holding the capital, they established El Palo de Ciego, Periódico poco político, de costumbres, literatura y avisos, and in the following month, La Chinaca; both continued publication until shortly before the city was taken by the French. The artículo de costumbres seems not to have been well adapted to the main purpose of both—the ridiculing of monarchists—for no such essays appear in the latter and only four in the former, one of which [43] was taken from a Spanish periodical. In those by Mexican writers, "Buscapié," a young liberal, recounts [196] a visit to some old hypocritical, and reactionary women, firm adherents of the Church, who

---

La Recamarera, El Músico de cuerda, El Poetastro, El Vendutero, La Coqueta, El Abogado, El Arriero, El Jugador de ajedrez, El Cajista, La Estanquillera, El Escribiente, El Ranchero, El Maestro, La Casera, El Criado, El Mecero, La Partera, El Ministro, El Cargador, El Tocinero, El Ministro ejecutor.

<sup>18</sup> "Album fotográfico," La Orquesta, 3rd Series, I, no. 68, February 15, 1868.

upbraid him for his, to them, heretical views; Alberto Bracho presents the stock picture [57] of a young woman who sets out deliberately to profit by her youth and charms; and Elízaga paints in black colors the equally familiar hypocritical beata who spreads discord with her lying and gossiping.

During the four years of the Empire nothing notable was produced, but the definite return of the liberals to power brought about a distinct literary revival. Early in 1868 Hilarión Frías y Soto became editor of La Orquesta, a periodical of wit and caricature, in which he published a series of twenty sketches [70-89] entitled "Album fotográfico," in each of which he describes some contemporary type not treated in Los Mexicanos pintados por sí mismos; among these are the prostitute of the better class, the go-between, the widow, the beggar, the street vendor, the small-town priest, the laundress, the sexton, the bandit, and the hair-dresser. They have been fairly well estimated by Altamirano in the following words:

Cada uno de ellos es un estudio de costumbres, es un retrato de un tipo contemporáneo, y no se sabe cuál preferir; tanta elegancia hay en el estilo, tanto color en la pintura, tanta gracia en el pensamiento, tanta exactitud en el dibujo.<sup>19</sup>

Of the periodicals established in 1869 two deserve special mention: El Renacimiento, of which Altamirano was one of the editors, and El Semanario ilustrado; in the former there are three local sketches by Facundo, which will be discussed later; in the latter, four, all in verse. Two of these are by Martín F. de Jáuregui: "La boda" [68] describes a marriage at a ranch home, and "El coleadero" [69] pictures graphically various phases of ranch life, the food, the branding, and the various contests in horsemanship and roping. The first of the verse cuadros by Elízaga [63] describes a home at nightfall—the girls at the window with their lovers, while the mother in the kitchen doles out, by the aid of beans, the money for the next day's purchases; the second deals with the traditional theme of the mania for coaches [62]. Although not in the form of costumbrista essays, Alfredo Chavero's letters of travel, Fidel's letters to El Nigromante [Ignacio Ramírez], and the same writer's weekly reviews shed much light on manners and customs.

The popularity of the cuadro was not limited to the capital; it played an important rôle in some of the provincial journals. In the introduction to La Aurora literaria, a journal established in Morelia, Michoacán, in 1875, the editor, Mariano de Jesús Torres, states:

En fin, nos deleitaremos con el estudio de esos personajes que presentan un tipo especial . . . El imberbe estudiante, el diputado palabrero, el locuaz periodista, la bisbirinda fabriqueña, el reverendo fraile, el aguerrido chinaco, todos caerán bajo el dominio de nuestro crítico.

<sup>19</sup> Revistas literarias (Mexico, 1868), p. 79.

Haciendo también un estudio de las costumbres nacionales, asistiremos a una función de títeres en los corrales del Coyote y del Santo Niño, y nos deleitaremos con las chocarrerías del payaso y los disparatados diálogos de los muñecos: iremos al Hipódromo a reír en una comedia de aficionados, o bien colocados en una luneta de la plaza de toros, o en un palco del teatro principal, observaremos al cócara de diversiones públicas.

Llegado que sea el Carnaval, veremos los grotescos toritos de petate, con su bullicioso caporal y su impudente maringüía; en la Semana Santa veremos las procesiones de Cristo, y al repicar la gloria, contemplaremos arder entre la rechifa de la multitud la efígie caprichosa del traidor discípulo.

En la Noche-buena asistiremos a un coloquio para reír con las chocarrerías del ermitaño y las sandeces de Bartolo, y tomando participio en una rifa de compadres, veremos desplegar en ella todos los ardides electorales; o bien tomando asiento en un estrado, observaremos en un juego de prendas las arterías de que los novios se valen para comunicarse sus amores.

The cuadros in this periodical deal exclusively with manners and customs in Morelia and although unsigned were evidently all written by the same author, who was probably the editor of the periodical. They consist of a detailed account of the celebration of the Feast of the Assumption (August 15), for which all Morelia repairs to the nearby village of Santa María [222]; the diversions then popular on a Morelian boulevard [223]; customs observed during Lent, especially Holy Week [229]; a mock bullfight regularly staged on the three days preceding Ash Wednesday, whose principals—the depraved of the city—consisted of a man disguised as a bull, of the capataz, and the maringüía or queen, a male moral pervert dressed as a woman [230]; the custom of observing Monday as a holiday [218]; the processions and festivities on Corpus Christi Day [200]; and the bathing in the streams and in public bath houses, followed by military music in the afternoon and dance and fireworks on the night of St. John's Day [219]. In these, the cuadro, following its trend in Spain, has developed into regionalism.

The genuine sympathy of the Morelian writer for the manners and customs he describes is entirely lacking in the next author who turned his attention to similar material, José T. de Cuellar (1830-95), better known as "Facundo" and frequently termed the literary successor of Fernández de Lizardi, with whom he has indeed much in common. Like both Lizardi and Larra, Cuellar is primarily a reformer; although he makes use of his satiric genius in setting forth the shortcomings of his country, he is actuated solely by patriotic motives. "Otros habrá," he says in "Del aseo," "que me atribuyan mala voluntad a nuestros tipos nacionales, porque la forma más vulgar del patriotismo es esa que pone a prueba de calzoneras, de rebozo y de enchiladas."<sup>20</sup> The qualities that distinguish Facundo as a Mexican costumbrista are pointed out by Altamirano in the foreword he wrote to the artículos in Cuellar's collected works.

Yo le saludo en el nuevo género que Vd. cultiva no sólo un bello dominio del arte aquí apenas pisado, sino la revelación de un diagnóstico oportuno y de un preservativo eficaz.

Un moralista así, estaba haciendo falta y Vd. ha venido muy a tiempo. La ática sonrisa de Larra, la mirada profunda de Addison, el estilo mesurado, elegante, la ironía ligera, la intención honrada, el ánimo varonil; nada falta a Vd. para caracterizar la misión que se ha impuesto en la prensa.

Siga Vd. Los que quieren el bien de la patria no pueden menos de aplaudirlo y yo soy el primero.<sup>21</sup>

Although the bulk of Cuellar's work seems to have been produced in the eighties, he had made himself known in this genre as early as 1868, for in that year Altamirano wrote of him:

Cuellar ha publicado escritos ligeros, como los Cuentos del vivac y como sus crónicas de teatros actuales, que llevan aquella firma, con la que llamó tanto la atención en artículos dignos de Jouy y de Fígaro, y que se llamaron "Las bancas de fierro," "El crédito público,"<sup>22</sup> "La veneración" y otros.

Si Facundo quisiera, podría escribir la sátira política como Larra, o el artículo de costumbres como Mesonero. Lo decimos sin pasión, precisamente porque tenemos por el primero una predilección marcada, comprendemos la dificultad de igualarle; pero "El crédito público" de Cuellar nos hizo concebir esperanzas de ver en nuestro país bien imitado el estilo del célebre satírico español.<sup>23</sup>

Three of Facundo's essays were published by Altamirano in 1869. Two of these deal with life in towns he had visited—Real de Catorce, a mining center [58], and Santa María del Río [61]; while the third gives an interesting account of the celebration of the Feast of the Assumption [59]. In this excellent portrayal of local customs, a stinging comment on bullfighting suggests the critical attitude that was to mark his later work. Era preciso que el espectáculo condenado por la civilización moderna, formara parte integrante de esta fiesta, mezcla extraña de devoción y barbarie, de oración y vicios, de ociosidad y paseo, de despilfarro y comercio.

To this period belongs also "Las Posadas" [60], published in El Album de Navidad (Mexico, 1871), in which Facundo, using Mesonero tech-

<sup>20</sup> La Linterna mágica (Santander, 1891), x, 136.

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., ix.

<sup>22</sup> Although this title appeared in 1841 as the work of "Verdad," the possibility that the article was by Cuellar is barred by the fact that the latter was then only eleven years old.

<sup>23</sup> Revistas literarias de México, 108-109.—The writer has been unable to locate the articles by Cuellar mentioned here.

nique, weaves into an amusing narrative a description of a custom peculiar to the celebration of the Feast of the Nativity.

During the seventies Cuellar served as first secretary of the Mexican legation at Washington. Impressed most favorably with the material progress of the United States, he began publishing in the Sunday issues of El Libertador in 1882 a series of articles entitled "Artículos ligeros sobre asuntos trascendentales,"<sup>24</sup> in which he pilloried those conditions which he thought prevented Mexico from taking a place among progressive nations. He criticized the elaborate programs given by schools at the close of their year; the lack of taste in laying out public parks and squares, and the failure to care for them; the costly and unhygienic system of delivering water to the houses by means of the water carrier; the inefficient and costly postal system, inaugurated during colonial days and unimproved since; the profane manner of celebrating certain religious feasts, such as All Soul's Day; the excessive rate of interest charged by pawnbrokers and money lenders; the poorly paved streets, and the inefficiency of the workmen employed in repairing them; the antiquated business methods of the merchants; the inactivity and incompetence of the city council; the failure to tax alcoholic drinks, on which one could get drunk for a few cents; the wide prevalence of prostitution; the general lack of cleanliness among the lower classes, and their persistence in clinging to certain articles of clothing—the broad-brimmed hats, blankets, and rebozos—no longer worn in civilized countries; the practice of the lower classes, particularly the Indians, of sleeping in the doorways and on the sidewalks and depositing their excretions anywhere; and the miserable conditions prevailing in the tenement houses occupied by laborers. With the purpose of remedying abuses and correcting evils, Cuellar records, in essays that are as genuine artículos de costumbres as Larra's "Vuelva Vd. mañana," with which they have much in common, the life and customs in the early eighties of the various strata of society in a country slow in making material progress.

In the half-century we have just reviewed, extending roughly from 1840 to 1890, Mexico could boast of some forty writers who recorded many of her peculiar manners and customs. The majority of these were of the later Mesonero Romanos type, interested in the various aspects of life per se; but among them were followers of Larra, especially "Verdad," "Fortún," and "Facundo," who through their efforts to spur Mexico on to progress, serve to connect Larra, in spirit at least, with the "generation of 1898," which sought to awaken Spain from her lethargy.

<sup>24</sup> La Linterna mágica (Santander, 1890-1892), ix, x, xx-xxii.

Like Larra, they were rebels at heart and ceaseless critics of their country, but they called attention to her shortcomings solely from patriotic motives. No one of these Mexicans could boast the mordant wit or stinging satire that distinguished the work of Fígaro; but each contributed in a lesser degree to the ends he sought to serve.

Although the term "costumbrista" is applied, and justly from their choice of subject-matter, to both these groups of writers, the distinction between them becomes very clear when it is realized that the purpose of the latter group was the elimination of many of the features of national life that furnished the other type of costumbrista his cuadro. In the face of progress, unusual types, manners, and customs tend to disappear; variety fades into uniformity; and the distinctive is merged in the conventional. The labors of the progressive group were directed to destroying the local and the primitive—the substance upon which the perhaps more genuine costumbrista fed. What he lovingly portrayed in his cuadro, the satirist ruthlessly held up to scorn. It was for the reason that Mexico in the nineteenth century still retained much of the medieval Spanish, of the primitive Indian, and of the distinctively creole which resulted from a transplanted civilization, that she furnished colorful material to her costumbrista writers; but that much of her picturesque, especially in the cities, has since vanished, has been, to some extent at least, the work of the writers of artículos de costumbres from Lizardi to the present day.

JEFFERSON REA SPELL

University of Texas

BIBLIOGRAPHY

(From the Revista española (1833) and El Semanario pintoresco (1836–37), the Almacén universal (Mexico, 1840. 2 vols.) reprinted seven costumbrista articles by Mesonero Romanos: "El domingo" [I, 10–17]; "El romanticismo y los románticos" [I, 81–93]; "Un día de toros en Madrid" [I, 152–160]; "El extranjero en su patria" [I, 189–194]; "El teatro por fuera" [I, 205–213]; "Las niñas del día" [I, 29–34]; and "El alquiler de un cuarto" [II, 142–148]; and four by Larra: "Yo quiero ser cómico" [I, 72–79]; "Literatura española" [I, 307–314], "La polémica literaria" [II, 34–38], and "Don Timoteo o el literato" [II, 153–159]. These items were discovered after the bibliography was completed.)

COSTUMBRISTA ARTICLES PUBLISHED IN MEXICAN PERIODICALS<sup>1</sup>

I. BY FOREIGN AUTHORS

1. Addison, J., "Análisis de la cabeza de un petimetre," El Mo-saico mex. iv (1840), 484-486.
2. ——— "El corazón de una co-queta," Ibid., 499-501.
3. Ariza, J. de, "El salón de diligencia," La Ilustración mexicana, iv (1854), 85-88.
4. Bretón de los Herreros, M., "La nodriza," El Museo mexicano, iv (1844), 302-306.
5. Díaz, C., "Costumbres provinciales. ¡Un muerto!," España pintoresca, i (1843), 447-450.
6. ——— "El novenario," Ibid., 535-539.
7. El fisgón invisible, "Costumbres de la Habana. Las cartas de recomendación," Ibid., 160-163.
8. Flores, A., "Apuntes mños de un viaje que hice yo," Ibid., ii (1844), 184-186.
9. Gil, E., "Los maragatos," Ibid., i, 365-367.
10. Irving, W., "Costumbres inglesas. La noche buena," El Museo mexicano, iv (1844), 522-523.
11. Iza Zamácola, A. de, "Costumbres vascongadas," España pintoresca, i (1843), 65-74.
12. Jouy, V. D. E. de, "Influencia del bello sexo," Semanario de las señoritas mejicanas, i (1841), 213-215.
13. Larra, M. J. de, "Cuasi Pesadilla política," España pintoresca, i (1843), 583-584.
14. ——— "El mundo todo es máscaras," Ibid., ii (1844), 217-221.
15. [Mesonero Romanos, R. de] El curioso parlante, "La almoneda," El Apuntador (1841), 325-331.
16. ——— "El alquiler de un cuarto," España pintoresca, i (1843), 270-273.
17. ——— "El amante corto de vita," El Museo popular, i (1840), 52-58.
18. ——— "Antes, ahora, y después," Diario de los niños, iii (1840), 180-192.
19. ——— "La casa de Cervantes," España pintoresca, i (1843), 324-327.
20. ——— "Los cómicos en cuarema," Ibid., ii (1844), 221-225.
21. ——— "El día de toros," Ibid., i (1843), 575-579.
22. "Un día en Madrid," Ibid., ii (1844), 196-198.
23. ——— "Un dominó," Ibid., 178-182.
24. ——— "Escenas de buhardilla," Ibid., i (1843), 358-365.
25. ——— "La posada," El Mosaico mexicano, iv (1840), 100-109; 151-159.
26. ——— "El espíritu de asociación," Repertorio de literatura y variedades, i (1841), 82-84. Also in España pintoresca, i, 452-453.
27. ——— "Hablemos de mi pleito," El Apuntador, (1841), 210-218.
28. ——— "Una noche de vela," España pintoresca, i (1843), 18-22; 30-32.

<sup>1</sup> Unless otherwise specified, all were printed in Mexico City.

29. ——— "La político-manía," El Museo pop. I (1840), 97-101.
30. ——— "El Prado de Madrid," España pintoresca, I (1843), 44-47.
31. ——— "El romanticismo y los románticos," Ensayo literario, I (Puebla, 1838), 51-61. Also in España pintoresca, I, 435-440.
32. ——— "El salón de Oriente," España pintoresca, II (1844), 286-288.
33. ——— "Una visita a San Bernardino," El Mosaico mexicano, III (1840), 11-17.
34. Monnier, E., "La manía de los Albums," El Ateneo, II (1845), 55-57.
35. Ochoa, J. A. de, "Día de San Juan," Semanario de las señoritas mejicanas, II (1841), 195-198.
36. Sánchez Ocaña, V., "El sábado," La Ilustración mexicana, I (1851), 196-198.
37. [Segovia, A. M.], "Los aficionados," El Liceo mexicano, II (1844), 49-51.
38. [Silvela, M.] Velisla, "El perfecto novelista," La Ilustración mexicana, II (1851), 179-185.
39. ——— "Literatura infinitesimal," Ibid., 209-218.
40. Somoza, José, "Los charros de Salamanca," España pintoresca, I (1843), 40-41.
41. T., R. de, "Costumbres de Valencia. Les Milacres," Ibid., 395-397.
42. Vicente y Carabantes, José de, "Los Valencianos," Ibid., 385-387.
43. [Zea, F.] El bachiller Sansón Carrasco, "Yo en venta," El Palo de ciego, II, nos. 22-23, Jan. 20 and 23, 1863.

II. BY MEXICAN AUTHORS

44. [Barbachano, M.], Don Gil de las Calzas verdes, "Una carga concejil," Registro yucateco, III (Mérida, 1846), 113-116.
45. ——— "Cosas del día o sea la biblioteca de Toribio," Ibid., I (1845), 130-134.
46. "D. Cándido, o la piedra filosofal," Ibid., III (1846), 58-62.
47. ——— "Entre los malos el peor," Ibid., IV (1846), 221-224.
48. ——— "Un hombre-piedra," Ibid., III, 420-422.
49. ——— "Me voy a los toros," Ibid., IV, 95-97.
50. ——— "Novedades aquí," Ibid., III, 175-177.
51. ——— "No tan calvo que se vean los sesos," Ibid., IV, 301-304.
52. ——— "El porqué de mi silencio," Ibid., II (1845), 460-462.
53. ——— "Un quid pro quod," Ibid., I (1845), 96-97.
54. ——— "Tiró el diablo de la manta," Ibid., 59-61.
55. ——— "Una de cal y otra de arena," Ibid., III (1846), 13-15.
56. ——— "Vaya un hombre," Ibid., I (1845), 37-38.
57. Bracho, A. A., "Por un artículo de nuestro periódico," El Palo de ciego, I, no. 18, May, 1862.
58. [Cuellar, J. T. de] Facundo, "Facundo dado a los viajes," El Renacimiento, I (1869), 14-16.
59. ——— "La fiesta de Santa María del Río," Ibid., 160-162.
60. ——— "Las posadas," Album de Navidad (Mexico, 1871), 143-174.
61. ——— "Santa María del Río,

- Ojo caliente, y Guanajuatito," El Renacimiento, I (1869), 149-151.
62. Elízaga, L., "El dueño del forlón," Semanario Ilustrado, I (1868), 340-341.
63. ——— "Romance de costumbres," Ibid., I (1868), 301.
64. ——— "La solterona," El Palo de ciego, II, no. 9, Nov. 7, 1862.
65. Esteva, J. M., "La jarochita," El Museo mexicano, III (1844), 234-235.
66. ——— "Nor Gorgoño," El Veracruzano, I (Vera Cruz, 1851), 221-225.
67. Franco, A. A., "Fatalidad," El Liceo mex. II (1844), 22-24.
68. F[ernández] de Jáuregui, M., "La boda. Cuadro de costumbres nacionales," El Semanario ilustrado, I (1868), 59-60.
69. ——— "El coleadero," Ibid., 186-188.
70. Frías y Soto, H., "La actriz," La Orquesta, 3rd Series, I, no. 78, March 21, 1868.
71. ——— "El bandido," Ibid., no. 90, May 2, 1868.
72. ——— "El billettero," Ibid., no. 76, March 14, 1868.
73. ——— "La colegiala," Ibid., no. 85, April 15, 1868.
74. ——— "La corredora," Ibid., no. 69, Feb. 19, 1868.
75. ——— "El cura de pueblo," Ibid., no. 81, April 1, 1868.
76. ——— "El empleado," Ibid., no. 80, March 28, 1868.
77. ——— "El estudiante," Ibid., no. 79, March 26, 1868.
78. ——— "La gran señora," Ibid., no. 72, Feb. 29, 1868.
79. ——— "La lavandera," Ibid., no. 84, April 13, 1868.
80. ——— "El mendigo," Ibid., no. 75, March 11, 1868.
81. ——— "La monja," Ibid., no. 82, April 4, 1868.
82. ——— "El peluquero," Ibid., no. 92, May 9, 1868.
83. ——— "El pilluelo," Ibid., I, no. 83, April 8, 1868.
84. ——— "El poeta," Ibid., no. 71, Feb. 27, 1868.
85. ——— "La polla," Ibid., I, no. 91, May 7, 1868.
86. ——— "El sacristán," Ibid., nos. 87-88, April 22 and 26, 1868.
87. ——— "La traviata," Ibid., no. 67, Feb. 15, 1868.
88. ——— "La viuda," Ibid., no. 70, Feb. 22, 1868.
89. ——— "La vieja," Ibid., no. 73, March 5, 1868.
90. [Martínez de Castro, L.] Mala Espina, "Las apuestas," El Liceo mex. II (1844), 280-282.
91. ——— "Don Espiridión Machuca, hermano de la caridad," Ibid., 332-334.
92. ——— "Vagamundos espirituales," Ibid., 114-118.
93. Núñez, Fabricio, "Carta," El Apuntador (1841), 223-224.
94. ——— "C'est fini," Ibid., 311-314.
95. ——— "Fabricio Núñez a sus lectoras," Ibid., 108-110.
96. ——— "Lo que es ser buenos cristianos," Ibid., 179-180.
97. ——— "Matar el tiempo," Ibid., 49-51.
98. ——— "El paseo," Ibid., 79-80.
99. ——— "El patio del teatro. Costumbres teatrales," Ibid., 42-44.
100. Núñez Fabricio, el poblano, "Proyecto frustrado," Ibid., 233-240.
101. Núñez, Fabricio

- anuncio y el candil de la ópera," Ibid., 54-56.
102. ——— "Visitas," El Apuntador (1841), 153-157.
103. Orozco y Berra, F., Una madre fastidiada," La Ilustración mexicana, I (1851), 101-105.
104. ——— "Revista del desayuno. 'El Progreso' al amanecer," Ibid., 42-45.
105. [Payno, Manuel] Yo, "El aguador," El Museo mexicano, III (1844), 173-176.
106. ——— "Costumbres. La enfermedad. El entierro. El pésame," Revista científica y literaria, II (1846), 7-12; 225-227.
107. ——— "Un inglés," El Museo mexicano, II (1843), 23-24.
108. ——— "Para mañana," El Album mexicano, I (1849), 89-90.
109. ——— "Semana santa," Ibid., 321-323.
110. [Prieto, G.] Fidel, "Amalio Espejel o la tono-manía," Revista científica y literaria, I (1845), 321-325.
111. ——— "Aventura de carnaval," El Museo mexicano, III (1844), 68-72.
112. ——— "Un baile por dentro," Revista científica y literaria, II (1846), 188-193.
113. ——— "Cartas sobre México," El Museo mexicano, II (1843), 337-340; 377-380; 428-430.
114. ——— "Cartas sobre México. Diversiones públicas. Teatro de Nuevo México," Ibid., III (1844), 25-28.
115. ——— "Cocheros," Ibid., 373-377.
116. ——— "Un convite inesperado," El Album mexicano, I (1849), 62-64.
117. ——— "Costumbres de la frontera del norte. Un baile de afuera," El Renacimiento, I (1869), 492-494.
118. [Prieto, G.] D. Benedetto, "Costumbres mejicanas. Un domingo," El Museo popular, I (1840), 36-43.
119. [Prieto, G.] Fidel, "Costumbres nacionales. Juego de pelota," Revista científica y literaria, II (1846), 28-29.
120. ——— "Daguerrotipo social. Exposición de retratos Enriquito Filigrana," El Album mexicano, II (1849), 175-177.
121. ——— "D. Anacleto Parsimonia," El Museo mexicano, II (1843), 69-72.
122. ——— "Enero," El Album mexicano, I (1849), 158-161.
123. ——— "Escenas campestres," El Museo mexicano, II (1843), 100-103.
124. ——— "Escenas domésticas. Compadrazco," Revista científica y literaria, I (1845), 213-216.
125. ——— "Escenas domésticas. Placeres conyugales. Cosas que no faltan. Un día aciago," Ibid., II (1846), 112-116.
126. ——— "Faces del centro de México. Domingo por la mañana," El Album mexicano, II (1849), 192-194.
127. ——— "Mariquita Castañuela," El Museo mexicano, II (1843), 27-31.
128. ——— "Una mudada," El Album mexicano, I (1849), 234-236.
129. ——— "Un paseo a Cuernavaca en . . . 1845," Revista científica y literaria, I, 85-91, 111-127, 154-160, 230-232, 288-292, 330-332.
130. ——— "Un puesto de chía en

- semana santa," El Museo mexicano, III (1844), 428-430.
131. ——— "Sobre mesa. Amor platónico. Amor aguerrido," Revista científica y literaria, II (1846), 74-84.
132. ——— "El tráfico de flores. Recuerdos de otra edad," El Album mexicano, II (1849), 147-151.
133. ——— "Una tertulia de ancianas," Ibid., I (1849), 423-425.
134. ——— "Vaya unas personas obsequiosas," Ibid., 602-605.
135. ——— "Una vieja," El Museo mexicano, I (1843), 457-459.
136. Redondo, F. M., "Filarmonismo," La Ilustración mexicana, II (1851), 569-573.
137. Sierra, R. de la, "El educado en Francia," Revista científica y literaria, II (1846), 326-327.
138. Vélez, A. "El aguador de Veracruz," El Museo mexicano, IV (1844), 131-133.
139. ——— "El compadrazgo," Ibid., 225-231.
140. ——— "El jarocho," Ibid., 60-62.
141. [Zarco, Francisco] Fortún, "El aturcido," La Ilustración mexicana, III (1852), 296-302.
142. ——— "Botón, rosa, hoja," Ibid., V (1854), 114-119.
143. ——— "Las cabezas en la ópera," Ibid., V (1854), 39-41.
144. ——— "Un carácter franco," Ibid., II, 623-625.
145. ——— "Castillos en el aire," Ibid., IV (1854), 337-344.
146. ——— "Charadas, logogrifos y enigmas," Ibid., I (1851), 332-334.
147. ——— "Charla a propósito de un figurín," Ibid., V (1854), 545-548.
148. ——— "Charla sobre un figurín," Ibid., 116-118.
149. ——— "Ciencias. Tramitología," Ibid., II (1851), 187-204.
150. ——— "Confidencias de un marido," Ibid., II (1851), 454-456.
151. ——— "Confidencias de una esposa," Ibid., 473-477.
152. ——— "La conversación," Ibid., I, 466-472.
153. ——— "El crepúsculo en la ciudad," Ibid., 234-237.
154. ——— "Crónica de la exposición," Ibid., II (1851), 58-69.
155. ——— "Del trabajo y de la pereza," Ibid., 576-580.
156. ——— "Los distraídos," Ibid., I (1851), 65-69.
157. ——— "¿Dónde hay mujeres?," Ibid., IV (1854), 420-427.
158. ——— "Un entierro," Ibid., II (1851), 271-275.
159. ——— "Fragilidades," Ibid., 655-657; 677-679.
160. ——— "El hábito no hace al monge. Mentira como otras tantas," Ibid., I (1851), 115-120.
161. ——— "El hogar doméstico," Ibid., III (1852), 643-647.
162. ——— "El hombre-eco," Ibid., I (1851), 131-134.
163. ——— "La honra y el trabajo," Ibid., III (1852), 217-221.
164. ——— "Idilios en nuestro siglo," Ibid., 105-113.
165. ——— "Ilusiones o locuras," Ibid., 43-56.
166. ——— "El joven juicioso," Ibid., II (1851), 365-369.
167. ——— "El libertino," Ibid., 256-259.
168. ——— "México de noche," Ibid., III (1852), 157-160.
169. ——— "Miseria," Ibid., I (1851), 433-437.

170. ——— "Modas," Ibid., III (1852) 87-89; 563-565; 598-599.
171. ——— "Modas y novedades," Ibid., II (1851), 12-16.
172. ——— "Los novios. El novio mudo," Ibid., III (1852), 541-544.
173. ——— "Operas y toros," Ibid., 592-595.
174. ——— "Una palabra," Ibid., II (1851), 582-586.
175. ——— "El palacio nacional," Ibid., I (1851), 599-602.
176. ——— "El palacio nacional. El presidente. La presidencia," Ibid., II (1851), 105-109.
177. ——— "El paquete," Ibid., III (1852), 12-14.
178. ——— "El payaso," Ibid., I (1851), 539-541.
179. ——— "Pobre," Ibid., II (1851), 148-150.
180. ——— "Pobres ricos," Ibid., V (1854), 145-150.
181. [Fortún]? "Por dinero baila el perro," Ibid., I (1851), 154-155.
182. [Zarco, F.] Fortún, "Los retratos," Ibid., III (1852), 371-374.
183. ——— "Resurrección de Fortún," Ibid., I (1851), 33-36.
184. ——— "Los seres excepcionales," Ibid., IV (1854), 387-391.
185. — "El spleen," Ibid., II (1851), 300-304.
186. ——— "Los transeuntes," Ibid., IV (1854), 214-216.
187. ——— "Tras la cruz está el diablo," Ibid., I (1851), 543-547.
188. ——— "Utilidad de un figurín," Ibid., V (1854), 214-216.
189. ——— "Vendutas," La Ilustración mexicana, I (1851), 586-592.

III. BY ANONYMOUS MEXICAN AUTHORS

190. "La Alameda," La Ilustración mexicana, I (1851), 501-503.
191. B. [Prieto, G.]?, "Ensayo histórico sobre las modas," El Museo popular, I (1840), 47-48.
192. ——— "Lecciones a un periodista novel," El Museo popular, I (1840), 129-132.
193. El Bachiller, "Un viaje en sueños," El Veracruzano, I (Vera Cruz, 1851), 88-90.
194. "Un baile de candil," El Tío Nonilla, I (1849), 43-46.
195. "Las bailes de cruz," El Veracruzano, I (1851), 226-228.
196. Buscapié, "Amistades añejas. Un chubasco inesperado," El Palo de ciego, I, no. 2, April 4, 1862.
197. C., A. de "La suegra," El Tío Nonilla, I (1849), 103-106.
198. Calamocha, "El océano de tinta," El Liceo mexicano, II (1844), 161-164.
199. "Carta al Licenciado Vidriera. D. Polibio Pebete," El Liceo mexicano, I (1844), 428-429.
200. "El corpus," La Aurora literaria (Morelia, 1875), 146-148.
201. "El corpus de Santiago Tlalolco," Semanario de las señorilas mejicanas, II (1841), 321-325.
202. "Cosas de mi casero," El Liceo mexicano, I (1844), 193-195.
203. "Don Amadeo," El Tío Nonilla, I (1849), 250-252.
204. D. Benedetto I. del F. [Prieto, G.]?, "Las doncellas," El Museo popular, I (1840), 74-77.
205. "Los elegantes," La Bruja, I, no. 15, Dec. 4, 1841.

206. "Ella," El Liceo mexicano, I (1844), 334-337.
207. "Ensayo," Ibid., II (1844), 35-37.
208. F. G., "Máscaras," Diario de los Niños, III (1840), 199-204.
209. "Ha sido una chanza," Semanario de las señoritas mejicanas, I (1841), 179-182.
210. I de L., "El pisaverde," El Museo mexicano, III (1844), 273-279.
211. I. G., "Artículo de costumbres," Semanario de las señoritas mejicanas, III (1842), 240.
212. ——— "Día de San Juan," Ibid., II (1841), 199-200.
213. [I. G.], "Diálogo entre una suscritora y el editor," Ibid., III (1842), 241-245.
214. I. G., "Máscaras," Ibid., I (1841), 233-240.
215. Imitación del Estudiante, "No hacer nada," Ibid., II (1841), 190-192.
216. L. R., "Una visita al Hospital de San Hipólito," El Museo mexicano, III (1844), 438-440.
217. El Lic. Vidriera, "Don Claudio Ubique," El Liceo mexicano, I, 267-269.
218. "El lunes," La Aurora literaria, (Morelia, 1875), 134-136.
219. "La mañana de San Juan," Ibid., 158-160.
220. Observador, "El carnaval," Semanario de las señoritas mejicanas, III (1842), 284-287.
221. P., "Las edades," Ibid., III (1842), 295-296.
222. "Un paseo a Santa María," La Aurora literaria, 25-31.
223. "El paseo de las lechugas," Ibid., 82-84.
224. "Un poeta como muchos," El Liceo mexicano, II (1844), 258-261.
225. "El populacho de México," El Museo mexicano, III (1844), 450.
226. "Rancheros," La Ilustración mexicana, I (1851), 129-131.
227. "Los rancheros," El Museo mexicano, III (1844), 551-559.
228. El Reptil, "D. Silvestre Cualnacio," El Liceo mexicano, I, 380-381.
229. "La semana santa," La Aurora literaria, 93-98.
230. "Los toritos de petate," Ibid., 68-70.
231. Tristán, "Cartas del sobrino de Tío Tristán," El Museo mexicano, IV (1844), 290-292.
232. Uno de tantos, "La Bella Unión," El Apuntador (1841), 365-369.
233. "Los velorios," Semanario de las señoritas mejicanas, II (1841), 402-408.
234. Verdad, "Crédito público," El Apuntador (1841), 134-138.
235. ——— "Un destino," Ibid., 124-126.
236. ——— "El día de difuntos," Ibid., 340-343.
237. ——— "Quiero ser poeta," Ibid., 93-96; 105-107.

XIX

IRONY IN HARDY AND CONRAD

CRITICS have analyzed at length the philosophy of ironic determinism held by Thomas Hardy, and they have been almost equally voluble in treating the irony that lies like a spinal column in the body of Joseph Conrad's writing. But although the critics have successfully summed up the philosophies of these writers, they have abstained from any satisfactory discussion of the methods of irony which Hardy and Conrad use to illustrate their concepts of irony. The two novelists use differing methods to bring out somewhat differing ideas on life, and I propose here to contrast their methods so as to bring out the distinctive qualities in the method of each.

Certainly Hardy and Conrad are among the great modern ironists. Neither could suppress a bit of irony any more than Oscar Wilde could repress an epigram. To enumerate all the ironies in a novel like Tess of the D'Urbervilles or Nostromo would be to relate the whole story, and to explain some of the more delicate ironies would be a task as tedious as explaining the etymological nuances of a fine stylist. Hardy and Conrad so impregnate their styles with irony that they do not keep irony out even of pieces essentially descriptive, like "A Tryst at an Ancient Earthwork" (A Changed Man) and "Typhoon." Irony runs through their writing like a Wagnerian leit-motif.

Hardy and Conrad, the English architect and the Polish seaman, study the manifestations of destiny in the world of men and see men blindly pitted against overwhelming odds, suffering from an unjust fate. Man is predominantly the creature and the victim of lost opportunities, of the tricky fatalities that lurk in obscure impulses, of accidents that have backward and forward connections, all working through the blind force of circumstance in a world composed of riddles. Evil is inherent in fate, not in man, though men hold one another responsible, being as purblind as the fate above. Chance is against man; so is its ally, Time, that cannot be hurried, and its enemy, Death, that will not wait. Conrad urges man, despite these adverse conditions, to get all he can of the romance and zest of life. Hardy broods more deeply over the matter, finding a metaphysical basis in an Imminent Will who rules carelessly over man, administering pre-adjusted laws concerned only with heartless cause and effect: There is no glamour such as Conrad sees. In the end the classically inspired Hardy sees a tragic collectivism on earth; the romantically inspired Conrad sees a tragic individualism.

Conrad and Hardy use all the known varieties of overt concealment or irony—Sophoclean or dramatic irony, in which certain characters are unconscious of the trend of events visible to the reader; Socratic or rhetorical irony, in which in the remarks of the author or of the characters there is a disparity between surface meaning and underlying meaning; and irony of fate, in which the whole group of characters is unaware of the course of events.<sup>1</sup> With their irony they express their ideas as authors, criticize and evaluate their characters, gain effects in plot and scene construction, and suggest philosophically the futility and frustration that await all man's open-eyed yet blind striving. Irony with them becomes an artistic method.

The conclusions that Hardy and Conrad reach about life are more or less in concord, but their methods of irony are at variance as much as the men themselves. Hardy's irony is more objective, more systematic, more dramatic, Conrad's more introspective, more reflective, more psychological. Hardy searches for a metaphysical explanation, Conrad for a psychic. Hardy tells a story from beginning to end in the third person, giving a series of dramatic presentations in chronological order from the lives of his people. He sets forth frustrations directly and clearly. Conrad tells a story in the first person, neglecting chronological sequence, darting forward or backward as the mood takes him, retrospecting on the disillusionments of the past. Hardy depicts his ironies in the vivid present, Conrad his ironies in the shadowy past. Hardy illustrates his ironies with a thousand small incidents, a thousand minutiae, closely timed; Conrad depicts his ironies with many fewer incidents, seen in broad perspectives of chronology and rarely timed very closely.

Conrad's method is to keep as long as possible the expected things from happening—to hang a sword by a hair, which, when it does fall, destroys at a stroke. Hardy's method is to make things happen from the very beginning and lead from one to another with increasing speed, like water coming to a fall. Conrad kills with the one stroke, Hardy with many strokes.

Hardy's method is formal, logical, thought out. Hardy has a thesis to prove. But he is too much the artist, too much the student of men to become a tractarian philosopher. He records the lives of his people largely without comment, often recording the data of each irony with the meticulousness of a scientific report. Conrad's irony is personal, discursive, felt out. Conrad feels that often an irony cannot be definitely stated—any more than life or character or fate can; it cannot be put with true realism into fixed situations and set dramatic speeches. So where Hardy crystallizes his irony into firmly outlined scenes, altogether objectively, Conrad elusively approaches his scenes from many angles, getting evidence from many sources and throwing subjective light on the irony as from a revolving mirror. His vision is purposely blurred. His ironies, seen in perspective, are not sharp, but they gradually converge on one focal point, the crucial irony of the tale—the killing of Lena when she has almost saved her life and Axel's (Victory), the breaking down of Kayerts and Carlier at the moment of relief ("An Outpost of Progress").

<sup>1</sup> The dictionaries and encyclopaedias remain the best references as to the nature of irony. For discussions of its characteristics, see Bourne, Randolph S., "The Life of Irony," in The Atlantic Monthly, cxi (March, 1913), 357-367; Johnson, S. K., "Some Aspects of Dramatic Irony in Sophoclean Tragedy," in Classical Review, xlii, (Dec., 1928); and Saintsbury, George, "Irony," in The Dial, lxxxii (March, 1927), 181-187. Thomson, J. A. K., Irony, An Historical Introduction (George Allen & Unwin, Ltd., London. 1926), analyzes irony in ancient writers but does not attempt definition of irony; Turner, F. McD. C., The Element of Irony in English Literature (Cambridge University Press, 1926), discusses irony in eighteenth-century writers, but seems to confuse satire and irony.

To turn, however, from general comparisons to the first of three particular bases of irony, I may suggest that in concealment lies one fundamental of the ironic method of Conrad and Hardy. Fate conceals. A man cannot tell what chain of future events will link to a trivial incident in the present. The plots in Hardy and Conrad are built around the irony of opportunity missed because half or wholly unrealized at the time. Tess of the D'Urbervilles and The Mayor of Casterbridge are striking examples in Hardy's prose, and his poems play constantly on this theme, for instance "The Harbour Bridge" and "A Beauty's Soliloquy During Her Honeymoon" (Human Shows Far Phantasies). Humans conceal; and concealment in conflict leads to irony. Lack of frank confession or adjustment or compromise allows small dislikes and misunderstandings to grow to monstrous proportions. In Hardy the inhibitions of men and their concealments of pasts and motives lead to dramatic irony, where the reader knows all as it happens. The reader sees Susan Henchard and Tess and Melbury failing to explain frankly at the proper time and subsequently tangling up themselves and their associates in tragic and bitterly ironical dénouements.

Conrad's concealment is of another sort, for the sum effect of his elliptical method of story-telling is concealment from the reader. Yet the reader does not take offense, because he feels that things are being concealed from the narrator himself. Delicate, subtle men, lovers of oblique psycho-analysis, like the Davidson of Victory and "Because of the Dollars," the Giles of The Shadow Line, and the Marlow of Lord Jim and Chance, are men who take a long while to reach conclusions for themselves, and their informing the reader is delayed accordingly. Where Hardy's people can make crisp dramatic speeches, and sum up an event quickly, Conrad's people struggle realistically to express their thoughts and to set them in order. In Lord Jim it is only in a much-delayed and fleeting clause that Marlow tells that the French gunboat picked up the crippled Patna. Conrad thus conceals the trend of the story from the reader just as Plato concealed the trend of the logic from his circle of students. There is something distinctly Socratic in Conrad's hazy approach to a matter from all sides, knowing very well his reasons for analyzing as he does, but remaining non-committal. Chance is the supreme example of this method, with its retrospection within retrospection, its circles within circles. The basic principle of Conrad's method is that most persons are most likely to see the ironies of life when looking backwards to the past—which, by the way, is certainly true in Hardy's treatment of history in The Dynasts.

Coincidence is a second fundamental of the ironic method. To obtain ironies a writer must depend upon coincidence to turn the course of events to ironic frustrations and disappointments. Conrad and Hardy use ironic coincidence avowedly. Their coincidences are not pure ones, as in Dickens or Fielding, for instance, where the value of circumstances is not changed, where the coincidence might happen any time and the quality of the situation would remain the same with no change in thoughts, motives, or acts, simply as if another guest were added to a banquet table. Their coincidences alter the growth of the plot, shedding new light on the past or adumbrating developments in the future. One day, as Jude Fawley happens to walk home by a new route, he makes the acquaintance of Arabella when she throws a bit of pigflesh at him; consequently he marries her only to be disillusioned in marriage and ruined in his career.

Beginning with the initial coincidences that a reader must accept at the start of a story—Mr. Durbeyfield's conversation with Parson Tringham, Travers's yacht stranding on the Shallows—Hardy and Conrad spin their plots, the latter using ironic coincidence less than the former and arriving in each of his plots at his one principal ironic climax which contrasts with Hardy's picaresque series of ironic climaxes. Conrad uses explicit, finely spun psychology to give events inevitability and to support the fate, say, in Chance. Far-fetched, strained ironies are practically non-existent, for Conrad's psychoanalysis fills around the joints of a skeleton plot which Hardy with almost scientific preciseness would leave bare.

But where coincidence in Conrad is comparatively incidental in the broad sweep of the author's philosophy, coincidence in Hardy is integral. Hardy's use thereof is deliberately startling; he wishes to call attention to essential aspects of life that men overlook. He creates a series of ironical situations and then subjects a few hapless beings to seemingly inexorable agencies. The result is an extremely effective brute chance. Reflection substantiates this chance that runs riot. In the contemporary age of train schedules, telephone exchanges, speeding automobiles, time-clock work days, and event-filled, active lives, all sorts of chance happenings are transpiring continually, even more so than in nineteenth century Wessex. Hardy stresses the ironic complexities in civilization by intensifying little circumstances. As Garwood says:<sup>2</sup>

If we took from him the undelivered letters, the marriage licenses that have a mistake in date or place, the leases where chance of renewal is discovered after the time has expired, the marriages that come too early or too late, we should spoil the fabric of his tales.

But Hardy's use of coincidence has been much objected to, even though (as Grimsditch demonstrates)<sup>3</sup> ample vindication can be made for the coincidences in Hardy rising out of environment, home-training, occupation, character, ideology, and custom. From the critic's standpoint there is a question how far the little accidents like the losing of letters and the delay of news are to be regarded as justifiable ironies of fate, how far as necessary devices of plot workmanship. Hardy is variously condemned for excessive use of coincidence in the novels,<sup>4</sup> as in A Pair of Blue Eyes, The Mayor of Casterbridge, Life's Little Ironies, and in many of the poems where the ironies come so thick and fast that they are inherently weak and improbable because placed in unique situations that per se lack universality. Despite the fact, however, that some readers are not convinced by the determinism of Fanny's going to the wrong church in Far from the Madding Crowd, or Venn's error about the guineas in The Return of the Native, or the letter's being under the carpet in Tess—episodes where Hardy with his greatest skill is giving his interpretation of life—Hardy is not, I think, a resourceless craftsman, forced to use obvious expedients in his plots. But since this paper is concerned with method rather than with vindication of the underlying thesis, I shall leave the matter undecided and pass on.

Irony, used to appeal to the reader's sense of justice, is a third fundamental of the ironic method, a key to the effects in Conrad and Hardy with the exception of passages of pure description in their earlier works, though even there they gain an effect by setting off the subject of the descriptions against the ironic mood of the story proper. In their mature writing the two authors stir the emotions of the reader through the irony of the situations they set before him, accentuating the irony with little bits of rigidly selective realism. They awaken sympathy by placing an admirable creature or a creature in some way likable in a net of ironies and letting him tangle himself up until suffering or death results. When people like Tess or Winnie Verloc, Knight or Razumov, Mrs. Yeobright or Lingard come to grief there is a powerful appeal to our sense of the unfitness of things. Our feeling for justice is outraged. The contrast that is the province of the ironist—the contrast of ideality with reality—joined with artistic technique and the thinking of strong minds is a sure means of impressing the reader.

<sup>2</sup> Garwood, Helen, Thomas Hardy, an Illustration of the Philosophy of Schopenhauer (Philadelphia: John C. Winston Co., 1911), pp. 60-66.

<sup>3</sup> Grimsditch, H. B., Character and Environment in the Novels of Thomas Hardy (London: H. F. & G. Witherby, 1925).

<sup>4</sup> Chew, S. C., Thomas Hardy, Poet and Novelist (Bryn Mawr, Pa., 1921), pp. 114-116.—Garwood, Ibid., pp. 57 ff.—Johnson, Lionel P., The Art of Thomas Hardy (London: John Lane, 1923), pp. 56-57.—Williams, Randall, The Wessex Novels of Thomas Hardy (London and Toronto: J. M. Dent & Sons, Ltd.; New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 1924), pp. 136 ff.

Yet some of the irony is much more convincing than the rest. The method of irony demands legitimate synthesis of irony and character development. It is in the irony in the group of novels including Far from the Madding Crowd, The Return of the Native, The Woodlanders that Hardy fully understands his people and their environment and makes their fate seem to result from their inner nature as much as from predestined fate without. Where his characters are most real his ironies are most convincing. In The Hand of Ethelberta and A Laodicean and the other "Novels of Ingenuity" the people and the settings are lacking in reality, and accordingly the ironies, albeit clever, are noticeably unconvincing. Too, in The Dynasts, where all fate is deterministic and the spirits of the protagonists are guided only by external causes, the ironies are cut and dried and as lifeless as the dramatis personae. Similarly, in Conrad, The Inheritors, The Secret Agent, The Rover, and other stories laid in Europe are deficient in the richness of insight into humanity that makes masterpieces of cogent irony of the novels centered around the Malay archipelago and shipboard experiences of Marlow.<sup>5</sup>

In connection with characters and determined fate, it is interesting to note that the ironic method of Hardy and Conrad calls for the introduction of very few conventional villains into their works, and those few into their inferior work. Yet there is abundance of evil in the novels. The great mass of the characters, activists or pessimists, does evil quite unconsciously, elected to do wrongs by suffrages of accidents beyond its immediate perception. Characters like Elfride, Troy, Venn, Arabella, Kurtz, Nostromo feel the urge to live, act, and be happy. They do not deliberately will to bring trouble to their fellows. Some characters, like Mrs. Yeobright, Lady Constantine, and Lingard, bring woe where they actually intend good. Wildeve, Jack Durbeyfield, Almayer, Tuan Jim are unconscious of the affliction they are bringing upon themselves and others. Evil comes from men's motivating desires and aspirations being at cross-purposes, Clym Yoebright's and his mothers', Verloc's and Winnie's; and with concealment and coincidence coming also into play, the result is a cumulative negation of hope and desire. If culprits must be found in Conrad and Hardy, the leading characters, of course, are responsible. But as the German naturalist tells Almayer, the only offense these people commit is to be alive.

<sup>5</sup> See Chew, Ibid., p. 76.

Justification for the irony, to conclude, is the basis for the success of the irony in The Return of the Native and Nostromo. Conrad and Hardy supply their great portraits with ancestry and with hereditary characteristics or some sort of home conditions. They make a character's action the only action that character could take. He may cry, "If I had only acted differently, how different everything would be now!" but what he does is inevitable because of past experiences and past associations, because of the gradual coming together of a thousand small circumstances through the workings of august and inscrutable destiny.<sup>6</sup> Life is not a single thread which ramifies until a climax is reached and then becomes single again, but is a web of essentially the same complication at any time. The events of the past ramify into the present as those of the present into the future. In this justification of their plots by determinism Conrad and Hardy unite into one their philosophy and their method.

RICHARD G. LILLARD

Los Angeles Junior College

<sup>6</sup> See Ford, F. M., Joseph Conrad, a Personal Remembrance (Boston: Little, Brown, and Co. 1925), pp. 218-219.

DIE WAHRSCHEINLICHKEIT DES KUNSTWERKS

In dem kleinen Aufsatz "Über Wahrheit und Wahrscheinlichkeit des Kunstwerks" vom Jahr 1798 führt Goethe den Nachweis, daß "das Kunstwahre und das Naturwahre völlig verschieden" sind, und daß die Verschiedenheit so weit geht, daß der Künstler keineswegs danach streben dürfe, daß sein Werk sich wie ein "Naturwerk" darstelle und einem solchen zum Verwechseln ähnlich sei. Die Beweisführung geht von der Oper aus, dem Kunstwerk, das nach seinem Wesen von Naturwahrheit denkbar weit entfernt sei, dessen Kunstwahrheit, aber, wenn man die Wirkung als Maßstab nimmt, sich nicht bestreiten lasse. Was aber für die Oper gelte, treffe mutatis mutandis auf alle Künste zu, sie erstrebten keine Wahrheit, keine äußere Gleichheit mit der Wirklichkeit, sondern nur eine auf ihren eignen inneren Gesetzen beruhende Wahrscheinlichkeit. So treffend die Ausführungen sind, so sind sie doch nicht erschöpfend, und man muß in der eingeschlagenen Richtung einen Schritt über Goethe hinaustun. Das Kunstwerk ist nicht nur keine bloße Nachahmung der Natur, sondern wenn es das wäre, wenn es nur einen in der Wirklichkeit vorhandenen Vorgang oder Gegenstand kopierte, so würde es damit aufhören, ein Kunstwerk zu sein. Die Photographie oder die Wachsfigur im Raritätenkabinet sollen der Wirklichkeit so ähnlich als möglich sein, sie werden mit der ausdrücklichen Absicht geschaffen, den Beschauer über ihre Nichtwirklichkeit zu täuschen. Diese Absicht läßt sich jedoch nur bis zu einem gewissen Grad durchführen, die Täuschung wird niemals vollkommen sein, und daraus ergibt sich, daß die Nachbildung mit Notwendigkeit hinter dem Vorbild zurückbleibt und im Vergleich mit ihm als etwas Unvollkommenes erscheint. Bei ihrer Betrachtung drängt sich der Vergleich mit dem Original, mit der Wirklichkeit, auf, und da dieser zu ihren Ungunsten ausfallen muß, so erweckt die Nachahmung in dem Beschauer eine Empfindung der Unzulänglichkeit, also grade das Gegenteil von dem reinen Lustgefühl, das das Kunstwerk hervorrufen soll.

Die Nachahmung besitzt einen eignen Wert überhaupt nicht, sondern empfängt ihn nur mittelbar von dem Vorbild und enthält ihn nur, soweit sie dieses wiedergibt. Die Photographie entwertet, sobald sich herausstellt, daß sie die angegebene bekannte Persönlichkeit nicht darstellt, sondern einen beliebigen, mir gleichgültigen Fremdling. Das Kunstwerk dagegen führt eine selbständige, von dem Vorbild unabhängige Existenz. Ein Porträt von Velasquez schätzen wir heute nicht geringer als die Zeitgenossen, obgleich uns ein Urteil über seine Ähnlichkeit nicht mehr möglich ist. Das Bild einer Neapolitanischen Landschaft erscheint an Ort und Stelle nicht wertvoller als anderswo, weil der dortige Betrachter das Gemälde auf seine Ähnlichkeit prüfen kann, und der berühmte Pottersche Stier wird in den Augen eines Landwirts eher verlieren, wenn er sich durch seine Sachkenntnis verleiten lässt, ihn mit einem wirklichen preisgekrönten Zuchtbullen zu vergleichen. Goethes Egmont bleibt derselbe, obgleich sich seine Ähnlichkeit mit dem Mann der Wirklichkeit auf den Namen beschränkt, und wenn der Schöpfer der Laokoongruppe oder Shakespeare, als er Hamlet schrieb, wirkliche Geschehnisse nachzuahmen glaubten, so ist es für das fertige Kunstwerk belanglos, daß beide sich in einem Irrtum befanden und daß weder der troische Priester noch der Dänenprinz je gelebt haben. Die Betrachtung und Bewertung des Kunstwerks vollzieht sich ohne Rücksicht auf das etwaige Original, ja ohne an dieses auch nur zu denken, und sie bleibt die gleiche, selbst wenn eine Vergleichsmöglichkeit überhaupt nicht vorhanden ist. Der Künstler selbst bildet die Wirklichkeit nach, er hat sie während des Schaffensprozesses beständig vor Augen, aber sobald dieser abgeschlossen ist, hört die Verbindung zwischen der Vorlage und dem Abbild auf, und das Kunstwerk steht als etwas Selbständiges da, nicht als eine Wiederholung des Urbilds, das von diesem wie der Mond von der Sonne sein Licht empfängt, sondern als ein mit eigenem Leben begabter Organismus, der mit der Wirklichkeit wohl durch sein Werden, nicht durch sein Sein in Zusammenhang steht.

Es ist weder Aufgabe noch Absicht des schaffenden Künstlers, vorhandene Erscheinungen möglichst wirklichkeitsgetreu nachzuformen, sondern sein Ziel ist, den subjektiven Eindruck, den er von ihnen gewonnen hat, festzuhalten, in der Darstellung zu objektivieren und durch sie auf das Publikum zu übertragen. Das kann allerdings nur durch die Darstellung der Wirklichkeit geschehn. Wenn der Maler eine Winterstimmung übermitteln will, so muß er dem Beschauer das Objekt, das ihm selbst die Stimmung eingegeben hat, also die Winterlandschaft vor Augen stellen. Ebenso kann der Dichter eine Stimmung nur auf Grund positiver Angaben hervorbringen. Aber diese sind nicht Selbstzweck, sondern nur Mittel zur Ausführung einer höheren, übergeordneten Absicht. Der Künstler ergreift den ihm von der Außenwelt gebotenen Stoff, aber indem er ihn ergreift, hebt er ihn aus der Wirklichkeit heraus, macht ihn selbständig und löst ihn aus dem Kausalzusammenhang, in dem und durch den er in der Wirklichkeit allein existiert. Er isoliert das Objekt genau so, wie der Forscher eine Pflanze oder ein Tier zwecks wissenschaftlicher Beobachtung zunächst von allen gleichgearteten absondert. Diese künstlerische Isolierung entfremdet den Stoff der Wirklichkeit, sie verleiht ihm eine Einmaligkeit und Einheitlichkeit, wie sie eine durch Zufälligkeiten getrübt Erscheinung des Lebens nicht besitzt. Sie entwirkt ihn, aber indem das Phänomen infolge seiner Isolierung als Symbol aller ähnlichen Phänomene erscheint, bedeutet diese Entwirklichung zugleich eine Verwirklichung auf einer höheren Stufe, eine völlige Umschöpfung des Stoffes, sodaß er mit den Gebilden der Wirklichkeit nur noch eine äußere Ähnlichkeit aufweist. Auch diese unterliegt bei der künstlerischen Umgestaltung unter Umständen einer eingreifenden Modifikation, indem der Künstler das Objekt stimmungsgemäß durcharbeitet, das heraushebt, was die Stimmung fördert und das Gegenteil unterdrückt. Aber nicht in diesen stofflichen Änderungen, so bedeutend sie auch sein mögen, darf man den Unterschied von Wirklichkeit und Kunst suchen, sondern in der grundsätzlichen Verschiedenheit, die zwischen einem kausal gebundenen, dem Leben angehörenden und einem in sich selbst isolierten, nur einer Stimmung dienenden Gegenstand besteht. Man kann, um Goethes Ausdrücke zu gebrauchen, dem einen Wahrheit, dem andern Wahrscheinlichkeit zuschreiben; es kommt auf die Worte nicht an, die Hauptsache ist, daß man sich darüber klar ist, daß die Gebilde der Kunst, wenn man das Leben als Realität betrachtet, eine Irrealität besitzen und nur Scheinwerte darstellen.

Das Bewusstsein dieser Irrealität ist sowohl Voraussetzung des künstlerischen Schaffens wie der ästhetischen Aufnahme des Kunstwerks. Das Publikum muß wissen, daß das, was ihm geboten wird, nicht Wirklichkeit ist, und der Künstler muß alles daran setzen, jeden Gedanken an die Realität des Dargestellten abzuwehren. Gelingt ihm das nicht, versagt die Kraft seiner Täuschung, so ergeht es dem Zuschauer wie dem amerikanischen Soldaten in der bekannten Anekdote, der den Darsteller des Othello auf offener Szene niederschoss, weil er die Mißhandlung einer weißen Frau durch einen Neger nicht ertragen konnte. Dichter und Schauspieler hatten in diesem Fall nicht vermocht, den Eindruck der Irrealität der Darstellung zu bewahren. Wenn die bekannten Kirschen des Apelles, die angeblich wirklichen Früchten so genau glichen, daß die Vögel sie anpikkten, auf die Menschen denselben Eindruck gemacht hätten, so hätten sie nicht nur keine künstlerische Wirkung hervorgebracht, sondern sie wären überhaupt kein Kunstwerk gewesen. Wie sie dem Maler nicht essenswert, sondern malenswert erschienen, so durften sie in dem Betrachter nicht die appetitreizende Wirkung echter Kirschen hervorbringen. So wenig wie sonst ein gemaltes Stilleben, mag der dargestellte Schinken noch so rosig und die Färbung der Weintrauben noch so verlockend aussehen. Eine entkleidete Aphrodite mag alle Reize weiblicher Nacktheit besitzen, sie muß der Wirklichkeit so weit entrückt und von einer irdischen Frau so weit verschieden sein, daß sie keine sinnliche Begierde erweckt.

Der heilige Augustin bemerkt einmal, es werde die Zeit kommen, wo man die körperliche Schönheit werde wunschlos bewundern können. Diese Zeit oder besser dieser zeitlose Zustand findet sich in der Kunst, in ihrem enstofflichten Gebiet, wo alle selbstsüchtigen, materiellen Regungen zum Schweigen kommen. Wenn wir beim Anblick der Laokoongruppe, bei Rafaels "Brand des Borgo" oder bei Shakespeares König Lear auch nur einen Moment in der Illusion lebten, daß die dargestellten Schrecken Wirklichkeit wären und eine wirkliche Gefahr bedeuteten, so wäre nicht nur die Freude am Kunstwerk vernichtet, sondern sogar der Gedanke, ein Kunstwerk vor sich zu haben, aufgehoben. Die Kunst kann das Furchterlichste darstellen, aber wenn sie Dinge zeigen kann, vor denen wir uns im Leben mit Entsetzen oder gar Ekel abwenden, so nur, weil es dank ihrer Darstellung ausgeschlossen ist, diese Schrecknisse mit solchen der Wirklichkeit zu verwechseln. Das gilt natürlich auch für die positiven Empfindungen. Die Erhebung, die wir bei der Rettung des greisen Anchises oder Baumgartens durch Tell fühlen, ist von ganz anderer Art als bei der gleichen Tat in der Wirklichkeit, schon dadurch, dass der Eindruck frei von jeder moralischen Bewertung ist.

Wenn wir im Leben einen Kampf sehen, so fragen wir, wer sind die Kämpfenden, warum wird gekämpft und welche Sache vertreten sie? Betrachten wir dagegen Rafaels "Kampf an der Milvischen Brücke," so werfen wir auch nicht eine dieser Fragen auf, sondern der Eindruck des Bildes ist rein malerisch und liegt in einer Bewusstseins-sphäre, zu der die Wirklichkeit überhaupt keinen Zugang hat, sondern nur ein Abglanz von den Erscheinungen. Es geht uns in der Kunst wie den Müttern im Faust. "Umschwebt von Bildern aller Kreatur," sehen wir nicht die Dinge, wie sie sind, sondern nur ihre "Schemen," die man allenfalls nach ihren äußeren Umrissen für die Dinge selbst halten könnte, wenn man nicht wüßte, daß sie etwas anderes sind, keine Produkte der Wahrheit, sondern nur der Wahrscheinlichkeit.

Mit dem Nachweis, daß die Wahrscheinlichkeit nicht Wahrheit ist, haben wir aber erst den negativen Teil des Begriffs gewonnen. Daneben besitzt er einen positiven Inhalt. So unwirklich die Gebilde der Kunst sind, so stehen sie doch in enger Verbindung mit der Wirklichkeit und bewahren zum mindesten eine äußere Ähnlichkeit mit deren Erscheinungen. Die Kunst kann nichts darstellen als das, was im Leben vorhanden ist, und sie muß es so darstellen, wie es vorhanden ist. Die Phantasie des Künstlers mag ihre Flügel noch so weit spannen, sie bleibt an die Wirklichkeit gebunden und kann nur gegenständlich wiedergeben, was sie gegenständlich vor sich sieht. Der Bildhauer zeigt uns geflügelte Löwen, der Maler Zentauren, die halb Mensch halb Pferd sind, und der Dichter führt sprechende Tiere und denkende Pflanzen vor: es sind Ausgeburten seiner Phantasie, Dinge, die in der Wirklichkeit nicht vorkommen, ja die der Vernunft und aller Erfahrung Hohn sprechen; und doch brauchen wir sie nur zu zerlegen und ihre Teile im einzelnen zu prüfen, um uns zu überzeugen, daß sie der Wirklichkeit entnommen und ihr trotz aller Seltsamkeit nur nachgebildet sind. Pflanzen und Tiere reden mit der Sprache, die der Dichter dem Menschen abgelauscht hat, der geflügelte Löwe verdankt seine Flügel dem Vogel und der Pferdeleib und das Menschenangesicht des Zentauren bleiben darum nicht weniger realistisch, weil hier zwei Erscheinungen der Wirklichkeit zu einer durch die Erfahrung nicht belegten Einheit verbunden sind. Der Künstler kann die Erscheinungen des Lebens variieren, permutieren und potenzieren, er kann sie zu den seltsamsten Verbindungen zusammenfugen und auseinanderreißen, er kann sie ins ungemessene vergrößern und verkleinern, er kann aus Menschen Zwerge und Riesen machen, er ändert doch nur die Dimensionen. Im Erfolg bleiben es dieselben Menschen, und ob er den Riesen wie Homer ein Auge nimmt oder ihnen wie Swift Pferdeköpfe aufsetzt oder aus den Zwergen böartige Mißgestalten macht: alle diese Eigenschaften stammen, so sonderbar sie im einzelnen Fall wirken, aus der Wirklichkeit und können vom Künstler nur verwendet werden, weil sie ihm und seinem Publikum aus der Wirklichkeit bekannt und als Vorbilder geläufig sind. Wenn uns der Dichter in das Totenreich oder das Paradies versetzt, so kann er uns noch so eindringlich versichern, daß die Abgestorbenen keinen Körper besitzen, er selbst vermag sie nur darzustellen, indem er ihnen einen beträchtlichen Rest von Körperlichkeit beläßt, und wenn ihm der Maler in dieses Jenseits folgt, so malt auch er Menschen, deren Umrisse allenfalls etwas verschwimmen, aber doch so deutlich hervortreten, daß wir sie als Menschen erkennen, als Wesen, wie wir sie in der irdischen Wirklichkeit zu sehen gewohnt sind. Seit den Tagen des Odysseus bemüht sich die Phantasie, fremde Länder, die Unterwelt, den Mond oder einen Planeten mit Geschöpfen zu bevölkern, die die Verneinung der menschlichen Natur sein sollen; herausgekommen sind dabei nur Menschen mit leicht veränderten physischen, aber völlig unveränderten psychischen Eigenschaften.

So eng aber der Künstler an die Erscheinungswelt gebunden ist, wenn es gilt, eine Stimmung zu erzeugen, so groß ist seine Freiheit, sobald sie sich eingestellt hat. Dann kann er sie gewissermaßen als Sprungbrett benutzen, durch das sich seine Phantasie zu den abenteuerlichsten Regionen aufschwingt. Wir brauchen nur an Aristophanes und Ariost zu denken, an all das "dumme Zeug," die corbellerie, wie der Kardinal von Este sagte, die wir uns von ihnen beinahe als etwas Selbstverständliches bieten lassen. Bei dem einem gibt es einen Frieden, der pfundweise verkauft wird, einen Mistkäfer, auf den man in den Himmel reitet, bei dem andern unsichtbar machende Ringe, Ritter, die den Mond besuchen, und Menschen, deren abgezapfter Verstand auf Flaschen gezogen wird. Es sind nicht nur glatte Unmöglichkeiten, sondern die denkbar grobsten Widersinnigkeiten, und doch lassen wir sie uns gefallen, ohne daß sich die Vernunft dagegen auflehnt, ohne daß sie gegen die offensichtliche Vergewaltigung aller Erfahrungssätze Protest einlegt. Das Kausalgesetz existiert in der Kunst nicht. Dinge, die im Leben als Paradigmata der Unmöglichkeit gelten, wie der zu Berg fließende Fluß oder der Blitz aus heiterm Himmel, bereiten uns in der Dichtung keinen Anstoß. Wenn das Wunder irgendwo einen berechtigten Platz hat, so in dem Kunstwerk.

Freilich wenn wir in der Kunst diese jenseits der Vernunft liegenden Dinge, diese auf den Kopf gestellte Welt widerspruchslos hinnehmen, so sind wir doch weit davon entfernt, sie zu glauben, sie für wahr oder auch nur für möglich zu halten. Wir bleiben von ihrer tatsächlichen Unmöglichkeit überzeugt, aber diese verstandesmäßige Überzeugung ist, solange wir im Banne der Kunst stehn, ausgeschaltet, und infolge ihrer Ausschaltung fehlt uns das Organ, um die Unglaublichkeit des Dargestellten wahrzunehmen. Der Verstand räumt der Phantasie das Feld und diese kennt den Begriff der Wahrheit überhaupt nicht. Im gewöhnlichen Leben gibt es nur "Wahr" und "Unwahr," "Möglich" und "Unmöglich." Was mit Tatsachen belegt ist, gilt als wahr, was der Erfahrung entspricht, als möglich, das Gegenteil als erfunden und unmöglich. Mit dieser Betrachtungsweise kommt man in der Kunst nicht aus, in ihrer der Erscheinungswelt übergelagerten Sphäre gibt es weder Tatsachen noch eine Erfahrung, die sich auf Grund der Tatsachen entwickelt; sondern es gibt nur eine Darstellung, die als wahrscheinlich empfunden wird, solange sie die Phantasie ausfüllt und zwar so vollständig ausfüllt, daß der Verstand und die verstandesmäßige Kritik daneben nicht zur Geltung gelangen. Das Wesen der künstlerischen Wahrscheinlichkeit besteht nicht darin, daß man das Dargestellte glaubt oder glauben kann, sondern daß es so dargestellt ist, daß es keinen sachlichen Widerspruch hervorruft. Die künstlerische Isolierung bewirkt, daß der Stoff der Wirklichkeit entrückt und zur Form erhoben wird. Je reiner die Form ist, um so stärker wirkt die Wahrscheinlichkeit, und je mehr das Kunstwerk in der Form aufgeht, um so größere Unwahrscheinlichkeiten im landläufigen Sinn verträgt es.

Die Wahrscheinlichkeit ist keine objektive Eigenschaft der Erscheinungen, sondern ausschließlich Sache der Darstellung, d.h. der Form. Es gibt grundsätzlich nichts, das als unwahrscheinlich von der Kunst, insbesondere von der Poesie, ausgeschlossen wäre, sondern es gibt nur Gegenstände, die nicht so dargestellt sind, daß sie künstlerisch und wahrscheinlich wirken. Es beruht daher auf einem Irrtum, wenn Racine im Vorwort der Iphigénie die wunderbare Verwandlung der Heldenin ablehnt, weil sein Publikum das Wunder nicht gläubig hinnehmen würde. Der Dichter ist das Opfer einer falschen Theorie geworden, sonst lage in der Erklärung das Anerkenntnis, daß seine Kraft nicht ausreichte, um das allerdings objektiv Unmögliche auf der Bühne wahrscheinlich zu gestalten. Die Berufung auf die Bildung der Zuschauer beweist für ihre Aufnahmefähigkeit um so weniger, als sie sich etwa gleichzeitig die Märchen Perraults anhörten, die von viel erstaunlicheren Dingen berichteten als der Verwandlung einer Jungfrau in eine Hirschkuh.

In einem Roman von Stevenson erklärt eine der auftretenden Personen, er könne eher an ein Wunder, also an das Eingreifen übernatürlicher Gewalten, glauben, als daß Gladstone das Zimmer der Königin Viktoria mit einer brennenden Zigarre betreten habe. So paradox die Behauptung klingt, so ist doch so viel an ihr richtig, daß ein derartiges unzeremonielles Verhalten des Ministers den Kennern der englischen Hofordnung höchst unwahrscheinlich und unglaublich vorkommen würde. Dieser verhältnismäßig kleinen Schar stehen aber die Millionen von Außenseitern gegenüber, die an der Gladstoneschen Zigarre auch nicht den leisesten Anstoß nehmen würden, so wenig wie an den ebenso offensichtlichen Verstößen gegen die türkische oder chinesische Hofetikette in Racines Bajazet oder in Voltaires Orphelin de la Chine.

Es liegt auf der Hand, daß die Bekanntschaft des Publikums mit den einschlägigen Erscheinungen bei ihrer künstlerischen Darstellung eine wesentliche Rolle spielt. Je genauer es mit ihnen vertraut ist, um so schwerer fällt ihre künstlerische Isolierung. Die Leute haben sich daran gewöhnt, das Dargestellte als einen Teil ihres alltäglichen Lebens zu betrachten und sind daher nicht gewillt, es von ihrer persönlichen Erfahrung zu trennen und losgelöst von ihren materiellen Interessen aufzunehmen. Ihr besseres Wissen verhindert sie, sich dem Zauber der Form hinzugeben, und dieses philisterhafte Besserwissen widersetzt sich in besonderem Maße der poetischen Behandlung moderner Stoffe. Man wird dem Realismus, wie er um die Jahrhundertwende auftrat, den Vorwurf nicht ersparen können, daß er dieser kleinlichen Auffassung, die die Kunst an die Kette der Wirklichkeit legte, die weitesten Zugeständnisse gemacht hat. Wenn er grundsätzlich einen Unterschied zwischen der Wirklichkeit des Lebens und der Unwirklichkeit der Kunst nicht anerkannte, so verstieß er damit gegen die Idee der künstlerischen Wahrscheinlichkeit und hätte logischerweise die Kirschen des Apelles als die höchste der Kunst erreichbare Leistung betrachten müssen, weil sie in ihrer Wirkung von echten nicht zu unterscheiden waren. Erfahrungsgemäß kann der Künstler mit einem modernen Stoff weniger frei schalten aber es wäre verfehlt, daraus ein Prinzip zu machen. Es gelingt auch dem Gegenwartsroman oder dem realistischen Drama die Grenzen des poetisch Wahrscheinlichen sehr weit hinauszuschieben. Man denke nur an Hermann Hesses Steppenwolf mit seiner an Hoffmann gemahnenden Phantastik, an Ibsens Frau Alving, die wie eine Gestalt des griechischen Mythos selbst vor einer blutschanderischen Geschwisterehe nicht zurückschreckt, oder an die Gespenstererscheinung in Wedekinds Frühlings Erwachen, die trotz des sonst streng durchgeführten Realismus nicht als ein Verstoß gegen die Wahrscheinlichkeit empfunden wird.

Auch unter den ungünstigen Vorbedingungen, die ein moderner Stoff und ein modernes Publikum bieten, gelingt es dem Künstler, durch die Form das kunstfeindliche Besserwissen niederzuringen. Man wird sich aber der Erkenntnis nicht verschließen können, dass im ganzen die Entwicklung dahin geht, bei den Hörern und Zuschauern, besonders aber bei den Lesern die Neigung zu einer verstandesmäßigen Aufnahme des Dargestellten zu vermehren, während sich im gleichen Maße die Fähigkeit der rein intuitiven Aufnahme abschwächt. Wenn man die Zeitgenossen des Äschylos mit denen des Aristoteles vergleicht, so sind die letzteren zweifellos auf Kosten der Phantasie kritischer veranlagt, genau so wie der heutige Engländer im Vergleich mit dem Theaterbesucher Shakespeares. Diese Wendung zum Verstandesmäßigen, diese Ernüchterung zum Realismus, die sich am deutlichsten in dem Aufkommen des Prosaromans widerspiegelt, beruht offenbar auf einer psychologischen Notwendigkeit, die mit dem Fortschritt oder besser mit der Ausdehnung der Kultur verbunden ist. Die Unbefangenheit des Gemüts ist mit dem zunehmenden Wissen, die Fähigkeit, die Dinge außerhalb jedes Zweckzusammenhangs zu betrachten, mit der umsichgreifenden Rationalisierung des Lebens unvereinbar. Die Folge wäre, dass mit dem Rückgang ihrer Voraussetzungen auch die Kunst selber zurückgehn, an Schwungkraft verlieren und allmählich verebben müsste. Eine derartige rückläufige Bewegung ist unverkennbar, die Kunst büßt an Bedeutung ein, und wenn diese Entwicklung keinen größeren Umfang angenommen hat, so liegt es an der Tradition von mehreren tausend Jahren, die ihr ein Gegengewicht bietet und sich auf allen künstlerischen Gebieten geltend macht. Sie ist heute die stärkste Stütze des künstlerischen Schaffens, und sie ermöglicht es im besonderen Maße, Dinge wahrscheinlich zu machen, die als solche dem kritischen Verstand nicht einleuchten. Was die Vergangenheit als poetisch und wahrscheinlich anerkannt hat, tritt mit dem Anspruch auf gleiche Anerkennung auch in der Gegenwart auf. Eine umfassende Konvention hat sich ausgebildet, ein stillschweigendes Abkommen, Dinge als wahrscheinlich gelten zu lassen, die sich dereinst als wahrscheinlich bewährt haben. Die Tradition mit ihrer zwingenden Gewalt hat sie poesiefähig gemacht und erhält sie in diesem Zustand. Daß die gesamte Kunst in hohem Maße auf konventioneller Grundlage beruht, kann als Tatsache gelten. Wenn sie eines Beweises bedürfte, so liefert ihn die Skulptur. Die weiße Marmorfigur ist seit der Renaissance allgemein angenommen, nicht weil ihre Unbemaltheit einem psychologischen Bedürfnis entspräche, sondern weil die erhaltenen antiken Standbilder die Farbe verloren hatten. Neuere Versuche, die Bemalung wieder einzuführen, versagten gegenüber der eingewurzelten Konvention, obgleich sie durch die Tendenz zum Realismus auf der einen und die genauere Kenntnis des Altertums auf der andern Seite gestützt wurden. Auch die Bühnendichtung kann als Beweis für die Macht der Konvention herangezogen werden. Der Trieb, von der erzählenden zur gegenwärtigen Darstellung, von der geschehenen zu der geschehenden Form aufzusteigen, ist dem Menschen angeboren, aber die Art, wie er befriedigt wird, die Fiktion, daß die Schauspieler so tun, als ob sie unbeobachtet unter sich allein waren, beruht auf einer Tradition, die Äschylos noch wenig gelaufig ist und sich erst bei Sophokles durchsetzt.

Im vorliegenden Fall kommt es aber weniger auf die allgemeine Bedeutung der Konvention an als auf die besondere Wirkung, die sie innerhalb der einzelnen poetischen Gattungen besitzt. Ob die Einteilung in Epos, Lyrik, Drama von Anfang an konventionell war, erscheint zweifelhaft; sicher ist, daß sie heute nur noch durch die Tradition erhalten wird. Mit jeder dieser Bezeichnungen verbinden wir eine bestimmte überlieferte Vorstellung, und diese Vorstellung prägt sich noch entschiedener mit der weiteren Unterteilung aus, in Tragödie, Komödie, Roman, Novelle, Märchen, Satire usw. Diese Benennungen wirken ähnlich wie in der Musik der vorgesetzte Schlüssel. Sie geben die Stimmung an, in die sich der Leser oder Hörer zwecks geeigneter Aufnahme der Dichtung versetzen soll, und sie rufen bestimmte Erwartungen hervor die auf der Kenntnis ähnlicher gleich klassifizierter Werke begründet sind. Eine Geistererscheinung z.B. bedarf in einem Lustspiel einer stärkeren Motivierung als in einer auf Erhabenheit abgestimmten Tragödie. Lessing tadelt mit Recht das kümmerliche Gespenst in Voltaire's Sémiramis und er hat auch den Grund erkannt warum es im Gegensatz zu denen Shakespeares unwahrscheinlich wirkt. Es versagt nicht nur infolge der unzureichenden poetischen Kraft des Verfassers, sondern es steht auch grundsätzlich in Widerspruch zum Wesen der klassischen oder klassizistischen tragédie, wie sie sich in Frankreich entwickelt hat.

Von einer Tragödie oder einem Epos erwarten wir Handlungen und Gestalten, die in irgendeiner Weise das Normalmaß überragen, βελτιους wie schon Aristoteles erklärt, und diese Auffassung ist so tief eingewurzelt, daß uns eine unheroische Darstellung von Menschen und Verhältnissen, die wir unter dem heroischen Aspekt zu sehen gewohnt sind, überraschend und unwahrscheinlich berührt. Homers Männer und Frauen sind gewiß von einem stilisierten Heldentum denkbar weit entfernt, aber die Konvention der Jahrhunderte hat es dahin gebracht, daß uns eine schöne Helena, die friedlich ihre Wirtschaft besorgt, oder ein Achilles, der nicht immer Feinde erschlagt, als ein Bruch mit dem uns vorschwebenden Bild und als Verstoß gegen die traditionelle Wahrscheinlichkeit erscheinen. Die Komik Offenbachs oder der Reiz eines neueren englischen Buches, das das Privatleben Helenas schildert, beruhen darauf, daß sie diese Gestalten in einer uns unwahrscheinlichen Alltäglichkeit vorführen.

Die poetische Wahrscheinlichkeit ist grundsätzlich psychologisch, jedoch mit der zunehmenden Bildung und Belesenheit wird sie mehr literarisch. Die Frage ist nicht mehr, ob das Dargestellte wahrscheinlich ist, sondern ob es nach dem Stand der literarischen Entwicklung als wahrscheinlich gilt. Was die meisten Opern an Handlung bieten, sind Ungereimtheiten und unmögliche Widersinnigkeiten, selbst Wagners Nibelungen machen keine Ausnahme, und wenn man seine germanischen Götter und Helden nur nach dem Text beurteilt, so wirken sie grotesk. Aber trotzdem nehmen wir sie und die noch unglaublicheren Gestalten der Italiener widerspruchslos hin, weil wir an die Oper andere Anforderungen von Wahrscheinlichkeit stellen und uns daran gewohnt haben, daß diese nicht durch das Wort, sondern nur durch die Musik befriedigt werden.

Jede poetische Gattung hat nach ihrem besonderen Wesen auch eine besondere Art von Wahrscheinlichkeit ausgebildet. An die Satire treten wir mit der Erwartung, daß uns die Welt in einer komischen Verzerrung, gewissermaßen in einem Hohlspiegel, gezeigt wird, in dem Märchen erscheinen uns die größten Wunderlichkeiten wie Selbstverständlichkeiten, und Voraussetzung der Fabel ist nicht nur, daß sich Tiere und Pflanzen wie Menschen gebärden und wie Menschen reden, sondern daß sie auch von einer Moral beseelt sind, die die ausschließliche Konvention dieser poetischen Gattung bildet. Bezeichnend ist, daß Phädrus-Äsop im Vorwort seiner Sammlung die sprechenden Tiere der Fabel als gebräuchlich und wahrscheinlich betrachtet, daß er dagegen die redenden Pflanzen als eine Neuerung zu entschuldigen bittet, die aber nach seiner Meinung mit dem Wesen dieser Dichtungsart durchaus verträglich sei. Das eine war damals schon konventionell, das andere ist es seitdem geworden, so daß heute ein Unterschied in der Wahrscheinlichkeit sprachbegabter Bäume und Tiere nicht existiert. Aber wenn sie auch eine Spezialität der Fabel bilden, so sind sie darum nicht ihr ausschließliches Eigentum. Rostand hat in Chameclair den Hühnerstall mit den sprechenden Insassen sogar auf die Bühne gebracht. Freilich konnte man auch bei der Aufführung die Beobachtung machen, daß die als Hühner verkleideten Schauspieler zunächst befremdend und unwahrscheinlich wirkten und daß sich die Zuschauer erst allmählich, weniger unter dem Eindruck der Dichtung als dank literarischer Erinnerungen an die vertraute Märchenpoesie, mit ihnen befreundeten und sie als wahrscheinlich empfanden.

Es zeigte sich in diesem Fall wieder, daß in der szenischen Darstellung vieles unwahrscheinlich wirkt, das in Form der Erzählung unbeanstandet hingenommen wird. Der feuerschnaubende Lintwurm in Siegfried oder die Wolfschlucht im Freischütz bilden immer eine Klippe für den Regisseur. Leibhaftig vorgeführt, werden sie leicht lächerlich und drohen aus dem Rahmen der Wahrscheinlichkeit herauszufallen. Das Auge ist in Bezug auf Wahrscheinlichkeit empfindlicher als das Ohr. Darin ist wohl der psychologische Grund zu suchen, daß die griechische Tragödie, wenn sie auch die Handlung von der Bühne nicht ausschloß, doch die Geschehnisse, besonders die Mordtaten, lieber hinter die Szene verlegte. Wenn Aristoteles das Wesen der Poesie ausschließlich im Vortrag findet und die Mitwirkung des Auges, die ὄψις oder das ὁρᾶν τὰ πράγματα, als weniger künstlerisch verwirft, so liegt es daran, daß die Ereignisse auf der Bühne ursprünglich nur erzählt wurden und daß er und seine Zeitgenossen es daher noch als unwahrscheinlich empfanden, wenn ein aktives Handeln vor ihren sehenden Augen, ἐν τῷ φανερόῳ, an Stelle der gewohnten Deklamation trat. Dem Philosophen erscheint alles, was er unter dem Begriff der Choregie zusammenfasst, also die gesamte gegenständliche Darstellung, nur als eine nicht notwendige und nicht unbedingt wünschenswerte Unterstützung des Vortrages; das bedeutet, daß sich das Publikum zu seiner Zeit noch nicht in die Theaterkonvention der volligen Identität von darstellenden und dargestellten Personen eingelebt hatte und daß ihm die restlose Inkorporation der dramatischen Gestalt in dem Schauspieler noch nicht geläufig war und daher unwahrscheinlich dünkte. Nachdem man sich aber daran gewohnt hatte, in dem auf Stelzen gestellten, mit einer starren Maske verkleideten Darsteller nicht mehr das Symbol der dargestellten Person, sondern diese selber zu sehen, trat das Umgekehrte ein, und die Verbannung der Handlung von der Szene, die die Schauspieler zu einer deklamierenden Untätigkeit verurteilte, wurde ihrerseits zur Konvention, die unverträglich mit dem Maß von Wahrscheinlichkeit ist, die wir vom Theater verlangen.

Je mehr die dramatische Aufführung an Gegenständlichkeit gewinnt, um so klarer tritt die Konvention hervor, auf der sie sich aufbaut. Anfänglich waren die Mitwirkenden von den Zuhörern begrifflich nicht geschieden, sondern bildeten nur einen Teil der Menge, Auserwählte, die den andern etwas vorsangen und erzählten. Erst allmählich setzte sich die Fiktion durch, daß der Theaterraum begrifflich in zwei Teile zerfällt, von denen der eine bis zur Rampe der Wirklichkeit, der dahinter liegende aber der Wahrscheinlichkeit angehört, und daß entsprechend dieser räumlichen Trennung auch die Menschen je nach der Stelle, wo sie sich befinden, einen verschiedenen Charakter tragen, daß die einen etwas sind, die andern etwas bedeuten. Diese konventionelle Scheidung, die uns in Fleisch und Blut übergegangen ist, war dem Soldaten, der den Othello auf offener Szene niederschloß, so unbekannt und so unvorstellbar wie einem Europäer die gleich konventionellen Voraussetzungen, auf denen das chinesische Theater oder ein türkisches Karaguis beruhen. Sie wirken daher auf ihn nicht in ihrer Wahrscheinlichkeit, sondern ihrer Wirklichkeit, nicht nach dem, was sie vorstellen, sondern was sie sind, nicht als Kunst, sondern als Kuriositäten.

So wichtig aber das konventionelle Element für die künstlerische Wahrscheinlichkeit ist, so darf man seine Bedeutung nicht überschätzen. Die Konvention liefert in der Hauptsache die Voraussetzungen der Wahrscheinlichkeit, aber ihr Einfluß reicht nicht so weit, daß konventionell und wahrscheinlich identisch wären. Die Wahrscheinlichkeit des Kunstwerks kann auf Tradition beruhen, aber ihr innerstes Wesen bestimmt sich nicht durch Gewohnheit und Überlieferung, sondern durch die freiwaltende Phantasie und Schöpferkraft des Künstlers im Bunde mit der von ihm hervorgerufenen Aufnahmefähigkeit seines Publikums.

MAX J. WOLFF

Berlin, Germany

Modern Language Association Books

THE MONOGRAPH SERIES

A discount of one-third from the list-price is allowed to Members of the Association.

Orders from the U. S. and Canada should be addressed to D. C. Heath and Company, Boston. Orders from abroad should be addressed to Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, London, E. C. 4.

I. LES PROPHECIES DE MERLIN

Edited from MS 593 in the Bibliothèque Municipale of Rennes

By LUCY ALLEN PATON

Published 1926 and 1927.

Part One: Introduction and Text (xl+496 pp.). } Price $9.00.
Part Two: Studies in the Contents (iv+406 pp.). }

Wm. A. Nitze (Modern Philology, Aug. 1929): This is an important book not merely for Arthurians but especially for students of medieval history and of Franco-Italian literature. Essentially a piece of Venetian propaganda, the Prophecies de Merlin consists of historical and romantic prognostication, attributed to the Arthurian seer, and mingled with narrative of knightly adventure taken, in large part, from the Vulgate cycle, the Prose Tristan, and the Palamedes . . . . One closes those two volumes with a sense of admiration and gratitude for their learned author, who promises further studies on the legend of Merlin, an event to which all Arthurian scholars will look forward with much interest.

II. DRAMATIC PUBLICATION IN ENGLAND, 1580-1640

A Study of Conditions Affecting Content and Form of Drama

By EVELYN MAY ALBRIGHT

Published 1927 (vi+442 pp.). Price $4.50.

Sir Edmund Chambers (Mod. Lang. Review, Jan., 1928): Miss Albright has succeeded in collecting a great deal of interesting material on many topics relating to play publication; on the regulation of the stage; on the censorship both in its general and in its dramatic operation; on copyright and stage right; on the sources of dramatic copy; on the methods of the printing houses; on contemporary notions of typographic accuracy. . . .

III. WRITINGS ASCRIBED TO RICHARD ROLLE HERMIT OF HAMPOLE AND MATERIALS FOR HIS BIOGRAPHY

By HOPE EMILY ALLEN

Published 1927 (xvi+568 pp.). Price $7.50.

The British Academy awarded the Rose Mary Crawshay prize in English literature to Miss Allen for this work.

Howard R. Patch (Speculum, October 1929): For a number of years scholars have eagerly awaited the publication of this work. . . . And it is really an honor, not only to Miss Allen, but also to the scholars who initially guided her research, and to the foundation which is responsible for its publication. Every document ascribed to Rolle has been minutely examined, and its claim to authenticity duly tested from every point of view. The editions and manuscripts are fully listed, and the evidence for the materials regarding the mystic's life properly scrutinized.

IV. THE CONSECUTIVE SUBJUNCTIVE IN OLD ENGLISH

By MORGAN CALLAWAY, JR.

Published 1933 (110 pp.). Price $1.50.

George O. Curme (JEGP, July, 1934): This treatise on the use of the subjunctive in Old English in clauses of result . . . shows conclusively that the subjunctive here is due to the meaning of the subordinate clause itself.

J. R. Hulbert (Mod. Phil., August, 1934): This most recent publication of Professor Callaway shows the same painstaking care and thoroughness, the same impeccable technique as all its predecessors, and, like them, is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of Anglo-Saxon.

V. THE REAL WAR OF THE THEATERS

Shakespeare's Fellows in Rivalry with the Admiral's Men, 1594-1603

By ROBERT BOIES SHARPE

Published 1935 (VIII+260 pp.). Price $2.50.

Modern Language Association Books

VI. PETER IDLEY'S INSTRUCTIONS TO HIS SON By CHARLOTTE D'EVELYN

At press.

REVOLVING FUND SERIES

Address orders to D. Appleton-Century Co., 35 W. 32d St., New York City.

Orders from abroad should be addressed to Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, London, E.C. 4.

---

I. THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE IN AMERICA By GEORGE PHILIP KRAPP

Published 1925 (Vol. I, xvi+378 pp.; Vol. II, vi+356 pp.). Price $10.

J. H. G. Grattan (Rev. of Eng. Stud., III, April, 1927): Professor Krapp's work will take its place in this country [England] among the few great books on the English language.

Morgan Callaway, Jr. (University of Texas Studies in English, No. 8): A work of which all Americans will be proud. . . . What impresses me most in this work is the catholicity of the judgments expressed. Professor Krapp's book moves in a region never touched by Mr. H. L. Mencken in his The American Language or by Mr. Gilbert M. Tucker in his American English.

---

II. PROBLEMS IN SHAKSPERE'S PENMANSHIP By SAMUEL A. TANNENBAUM, M.D

Published 1927 (xvi+241 pp.). Price $4.

Fifty-seven illustrations in facsimile and a full size, half-tone reproduction on India paper of the three pages of Shakspeare's Will.

Tucker Brooke (The Yale Review, Jan. 1928): The subject is an important one, reaching far beyond the question of the authenticity of certain extant signatures. . . . Since Shakespeare did not use a typewriter, and cannot be supposed to have dictated his poetry or even to have carefully collated and corrected scribes' copies, it is evident that the ultimate source of all his works must have been manuscript in his own handwriting. It therefore greatly concerns all who seek to interpret the printed text to know what kind of hand he wrote and how legibly, whether he wrote fast or slow, carefully or otherwise. All these things, and many more, Dr. Tannenbaum deals with, and he shows cause for believing that Shakespeare's penmanship was considerably more adequate to his occasions than is commonly supposed.

---

III. KEATS AND MARY TIGHE By EARLE VONARD WELLER

Published 1928 (xi+334 pp.). Price $3.50.

A page-for-page reprint of the 1811 ed. of the Poems of Mrs. Tighe, with phrases from the text of Keats arranged at the foot of the page, and an Index for convenient cross reference; also a Memorial Introduction.

A.J. in Modern Language Review, April, 1930; Mr. Weller brings with him some 400 parallel words and phrases; arranges them in footnotes, and cross indexes them in the Appendix. Some, it is true, seem trivial; others controversial; but as a whole the editor has made an interesting, if not convincing, case. The volume, however, serves another purpose. It reintroduces to an inappreciative world the work of a sadly neglected poetess.

Edmund Blunden (Daily Telegraph, Aug. 14, 1928): He proves with chapter and verse the previously admitted but uncalculated theory that Mr. Tighe influenced Keate's epithets and peculiarities of diction.

Modern Language Association Books

IV. BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY NOVEL IN FRANCE

By RALPH COPLESTONE WILLIAMS

Published 1931 (xiv+356 pp.). Price $3.50.

Contains between twelve and thirteen hundred titles. Part I is a list of authors; Part II is a list of novels, Part III is an alphabetical list of titles with authors' names.

H. Carrington Lancaster in Mod. Lang. Notes, Jan. 1932: The obvious need for a history of the French novel in the seventeenth century gave Dr. Williams the excellent idea of preparing the way for such a book by publishing a bibliography of of the genre. He went about the undertaking with unflagging industry, not discouraged by the fact that he was frequently limited in French libraries to the dole of a few books a day. His results have been most handsomely published by the M.L.A. . . . Nearly one hundred additional titles are given in an appendix, devoted to doubtful cases. . . . The project is one designed to be of assistance to investigators interested in the seventeenth-century novel, in individual novelists, or in the origins of the fiction of later centuries, both in France and abroad. . . . In short, the work is far from being definitive, but, despite its defects, it includes a great deal of information that is hard to obtain elsewhere, so that it should prove to be a useful starting-point for numerous monographs. Properly used, it will render much service and ought to be found in all libraries where advanced work is carried on in any modern European literature.

---

V. THE GYPSIES METAMORPHOSED, WRITTEN BY BEN JONSON A variorum edition by George Watson Cole, L.H.D., Librarian Emeritus of the Henry E. Huntington Library and Art Gallery

Published 1931 (xviii+298 royal octavo pages). Price $5.00.

Contains a facsimile of the rare first edition and of a contemporary MS. never before printed. Also reproduces for the first time with the masque the chief pieces of accompanying music. With introduction, Notes, and bibliographical Appendices.

Leonard L. Mackall in New York Herald Tribune, May 22, 1932: Dr. Cole's introduction and appendices give all the results of a most minute and exhaustive careful study of every physical detail of the 1640 duodecimo and of all the variations in the various texts, and he uses ingenious diagrams and tables to show clearly the precise relationship to each other of all the original leaves (and pages) and those substituted for some of them.

---

Address orders for the following to the Executive Offices.

---

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF CRITICAL ARTHURIAN LITERATURE FOR THE YEARS 1922-1929

By JOHN J. PARRY

Published 1931 (iii+59 pp.). Price $.75.

Edited for the Arthurian Group of the Modern Language Association. Contains 686 items, arranged by authors, with references to all reviews and book notices of them, and a subject index.

REGULATIONS OF THE ASSOCIATION

ADOPTED BY THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL

Arrearages in Membership Dues:

If members are in arrears for dues for the preceding calendar year their copies of PMLA will not be mailed to them until these dues have been paid. Members whose dues continue unpaid for two years shall be dropped from the printed List of Members.

Papers for the Program of the Annual Meeting:

Members of the Association may offer papers to be read either at the General Sessions, at the Departmental Sections, or at meetings of the Discussion Groups. The titles of papers proposed for General Sessions or for the Departmental Sections should, in all cases, be accompanied by synopses (not to exceed 60 words) to be printed in the program.

Papers for the General Sessions should be submitted to the Secretary of the Association for consideration by the Program Committee; papers for the Departmental Sections may be sent to the Secretary or directly to the officers of the Sections as announced in the June PMLA. The titles of papers for the Discussion Groups should be submitted to officers of the Group concerned.

The latest date at which proposals for the program can be received is October 31, but notice well in advance of this date is highly desirable as programs are often made up before that date.

Manuscripts Submitted for Publication in PMLA:

Members have the privilege of submitting papers for publication in PMLA, whether these have been previously presented at the Annual Meeting or not. Manuscripts should be addressed to the Editor of PMLA, to be referred to the Editorial Committee. No paper shall be accepted for publication which has not been approved by the Editorial Committee.

Contributors shall be allowed seventy-five cents per galley for author's corrections, but charges in excess of this allowance shall be paid by the contributor.

Fifty reprints with covers (or twenty-five in the case of communications in the "Comment and Criticism" Department) will be supplied to contributors gratis. A larger number will be furnished if desired, provided that notice is given by the time corrected page proof is returned. The cost of these extra reprints will be determined on the basis of the actual charges made by the printers.

PMLA

PUBLICATIONS OF
THE MODERN LANGUAGE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA

Issued Quarterly

---

VOLUME L

JUNE, 1935

NUMBER 2

---

XXI

IRREGULAR HEMISTICHS IN THE MILAGROS OF GONZALO DE BERCEO

EL cuento septenario es de grant santidad.—Berceo, Loores 143a. There are in Berceo's verses besides the prevailing Alexandrine half-lines of seven syllables a few hemistichs of five, six, eight, nine, and even ten syllables. These may be considered as due to the alterations and mistakes of the copyist. Such is the position taken by Fitz-Gerald in his critical edition of La Vida de Santo Domingo de Silos and in his treatise on the versification of the same work.<sup>1</sup> He is supported by Henríquez Ureña, who finds the regularity of Berceo quite exceptional in Old Spanish poetry, and who believes him to be the only versifier we can call correct from the Cid to D. Pero López de Ayala.<sup>2</sup> Others, not finding credible this unique position of the poet, may care to see in his lines traces of the tendency to ametric verse that is supposed to have influenced all the other writers of the cuaderna vía stanza. A third position has been championed by Lang, who, remaining silent about the odd lengths other than those of eight syllables, affirms "that no convincing argument has as yet been advanced against the thesis that Gonzalo de Berceo admitted the native octosyllable quite as much as the other authors of the cuaderna vía."<sup>3</sup>

Opinions have sometimes varied just as widely concerning the scansion of individual lines. The first hemistich of verse 57a of the Santo Domingo reads Maria la Egiptiaca. In the year 1897 Hanssen proposed the reading Mari la Eypçiaca,<sup>4</sup> ten years later he offered Maria l'Eypçiaca or Maria la Gypçiaca,<sup>5</sup> Fitz-Gerald believes that here the combination ia in Maria counts as one syllable and that the half-verse is correct as it stands (i.e., of seven syllables),<sup>6</sup> Menéndez Pidal agrees with Fitz-Gerald.<sup>7</sup> Lang prefers to regard the hemistich as octosyllabic.<sup>8</sup> All seem to have overlooked the syllabic value of the variant spelling of the Saint's name in Milagros 521a, 767b, a la Egiptiana and ibid., 783c, de la Egiptiana. In Loores 201a, Maria la egiptiana pecadora sin mesura, the incorrect pecadora for pecador (fem.) or pecadriz, throws suspicion on the first hemistich, which might well read E la Egyptiana, and so in the example in question. In general, however, the prosodic values determined by Hanssen in his studies of the works of Berceo are sound, as is in particular his principle of obligatory hiatus which I have used everywhere in this investigation. No evidence has been found to lead me to doubt its validity, aware as I am that eminent scholars have held that the poet exceptionally admitted synalepha.

<sup>1</sup> La Vida de Santo Domingo de Silos, ed. J. D. Fitz-Gerald (Paris, 1904). Versification of the Cuaderna Vía as found in Berceo's Vida de Santo Domingo de Silos (New York, 1905).

<sup>2</sup> P. Henríquez Ureña, La Versificación Irregular en la Poesía Castellana (Madrid, 1933), p. 18.

<sup>3</sup> H. R. Lang, "Metrical Forms of the Poem of the Cid," PMLA, XLII (1927), 530.

THE MANUSCRIPTS AND EDITIONS

At the beginning of the eighteenth century two manuscripts of the works of Berceo existed in the monastery of San Millán de la Cogolla. One of these, a quarto codex, showed in its language traits of the Navarro-Aragonese dialect, the other, a folio codex, showed Castilian traits. The first, as far as the Milagros is concerned, is preserved for us in a copy made in the eighteenth century by the Rmo. Ibarreta, reproduced in the edition of Solalinde in the Clásicos Castellanos, Vol. XLIV. This manuscript and text is referred to as I. The age of this quarto codex, as well as that of the folio, was supposed to be the thirteenth century by the Rmo. Sarmiento, who described them about the year 1745.<sup>9</sup> His judgment, however, does not merit complete confidence as we now know the writing of the folio to be of the second half of the fourteenth century.<sup>10</sup> Parts of the folio, long supposed to be lost, were discovered by Professor Marden in 1925 and 1928 and have been published in C. C. Marden, Cuatro Poemas de Berceo (Madrid, 1928) and Berceo, Veintitrés Milagros (Madrid, 1929). Professor Marden refers to the two parts of the manuscript as A and A"; we shall use A to designate both. It should be added

<sup>4</sup> This and the corrections for the Milagros to be considered below are from Miscelánea de Versificación Castellana (Santiago de Chile, 1897), in this case §5. A useful list of the metrical works of Hanssen is given by Henríquez Ureña, op. cit., p. 11.

<sup>5</sup> Notas a la Vida de Santo Domingo de Silos (Santiago de Chile, 1907), p. 13.

<sup>6</sup> Versification, p. 103.

<sup>7</sup> Cantar de Mio Çid (Madrid, 1908), p. 273, Note 1.

<sup>8</sup> Op. cit., p. 529.

<sup>9</sup> C. C. Marden, Cuatro Poemas de Berceo (Madrid, 1928), p. 11.

<sup>10</sup> Fitz-Gerald, Santo Domingo, Introduction.

that A and A" are parts of a longer manuscript originally containing the text of Santo Domingo de Silos designated E, and used by Fitz-Gerald as the basis of his critical edition;<sup>11</sup> that this same manuscript contains the Vida de Santa Oria, for which we have no independent text; and that the latter part of El Sacrificio de la Misa (250d-297) can be supplied only from Ibarreta's copy, which in all probability is derived in this case from the folio.<sup>12</sup>

Marden has studied the language of A in relation to that of I and finds that the latter contains many traits of the dialect of Rioja, Berceo's native region.<sup>13</sup> He concludes that the language of A is a Castilianization rather than a modernization of the dialect of I. To this we may add that the copyist of I seems to have shared his author's dialect, as he introduced the article in the characteristic Riojan form to the hemistich Metiéronse ennas naves (Milag. 588c). If the line was originally regular, Berceo wrote en naves as appears in A. A Castilian scribe, if revising, would have written en las naves.

If A loses some authority on the ground of dialect, it does so further in its inconsistency of vocabulary: some forms are replaced, others not. Frequently with the later occurrences of a word the scribe forgets his rôle of editor and the original form appears. For example, quisque is replaced by cada uno in 82c but retained in 139d, sedie (sovo) is replaced by estaua (estouo) in seventeen cases but sovo is kept in 178b. So reverencia replaces enclín in 76d but not in 80c. Even in Santa Oria, where we have no manuscript check on his vagaries, we may be sure that hypermetrical palabras (16d, 22c) has usurped the place of vierbos, as happened in Mil-agros 657a, 777d, although metrically correct vierbos is inadvertently retained in S. Oria 122. Characteristic is his treatment of desent (desende). Desent is replaced by después seven times, (208d, 231d, 252d, 300b, 793c, 801c, 834c) with, of course, no disturbance to the length of line; but when the poet writes desende (493a), A's después makes the line a syllable too short and quite inconsistently three cases of desent (94d, 615d, 616a) are replaced by desende, making the line too long.

In several of the instances in which MSS. I and A differ, the rime supports the vocabulary of the former. The form quitar is doubly suspicious in 239c Qujtáualis a los omnes lo que podía toller, while I's Tolliélis is metrically correct and in accord with the rime word toller which is also the rime in verses 342b, 490c, 696d. Sedia, uniformly ousted by A's estaua, occurs in rime with Maria (447b). So recudir replaced by re- sponder (90a) is a rime word in 293b; segudar replaced by seguir (382a) is in rime in 472d.

<sup>11</sup> Cuatro Poemas, p. 26.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. op. cit., p. 31 and A. G. Solalinde, El Sacrificio de la Misa por Gonzalo de Berceo (Madrid, 1913).

<sup>13</sup> Cuatro Poemas, pp. 39-42.

A study of all the irregular hemistichs in both manuscripts should lead to valuable results. They fall into groups. There are those peculiar to one manuscript (groups A and B below), those common to both (C), and those found in the parts lacking from one or the other (D, E). For example, Marden's edition of MS. A has only 709 of the total 911 quatrains of the Milagros, as the first part of the work (73 quatrains) and eight pages containing sixteen each have been lost from the codex, which did not originally contain one quatrain (391).<sup>14</sup> On the other hand, Marden infers on very good ground that Ibarreta copied 143-145, 514-521, 522-529 from the folio (MS. A) rather than from the quarto.<sup>15</sup> We have thus only 892 quatrains from the latter. Within these groups the irregular hemistichs may be subjected to a simple classification. A hemistich is not too long or too short in general but by a definite syllable, and these syllables can be grouped. The vocabulary may be altered by the use of a word longer or shorter by a syllable (rarely more) than the word replaced (groups 1-2 below), the hemistich may be irregular by the omission or addition of a word, usually a monosyllable (3-7), in certain words the final vowel e or o suppressed by the poet may be restored or one used by the poet suppressed (8-10), apheresis and syncope may be neglected or misapplied (11-12), the word order may be disturbed, throwing the cesura in the wrong place and thus affecting one or both hemistichs (13). We thus get a natural crescendo or diminuendo series from the basic heptasyllabic pattern.

(A) Octosyllabic Hemistichs Peculiar to MS. A.

1. Vocabulary altered.—These substitutions constitute the most elusive type of irregularity. Without the variants, some of them produce the impression of authentic octosyllables: Levantó a Dios los oios 655b, perdonat esta uogada (rime dada) 566c, etc. Often the word supplied is of the nature of a definition or is an attempt to make the text more explicit. Separate groups are those readings that differ by a prefix.

acostumbrado—costumnado 102a; açerca—çerca 249a; allegaron—plegaron 616b; acaesció—caesció 700b; assý—sí 735d; atrevió—trovo 900a.

ensennado—senado 183b, enfermería—fermería 245d, 292a; encampar—campar 380b.

detardemos—tardemos 425a; delibre—libre 539a; demandaua—mandaba 723d. estaua—sedié, estouo—sovo 150d, 247b, 279c, 284c, 318c, 327c, 414a, 415a, 427c, 427cII, 728c, 732d, 735b, 751b, 776a, 807c, 838d, 849d (18 cases).

fazer—fer 248c, 274d, 338d, 403b, 404a, 582d, 715d, 821a (8 cases).

<sup>14</sup> The missing quatrains are 1-73, 106-121, 154-169, 186-201, 362-377, 391, 459-474, 506-521, 618-649.

<sup>15</sup> Veintitrés Milagros, pp. 16-17.

reçibir—prender 74d, 204a, 392c, 428d, 559b, 690b.

tomó (at cesura)—priso 207a, 479d, 885a.

cada día—cutiano 220b, 387a (=388b).

palabra—vierbo, bierbo 657a, 777d.

mala querencia—malquerencia; buena q.—bien q. 378b, 821d.

reverencia—el enclín 76d; don Cristo—Cristo 93b; E declaró—Regunzó 175c; indición—dición 181b; contegió—cumtió 182d; Endereçó—Aguisó 184b; Co-mençó se—Cueitóse 214c; de lo suyo—del suyo 233d; Qujtáualis—tolliélis 239c; aumentado—adonado 280a; siella—siet 312c; con que—do 405d; acabaron—finaron 573b; Leuantó—erzió 655b;<sup>16</sup> testigos—testes 686b; enoio—tedio 704b;

seso—sen 707d; fiziessen penjtencia—se penetenciassen 708d; este—el 735a;

fizo se—fincó 743b; querido—quisto 745a; fraguada—nada 790d; dentro en un—en chico 801d; Fasta que—Hasta 816c, sin todo—e sin 822d.

Total, 79 cases

2. Wrong form of verb.—escruijó (at cesura)—escripso 182c, 353a; ujdí—vi 447a; querría (1st person)—querré 657b; podiesse—podié 741d; destruydos—destructos 785d. (6 cases)

3. Article added.—la 177c 742b; el 764c; a la otra—al otra 590b (4 cases.)

4. Object pronoun added.—la 131d; ge 364b; se 348a; lis 399a; lo 667c; me 788d; te 797b, 804d. (8 cases.)

5. Preposition added.—de 126a, 304a, 601d; a 394d, 546b, 732c; en 431d, 567c. (8 cases.)

6. Conjunction added.—e 77a, 78d, 209c, 298c, 498d, 672a, 799d, 874d; ca 333c. (9 cases.)<sup>17</sup>

7. Emphatic or other word added.—bien 221c, 407d; buen 350c; su, sus 275d, 673a, 814b; tú 693c; mj 771c. (8 cases.)

8. Apocope.—In these words final e (or Berceo's dialect i) is lacking in MS. I. Our scribe's preference for the full forms may possibly be indicated in the final quatrains (686–777) of La Vida de Santo Domingo in which MS. E (of which our A is a part) and V<sup>2</sup> share common errors and peculiarities of vocabulary, while E alone has the full forms of onde 699c, 714d, 715b; ende 702d, 736d; dende 750d; grande 708a; fuerte 733a, 739c; estonze 731c; diente 769c; ante 689a. That is, the manuscript family to which A belongs does not contain his restored apocopes.

Staaff's study of apocopated pronouns<sup>18</sup> enables us to make the following observation in regard to the Milagros: of 448 full forms (of me, te, se, le, li) and 89 apocopated forms, manuscript I has only nine that make the hemistich irregular, and of these, seven are corrected by A, one is not found in A (165a), and only one remains with no manuscript evidence against the irregularity:

<sup>16</sup> This may be the key to Loores 17b, Profeta se levantará. I do not recall a form erzdrá (or erzdré), but it is possible. Cf. iasdré (203d) and erzarse=levantarse, Fernán González 750c.

<sup>17</sup> It is not clear why E's conjunction should be retained in S. Dom. 69a e cadia fria elada in order to make a monosyllable of fria, while MSS. HV read caye f. e. Cf. Menéndez Pidal, op. cit., p. 273, Note 1.

<sup>18</sup> Erik Staaff, Étude sur Les Pronoms Abrégés en Ancien Espagnol (Uppsala, 1906).

Enfogóse en la agua (595d). Manuscript A too, while restoring the final e to nouns, adjectives, verbs, and particles, has been conservative in regard to object pronouns: against six expanded forms it has allowed forty-seven to remain apocopated in accord with the regular length of line, we must believe, however, out of orthographical rather than metrical considerations. Other than pronouns only thirteen of the short forms remain. two each of diz, faz, val, as listed below, and siquier 80a, comoquier 671d, uid 609b, and fiz 693a, 754d, 772b, 816d.

Whoever added the final vowel can hardly have had synalepha in mind. Of the 124 examples here listed only 52 (41.9 per cent) are followed by a word beginning with a vowel.

este, esti—est 103c, 105a, 134a, 134a<sub>II</sub>, 211d, 218c, 221a, 286a, 288b, 315c, 410a, 616d, 674d, 747a, 748a, 818a, 820d; esse—est 857d. (18 cases.)

-miente, -mente—ment 101b, 222a, 232d, 390a, 615d, 662b, 678c, 692b, 701b, 719c, 731c, 847a, 975b. (13 cases.)

ende—ent, end, en 90d, 128d, 175d, 303a, 332d, 381b, 408d, 422d, 617d, 815b, 858b, 896a, 908d. (13 cases.)

onde—ond, ont 330d, 350d, 387c(=388b), 415d, 441d, 580c, 737d, 828d, 888b. (9 cases.)

grande—grand 84c, 413d, 420b, 457a, 544d, 598a, 720d. (7 cases.)

gente—gent, yent 216c, 260a, 356b, 416c, 724d, 831d, 838d. (7 cases.)

-isti—ist (preterite ending) 135b, 202d, 272d, 454a, 609d, 779b. (6 cases.)

desende—desent 94d, 615d, 616a.

dize—diz 125d, 266d, 405b, 754b. But diz 92a, 909d.

dulze—dulz 173a, 234d, 298c, 879d.

estonze—estonz 243c, 294a, 431c, 502c.

fuerte—fuert 178b, 229b, 324a, 540d.

li—l 105a, 124a, 490d, 560d. But 47 apocopated forms remain.

faze—faz 310c, 323d, 352c. But faz 172c, 739c.

delante 321a, 389a; Guiralte 183a, 210b; muerte 487c, 823c; vale 325b, 861b (but val, rime, 551d, impv. 475a); deleyte 85d; elli—él 240c; englute 883c; essi—es 532b; escote 392d; fuente 867c; iaze 177b; Laurente 240b; luze 256a; puedc—puet 202b; princepe 295d; que me—quem 534c; siete 576a; semciant 321d; ueste 721d; valiente 87c; vine 729b. (124 cases.)

9. Apocope of final o.—commo—com 86a, 256c, 852b; pleyto—pleit 91d, 663c, 681c; Giraldo—Giralt 219a; todo—tod, tot 303b, 304d, 343d, 811d, 884b; cabo—cab 343c; uno de—un de 595a.

10. Elision.—de esso—desso 153d, 409d; para el—poral 260d, 482b, 552b; de onbre—domne 291a; sobre el—sobrel 357c, dar te a—darta 484d; dexas se ya—dessarsie 494d; contra el—contral 600b; Venjr me a—venir ma 767b.

11. Aphesis.—obispo—bispo 221a, 232a, 398b, 399a, 402d, 540c, 548a, 550c, etc. (30 cases in all); obispado—bispado 578d, 714b, 737b, 904b, 907b; yglesia—glesia 876d.

12. Syncope.—No examples.

13. Word Order.—150c, 232d, 354d, 855a, 867d.

Uncorrected by MS. I are 54 more hemistichs, which with the totals for groups 1–13, make for MS. A 367 octosyllabic hemistichs.

(A) Hexasyllabic Hemistichs Peculiar to MS. A.

1. Vocabulary.—dële Dios perdón—domne Dios lo perdón 103d; quanto que—todo quanto 133b; sabia—entendia 135d, bien querientes—sus connoçientes 151b; tal—atal 222b; Ca—a qui 227b; brauo—brabiello 228c; mala fama—mal testimonio 271d; traxieron—aduxieron 279d, 577a, 811c, 831b; tanta—atanta 280a; segujan—segudavan 382a; pies—piedes 386b, 738a; por—pora 447d; monge—bon omne 489a; después—dessende 493a; árbol (at cesura)—ardor 613b, siello—seiello 740c, 741d, 836b, 842c; sentado—assentado 753c; grande—grand día 790b; muy—sobra 830d (27 cases.)
2. Wrong form of verb.—vieron, ujeron—vidieron, veieron 86b, 305b, 882d; quiero—querría 75b, ujestes—uidiestes 94b; Asmó—asmando 338a; uer—ueer 215b; vidi—vidía 607c. (8 cases.)
3. Article dropped.—133e, 22Cb, 385c, 850b, 601b, 801d, 821c, 865a, 865b, 893a, 903c; del alma—de la alma 85b. (12 cases.)
4. Object pronoun dropped.—la 80c; lo 133b; li 149d, 295a, 339d; ge 174a; te 485d; 718d. (8 cases.)
6. Conjunction lost.—496a, 662b, 792d.
7. Emphatic or other monosyllable dropped.—él 175c, 211c; muy 226b; grand 351c; bien 440b, 880c; tú 728b, 798c; com 104b; end 138d; -mient 242d; sant 282b; [h]a 420d; y 654c; que 581a, 658d, 888b; Dios 896a. (18 cases.)
8. Apocope of final e.—Nol—Non li 181d; quier—quiere 671d, Sil—Si li 745d; Nol—Non lo 538a.
9. Apocope of final o.—segunt—segundo 256d, 417a.<sup>19</sup>
10. Elision.—ques—que es 139c; Fazer le—Fazer li [h]e 739d.
11. Apheresis.—spaçioso—espaçioso 436b.
12. Syncope.—bendicto—bene[d]ito (?) 76a, malditos—maleditos 217b.
13. Word Order.—Here the theory of permissible octosyllables is not applicable as it is impossible to retain the hemistich of eight syllables without accepting its companion of six. The one line in question is 150c Non se sintió de ninguna cosa embargado, in MS. I cosa ninguna. There are more similar cases in the other works of Berceo. Fitz-Gerald has allowed to stand in his critical edition S. Dom. 740d Nol debia valer a cuita nul fiador. This should read Non li debie a coita valer nul fiador. For order cf. Milagros 828c.

Adding to the 88 examples listed 23 more which are not corrected by manuscript I, we have for manuscript A 111 hemistichs of six syllables.

(A) Hemistichs of Nine Syllables Peculiar to MS. A.

Here follow seventeen hemistichs of nine syllables. They are subject to precisely the same classification as those of eight, except that several contain two kinds of irregularity. In other words, the scribe follows his system through regardless of length of line.

1. Vocabulary.—cada uno—quisque 82c, la Gloriosa—ella 102b; entendisti—tovist 230b; Don loco, mal auenturado—Don fol, malastrugado 340a; ende estouo—i sovo 350c; E este—Dest (252a); Nol apretarán tanto tenazas de fierro mas fuerte (sic)—Nol premirién tenazas de fierro tan fuertmientre 242d.

<sup>19</sup> S. Dom. 581c (all MSS.) segunt mj cu-idar should read segundo mj cuidar as in ib. 459c, where segunt is the incorrect reading of E. Cf. Menéndez Pidal, op. cit., p. 162, 15.

2. Wrong form of verb.—naçido—nado (569a).

5. Preposition added.—a (personal obj) (146b).

6. Conjunction.—E este—Dest (252a).

7. Word inserted.—Era 610b, 875d; toda 666b.

8. Apocope of e not observed.—este—est (146b), (252a), (906b), Rogóle que le—Rogól quel 232c, este—Dest (252a); sofristi muerte—sofrist muert 453b; aparte—apart (563c); reciente—rezién (569a); fuerte mente—fuermient 907c.

11. Aphesis.—obispo—bispo (563c); obispado—bispado (906b).

These cases with three more (241b, 278b, 584c), in which MS. I shares the irregularity wholly or in part, make for MS. A a total of 20 hemistichs of nine syllables (eneastílabos).

(A) Hemistichs of Five Syllables Peculiar to MS. A.

7. Dissyllabic word omitted.—otras 132b; mui 484d; sofrir 596b.

(A) Hemistichs of Ten Syllables Peculiar to MS. A.

1, 8. Vocabulary and Apocope.—Assý fizieron los príncipes que le estauan enderredor—Sf f. l. p. quel sedién derredor 735d.

(B) Hexasyllabic Hemistichs Peculiar to MS. I.

1. Vocabulary.—él—el loco 81c; fer—fazer 150d, 547c; negada—denegada 181c; tardado—detardado 343b; Miguel—Migael 353b; grandes—granadas 486b; Quien—Qui en 569c; Plógol al obispo—Era el pueblo delli 578c; Con su—E en su 687b; tales—cabdales 808c; Dizién—Clamauan 896c; mal—mala 277d.

2. Wrong form of verb.—podrie—podría (1st pers.) 449c, 704b; avie—avía (1st pers.) 759a; vieron—ujdieron 879c; serie—sería (1st pers.) 450b; ver—veer 691d.

3. Article dropped.—el 131d, 257a; los 272b; -nas (=las) 588c.

4. Object pronoun dropped.—le 534c; te 733c; me 787d; lo 901d.

6. Conjunction.—128b, 847d.

7. Emphatic or other word dropped.—él 241d; non 291b; grant 378b, 569c; su 252b, 795b; tu 524a; ende 807b.

8. Apocope.—Primiól—primiólo 242b; nil—njin lo 286d; Prisol—priso li 356c; Plógol—plogo li 577c; est—este 616d; gent—gente 828d.

9. Apocope of o.—Quand—quando 439a.

10. Elision.—Desta—de esta 424d.

11. Aphesis.—bispo—obispo 711b.

12. Syncope.—bendicho—benedicho 485c; Endrezar—enderezar 288d.

13. Word order.—bon omne—omne bueno 283a; Quísolis don Cristo grant miraclo demostrar—Qjsolis grant mjráglo d. C. d. 441c.

Total, 50 hemistichs.

(B) Octosyllabic Hemistichs Peculiar to MS. I.

1. Vocabulary.—podrie (1st pers.), Sennora—podría, Madre 545c; E vido—Cuydó 684d; a un—el 758b; postremería—postremera 794c; enfermería—fermería 811d; Migael—Migel 317a.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>20</sup> It is better, however, to read Sant Migael de (la) Tumba, cf. 433a.

2. Wrong form of verb.—sentía—sentí 488c; si non, serie—que sería (1st pers.) 450c.
  3. Article added.—la 102c, 224a, 234d, 504b, 768a, 852c, el 337a, 604c, 801c, un 285b.
  4. Object pronoun added.—lis 239c; se 595a.
  5. Preposition added.—de 326c; a 861b, 880c.
  6. Conjunction.—678c, 792d, 801c, 881a.
  7. Emphatic word added.—bien 96b; grant 741a.
  8. A pocope.—Acorrióli—Acorriól 88a; Viólo—Viól 243a; no lo—nol 489c; Quiquiere—quiquier 557c; Díssoli—Díxol 736a; Siquiere—siquier 817c.
  10. Elided vowel supplied.—ante el—antel 223a, 757b; Sobre el—sobrel 893c; poca de ora—poca ora 734a; de esto—desto 776c.
  12. Syncopated vowel restored.—miraculo 131b; Benedicha 458b.
  13. Word order.—misme çibdat (at cesura)—çidat mjsma 306a; see under hexasyllables for 441c; laudada seer (at cesura)—seer laudada 542d; No li querrá toller por fuerça lo que toviere—N. l. q. por fuerça quitar (toller) l. q. t. 868c.
- Total, 46 hemistichs.

(B) Hemistichs of Nine Syllables Peculiar to MS. I.

1. Vocabulary.—tan mala—tal 250c.
7. Word added.—toda 492d.

(B) Hemistichs of Five Syllables Peculiar to MS. I.

1. dictador—enterpretador 866b.

In the next three groups (C, D, E) there is no direct manuscript evidence against the irregularity, the authenticity of which must therefore stand or fall according to the evidence of parallel passages or to the relative conformity of the irregular lines with such laws of prosody as we can infer from the poet's usage. Our task is aided by the frequent repetitions in this class of verse.

Lang has set down<sup>21</sup> as authentic octosyllables in Santo Domingo eighty-three hemistichs that Fitz-Gerald had corrected in the introduction of his critical edition. In only one case, that of the syllabic value of Maria (57a), does he discuss the validity of these corrections. That cannot be done in detail here; however, it must be noted that twelve of these octosyllables contain este and four obispo. These are surely doubtful. Equally doubtful (as the work of the poet) are those hemistichs that are repeated in a perfect form elsewhere, e.g., S. Dom. 685b, tollið se li de los oios occurs as t. s. l. de oios in S. Dom. 725b, Milag. 63b, 489d; and compare S. Dom. 244b, Tolliéronseme doios. In this expression, as often, the use or omission of the article follows the requirements of regular versification: cf. S. Dom. 624c, Tuelle de los mis oios, and Milag. 490c de los oios toller. Elsewhere<sup>22</sup> Lang tells us why such corrections are not permissible. Quoting Apolonio 5c, ouo en este comedio with other long hemistichs, he remarks (perhaps in view of ibid. 197a, fue en este comedio)<sup>23</sup> that "more than one of the cases in question may doubtless be reduced by correction or other critical devices, but the application of this procedure will in its turn reduce many heptasyllables to shorter forms." This, if applied to Berceo's lines, is to miss completely the poet's system of double prosodic values, a system not only governing his use of apocope, elision, dieresis, etc., but of much wider application. It extends to the choice of vocabulary and to what one might call padding. May I give a few common examples without references?

<sup>21</sup> Op. cit., pp. 591–592.—This list contains five hemistichs of nine syllables: 44c, quando fue evangelistero; 442c, fuerte miente escarmentados; 771b, meti en nuestros coraçoñes; 35d, 527b, leuaronlo a la iglesia; unless in these alone Professor Lang allows synalepha, in which case the last example is heptasyllabic.

Fer—fazer, omne—el omne, bon omne—omne bono, Cristo—don Cristo—Jesu Cristo—nuestro sennor don Cristo (S. Dom. 31a), Oria—don Oria, at cesura Sancto Sp̄ritu—Sp̄ritu Sancto, maguer—maguer que, tal—atal, el—elli, desguisado—desaguisado, gradir—gradescer, ofrir—ofreçer, etc.

Here are a few passages that reveal in short compass this principle of double values. The list might be extended. It must be conceded that the poet missed excellent opportunities to "vary the monotony of his lines."

Que tolliese dest omne este tan grant dolor, S. Dom. 409c.
 Perdieron tod esfuerzo e todo so sentido, S. Mill. 451c.
Ende salió el démon, mas fue ent mal repiso, S. Dom. 62d.
Siquiera a la madre, siquier a las sorores, S. Oria 146b.
 Esto cómo cuntiera, com non eran çerteios, Milag. 104b.
Diste conseio malo, matest al mi romero, ibid., 202d.
 Non cates al mi mérito, mas cata tu bondat, ibid., 903d.
 Vistié a los desnudos, apacié los famnientos, ibid., 708a.
 Tantas son sus merçedes, tantas sus caridades,
 Tantas las sus virtudes, tantas las sus vondades, ibid., 614ab.

Staaff's treatise reveals the principle at work in the poet's use of pronouns. The syllabic and non-syllabic forms are used with few exceptions in conformity to regular verse. This enables Staaff to make in the Milagros fifteen corrections that have been substantiated by new manuscript evidence from A. In thirteen cases the new manuscript brings no new evidence and in only five has Staaff gone astray.<sup>24</sup>

Sometimes there is more than enough evidence to disprove an irregularity but not enough to restore the original reading. In view of S. Dom.

<sup>22</sup> "Contributions to the Restoration of the Poema del Cid," Rev. Hisp. LXVI (1926), 14.

<sup>23</sup> Against S. Dom. 80d, ouo en este comedio are S. Mill. 144a, demás en est c., ibid. 395a, Didlis en est c., Milag. 161c, Cuntiol en est c.

<sup>24</sup> 181c, 202a, 233c, 242b, 695a.

250b, meterlo a la pella, Hanssen corrected Milag. 256c to read que traen a [la] pella, which seems probable, even considering 86a la traen com a pella. Fortunately MS. A, como a pella, decides the case. Marden, who allowed synalepha of like vowels between hemistichs in the Poema de Fernán González,<sup>25</sup> might have accepted as regular Milag. 337a, Yendo por la carrera a complir el so depuerto. Hanssen omits a as Berceo frequently does between ir and the infinitive. MS. A again decides by reading complir su. Selecting for correction the most difficult passages of the Milagros, Hanssen fails in eight,<sup>26</sup> succeeds in fourteen, and in fourteen more A adds no new evidence.

In the cases that follow the attempt has been made to gather the evidence rather than to offer definitive corrections. In most cases, however, the evidence is quite sufficient to discredit the irregularity. The reader will see by weighing individual cases that the concurrence of two manuscripts does not necessarily establish a reading. In the list below credit is given to Hanssen and Staaff by the letters H and S.

(C) Hemistichs Octosyllabic in Both MSS.<sup>27</sup>

- 83c Buscando sus(o) et iuso H.
- 91a Esripto es que (el) omne, cf. 3b, 5b.
- 105c (A)pareciól a un clérigo HS, cf. Loor. 125c.
- 130b Ben(e)dicha sea ella
- 138a Quand(o) ovo la Gloriosa, cf. S. Mill. 79b, 156a.
- 151a End(e) al día terzero
- 185a Quand(o) a essir obieron, or (a).
- 228b Apareciól al (o)bispo S, cf. 221a.
- 231c hasta (e)l trenteno día, cf. 575c, S. Dom. 514d.
- 262d Beati immaculati, Berceo's Latin phrases sometimes show metrical anomalies, cf. 221c, S. Laur. 46d.
- 277c (La) boca por que essié, or esse H.
- 325d io al (o)bispo don Tello.
- 335b Moviól(o) la ley del siglo S.
- 339d Com(o) qui sannosamientre S, cf. 777d, 210c.
- 351b Por qui fizo est(e) omne
- 378d En buscarli muert(e) mala, cf. 453b, 447a, 487c, 823c.
- 385b com(o) el de San Marzal, cf. 852b, S. Dom. 228c.
- 387b ant(e) fuera a prender, cf. S. Mill. 69b.
- 400c (la) eglesia quebrantar, cf. 410d.
- 401a quand(o) fueron maestrados.

<sup>25</sup> Poema de Fernán González, Texto Crítico por C. C. Marden, Baltimore, 1904. Synalepha between hemistichs: 26d, 43c, 68a, 164b, 233b, 242b, 281a, 241d, 360a, 410c, 424a, 471b, 535b, 558a, 558d, 578c, 623c, 650c, 667d, 740a.

<sup>26</sup> 233c, 250c, 256c, 337a, 378b, 571a, 741a, 801c.

<sup>27</sup> 584c is of nine syllables in MS. A, 797d is nondescript in MS. I.

- 452d Podriélo en (la) eglesia, cf. a eglesia 102cA 560b Fo poia l(a) abadessa H.
 551d Io a Dios me (a)comiendo, cf. 671a
 562d echadas dest(i) logar
 571a Touose en la duenna el (o)bispo por errado.
 574c Quand(o) quiso despedirse.
 575d Desend(e) él pensarié.
 584c Tan grand es cias com(o) eri, cf. S. Mill. 464b, 260d.
 584d en calient(e) e en frío, cf. 473a, or (en).
 595d Enfogós(e) en la agua S.
 (675b Con grafios, con guizquios, A reads ezquinos, perhaps *guizquinos based on guizque.)
 680a Reptával(o) la aliama S.
 597d a Dios e (a) la Gloriosa, cf. 159c.
 743c Pero Dios se lo quiso, no por poder del peccado, "no entiendo la frase" H.
 793c Predicó (el) Evangelio, cf. Sacr. 51c, Loor. 177a, S. Mill. 157c.
 797d No lo podrie (1st pers.) traer, A podría, read nol podría.
 845b Este non iaz(e) en dubda, cf. 31b.
 848b que en (la) eglesia era, or (e)glesia.
 869b sennor d(e) Estremadura.
 881b Ca en cosas de (e)glesia, or d(e) eglesia 886c marido de Teodora. I have nothing to offer.
 889b Entraron en la (e)glesia, cf. 876b.
 905a Por del (o)bispo de Avila.
 Total, 42 cases.

(C) Hemistichs Hexasyllabic in Both MSS.<sup>28</sup>

- 181b [E] es plena de gracia, or Plena de gracia es, cf. 792a.
 221c Salve Sancta Parena, cf. note on 262d.
 256c que traíen [com] a pella, cf. 86a.
 260b Quitósse de la alma [la] que tenié ligada, H tenía (3 syl.), Menéndez
Pidal tenie (3 syl.), cf. 865bA, 276c, 335a, Sacr. 209b, 262d.<sup>29</sup> 315a Dios [el] nuestro sennor S, cf. 244a, 257aA, 842d.
 355a Venié [hy] un iudezno, cf. S. Mill. 218a, S. Dom. 295a.
 355d Avién con el[li] todos, cf. 371d.
 357b el ninno iudezno, read ninnuelo 363a.
 378b avian mal querencia, A avjan grant mala q., read a. g. mal querencia, cf. 573c, 821d, Juan Ruiz 417d.
 393d Sin ti d[e] esta fiebre, cf. 424dA.
 434d De San Miguel era, read Migael.
 445c E por Sant Miguel, read Migael.
 445d Es esti miraclo bien que lo escrivamos, A Esti tal miraglo bien es que, read Esti miraclo es bien que.

<sup>28</sup> In A the following are of eight syllables: 256c, 378b, 896a.<sup>29</sup> F. Hanssen, Gramática Histórica (Halle, 1913), §234.

- 454d El miraclo vieio, read Esti m., cf. 907c, 735a, var.
 458c Tu seas ben[e]dicho.
 459c dar en est[i] conviento.
 460d Bien te lo cuidaba, read cuidaría.
 738a a tos pie[de]s caer, cf. 386b, 756c, 764a.
 798c Quequier[e] que tú mandes.
 832b Prender pan ben[ed]lito.
 842d Dios [el] nuestro sennor
 851b E era grant mérito, A Era de g. m., read E era de g. m.
 868a Read Bien creo que qui esti miraclo [bien] oiere, or Bien creo est(i) miraclo que el que lo oiere, but(?).
 896a End a pocos días, A Ende a p. de d., read Ende a. p. d.
 907c El miraclo nuevo, read esti m. n., cf. 735a var.
 Total, 25 cases.

(C) Hemistichs of Nine Syllables

- 184b Al apostol(o) d(e) Espanna, A apostol.
 241b Fo a los purgatorios do merecié (seer) levado H.
 278b A cogieronse de y ayna, I cojieron ssada hina, read most naturally cogieronse d'ahina, but I have not found "de ahina" elsewhere, cf. "de prisa."
 560a onde estava asentado, A posado, read ond e. p.

(D) Irregular Hemistichs in those parts of MS. I that have been lost from A.
Octosyllables

- 36b pora darnos (la) entrada—por(a) H.
 53c que par(i)rie a Messia S—(a) H.
 117d estava con (grand) querella H, or sedié.
 155a los manzebos (más) livianos H.
 157b (Ca) ellos non querién ir H.
 158b Fue en buenos e (en) malos, cf. 159c.
 200a Recudiól(i) un diablo S.
 370d Methieron est(i) miraclo.
 373a facién(li) mala ofrenda (?).
 473a Entrant(e) de la iglesia, cf. 352d, 416a.
 513d Ca sabia que otro día seria porfazada, Ca sabia otro día que seria porfazada H.
 629d Quando xx. quando xxx., read perhaps veynt S. Dom. 457c, S. Mill. 124a.
 627a Demandól có(m)o andava S.
 649a Levól(o) a la eglesia.
 (668a Sennor, quand(o) [al] non puedo.)
 (724a Cuidávanse los omnes que con seso quebrava, perhaps Cuidávanse los omnes con seso que obrava.)

Total, 14 cases.

Hexasyllables

- 23d ruela noch[e] e día.

- 32a La ben[e]dicha Virgen.
 56a Tiempo de qual[a]esma, or la q., or El tiempo.
 112a Yssiéli por [la] boca S.
 116a D[e] un clérigo otro, cf. 431a
 121c El ve[c]r, el oír.
 156a Díssol[i] Jesu Cristo S.
 192d Que [la] tu carne misma, or meisma, cf. S. Dom. 227b, 78aE, Milag. 694b.
 201d Iago, se[e]r villano.
 364d De [a]tan fiera queja, cf. S. Mill. 66ab.
 365c estorció bien [e] gent, cf. 402d.
 506d Vivién segund[o] regla, cf. S. Mill. 462b.
 512a Entendió el [o]bispo.
 513d See above, octosyllables.

Total, 14 cases.

Of Nine, Twelve, and Five Syllables

- 516b Non avia alguna escusa (?).
 520a Tú acorrist(i, Sennora, a) Theóphilo que era des(es)peñado II.
 62d de [la] Na[ti]vidat, Lanchetas, Solalinde.

(E) Passages in which MS. I does not follow the quarto codex.

Octosyllables

- 144d contra (la) su magestat H.
 515b La que fue para el mundo, read poral.
 518a diz(e)lo la Escripura.
 254b tan dulz(e) e tan cumplido.
 524d Ca veo que m(e) segudan S, cf. 354c.
 526b Fuent(e) de misericordia, cf. 35a, 126d, 867c.
 527d Que tod(o) el mundo fable, cf. 543d.
 528d f(aç)er edificación.

Leaving aside all corrections, what do we find is the condition of the manuscripts as regards irregularity? In manuscript A there are 709 quatrains (coplas) of the Milagros, one of them (866) of five verses. We then obtain from the above data these totals: of seven syllables, 5172 hemistichs; of eight, 367; of six, 111; of nine, 20; of five, 3; and of ten, 1. The total irregularity is therefore 8.84 per cent.

Our scribe's treatment of Santo Domingo is much the same. An examination of the irregular (therefore rejected) readings of manuscript E in Fitz-Gerald's edition gives the following results: of eight syllables, 259 hemistichs, of six, 78; of nine, 22; of five, 4. To these totals should be added those irregularities that the editor has incorporated into his text and corrected in the introduction:<sup>30</sup> 81 octosyllables, 12 hexasyllables, and 5 of nine syllables. To this must be added a certain number of readings in the edition which cannot be maintained as correct in view of our growing knowledge of Berceo's prosody, viz., 20 octosyllables,<sup>31</sup> 21 hexasyllables,<sup>32</sup> 14 of which secure a regular length by reading the imperfect ending ia as dissyllabic, and one of nine syllables (57a). Resulting totals: 8, 360; 6, 111; 9, 28; 5, 4. Santo Domingo has 777 quatrains (two of them of five verses each). In manuscript E there are then 5717 regular hemistichs and an irregularity of 8.08 per cent.

<sup>30</sup> The same list in Versification, pp. 43-45, and (except sixes) in Lang's list. Cf. note 21.

In each case the different lengths of hemistich arrange themselves in descending frequency on this scale: 7,<sup>8,9,10</sup>. And this holds for MS. A of the Milagros likewise if we count only those irregular hemistichs for which a regular variant is found in I. The formula discovered by Menéndez Pidal for the Cid by counting only hemistichs of sure measure is 7,<sup>8,9,10</sup>, and for whole verses, 14,<sup>15,16,17,18</sup>. That for the Roncesvalles, by counting only verses with no conflicting vowels, is the same as we have obtained except that lengths of 4 and 13 syllables end the scale.<sup>33</sup> The formula also holds for the Roncesvalles as far as the fourth figure by including all hemistichs (except, of course, the destroyed 3b and 4b), counting syllables by hiatus, and giving either Old Spanish value to myt, vio, mio, oy, ay, fui, imperfect -ia, and orient. The total irregularity in the Roncesvalles is of course much greater, being over half.<sup>34</sup>

The figures for La Vida de Santa Oria are 7, 1536; 8, 79; 6, 19; 5, 3; 9, 2; 12, 1; irregularity 6.34 per cent. The scale remains the same for the first three lengths.

Turning to MS. I we find the same scale but a much smaller proportion of irregularity. There are 892 coplas, one (866) of five verses. Distribution: 7, 6940; 8, 100; 6, 89; 9, 6; 5, 2; 12, 1; irregularity 2.77 per cent.

That this regular departure from the standard heptasyllable is a function of scribal transmission rather than a product of poetic design may be induced from the data for El Sacrificio de la Misa, part of which we possess in a manuscript of the early fourteenth century (verses 1-250c), and for the rest (250c-297) we have only the Ibarreta copy which seems

<sup>31</sup> As follows, 69a, 73a, 73b, 83d, 201c, 204d, 206a, 217b, 219d, 245d, 443c, 511c, 683c, 685c, 714d, 740d, 762b, 765c.

<sup>32</sup> As follows, 82b, 304b, 553c, 581c, 702a, 703d; with -ia, 7a, 15c, 21b, 61c, 120d, 173a, 182d, 229c, 337c, 369d, 403a, 642b, 748a, 751d. In view of the readings of the new manuscripts it has become harder than before to claim any values for the imperfect tense (in -er and -ir verbs) in Berceo but -ia (2 syl.), -iēs, -iē (-ia, 2 syl., used only in rime), -iemos, -iedes, -iēn, in which the combination ie is always monosyllabic. The evidence also points to the total exclusion of monosyllabic -ia.

<sup>33</sup> Rev. de Fil. Esp., iv, 126-127.

<sup>34</sup> Some of the irregularities of the Roncesvalles are very questionable. E.g., 26b con grant dolor que avjée, in an a-e assonance, had better be heptasyllabic and read ave (=ha), historical present as in 11b, 14a, 30b, 86b, 100b.

in this part to be based on a lost portion of the folio. The latter shows the same order of lengths and nearly the same proportion of irregularity as we have found for the different portions of the folio; 7, 338; 8, 27; 6, 7; 9, 5; 10, 1; irregularity 10.57 per cent. But the copyist of the first part shows a very definite tendency to contraction (especially apocope) as the sixes prevail over the eights; 7, 1880; 6, 77; 8, 39; 5, 1; 9, 1; irregularity 5.91 per cent.

Manuscripts A and I have 690 quatrains in common (5520+2 hemistichs). In group C above there are 53 irregularities in which the manuscripts concur, that is, less than 1 per cent of the whole of this rather lengthy portion of the poet's work. Aside from Berceo, Henríquez Urcía states, every fourth Alexandrine [verse?] in early Spanish poetry has an irregularity.<sup>35</sup> Lang believes that in the Alixandre about one-fourth of the hemistichs preserved in manuscripts O and P are octosyllables.<sup>36</sup> In the year 1916 Marden states of the Apolonio that "at least twenty-five per cent of his verses are metrically incorrect" and in 1922, "about twenty per cent of the hemistichs of the manuscript are irregular."<sup>37</sup>

WORD ORDER

There are in Berceo's works many correct verses which show that the poet has departed widely from the normal prose word order for the purpose of bringing the cesura into the middle of the line. That is, he has at times clearly avoided hemistichs of more or less than the standard measure. These are doubly convincing, for considering the manifest scribal disregard for meter the tendency would be to restore the prose order. In the following examples the cesura is marked, the transposed member is underlined> and the irregular lengths of hemistich avoided are indicated.

Milag. 21c	Ca los evangelistas: quatro que los dictavan (9+5).
S. Dom. 358d	Temién que a fincar : avrié en la prisión (9+5).
S. Dom. 391b	Fízose a la casa: traer del confessor (9+5, or 6+9).
Milag. 812b	Los tus gémitos grandes : las tus afflicciones (6+7).
Loores 5b	Ca por Spiritu Sancto: tu virtut entendieron (6+7).
Duelo 114d	Mas non quiso castigo: prender la iudería (7+8).
Milag. 554d	No li puede en cabo: prestar nulla guarida (7+8).
S. Oria 167b	Çerca anda del cabo: Oria de la carrera (6+8).

A larger group is formed by first hemistichs in which the normal order of words would result in an octosyllabic half-line ending with an accented syllable (hemistiquio agudo): e.g., S. Dom. 593b allá que lo levassen (7 syl.) instead of prose order que lo levassen allá (8 syl.). Granted the freedom of introducing the octosyllable, these cases would point to an aversion to using the masculine verse-ending at the cesura. No such aversion is apparent. There are in the 911 coplas of the Milagros 969 masculine rime words, 26.5 per cent of the whole. Masculine endings for the first hemistich are 241 in number, almost exactly one-fourth of the rimes of this type. It seems that, either hemistich being allowed to end at random, one "acute" rime word induced three more. Each of the examples to follow is furnished with a companion in which the transposed member figures at the end of a regular hemistich thus showing its capacity to carry the rhythmic stress of a heptasyllable.

<sup>35</sup> Op. cit., p. 18.

<sup>36</sup> Rev Hisp., LXVI (1926), 14.

<sup>37</sup> C. C. Marden, Libro de Apolonio (Baltimore, 1917, and Princeton, 1922), Pt. I, p. xiv, Pt. II, p. 32.

S. Dom.	250d	Porque del sol tan cerca: sedí esta estiella
S. Dom.	234c	Mas lucí que el sol : tant era de lumnosa
Milag.	136b	Ésta es en que somos: la cabeça iornada
Milag.	537d	Como muger que es : de tal cosa librada
S. Oria	89a	Dexemos lo al todo: a la siella tornemos
Loores	74d	Sobre todo lo al : en cruz quiso morir
Milag.	261d	Del mal si non te guardas: caerás en peor
Loores	177c	De partirme del mal : nunca non ovi cura
Milag.	689c	Aún si de non dices: ferté mayor mercado
Milag.	224d	Si dissiese que non : dizría falsedat
Sacrif.	245c	Quando en cruz fue puesta: la persona honesta
Sacrif.	94d	Al que morió en cruz : por el nuestro pecado
Milag.	757c	De mí hablarán todos: mesquino pecador
Duelo	30b	Más se dolió de mí : que non de su laçerio
S. Dom.	476b	Padre, yo a ti vengo: por salut demandar
Milag.	729b	Por esso vin a ti : por seguir tu mandado
S. Dom.	195b	Mártir de Dios amado: oye mi oración
Sacrif.	238b	Se non fuessen de Dios : de corazón amados
Milag.	452b	Rendieron a Dios graçias: e a Sancta María
Milag.	214a	Rendió graçias a Dios : e a Sancta María

The data presented throughout the study support the following conclusions in regard to Berceo's verse: (1) obligatory hiatus with no exceptions; (2) complete regularity of composition with no possibility of separating one type of manuscript irregularity (octosyllables) from the others as to nature or origin; and (3) irregularity in conformity with the ametric formula may on occasion be the product of scribal transmission.

H. H. ARNOLD

HONORÉ BONET: A FOURTEENTH-CENTURY
CRITIC OF CHIVALRY

BY the end of the fourteenth century the institution of chivalry seemed more brilliant than ever before. It had covered itself with glory during the long years of the struggle between France and England, numbering among its heroes such exemplars of knighthood as the Black Prince and King John of France, Sir John Chandos and Bertrand du Guesclin. During the lull that occurred in the last years of the century, monarchs and princes, freed from the galling restrictions of war, vied with one another in the great mediæval pageant, the tournament; court life under the youthful Charles VI in extravagant reaction to the bourgeois régime of Charles le Sage, was once more aristocratic and magnificent, knights rode gaily forth on expeditions against the infidels or wandered off to foreign lands to join in jousts and tourneys.

Though chivalric splendor had never been more hollow, more engrossed with outward pomp to the exclusion of all nobler duties, contemporaries were still dazzled and admiring. Thus it is interesting to note some criticisms and denunciations of chivalry coming from a keen observer of events in the last quarter of this century, a writer whose literary merits are small, but whose perspicacity does him honor. The name of Honoré Bonet is known only to specialists in the literature of the fourteenth century, although students of jurisprudence recognize him as one of the first writers on international law. In his two works in French, L'Arbre des Batailles and L'Apparicion Maistre Jehan de Meun, mingled with many discussions of the laws of war and the tribulations of the church during the Great Schism, are to be found some of the clearest evidences we have of chivalric decadence, a keen probing of faults allied with proposals for reform, which, as we know from history, went unheeded.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Born in Provence between the years 1340 and 1347, Honoré Bonet became a monk in the Benedictine order. He studied at the university in Avignon for several years, and we find him mentioned in 1382 as the prior of Salon. Three years later he became associated with the rulers of Provence, whom he served successfully in diplomatic negotiations. His first work, L'Arbre des Batailles, was perhaps composed soon after he received his degree as Doctor of Decretals, in 1386. The work was dedicated to Charles VI, who repaid Bonet with a pension and an appointment of trust. From this time on he was closely linked with the royal court and after 1393 took up his residence at Paris. In 1394 he wrote his Somnium super materia scismatis, a work of conciliation, attempting to unite Christendom without recourse to armed intervention. His last work, L'Apparicion Maistre Jehan de Meun, appeared in 1398. The last known mention of Bonet is in the year 1405, but the date of his death is unknown. His was not a life of great achievements nor did he have any marked

L'Arbre des Batailles is usually considered Bonet's most important work. It gave him a great reputation for learning and probity among his contemporaries, and is perhaps the first work on international law, according to the Belgian jurist, Ernest Nys.<sup>2</sup> It was not intended as a work for the jurists but rather as a popular treatise for the use of heralds, princes, and especially knights engaged in war. The first and second parts giving the author's interpretation of history in the light of St. John's Apocalyptic vision of the seven angels, and a summary view of Roman history based on Orosius, contain several references to the Great Schism and the rival popes, but it is only in the third and fourth parts, which constitute three-quarters of the book, that we find discussion of battles and contemporary customs, with the author's incidental remarks on chivalry.

Bonet approaches the whole subject of the chivalric code of conduct and the laws of war from a practical viewpoint. He spends no time on chivalric metaphysics, in which the knight's prowess is derived from the love and worship of his lady. His book is a working manual for the knight, whom Bonet considers a soldier almost in the Roman tradition, although most mediæval knights were anything but that. He refuses to consider chivalric gallantry and the point of honor, seeking instead a sober and reasonable basis for his decisions. The success of the work proves in striking fashion how chivalry had changed, judging from its readiness to accept an eminently practicable code without insisting on the exaggerated standard that we find in such a work as the Cent Ballades, still in the literary tradition.<sup>3</sup> Much of this was probably due to the changes in the chivalric method of warfare which were introduced by Du Guesclin. The latter was a realist in war, though in no way inferior to his contemporaries in generosity and courtesy, with the result that the French once again felt the taste of victory. His death, and the accession of Charles VI, marked the return to the former system of heroic defeats, which found its climax in Agincourt.<sup>4</sup>

Bonet's classification of brave knights is realistic, almost cynical: the love of ladies as an incentive to bravery does not fall within his category; there is instead a list of prosaic motives not to be found in the customary treatises on chivalry. First of all, a knight will be "bien hardy" because he desires to win the glory of this world and have renown. Then follows influence on his time, yet it is easy to recognize in his works an honest and independent thinker. Cf. Ivor Arnold, L'Apparicion Maistre Jehan de Meun, Publ. de l'Université de Strasbourg, 1926.

---

<sup>2</sup> Honoré Bonet, L'Arbre des Batailles, ed. Ernest Nys (Bruxelles-Paris, 1883), p. xxviii.

<sup>3</sup> Les Cent Ballades, Soc. des Anciens Textes Français, 1905.

<sup>4</sup> C. Oman, The Art of War in the Middle Ages (London, 1924), II, 198-199.

this statement: "Ung aultre chevalier sera hardy par paour de perdre l'honneur et le profit de son seigneur et pour paour d'estre prins s'il estoit couart." Some knights are bold because they have good armor, others because of proved weapons or long practice. A fine steed makes some knights brave (whether because of better chances of escape we do not know). There are those who work themselves up into a rage and become almost mad, while others are brave through plain ignorance, having no conception of true courage, "mais font ainsi qu'ils voient faire aux aultres plus avancez." Last in the list, but far from least: "Et si en a d'aultres qui sont hardis par convoitise de gaingner les richesses et non mie pour aultre chose."<sup>5</sup> Chivalry had already made itself famous by this phase of its activity.

What are some of the duties of these brave knights? Bonet solemnly considers whether it is the duty of a knight to attack or wait on the defense. There is no concern for the size and location of the enemy, tactics of battle are not in question, only the matter of bravery: "c'est clere chose et notoire que plus est loé ung baceler pour bien assaillir que pour bien attendre."<sup>6</sup> But Bonet invokes Aristotle to the contrary and decides that it is really "plus vertueuse" to wait on the defense: "car elle est de plus grande deliberation et plus froidement voit les perils de mort que ne fait celui qui assault, lequel en son courage a déjà prins ire par laquelle il ne peut coignoistre les perils où il se boute." However absurd such discussion might seem, French knighthood had consistently shown its belief in reckless, headlong assault, with dire results. Charles V and Du Guesclin, by daring to be unchivalric, forced their followers to wait until attacked, in order not to lose the advantage of numbers because of impetuosity. It seems as if Bonet had recognized the merits of the system and wished to give it his approval.

He next declares that it is the duty of a man to die for his lord rather than to abandon him in battle, even if he is only hired to fight. By the emphasis which he puts on this point Bonet seems to have realized what a world of difference lay between his view and the real events: in the battle of Poitiers whole battalions left the field in flight, with no intention of dying for their lord the king, present in person at the battle. A knight should be obedient to his commander:

Ung chevalier doit estre obedient à celui qui pour son seigneur est ordonné gouverneur de l'ost et si à lui n'est obedient il n'est mie bon chevalier mais est orgueilleux et outrageux.<sup>7</sup>

Infractions of discipline should be punished:

Après doit perdre le chief celui qui se part de la bataille contre le commandement

<sup>5</sup> Arbre des Batailles, p. 79.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., p. 78.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., p. 80.

de son seigneur siccome sont aucuns qui veulent faire hors de la bataille coups de lance ung pour ung. Pour soy moustrer bien hardy si laissent leur bataille et mal font . . .<sup>8</sup>

The same penalty is due the knight who stirs up dissension or quarrels in the army, which frequently happens in time of war, according to Bonet. In all these discussions may be seen his desire for more discipline, more order; he realized that there was such a thing as duty to the army as a whole, quite incompatible with the ordinary knight's thirst for self-display and individual valor.

In Bonet's opinion, the knights' neglect of their duties may be linked with the rapid growth of trickery and falsehood, which are destroying all feelings of trust and confidence. Safe conducts have become as subtle as legal documents, and have to be phrased in exactly the right way, or the person is liable to be held prisoner, "car trop plus leur plaist de trouver faulte en ung ou plusieurs saulfsconduits que de y trouver plaine assurance."<sup>9</sup>

The period of fair and open dealing seems to be passing:

par especial au temps de maintenant auquel nous voions tant de barat et tant de subtilitez trouver pour decepvoir et tromper l'ung l'autre. Aussi les gens ne ont aujourd'huy honte ne vergongne de mentir ne rompre leur foy. Et si est venu le monde en tel estat car ce que les droitz apellent traison on le nomme presentement subtilité et cautele, dont la foy viendra à neant, car l'ung n' aura quelque fiance en l'autre.<sup>10</sup>

The author is particularly indignant over the question of ransom. He pleads first of all for ordinary mercy and courtesy between Christians. If the captor will not allow his prisoner to go free, let him ask a reasonable ransom, one that the prisoner can pay well within his means, and not disinherit his wife and his children, his relatives and friends.

Et s'il fait aultrement il n'est pas gentil homme ainçois est tirant et non courtois. Mais nostre seigneur Dieu voit très bien comment les gens d'armes font le contraire; car sans pitié ne miséricorde ils prennent et font payer aux prisonniers grandes et excessives finances et raenchons et par especial aux povres gaigneurs qui labourent les terres et les vignes lesquels après Dieu donnent à vivre de leur labeur à tout le monde. Et en vérité j'ay grande douleur au cuer de voir et ouyr le grant martire que ils font sans pitié ne merchy aux povres labourers et aultres gens qui ne savent ne mal dire ne mal penser. . . . Et nul d'eux n'en a cure.<sup>11</sup>

Bonet is one of the first to argue for the rights of non-combatants, bitterly denouncing the inconsistency between chivalric ideals and con-

<sup>8</sup> Ibid., p. 98.

<sup>9</sup> Ibid., p. 158.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., p. 213.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., pp. 139-140.

temporary reality. Why, he asks, if France makes war on England, should the poor peasants and shepherds be molested? They take no active part any more than priests or hermits. According to the standard of honor of the age, what fame can one have in killing or imprisoning someone who never wore armor, who did not even know how to put on a coat of mail or close the visor of a helmet?

Que je voulsisse jugier que ce fust honneur ou vaillance de feir ung tel povre homme et innocent qui ne scet fors mengier du pain sec aupres de ses brebis par les champs et par les hayes et buissons, je ne pourroie faire par nulle raison.<sup>12</sup>

He denounces chivalry for its part in such sordid affairs and marks its decadence. Although the tilling of the soil is by its very nature a reason for immunity,

Dieu scet très bien comment les gens d'armes le gardent aujourd'huy et par ma foy, c'est moult mal fait. . . . A Dieu plaise de mettre es cuers des rois de ordonner comment en toutes guerres les povres laboureurs soient seurement et tenus paisibles, car aujourd'huy toutes les guerres sont contre les povres gens laboureurs, contre les biens et meubles qu'ils ont. Pourquoi je ne l'appelle pas guerre mais très bien me semble estre pilleries et roberie. Aussi ce n'est pas la manière de guerroyer selon l'ordonnance de deue chevalerie ne de l'ancienne coustume des nobles batailleurs lesquels soustenoient justice, dames veves, enfans orphelins et povres gens. Et aujourd'huy partout ils font le contraire. Et qui ne scet partout bouter les feus, rober les eglises, occuper leur droit et emprisonner les prestres, il n'est pas souffisant pour mener guerre. Et pour ce les chevaliers de maintenant n'ont pas la gloire et le los des anciens bachelers jadis regnans ne ja leur faits ne devoient venir à grant perfection de vertu.<sup>13</sup>

It is notable that many of the mediæval clergy had a much truer sympathy and regard for the sufferings of the oppressed peasants than their more cultured successors in the Renaissance and seventeenth century.

In the last pages of the work, the author explains the delinquencies of contemporary knighthood as due to its changed way of living. Not only the virtues of the knights of old had disappeared but their splendid physique as well. In Bonet's opinion, the perfect knight should not be nourished too delicately, car ainsi il ne vault guaires à la guerre por laquelle nous disons que la chevalerie du jourd'huy n'est mie de la proues se qu'elle fut du temps passé, car selon les loix anciennes les chevaliers mangoient feves et lard de porc et viandes grosses. Ils gesoient dur et portoient le harnois le plus du temps. Aussi ils demouroient au dehors des citez et goustoient l'air de la champaigne. . . . Si ne disputoient pas de coustume des vins lequel estoit le meilleur, ainçois beuvoient de l'eau clere pource que toute paine et travail sceussent endurer.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., p. 141.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., pp. 210-211.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., p. 255.

This is not sermonizing on the part of Bonet: the whole temper of chivalry had changed, the knights were losing their warlike skill and letting mercenaries do more and more of the actual fighting. The weakness of chivalry is brought out clearly in his other work.

L'Apparicion Maistre Jehan de Meun was written in 1398, while the discussion of the crushing defeat suffered by the Christians at Nicopolis<sup>15</sup> was still rife. Bonet at this time was in Paris, living at the maison de la Tournelle, the former residence of Jean de Meun, which the latter had bequeathed to the Dominican Order. This certainly must have prompted the idea of Bonet's work, which was to have the great critic and satirist of a former age appear to encourage the discussion of later faults. Sheltering himself, then, under the fame and popularity of Jean de Meun, Bonet begins his satire, making use of one of the trite mediæval forms, the dream, as a basis for his work, which is composed of a quantity of distinctly mediocre verses with a few passages of excellent prose.

The scene is laid in the maison de la Tournelle mentioned above; Bonet has just retired to the garden after dining and has fallen asleep. In a dream there appears to him "un grant clerc bien fourré de menu ver," Master Jean de Meun, who reproaches the author for not having protested against the evils which are destroying France and Christendom itself. After a feeble attempt at defense, Bonet is startled by the appearance of four new figures. One is a doctor, another a Jew, the third a Saracen, and the last a Jacobin. Called upon by Jean de Meun to explain their presence, the doctor and the Jew defend their positions at length. Then the Saracen, the most important of the four, takes up the discussion. He has been sent by the Sultan to study the Christian nations, their governments and their methods of warfare, and especially the customs of the French, "Car les François sont entre nous, Sus tous crestiens nommés plus prou, plus fiers, en armes plus vaillants."<sup>16</sup> Jean de Meun begs the Saracen to tell what he has learned about French customs, whereupon the Saracen begins his story, telling of his trip from the Orient and his arrival at Rome.

There the Saracen learns of the Great Schism. This discord among Christians amazes him, and gives him encouragement as well, for the Mohammedans, united in their faith, have no such weakness. However, the Saracens never really fear these Christian knights, "Entre nous estes pou doubtez," and this is why:

<sup>15</sup> The battle of Nicopolis (1396), between the Burgundians and their Hungarian allies on the one side, and the troops of the Sultan Bajazet on the other, was a great disaster for the Christians. It demonstrated the improved military skill of the Turks, and made the name of the Janissaries known to western Europe.

<sup>16</sup> L'Apparicion Maistre Jehan de Meun, Publ. de l'Université de Strasbourg (1926), vv. 315 ff.

Vous estes gent, car apris l'ay,
 Qui vivés dilicieusement;
 Se vous n'avez pain de froment,
 Char de mouton, beuf et pourcel,
 Perdriz, poucins, chappons, chevrel,
 Canars, faysans, et connins gras,
 Et que demain ne faillist pas
 Habondance plus qu'aujourd'huy
 Vous estes venus a l'annuy;
 Et se vo lit mol blanc n'avez
 Pour une nuyt, estes foulez;
 Chemise blanche sur le corps,
 Ou autrement vous estes mors,
 Et se bon vins n'avez en teste
 Pour non riens est toute la feste
 Mais nous Sarrazins tout envers,
 Com scet monseigneur de Nevers.<sup>17</sup>

The allusion to monseigneur de Nevers helps to explain the preceding lines. Jean, count of Nevers, later the notorious Jean sans Peur of Burgundy, was the leader of the Nicopolis expedition and one of the few captives spared. The captivity was not at all cruel or extreme, yet the knights suffered greatly: accustomed to the service of squires and pages, as well as fine living in general, they could not stomach the coarse cookery of the Turks, and many of them contracted serious maladies. Bajazet later took pity on the count of Nevers and gave him better food.<sup>18</sup> A tragic ending indeed for those who set out so boastfully on the expedition! This was one of the faults of later-day chivalry: its fighting men were not trained as soldiers and could not live a soldier's life.

The Saracen points out the contrasting life of the Moslem warrior: clear water and a little bread is a large meal for a Saracen, and he has no thought of finewine or the meat which is in season; and when it comes to sleeping, he does not bother to undress, nor does he seek out hay to lie on, but simply picks firm ground. He cares nothing for fine cooking, roasts or warm pies; such things render a man delicate, so that he cannot stand hunger or cold and if he sleeps in the open, he loses his strength and health.<sup>19</sup> He tells the French to consider the ways of their forefathers, which were true and sound.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., vv. 421 ff.

<sup>18</sup> D. Le Roux, La France en Orient au quatorzième siècle (Paris, 1886), I, 287 ff.

<sup>19</sup> Apparicion, vv. 437 ff.

Ne vouloyent fussent pansart;
 Ceulx leur donnoient fevez et lart
 Et l'eaue pure, lit de paille,
 Couchier avec cote de maille,
 Demourance hors des cités
 Pour estre des champs plus privés
 Et fussent tousjours ordonné
 Et prestz, quand seioient mandé.<sup>20</sup>

And yet, continues the Saracen, these French think that by bathing, by soft living, by pleasure seeking, by worrying constantly about food, that one becomes a brave knight, a doughty squire, or a strong henchman. He scornfully quotes Valerius Maximus regarding the virtues of Cato the Elder, a "chevalier saige, grant et bon," who never was fastidious about his diet or his garb. He never wanted pastry or cake to satisfy his hunger, nor did he care what color the cloth of his garments happened to be, provided the material was warm. Like a true soldier, "Oncques mauvais pain ne blasma, Ne bevrage ne refusa": this is the best regimen of the knight, asserts the Saracen, who next quotes St. Bernard to the effect that rich garments only engender envy among one's neighbors and that one should endeavor to win favor by good deeds rather than by brilliant attire.<sup>21</sup>

The training of children is at fault too. The French nourish their children so daintily, they are so carefully clothed in their youth, that when they come to manhood they cannot bear heat or cold, or eat food not seasoned to their taste.<sup>22</sup> The Saracen thinks that the youngster should have plenty of good food, in order to give him strong limbs, but should not be fed on pastry and the like, for these things merely rob him of vigor; nor should he be richly clothed, but should be brought up to endure changes of temperature.

Nous disons que vous n'estes saiges
 Quant vous voulés faire passaiges
 Contre Sarrazins ou paiens,
 Quant prenez ainsy tendres gens
 Ne regardés se ilz pourront
 Porter les grans maulx qu'ilz auront
 En chevauchier tant longue voye,
 Qui les plus forts souvent ennoye;
 Mais que le partir soit joly,
 Vous ne regardés la fin.<sup>23</sup>

<sup>20</sup> Ibid, vv. 459 ff. Cf. Arbre des Batailles, p. 255.

<sup>21</sup> St. Bernard, De laudibus novae militiae. Cf. E. Prestage, Chivalry (London, 1928), p. 48.

<sup>22</sup> Apparicion, vv. 482 ff.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., vv. 507 ff.

The last two verses refer plainly to the magnificent display of wealth shown in the Nicopolis expedition. Everything was aglitter with gold and silver; the Burgundian arms, embroidered in gold, covered the pennons and banners, while the very weapons were specially embossed. The tents were of satin, green satin being the prevailing hue, and furnished elaborately. Each knight vied with his neighbor in displaying his splendid attire. It was more like a pleasure excursion than a crusade against the Turks.<sup>24</sup>

Pour ce meurent ilz en la voye,
 Ou font a leurs annemis joye;
 Et quant ce vient a la bataille
 Leurs coups sont legeres, sans faille:
 A trois coups ferir force fault,
 Et sont perduz par ce deffault.
 D'une autre chose vous dy tant
 Que vous vous armez trop pesant,
 Tant que quant estes tout armez,
 En pou d'eure estes foulez . . .
 Et se un homme d'armes chiet,
 A tart relevera son chief,
 Et plusieurs meurent estouffez
 Des vostres, car trop sont armez.<sup>25</sup>

Here Bonet has hit upon one of the capital faults of the knight's equipment. The armor was so heavy that it wearied to exhaustion all but the very strong. In fact, few knights wore their armor while riding about on expeditions, as the strain would have been too great; the squire was always at hand to arm them quickly and surely. In a long battle many fainted from the oppressive weight and heat of these iron prisons. If they were on foot and tried to hurry, woe betide them, for once fallen, they had to be helped up. The light-armed Saracens had all the advantages of speed and consummate horsemanship, which frequently enabled them to hold their own, though they were no match for the heavy masses of feudal cavalry in a pitched battle.

At this point the Saracen introduces a fresh argument, in the form of a query, one that contained sound truth but which had little appeal for chivalry, whose pride could not brook the proposal. Whenever the French make war on the Saracens, he says, they leave behind the peasants, who do not know what comfort means, to tend the vineyards and fields, strong men who could live better on cheese than nobles on capons, for they have never been accustomed to luxuries.

<sup>24</sup> Le Roulx, op. cit., p. 238.

<sup>25</sup> Apparicion, vv. 517 ff.

Vous tenez qu'ilz ne vauldriont rien:
 S'ilz avoient un pou coustumé
 Simple cote en leur costé
 Ilz nous feroient plus grant guerre
 Que tous les gentilz d'Angleterre,
 Mais qu'ilz eussent ordonnance
 D'un bon cappitaine de France.
 Prenez exemple de Portugal,
 Se les vilains firent le mal
 Qui n'a guerez prindrent gent d'armes
 Dont maintes dames gettent lermes . . .<sup>26</sup>

The great master of war, Vegetius, says that laborers are effective soldiers; if one will but read Valerius Maximus, he proves the same point. But the French leave in repose those who could better stand the long road, the many hardships; for, brought up as peasants, these men do not fear rough beds or coarse bread, or wind or rain or great hunger. They can stand all kinds of toils, their arms are strong enough to give great blows and their strength is lasting, for they have been accustomed to hardships; all that is necessary is to teach them to wear armor. If they are sick or wounded, they are not so weakened as are the nobles, after having endured all kinds of suffering, because they are not used to dainty food.<sup>27</sup>

Such is Bonet's argument for an army of real warriors, to replace the idolent and half-trained nobles, whose pride and arrogance were hardly compatible with military organization. Agincourt was soon to furnish a terrible lesson to French chivalry, destroying the very flower of the institution and leaving the country helpless. In this short work Bonet brings together most of the reasons for chivalric decadence: the loss of religious inspiration, the love of pomp and luxury at the expense of sufficient training for war, defects in armor, rashness and indolence. His two works together give a surprisingly clear picture of the state of chivalry as it really was at the end of the fourteenth century.

RAYMOND L. KILGOUR

Harvard University

<sup>26</sup> This refers to the battle of Aljubarota (1385), in which the Portuguese peasants, who had risen en masse, fought with great bravery and success.

<sup>27</sup> Apparicion, vv. 543 ff.

XXIII

"THE QUESTION OF HALSAM"

IN British Museum Addit. MS. 34360 on folio 22 occurs one stanza of rime royal entitled "The question of halsam." It is smooth in meter, well-balanced in thought, and practically perfect in stanza form, comparing very favorably in these respects with other minor lyrics of the early fifteenth century. The popularity of this poem is attested by its presence in many manuscripts of that century and by the fact that Caxton printed it together with a second seven-line stanza also ascribed to Halsham.<sup>1</sup> Both of these lyrics are found in Bodley 3896, f. 195a (MS. Fairfax 16), which affords not only the earliest,<sup>2</sup> but the most authentic text of these pieces:

The worlde so wide / thaire so remuable
 The sely man / so litel of stature
 The grove and grounde / of<sup>3</sup> clothinge so mutable
 The fire so hoote / and subtil of nature
 The water neuer in oon / what creature
 That made is of these foure / thus flyttyng
 May stedfast be as here / in his lyving

The more I goo / the ferther I am behinde
 The ferther behinde / the ner my wayes ende
 The more I seche / þe worse kan I fynde
 The lighter leve / the lother for to wende
 The bet y serve / the more al out of mynde<sup>4</sup>
 Is thys ffortune not I / or infortune
 Though I go lowse / tyed am I with a Lune

The first lyric or stanza occurs alone in Brit. Mus. Addit. 34360, f. 22a, and with the second in five manuscripts:<sup>5</sup> Bodley 3896, f. 195a;

<sup>1</sup> Dr. E. Flügel, "Kleinere Mitteilungen aus Handschriften," Anglia, xiv, 463, n. Flügel also states that these two "balades" as they are called in one manuscript, were adapted under Henry VIII as "dreistimmige lieder."

<sup>2</sup> Professor Carleton Brown in his Register of Middle English Religious and Didactic Verse, I, 48, places this manuscript in the first half of the fifteenth century.

<sup>3</sup> The manuscript reads and for of, evidently a scribal error, since four out of the six MSS. use of. I understand the line to mean "The grove (trees in general) and the ground so changeable in their clothing."

<sup>4</sup> To make the rime scheme of the stanza accurate, mynde should rime with wende, not with fynde. All versions now read mynde, but it is possible that the archetype showed Kentish influence. If so, mende would be used and the rime would be correct. In the poems of the Kentish Gower the spellings mende and mynde are both found. See glossary of The Works of John Gower (English), edited by G. C. Macaulay.

<sup>5</sup> Brown, Carleton, op. cit., II, 336-337, no. 2252.

Addit. MS. 16165, f. 244a; the Harleian MSS. 7333, f. 148a and 7578, f. 20a; and Huth 7, f. 144. No variation save in dialect is found with the exception of one obviously corrupt line in Harley 7578.

The second lyric, found by itself in Camb. Un. Ff. 1.6, f. 151a and Addit. 5465, f. 2b, and combined with the first as listed above,<sup>6</sup> shows more variation. In some manuscripts lines are lost or transposed.<sup>7</sup> When the various readings of the last two lines are compared, the authenticity of the Fairfax text is established, for the end-words infortune and Lune, which occur only in the Fairfax manuscript, preserve perfectly the concluding cc rime. The word Lune is entered in the Oxford Dictionary with the definition leash for a hawk.<sup>8</sup> The first example cited is from Malory's Arthur vi, xvi. The appearance of lune in the lyric thus supplies an earlier use of this word than any previously recorded. Lune is a variant of loyn,<sup>9</sup> and several later scribes used this more common spelling, thereby doing violence to the rime. In Addit. 16165 and the two Harley manuscripts, 7333 and 7578, all of the middle of the fifteenth century,<sup>10</sup> the spelling is loyne, loygne, and loynne, respectively. The scribe of Camb. Un. Ff., evidently not familiar with the word, has changed it to lyne. This form is also used in Huth (1460-70)<sup>11</sup> and in Addit. 5465 (early sixteenth century).<sup>12</sup> Further deviation from the original may be seen in the changes in order made in the last two manuscripts. Huth reads:<sup>13</sup>

Though I goo loose I am teyde with a lyne
Is hit / fortune or Infortune thus I fynde./

Since the original riming word Lune was now lost, the puzzled Huth scribe, or perhaps some earlier scribe whom he followed, tried to find a rime or at least assonance by juggling the order. These futile efforts only serve to emphasize the superiority of the Fairfax text (Bodley 3896), which I have printed in full above, as our closest approximation of the archetype.

The intrinsic excellence of "The worlde so wide" and of "The more I

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., II, 331, no. 2212.

<sup>7</sup> Transcripts of the lyrics in Bodley 3896, Addit. MSS. 16165, 34360, and 5465, and Harley 7578 were made for me by Miss E. G. Parker of Oxford and Miss Edith S. Scroggs of London. I have a rotograph of the Cambridge University text. The Harley 7333 version is given by Flugel in Anglia, xiv, 463, n., as well as by Wright and Halliwell in Reliquiae Antiquae, I, 234. The Huth text as transcribed by Furnivall may be found in Notes and Queries, Fifth Series, ix, 342-343. <sup>8</sup> Oxford Dictionary, Lune.<sup>1</sup> <sup>9</sup> Ibid.

<sup>10</sup> Catalogue of Additions to the MSS. in the British Museum, 1846-47, pp. 155-156. Brown, Carleton, op. cit., I, 355, 356, 394. <sup>11</sup> Ibid., I, 472. <sup>12</sup> Ibid., I, 382.

<sup>13</sup> Furnivall's transcript printed in Notes and Queries, Fifth Series, ix, 342-343. Addit. 5465 gives similar lines:

"thoo I go lose yet am I teyd w<sup>t</sup> a lyne it is fortune or In fortune this I fynde."

goo" makes them worthy of consideration, but their interest is enhanced by the use which later authors made of them. For in addition to appearing alone, together, or with another stanza beginning "Wurship / wommen / wyne / vnweldy age,"<sup>14</sup> each of these lyrics serves as the opening strophe for a longer poem usually assigned to Lydgate.<sup>15</sup>

This situation raises the problem of authorship. Have we here two fragments from a long poem originally written by Lydgate, or have we two lyrics written by another author and used by Lydgate? That the latter is the right solution I am convinced for the following reasons. First, a long poem broken up would be likely to remain in the same combination, whereas these two stanzas appear in four ways. Secondly, Lydgate frequently borrowed. Miss Hammond calls attention to a similar use by Lydgate of Chaucer's line, "This world nys but a thurghfare ful of wo."<sup>16</sup> Finally, the concluding lines of "The more I goo" were not originally in the form Lydgate used. Instead of the rime infortune-Lune, he adopts the later version in which the rime is spoiled:

Is this fortune, or is it infortune?
Though I go loose, I tyed am withe a lyne.<sup>17</sup>

This internal evidence precludes, I believe, any further necessity for supposing that Lydgate was the author. It brings us, however, to the question: If these poems were not written by Lydgate, then by whom were they written?

In attempting to find an answer, we must return to the manuscript mentioned at the beginning of this article. Here and in two other manuscripts we find an ascription of authorship. Harley 7333 carries above the poems this heading: "Halsam squiere made thes ij balades." In Addit. 16165 they are entitled "two verses made in wyse of balade by Halsham Esquier." These two codices are believed to be Shirley's.<sup>18</sup> In no version in which more than the two stanzas are given does the name of an author appear.

Scholars in the past have either refused to accept "Halsam squiere" as the author or have made no attempt to identify him. Halliwell and Skeat, for example, in spite of Shirley's ascription of these stanzas to

<sup>14</sup> See Register of Middle English Religious and Didactic Verse, II, 399, no. 2693.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., II, 331, no. 2211. Halliwell, James Orchard, A Selection from the Minor Poems of Dan John Lydgate (Percy Society, 1840), pp. 193 ff., 74 ff. MacCracken, Henry Noble, The Minor Poems of John Lydgate, E.E.T.S., Ex. Ser., 107, xvii, xxx, no. 45, no. 153.

<sup>16</sup> Hammond, Eleanor Prescott, "Two British Museum Manuscripts (Harley 2251 and Addis. 34360): A Contribution to the Bibliography of John Lydgate," Anglia, xxviii (1905), p. 5.

<sup>17</sup> Halliwell, op. cit., p. 75.

<sup>18</sup> Flügel, op. cit., p. 463. Catalogue of Additions to the Manuscripts in the British Museum, 1846-47, pp. 155-156.

Halsham, believe that they were actually the work of Lydgate.<sup>19</sup> On the other hand, Ritson, Furnivall, Flügel, Miss Hammond, and MacCracken mention the Halsham ascription with apparent faith.<sup>20</sup> Very little argument has been presented by either side, nor has anyone thus far endeavored to find out who "Halsham" really was.

We have as foundation the three ascriptions to Halsham, two of which occur in Shirley MSS. John Shirley (1366?-1456) offers the evidence of a scribe accustomed to copying the work of Chaucer and Lydgate, and contemporary with them. Now if a "Halsham Esquier" can be found in the same period, a man living not too far from Lydgate's neighborhood, and one of apparent education and ability, Shirley's statement of his authorship will appear even more dependable. Such a man was Johannes Halsham, armiger, whose inquisition post mortem is recorded in the third year of Henry V (1415) and who died seised of lands in Sussex, Kent, Norfolk, and Wilts.<sup>21</sup>

John Halsham was the son of Robert Halsham,<sup>22</sup> commissioner of peace<sup>23</sup> and at least seven times a member of Parliament between 1351 and 1372.<sup>24</sup> Robert was also steward for life of the Honor of Bramber.<sup>25</sup> According to Elwes and Robinson,<sup>26</sup> John's mother was Joan, daughter and heir of Richard de Coombe (or Combes), who held the manor of Appelsham of John de Mowbray, lord of Bramber.<sup>27</sup> In the inquisition for Richard, held in 1350, Joan was reported as aged seventeen years and more.<sup>28</sup> One may then surmise that her son John was born somewhere in the sixth decade of the century and was probably from ten to fifteen years younger than Chaucer.

Although John Halsham spent most of his life on his lands in West Grinstead, Sussex (part of the Honor of Bramber), as a respected and increasingly prominent country squire, he passed some portion of his youth in Yorkshire. We have records of a family of de Halshams living

<sup>19</sup> Halliwell, op. cit., p. 193, note. Skeat, The Chaucer Canon (1900), p. 145.

<sup>20</sup> Ritson, Bibliographia Poetica: A Catalogue of English Poets (London, 1802), p. 57. Furnivall, Notes and Queries, Fifth Series, ix, 342-343. Flügel, op. cit., p. 463. Hammond, op. cit., p. 4. MacCracken, op. cit., p. xvii.

<sup>21</sup> Calendarium Inquisitionum post Mortem (London, 1828), iv, 13.

<sup>22</sup> Elwes, Dudley George Cary, and Robinson, Rev. Charles J., A History of the Castles, Mansions, and Manors of Western Sussex (London, 1876), p. 109. See also Notes and Queries, Fifth Series, vii, 407.

<sup>23</sup> Calendar of Patent Rolls, 1349-75, passim.

<sup>24</sup> "A Return (so far as can be ascertained) of the Members of Parliament for the County and Boroughs of Sussex," compiled from the return of members of Parliament ordered by the House of Commons to be printed March 1, 1878, by Alan H. Stenning, Esq., Sussex Archaeological Collections, xxx, 183-187.

<sup>25</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1367-70, p. 221.

<sup>26</sup> Op. cit., p. 109.

<sup>27</sup> Cal. of Inquisitions Post Mortem (London, 1916), ix, 370.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid.

in and around Halsham in Holderness.<sup>29</sup> These may have been relatives and were perhaps the incentive for the Yorkshire visit or visits. Or the young Halsham may have been with Thomas de Mowbray, then lord of Bramber and Earl of Nottingham<sup>30</sup> (later of Norfolk) when the Earl went up to his Yorkshire holdings<sup>31</sup> near the lands of the Percies. Whatever the explanation of his presence, there is no doubt that John Halsham was in Yorkshire in 1384.

In that year he enters upon the scene in romantic and somewhat sensational fashion by running off with the wife of Sir Ralph Percy, third son of Henry Percy, first Earl of Northumberland. The Patent Rolls record the appointment of a commission of oyer and terminer dated February 16, "touching the persons who at Semere, co. York, abducted Philippa, wife of Ralph de Percy, knight, and still detain her."<sup>32</sup> Nevertheless, the king himself interposed to stay these proceedings against Halsham by two orders issued on May 28, 1384. The second supplies some additional details:<sup>33</sup>

To the same, being justices lately appointed to hear and determine an alleged trespass by John Halsham committed against Ralph de Percy knight, namely the rape and abduction of Philippa wife of the said Ralph with goods and chattels of her husband, damages 3,000£. Writ of supersedeas until St. Peter's Chains . . . as for particular causes him now moving, the king desires to find a remedy by way of agreement touching the debates between the said parties. . . .

By June 7 John had obtained pardon "for the rape of Philippa de Artheles, and all other felonies and trespasses by him perpetrated."<sup>34</sup> The pardon was granted on the supplication of the king's kinsman, the <sup>29</sup> From the time of Richard de Halsam, who died about 1301 (Yorkshire Inquisitions, III, Yorkshire Arch. Soc. Record Ser., XXXI, 144), there are numerous records of Halsams or Halshams—the name is spelled either way—in Halsham or adjacent towns. In the Close Rolls for 1354 (Cal. Cl. R., 1354–60, p. 41) reference is made to the heir of John de Halsham, a minor in the king's wardship. Whether or not the heir was named John is not stated. At any rate a John de Halsham of the same neighborhood gained some publicity ten years later by poaching in the free warren and parks at Burstwyk—about four miles from Halsham—belonging to the king's daughter Isabel. The commission issued on her complaint (Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1361–64, p. 539) lists John Halsham's name among the thirty or more charged with this misdemeanor.

<sup>30</sup> Dugdale, The Baronage of England, I, 128. Dictionary of National Biography (London, published since 1917 by the Oxford University Press), XIII, 1127 ff.

<sup>31</sup> The Mowbrays held lands in Yorkshire "which stretched in a great crescent from Thirsk, whose valley is still called the Vale of Mowbray, to Kirkby Malzeard and the sources of the Nidd, with the outlying castle of Black Burton in Lonsdale" (D.N.B., XIII, 1125). Thirsk is about thirty-five miles from Seamer, the site of John Halsham's activities. See also Dugdale's Baronage, I, 127, 130.

<sup>32</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1381–85, p. 423.

<sup>33</sup> Cal. of Close Rolls, 1381–85, p. 452.

<sup>34</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1381–85, p. 399.

Earl of Oxford. The Earl of Nottingham (Mowbray) also joined in the request.<sup>35</sup> A writ dated July 10, 1384, to the sheriff of York, orders him to "de-arrest" and deliver to John de Halsham and Philippa Dartheles, his wife, certain goods and chattels of theirs arrested in Dancastre.<sup>36</sup>

What the details of the adjustment were I have not yet discovered. Was the lady a willing victim? Were the goods and chattels part of her own inheritance? Did the Percies agree not to prosecute to avoid publicity? In Burke's Peerage I find the statement that the marriage of Philippa and Ralph was annulled.<sup>37</sup> How was this action accomplished? I have not yet given up hope of finding answers to these questions, but at present I can only offer a survey of the lady's history as a basis of surmise.

She and her elder sister Elizabeth were daughters and co-heiresses of David Strabolgi, the last Earl of Athol in the direct Strabolgi line.<sup>38</sup> He had died by October 15, 1369, when the Fine Rolls show an order to the escheators of the various counties in which he had property to take his lands into the king's hand since his heirs were minors.<sup>39</sup> His widow, Elizabeth, daughter of Henry Lord Ferrers, held most of the lands in wardship for the daughters,<sup>40</sup> but on her death in 1375, Henry Lord Percy obtained the wardship of these.<sup>41</sup> He had already obtained in 1373 the right to the marriage of the heiresses.<sup>42</sup> In 1375 Elizabeth was fourteen and Philippa thirteen. By July 12, 1377, he had married them to his second and third sons respectively, and a partition of their inheritance had been made in Chancery.<sup>43</sup> Philippa thus became the sister-in-law of the famous Hotspur, eldest son of Henry Percy, now Earl of Northumberland. According to the Dictionary of National Biography<sup>44</sup> Hotspur was born in 1364. I have found no date for Ralph, but as third son he was still younger and must have been a boy of ten or eleven when the marriage took place. By 1384 when John Halsham carried her off, Philippa was a woman of twenty-two bound to a boy about seventeen or eighteen. Such a case might well win the sympathy of the king, who, according to the records just quoted, made an effort to adjust the affair.

The marriage of John and Philippa took place in Combes Church, Sussex. Evidence in regard to it is to be found in the Episcopal Register

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., p. 439.

<sup>36</sup> Cal. of Close Rolls, 1331-85, p. 459.

<sup>37</sup> Burke, A Genealogical and Heraldic History of the Peerage and Baronetage, 91st edition (1933), p. 2245.

<sup>38</sup> Dugdale, op cit, II, 96.

<sup>39</sup> Cal. of Fine Rolls, 1369-77, VIII, 57.

<sup>40</sup> Ibid., VIII, 65.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., VIII, 306.

<sup>42</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1370-74, 330.

<sup>43</sup> Cal. of Fine Rolls, 1377-83, IX, 5.

<sup>44</sup> xv, 840.

of Robert Rede, Lord Bishop of Chichester.<sup>45</sup> This contains an inquiry into the legitimacy of Hugh, son of John and Philippa, in connection with a claim on twenty acres of land in Combes. The suit was pending before the Justices of Westminster in 1405, and therefore a royal writ was sent to the bishop ordering an investigation. The bishop immediately sent a clerk to the church of West Grinstead, where the following testimony was collected. The other claimant for the land "asserted that he would not produce any witnesses, but that Hugh Halsham was and is the true son of John Halsham Esq. surviving and of Philippa Atheles his wife, deceased, born in true and lawful matrimony, and that there had never been any doubt of his legitimacy." In addition Sir Richard Daas, Chaplain Rector of Combes, "asserted the legitimacy of Hugh Halsham and stated that about twenty years and more ago the banns of his parents had been called in the churches of West Grenstede and Combes, and the marriage solemnized in Combes Church on the morrow of the Octave of the Epiphany, with due ceremonies and no objection made." A list of persons who attended the wedding is appended as further testimony. Six years later another son, Richard, went through a similar investigation to prove his claim to a messuage in Horsham.<sup>46</sup>

Philippa did not lose her Strabolgi inheritance when she married John Halsham, for a document of 1388 shows her and her husband in control of certain manors in Wilts, Kent, and Norfolk, part of the deceased Earl's property.<sup>47</sup> Other records prove that Philippa obtained her share of the knights' fees and advowsons of churches, which had been held by her father.<sup>48</sup>

Eleven years after the marriage Philippa died and was buried in West Grinstead Church, where the monumental brass erected to her memory may still be seen. Although she died in 1395, the monument was not executed until about 1441, when the tomb of Sir Hugh Halsham and his wife was erected.<sup>49</sup> Philippa is represented in kirtle and mantle with hands uplifted in prayer. She wears the horned head-dress of the period.<sup>50</sup> At her feet is a dog with bells on its collar. The inscription, restored from Sir William Burrell's manuscripts, reads "Hic jacet Philippa, quondam Uxor Johannis Halsham, Armigeri; et una filiarum et heredis, Davidis Strabolge, nuper comitis de Atthell; que obiit primodie Novembris Anno D'ni Mil'mo ccc°LXXXV°. Cuj' a'i'e propicietur

<sup>45</sup> The Episcopal Register of Robert Rede, Lord Bishop of Chichester, Sussex Record Society, VIII; vol. I of the Register, pp. 89-90.

<sup>46</sup> Ibid., I, 132-133.

<sup>47</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1385-89, p. 421.

<sup>48</sup> Cal. of Close Rolls, 1389-92, pp. 367-370.

<sup>49</sup> Boutell, Rev. Charles, Monumental Brasses and Slabs, p. 92.

<sup>50</sup> André, J. Lewis, "Female Head-Dresses Exemplified by Sussex Brasses," Sussex Arch. Coll., XLII, 8.

Deus."<sup>51</sup> A shield at her feet shows the Halsham arms, an argent chevron engrailed between three leopards' faces gules, quartering a lion rampant with a fess, and impaling the Strabolgi arms, a paly of six or and sable.<sup>52</sup>

After his wife's death John Halsham's interest apparently turned toward public affairs. Many records show his activity as commissioner of peace.<sup>53</sup> He was also named in the commissions of array for Sussex in 1402, 1403, and 1405 "to array all men at arms . . . for the defence of the sea coast against the king's enemies, who intend invasion."<sup>54</sup> Another evidence of Halsham's prominence is his appointment on a commission in 1405 to collect a loan for the king on security of a grant already made by Parliament for war, but not payable till "Martinmas next."<sup>55</sup> John was one of three appointed for Sussex.

Before 1403 John Halsham had married a second time, choosing a lady named Matilda or Maud.<sup>56</sup> Her last name is believed to have been Mawley.<sup>57</sup> She bore him a son John<sup>58</sup> and at least one daughter.<sup>59</sup> In 1403 the Halshams received the manorial rights of West Grinstead by grant of Henry IV,<sup>60</sup> and in 1411 John added to his property by the purchase of 127 acres.<sup>61</sup>

<sup>51</sup> Turner, Rev. Edward, "Brasses in Sussex Churches," Sussex Arch. Coll., xxiii, 161.

<sup>52</sup> André, J. Lewis, "West Grinstead Church and the Recent Discoveries in that Edifice," Sussex Arch. Coll., xxxviii, 52.

<sup>53</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1396-99, p. 227. Ibid., 1401-05, p. 520. Ibid., 1405-08, pp. 355, 498.

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., 1401-05, pp. 115, 288, 290, and 1405-08, p. 62.

<sup>55</sup> Cal. of Fine Rolls, 1399-1405, xii, 317-318. Also Foedera, viii, 412.

<sup>56</sup> Bishop Rede's Register, i, 185, Sussex Record Soc., vol. viii.

<sup>57</sup> Elwes and Robinson, op. cit., p. 284.

<sup>58</sup> Sussex Feet of Fines, iii, 265, no. 3117, Sussex Record Soc., vol. xxiii. Matilda (Maud) married Lord St. John after John Halsham's death. Philippa also had a son John, who was named in her inquisition post mortem as her heir (Notes and Queries, Fifth Series, viii, 239). His age is given as ten years in 1395, so that we may suppose he was her first born. Since Hugh, after his father's death, was in possession of his mother's property, it is thought that John died young (Notes and Queries, Sixth Series, iv, 198).

<sup>59</sup> Elwes in his corrected Halsham pedigree (op. cit., p. 284) gives as Matilda's daughters Joan, who married first Sir John Bowne and then Sir Robert Roos, and also a daughter Margaret. I believe that this Joan is the same as Ann mentioned in the deed recorded in the Sussex Feet of Fines for 32 Henry VI, no. 3117 (see preceding note) as the daughter of John Halsham and "late the wife of Robert Roos, knight." There may have been a daughter Margaret, but since Matilda's son John married a Margaret (Sussex Feet of Fines, no. 3117), there is a chance that Elwes mistook the daughter-in-law for an own daughter. Hugh, in his will, mentions a sister, Philippa Fauconer, wife of Sir Thomas Fauconer, Lord Mayor of London in 1415 (Elwes, op. cit., 284; Notes and Queries, Fifth Series, xi, 315, Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1413-16, passim). Her name would suggest that she was the daughter of the first wife. I should, therefore, list John Halsham's offspring as follows: (1) Philippa's children: John (died young), Hugh, Richard, Philippa; (2) Matilda's children: John, Ann, and perhaps Margaret. <sup>60</sup> Bishop Rede's Register, i, 185.

<sup>61</sup> Feet of Fines, iii, 224, no. 2802, Sussex Record Soc., xxiii.

John Halsham died some time previous to April 17, 1415, for on that date Henry V granted to another man the lordship of Old Shorham, co. Sussex, "as John Halsham had it of the king's grant while he lived."<sup>62</sup> His inquisition post mortem was held in the same year. This lists his property, the larger portion of which came to him through Philippa Strabolgi, his first wife, and was located in Norfolk, Kent, and Wilts. He himself held the Sussex manors of Appelsham, West Grinstead, and Noteham, and had the advowson of the church at Combes, near West Grinstead.<sup>63</sup>

Now, it has doubtless occurred to my readers that a number of Halshams have been mentioned in this investigation. What proof have we that John Halsham is the author of the lyrics rather than any other Halsham? I have found no proof outside of the manuscript ascriptions described earlier, that he or any other Halsham wrote poetry. My identification must, therefore, rest on other evidence. In the first place, I have endeavored to show by his life records that John Halsham was a man of spirit, ability, and intelligence who might have written poetry. In the second place, I have pointed out that his holdings in Sussex, Kent, and Norfolk place him in the part of England in which Lydgate might have encountered his work. Lydgate was apparently the younger man, being born about 1370 according to the evidence in the Fall of Princes.<sup>64</sup> Although we do not know the date of Halsham's birth, the Yorkshire affair proves him to be a man of mature daring and initiative by 1384. He is, therefore, a likely person in age, locale, and character.

Finally I offer the evidence obtained through reliance on the word squiere or esquyer used by Shirley. Since this title does not appear in the records of John Halsham until 1401,<sup>65</sup> it is evidently not his by hereditary right. I judge him to be an esquire by office, among whom, according to Camden, are justices of the peace and others who bear offices of trust under the crown.<sup>66</sup> In the numerous records of Halshams which I have inspected, I have found esquire used only for John Halsham and for his son Hugh, and once for his son John. However, since Hugh soon became a knight,<sup>67</sup> it seems improbable that he would be called Halsham esquire by Shirley. The younger John may also be disregarded, for as the son of the second marriage, he would be a much younger

<sup>62</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1413-16, p. 303.

<sup>63</sup> Calendarium Inquisitionum post Mortem, IV, 13.

<sup>64</sup> Dictionary of National Biography, XII, 306.

<sup>65</sup> Cal. of Close Rolls, 1399-1402, p. 322.

<sup>66</sup> Encyclopaedia Britannica, 14th ed., VIII, 715.

<sup>67</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1416-22, p. 197.

man than Lydgate and thus hardly likely to have provided that poet with themes. John Halsham, the father, although referred to by Dugdale as Sir, never attained this title according to contemporary records. He could properly be called "Halsam squiere" until the day of his death, as is proven by his inquisition post mortem, where the Latin equivalent armiger is used.

In the person of John Halsham esquire, a man of suitable title, age, locale, and character, I believe I have found the answer to "The Question of Halsam," at least so far as it concerns the identity of the author. It may be possible by further search to gain further evidence of his poetic accomplishment. But in any case it is a satisfaction to find the man who wrote at least two lyrics with some skill and whose use of rime royal suggests that he was an early imitator of Chaucer.

I have also noted a Squire Richard Sellyng, to whom verse in rime royal is ascribed in the Shirley MS. Harley 7333.<sup>68</sup> References in the Patent Rolls show him to have been a military man of some importance in the French campaigns. In 1434 and 1435 he was one of a small commission to take a muster at Calais.<sup>69</sup> The next year the castle of Banelyngham (Balinghem) in Picardy, of which he was then in charge, was captured by the French. Sellyng was accused of betrayal and his goods were confiscated, but on his petition and the favorable testimony of the mayor and other citizens of the town of Balinghem, his property was returned.<sup>70</sup> I mention Sellyng<sup>71</sup> here merely to show the apparent reliability of Shirley's ascriptions. Halsham and Sellyng are perhaps only two out of a number of laymen, busy with political and military affairs, who yet found opportunity to try their hand at Chaucer's favorite rime.

HELEN PENNOCK SOUTH

New York University

<sup>68</sup> Brown, op. cit., I, 355.

<sup>69</sup> Cal. of Patent Rolls, 1429-36, pp. 359, 476.

<sup>70</sup> Ibid., 1436-41, p. 27.

<sup>71</sup> Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Thomas Brockhill, married a Richard Sellyng, whom I take to be the squire, although no title is given. Thomas Brockhill died in 1437 and was buried in Saltwood Church, Kent (Archaeologia Cantiana, xviii, 423). I find many references to the Selling family in Kent, but of an earlier date, and am, therefore, not able to prove definitely that Squire Richard Sellyng belonged to this prominent family (Arch. Cant., iv, 308; xi, 331, 350, xiv, 204).

XXIV

PAROLE IDENTICHE IN THE SONNET
AND OTHER VERSE FORMS

SOME time during the first half of the fifteenth century there came into being a new type of sonnet the existence of which writers of Italian manuals of versification have either overlooked, ignored, looked upon as an isolated phenomenon, or connected with other devices that bear to it but a remote historical relationship.<sup>1</sup> The most immediate model of this new form is the sonetto equivoco—a favorite artifice from the first century of Italian literature to the end of the Trecento—in which the rime equivoe of the simple variety are extended to all of the fourteen verses.<sup>2</sup> Petrarch's Quand'io son tutto. . . is the best known example of a sonnet with equivocal rime words.

Quand'io son tutto volto in quella parte
Ove 'l bel viso di madonna luce,
E m'è rimasa nel pensier la luce
Che m'arde e strugge dentro a parte a parte,
I' che temo del cor che mi si parte,
E veggio presso il fin de la mia luce,
Vòmmene in guisa d'orbo senza luce,
Che non sa ove si vada e pur si parte.
Così davanti ai colpi de la morte
Fuggo. ma non sì ratto che 'l desio
Meco non venga, come venir sole.
Tacito vo; chè le parole morte
Farian pianger la gente; et i' desio
Che le lagrime mie si spargan sole.
(Il canzoniere [ed. Scherillo, Milan, 1918], 121-122.)<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> I refer specifically to P. E. Guarnerio, Manuale di versificazione italiana (Milan, 1913); F. Flamini, Notizia storica dei versi e metri italiani (Leghorn, 1919); T. Casini, Le forme metriche italiane (Florence, 1910); G. Federzoni, Dei versi e dei metri italiani (Bologna, 1912); F. D'Ovidio, Versificazione romana (Naples, 1932).

<sup>2</sup> The term rime equivoe means that the rime words are identical in sound but different in meaning. Simple rime equivoe consist of single words in contrast to compound rime equivoe in which either one of the two rime words is made up of two words (ama—chi'ama) or it has a prefix which the other rime word does not have (parte—di parte).

<sup>3</sup> L. E. Kastner, author of A History of French Versification (Oxford, 1903), in a note in his edition of The Poetical Works of William Drummond of Hawthornden (Edinburgh and London, 1913), I, 205, says of a sonetto identico by this Elizabethan poet: "originally the idea seems to have been suggested by the fourteenth sonnet of Petrarch's Rime, in which the octave is constructed on the rime words parte and luce." Not the Petrarchan sonnet alone, but rather the type to which it belonged developed into the sonetto identico. Another example related to Petrarch's poem is a sonnet by Giacomo da Lentino whose octave has

Since the rime equivoche sonnets often contained rimes identical in sound and in meaning (i.e., non-equivocal rimes)<sup>4</sup> whether from a conscious or involuntary effort on the part of the sonneteer, it was an easy step to increase the number of the parole identiche in a sonnet. Eventually this led to a shift of emphasis: the primary object of the composer was to repeat the identical alternating rime-words with little or no equivocation. The development of the sonetto identico, as we shall call this new type of sonnet, was no doubt further stimulated by the fact that parole identiche in rime had been in vogue for a long time,<sup>5</sup> and also by the fact that at least one other verse form, the sestina, is based essentially on the identical non-equivocal rime principle.

One of the earliest sonnets of the identico type is by Francesco Benedetti, who lived in the first half of the Quattrocento.

Creato il primo padre in questa vita
 Per il peccato acquistò eterna morte,
 Ne fo' alchun che potesse per morte
 Giamai sodisfare a tanta vita.
 A Dio venne pietà e prese vita,
 Con la qual poi sostenne accerba morte,
 E fo di tanto premio la soa morte
 Che a tutti noi ne rendè la vita.
 Che chiusa era per giustizia e gratia
 A l'humana natura, et ogni gloria
 S'el non fosse diffusa tanta gratia.
 Se cossì morte, vita, gratia e gloria
 Fo a tutto il mondo, io spero ch'anchor gratia
 Mi serrà morte, vita, gratia, gloria.

(Le rime del codice Isoldiano [ed. L. Frati, Bologna, 1913], 220.)

It will be observed that in this poem two sets of rime words are employed, one for the octave and another for the sestet. But whereas the equivocal rime word pattern remained fixed in its retention of a double set of rime words, the non-equivocal pattern was modified by the ex-the rime words spera and parte. See Poeti del primo secolo della lingua italiana . . . (Florence, 1816), I, 315. Cf. also K. K. Hasselkuss, Der Petrarkismus in der Sprache der englischen Sonettidichter der Renaissance (Münster. i. Westfahl. 1927), pp. 226-227.

---

<sup>4</sup> See L. Biadene, "Morfologia del sonetto nei sec. XIII e XIV," Studj di filologia romanza, IV (1889), 154.

<sup>5</sup> Cf. Freymond, Über den Reichen Reim bei altfranzösischen Dichtern . . . Zeitschrift für romanische Philologie, VI, 212 ff.; Tobler, Vom Französischen Versbau alter u. neuer Zeit (Leipzig, 1921), p. 157; Kastner, op. cit., p. 56. Parodi has apparently contributed the first Italian study on the subject in connection with work on the Divine Comedy. See "La rima e i vocaboli in rima nella Divina Commedia (Rime equivoche e di parole identiche)," Bullettino della Società Dantesca italiana, n. s. III (1896), 141-142.

tension of both the rime words of the octave to the entire sonnet.<sup>6</sup> One of the earliest poems illustrative of this modification is a sonnet by Aquilano. On account of its rime scheme it misses being a perfect example by one rime—the last.

Il tanto dir di sì par che sia no,
 Dimmi una volta un no che torni in sì;
 Se a te, signora sta il no e'l sì
 Non far che tanto il sì diventi no.
 Non mi pasco, signor, sempre di no,
 Vita non posso aver senza un bel sì;
 Così tra il sì e 'l no, e'l no il sì,
 Par che ogni cosa si trasmuta in no,
 Non è tua usanza de negar il sì,
 Se or volesti confirmar il no;
 La vita e nichilata senza sì.
 Pero signor, scanza de dirmi no
 Che lieto viverò dicendo sì,
 Che 'l ciel col sì ognor placar si può.

(Le rime [ed. Menghini, Bologna, 1894], 144, 1)

The growth of the sonetto identico was rather slow during the fifteenth century, but in the sixteenth century it became so popular that it largely supplanted the sonetto equivoco. Both the single and double set patterns continued side by side, but with a distinct preference for the single type formula.

On the basis of its rime words the sonetto identico falls into two main subdivisions. In the first of them the pair or pairs of rime words need not have fixed relationship to one another. Here equivocal rime words are relatively frequent, since the freedom of choice made it easy to choose rime words capable of equivocation. The two sonnets cited in full below bring out the identical rime pattern illustrative of the first subdivision.

Lodate o fanciulletti il gran signore
 Lodate tutti il suo mirabil nome;
 Benedetto sia sempre il santo nome
 De l'increato, eterno, alto signore.
 D'ogni signor si lodi hoggi il signore:
 L'orto e l'ocaso essalti il suo bel nome.
 Sovra ogni gente è grande il suo gran nome:
 Va sovra il ciel la gloria del signore.
 Chi è come Iddio nostro? il qual dal cielo
 Mira gli humili; e pover alza, e 'nsieme
 Gli fa beati in terra, e quindi in cielo.
 Co principi gli pon ne troni insieme:

<sup>6</sup> This extension, incidentally, gave rise to a new type of sonetto continuo.

Sparge grazie alle sterili dal cielo,
Che rallegrar le fa co figli insieme.

(C. Tolomei in Delle Rime di diversi nobili poeti toscani [ed. Atanagi, Venice, 1565], 26a, II.)

Mi tolse il cor, quando mi disse adio
Il di ch'io mi partij, mia bella Filli,
E sempre mi starà nell'alma Filli
E nella mente un dir sì dolce adio.
Qual pastore udio mai da ninfa adio
Così soave? com'udij da Filli
Quel caro di ch'io trasformaimi in Filli
E mandai per l'orecchie all'alma adio.
I miei dolci pensieri saràn di Filli
E i sogni miei m'apporteranno adio
Sempre la notte, e con adio mia Filli
Dovunque leggerò fie scritto adio;
E scrivendo e cantando dirò Filli
Filli io mi parto; e dirà Filli, adio.

(Bertini, Delle rime, I, Florence, 1583.)<sup>7</sup>

<sup>7</sup> The quatrains of other sonnets allied to the compositions of Tolomei and Bertini just cited are as follows:

L'esca che voi da faggi ombrosi e querce
Sazio d'ogn' altro, e'ngordo di tal cibo
Prendete in novo e prezioso cibo;
Vivo e lieto hor vi tien tra selve, e querce . . .
(C. Tolomei, op. cit., 166, II.)

Poi che gli ardenti miei gravi sospiri
Vanno, qual guida, inanzi al tristo pianto;
Occhi temprate homai sì largo pianto
Che forse scemeranno anco is sospiri . . .
(L. Paterno: Rime [Venice, 1560], 124.)

Quando spunta nel Ciel la lucid 'alba,
E quando poscia splendon mille stelle,
Sentì Mari pastor dir mest' a l'alba
Queste parole, e dirle anco a le stelle . . .
(L. Orlandino dal Greco: Rime degli Accademici Accesi di Palermo [Palermo, 1726], 229, I.)

Sgora dal mar d'immensa eterna luce
Luce, che l'aureo sol l'immote stelle
Forma, e l'avviva sì ch'indi la luce
Muove, ch'alluma in ciel l'erranti stelle . . .
(A. Marchetti: Rime scelte de' poeti illustri de' nostri tempi, Lucca, 1709.)

The octaves of the following sonnets are also built on two rime words: Minturno, "Come adivien . . ." with the rime words cielo and sole in his Rime e prose (Venice, 1569);

Of this classification is the most famous example of the sonetto identico—Berni's satirico-comic sonnet, Ser Cecco. . . .<sup>3</sup>

Ser Cecco non può star senza la Corte,
Ne la Corte può star senza ser Cecco:
E ser Cecco ha bisogno de la Corte,
E la Corte ha bisogno di ser Cecco.
Chi vuol saper che cosa sia ser Cecco
Pensi, e contempi che cosa è la Corte,
Questo Ser Cecco somiglia la Corte,
E questa Corte somiglia ser Cecco.
E tanto tempo viverà a la Corte,
Quanto sarà la vita di ser Cecco,
Perch'è tutt'uno ser Cecco e la Corte.
Quand'un riscontra per la via ser Cecco,
Pensi di riscontrare anche la Corte
Perchè ambedue son la Corte e ser Cecco . .

(Rime piacevoli, II, 1609.)

From the sixteenth century down to Giusti and Carducci, Berni's poem served as a model for a number of other sonnets, though not all preserve the rimalizzo in every verse.

Fassi noto a ciascun com'oggi il Varchi,
Renunzia il Varchi e vuol sol mastro Feo.
E tanto piace al Varchi mastro,
Ch'ei non vuol più sentir nominar Varchi . . .
(*Le rime burlesche edite e inedite di Anton
Francesco Grazzini detto il Lasca* [Florence, 1882], 25.)

Sebbene a molti par che tu sia corbo
A me par che tu tenga più del gufo,
Pero che quanto è sciocco e goffo il gufo,
Tant'è cattivo e malizioso il corbo . . .
(Idem, op. cit., 97.)

---

Minturno, "Odiar la notte . . ." with the rime words giorno and sole, op. cit.; Academico Trasformato, "Quando fia Amor . . ." with the rime words sole and luce in Rime de gli academici occulti (Brescia, 1567), 124. Other sonnets having only two alternating rime words for both octave and sestet are Montenero, "Donna perchè veder . . ." with the rimes morto and cielo in Rime di diversi signori napoletani et altri . . . Libro settimo (Venice, 1556); Muzio, "Se cos' a me . . ." with the rimes bella and core in Rime diverse (Venice, 1551), p. 29; Bertini, "Adio mi disse . . ." and "Vorrei cantar . . ." with the rimes Filli and adio (op. cit.).

<sup>3</sup> It differs from all of the poems cited above in having a rimalmezzo, which is also a parola identica, in addition to the fact that it is a sonetto caudato.

Io vidi un giorno una civetta, e 'l Chioccia
 Acccolato appresso la civetta;
 E alla fisionomia della civetta
 Somigliava a capel quella del Chioccia . . .
 (Rime burlesche del Signor Gius. Valeriano, Cav. Vannetti [Roveredo, 1756], 25.)

Una volta il vocabolo Tedeschi
 Sonò diverso a quello di granduca,
 E un buon Toscano che dicea granduca,
 Non si credette mai di dir Tedeschi . . .
 (Giusti: Tutti gli scritti [Florence, 1924], 141.)

Pietro Fanfani sta ne le postille
 E le postille stanno nel Fanfani:
 In principio eran sole le postille,
 Poi le postille fecero il Fanfani . . .<sup>9</sup> (Opere di Giosuè Carducci: Juvenilia [Bologna, 1909], 193.)

Before the fifteenth century two antonyms having the same consonantal rime are frequently found at the end of each of two successive verses such as ama-disama, spense-accense, amica-nemica. But two contrasting rime words having different consonantal rimes such as morte-vita, giorno-notte, pace-guerra are rather rare, indicating that this usage had not become fixed as a rhetorical device. Nor can the use of this artifice, which was soon to become the common property of the Petrarchists, hark back directly to the ideal model of all of the collections of love-poems of the time—Petrarch's Canzoniere, itself a great storehouse of antitheses. Only once does Petrarch bring together at the end of two consecutive verses one of the three groups mentioned above—vita-morte—in the canzone: "Perchè la vita è breve . . ." vv. 38–39. One is, therefore, tempted to believe that the model was originally found outside the realm of amorous poetry, probably in religious or elegized compositions in which the repetition of rimes like vita and morte was calculated to make an effect upon the reader. Indeed, the two earliest examples we have gathered, both of which were written in the early Quattrocento, are religious sonnets.<sup>10</sup> However, once the artifice was transferred to erotic poetry, it is easy to see how the taste for antitheses developed from the imitation of Petrarch made it a stock poetical device.

<sup>9</sup> See G. Surra: "Impronte Giustiniane nella poesia di Giosuè Carducci" in Giornale storico della letteratura italiana, LXI (1913), 63.

<sup>10</sup> I.e., the sonnet already cited: Creato il primo padre . . . and another sonnet with its octave constructed on the words vita and morte, "Sapi che cruda e tenebrosa morte," by Ulisse Aleotti in A. Segarizzi's study "Ulisse Aleotti, rimatore veneziano del secolo xv," Giornale storico . . . , XLVII (1906), 61.

Poems illustrative of this artifice may be said to belong to the second subdivision of the poesie identiche, and naturally fall into different groups according to the antithetical rime words employed. The most popular antonyms were, of course, vita and morte. One of the first religious poems with this device to appear in a Petrarchistic collection of verse is the following sonnet by Marmitta. It was plagiarized by S. della Croce.

Poi, che in questa mortal noiosa vita
 Il fin di tutti i mali è sol la morte,
 Per non viver più in grembo a l'empia morte,
 Che morto tiemmi in sì dolente vita,
 Forza è ch'io stesso rompa di mia vita
 Lo stame, & toglì con inganno a morte
 La gloria, ch'ella spera nel dar morte
 A me, c'ho in odio il lume della vita,
 So ben che cosa lieve fia la morte
 A sì gran mal, però già la vita
 Viver non seppi. hor saprò gir a morte,
 Così disse il buon Tosco, e a l'altra vita
 Tosto ne gî, cangiando in chiara morte
 La sua infelice, & tenebrosa vita.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>11</sup> Other poems either religious or elegaic in tone are:

Anchor che'n questa nostra mortal vita
 Il fin di tutti i mali sia la morte,
 Per non si dar in preda a l'empia morte
 Meglio è haver trista e sconsolata vita . . .
 (S. della Croce in Rime di diversi signori napoletani et altri . . . Libro quinto, Venice, 1552)

Aveziamoci a morir poiche per morte
 A fin si vien d'una noiosa vita,
 Che altro che miserie ha questa vita,
 Angoscie e pene assai più rie che morte? . . .
 (Argisto Giuffredì, Rime degli Accademici Accesi . . . , 1, 67.)

[The first verse comes from the beginning of F. Carrafa's sonnet: "Avezzienci a morir, poi che la Morte . . ." see I fiori delle rime de' poeti illustri . . . (ed. Ruscelli, Venice, 1569), 89v. In the same volume (168v.) is a similar line by Guidiccioni:.]

Da te morto Giesù, nasce la vita
 Che morendo per l'huom mort'hai la morte;
 E dal tuo amor in noi quella morte
 Che col morir ne scorge a miglior vita . . .
 (G. Fiamma, Rime spirituali [Venice, 1570], 332.)

O de l'ombre dannata immortal morte,
 Vita mortal, che sei tu? Morte o vita?
 Se sei vita, com'hai continua morte?
 Se morte, come duri eterna vita? . . .
 (L. Gandini, Rime [Venice, 1581], 31.)

(Rime di diversi . . . Libro primo . . . [Venice, 1549], 100 )

Bembo was apparently the first Petrarchist to use the vita-morte artifice in an erotic composition—a canzone.

E cosa natural fuggir da morte;
E quanto può ciascun tenersi in vita.
Ahi crudo amor! ma io cercando morte
Vo sempre, e pur così mi serbo in vita.
Che perchè 'l mio dolor passa ogni morte,
Corio a por giù questa gravosa vita.
Poi, quand'io son già ben presso a la morte,
E sento dal mio cor partir la vita,
Tanto diletto prendo della morte,
Ch'a forza quel gioir mi torna in vita.

(Rime [Verona, 1750], 218–219 )

Although the poem is among those he eventually refused to regard as his own, it served as a model for a string of similar compositions.<sup>12</sup>

Padie non pianger più mia dolce morte,
Poichè mercè del Cielo, a l'alta vita
Poggiai che se fu breve la mia vita,
Non m'apparve al morir ombra di morte . . .

(G. Le Rape, Rime degli Accad. Accessi, op. cit., I, 206 )

Per far che morte a noi donasse vita,
Et per trarne da grave eterna morte
Quel, che a mortai dispensa et morte et vita
Pronto hoggi corse a voluntaria morte . . .

(M. Valerio Sali, Rime scelte d'alcuni poeti bassanesi che fiorono nel secolo XVI [Venice, 1769], 88.)

Sommo Signor che con sì oscura morte
Cangiando l'immortal felice vita,
Desti a noi peccator la propria vita
Per liberarci da perpetua morte . . .

(Incerto, Delle rime di diversi nobili et eccellenti poeti . . . Libro secondo [Venice, 1548], 128v.)

See also Rime spirituali (Venice, 1550), 28v. Other sonnets using vita and morte as alternating rime words are S. della Croce, "Ben fu sciocco colui . . .," op. cit.; L. Orlandini dal Greco, "Donna real . . .," Rime degli Accad. Accessi, op. cit., II, 118; Aurelio Botticella, "Oggi hebbe il mio signor . . .," Rime degli Accad. Accessi, op. cit., I, 114; G. Le Rape, "Siccome si mostrò . . .," Rime degli Accad. Accessi, op. cit., I, 214; B. Giangrandi, "Se questa fragil, egra e mortal vita . . .," Rime scelte di poeti ravennati (Ravenna, 1739), p. 62.

<sup>12</sup> Compare

Affliger chi per voi cara ha la vita;
Che vien mancando, et è vicina a morte
E vostra empia durezza che di morte
Vaga procura il fin de l'altrui vita . . .
(M. Valerio Sali, op. cit., 77.)

Another variety of poems in vita-morte makes use of the antonym of each rime word as a rimalmezzo. This coupling of a word—vita or morte—with an antonym—morte or vita or a derivative in the same verse, but without the intention of forming a rimalmezzo, had become an established tradition in early Italian poetry, a fact which could not have failed to be influential in aiding the development of this particular artifice.<sup>13</sup>

One of the most perfect examples of this variety is the following sonnet by Lodovico Paterno.<sup>14</sup>

Io con credea giamai, che la mia vita
Potesse per amar giunger a morte;
Ahi fallace credenza: incauta morte
Più veloce, che stral va la mia vita . . .

(M. Valerio Sali, op. cit., 67.)

Io vo chiamando dolcemente morte
Che mi sottraggi a questa fragil vita;
Non perch'io creda, che sia dolce morte,
Ma per finir l'amaro della vita . . .

(L. Martelli, Opere [Florence, 1548], 27-28)

F. Denalio, "Se lunge io son da voi . . .," Prima parte delle rime (Bologna, 1580), p. 19 and Il Solingo, "Se voi sete 'l mio cor . . .," Rime degli Accademici Occulti (Brescia, 1567), p. 102, also wrote amorous sonnets with the rime words vita and morte. Likewise amatory in subject-matter, but making use of the vita-morte rime only in the sestet is a sonnet by Collatino da Collalto beginning, "Muzio, se di saper pur hai disio . . .," in Gaspara Stampa-Veronica Franco, Rime (Bari, 1913), p. 218.

<sup>13</sup> Compare Calvacanti, "Quando di morte mi conven trar vita," Poeti del primo secolo della lingua italiana (Florence, 1816), II, 287; Domenico Cavalca, "Morendo Christo in croce ci diè vita . . .," Raccolta di antiche rime toscane (Palermo, 1817), III, 179; Giacomo da Lentino, "La vita che mi diè fu la mia morte . . .," Poeti del primo secolo . . ., I, 293; Petrarch, "Egualemente mi spiace morte e vita . . .," op. cit., 288; idem, "Odiar vita mi fanno e bramar morte . . .," op. cit., 503.

<sup>14</sup> Others less complete are:

Com'hai potuto dar la morte o morte,
A chi morte toglieva e dava vita?
Come non ti cangiasti o morte in vita
Presso la vita mia nel darle morte? . . .

(L. Groto, Rime [Venice, 1581], 101)

La vita, amor, ch'io vivo, è proprio morte,
Anzi peggior che morte è la mia vita;
Suol finire morte una penosa vita;
Ma la mia vita non ha fin per morte . . .

(G. Gosellini, Rime [Venice, 1581], 101.)

Se io non ho vita in questa morta vita
Nè viver posso in questa viva morte,
Parmi ch'ella non sia vita nè morte
Questa, dove ognor moro e resto in vita . . .

(F. Copetta de' Beccuti, Rime [Venice, 1751], 64.)

S'io da vita volar potessi a morte,
 Et con morte cangiar quest' aspra vita;
 Vera morte non fora hor la mia vita,
 Ch'in vita mi sostien per doppia morte.
 Oh, se mia vita andasse in grembo a morte,
 Non di morte havrei tinta hoggi mia vita:
 Ma morte acquisterebbe, & polso & vita;
 Vita, in cui perde ogni ragion poi morte.
 Che non t'appressi a dolce morte, o vita?
 S'haver vita non puoi qui senza morte,
 Et se morte non fassi altro che vita.
 Ma tu vita felice, altera morte,
 Che morte hai nome, & sei pur viva vita,
 Porgi a la vita mia sì chiar la morte.
 (Le nuove fiamme [Lyons, 1568], 128-129.)

It was not long before new varieties came to light such as pace-guerra, giorno-notte, ghiaccio-foco, acqua-foco, etc. These compositions are miscellaneous in content, though amatory subjects seem to predominate. It will be noticed that some of them also make use of the antonym of the terminal word as a rimamezzo. This is partly because pairs of words like pace-guerra and notte-giorno, as in the case of morte-vita, were traditionally often coupled in the same verse.<sup>15</sup>

The following sonnet by Scipione Gonzaga illustrates the use of guerra-pace.

Dopo una lunga e travagliosa guerra
 Et un lungo aspettar quieta pace,
 Godessi il mondo una tranquilla pace,
 Ne così si vedrà che fosse in guerra;
 Quando fortuna che di mescer guerra,
 Non lasciò mai ne la più ferma pace,
 Volse turbar questa sì cara pace,
 Con nuovo insulto e non usata guerra.
 Pero che mentre il gran folgor di guerra,
 Henrico invitto, d'inviolabil pace
 Cerca segni mostrar con finta guerra,
 Morte nemica d'ogni nostra pace,
 Cangia la finta in sanguinosa guerra .

<sup>15</sup> Compare Petrarch, "Pace non trovo e non ho da far guerra . . .," op. cit., p. 288; idem, "E breve guerra per eterna pace . . .," op. cit., p. 453; idem, "A tanta pace e m'a lassato in guerra . . .," op. cit., p. 428; idem, "E mi tolse di pace e pose in guerra . . .," op. cit., p. 536; idem, "Pò far chiara la notte, oscuro il giorno . . .," op. cit., p. 370; idem, "E i giorni oscuri e le dogliose notti" and "I chiari giorni e le tranquille notti . . .," op. cit., pp. 503-504.

(Rime di diversi autori eccellentissimi .
Libro nono, Cremona, 1560.)<sup>16</sup>

Remigio Nannini (Fiorentino) wrote a sonnet in notte-giorno.

Deh non ritorni a rimendarne il giorno
 L'alba, e mai sempre adombri oscura notte
 Queste selve, e quest'antri, e sia la notte
 Il sole a gli occhi miei l'aurora il giorno
 Brami Damon per veder Filli il giorno,
 Ch'io più che mille giorni amo una notte,
 Dolce serena e riposata notte,
 Qual mia fia mai di te più caro giorno?
 Così Mopso cantava a mezza notte
 A la sua Silvia in braccio, ogni aspro giorno
 Posto in oblio per così dolce notte.
 Ne credendo che mai venisse il giorno
 Richiuse gli occhi, onde sparì la notte,
 Sì ch'abbracciati gli scoperse il giorno.
 (I fiore delle rime . . op. cit., 266.)<sup>17</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Other sonnets in pace-guerra are:

Felice chi da guerra ha tregua e pace,
 E ricco di trofei, ch'acquistò in guerra
 Non temendo dell'aspra e cruda guerra
 Trionfa altero in sua tranquilla pace . . .
 (C. Morelli, Rime [Cosenza, 1595], 34.)

Non bramo, ne desio, ne vo più guerra,
 Anzi ricerco a tutte l'hore pace;
 E pur non posso ritrovar mia pace,
 Che quanto io miro mi rassembra guerra . . .
 (idem, op. cit.)

Havrà mai fine questa dura guerra,
 Che mi fate, o pensier? datemi pace:
 Ch'io son già stanco in così lunga guerra,
 E pur dovreste poi prestarmi pace . . .
 (Orlandini dal Greco, op. cit., 297, 1)

<sup>17</sup> Three Sicilian poets, Bartolomeo Bonanni, ["Ecco or sen va . . .," Rime degli Accad. Accesi, I, 118,] Argisto Giuffredi, and Orlandini dal Greco likewise adopted the same rimes.

O felici pastor, che in questa notte
 Apriste gli occhi nel più chiaro giorno
 Che fosse mai, mercè di lui che'l giorno
 Creò da prima, e fece poi la notte . . .
 (Giuffredi, Rime degli Accad. Accesi, 68, 1.)

Quando fia mai (Signor) quel santo giorno
 Che non m'ingombri più terrena notte? . . .
 (idem, op. cit., 68, 1.)

A sonnet in foco-ghiaccio was composed by Cesare Simonetti.

Lasso ch'io ardo in vero ardente foco;
 Che spegner, non lo può neve ne ghiaccio,
 Freddo timor hor mi transforma in ghiaccio
 Hor d'ardente desir mi cangia in foco.
 Amor altro non è che vivo foco
 Et la gelosa tema horribil ghiaccio;
 Ma come huom viver può tra fiamme et ghiaccio
 Et che 'l gelo ogn'hor più s'avanza e'l foco?
 Amor tu vedi ben, c'ha il cor di ghiaccio
 Madonna, e a miei sospir, che son di foco
 Fredda è via più che freddo marmo o ghiaccio.
 Opra lo strale, opra la rete, e 'l foco
 Fere, annoda, & accende un'vivo ghiaccio,
 Che mare. terra, & ciel vince 'l tuo foco.
 (Rime, Padua, 1586.)<sup>18</sup>

There is another sonnet-variant of theme in pianto and foco by T. A. Balli.

Sparite, o fiere Larve, ecco qui il giorno
 Onde fu estinta al fin la cieca notte
 Che il dì ne tolse, e n'arrecò la notte
 Per non riveder più l'aurora e 'l giorno . . .
 (Orlandini dal Greco, Rime degli Accad. Accesi . . . , 131, II.)

<sup>18</sup> Simonetti furnishes a further example in the same rimes: Lasso tra due contrarii in freddo ghiaccio . . . (op. cit.) while others are supplied by Giuffredi, A. Botticella, and Piasentini.

Che non puoi far Amor? se d'un gran ghiaccio
 Nascer facesti un Mongibel di foco?
 Ma che puoi far, se col tuo ardente foco
 Un cor non puoi scaldar fatto di ghiaccio? . . .
 (Giuffredi, Rime degli Accad. Accesi, op. cit., 59, I.)

In alto e nuovo Mar di vivo ghiaccio
 Vidi vaga Sirena sparger foco,
 Il cui dolce cantar me fe di ghiaccio
 E 'l guardo onesto mi converse in foco . . .
 (Botticella, Rime degli Accad. Accesi, op. cit., 105, I.)

Se questa mia nemica è tutta ghiaccio,
 Amor, ond'ha così possente foco,
 Che sgombrando dal petto il duro ghiaccio,
 Non lascia parte in me che non sia foco? . . .
 (M. Piasentini, Rime di vari . . . [Orvieto, 1596], 33)

Giuffredi wrote a sonnet in ghiaccio-foco, "Romper credei . . .," op. cit., I, 94, which was answered per le rime by his friend Gabrieli in "Se di tua donna . . .," op. cit., I, 94.

Amor, se vuoi ch'io mi consumi in pianto
 Ragion è ben, che tu mi spegni il foco;
 E non che cresca il foco e cresca il pianto;
 E più ch'abondi il pianto abondi el foco . . .
 (Rime degli Accad. Accesi, op. cit., 368, 1)

Orlandini dal Greco devised a further variation by his use of the contrasting rime words terra and cielo.

Si mostra a noi fiorita ogn'hor la terra,
 E si vede sereno e bello il cielo;
 Mentre la mia Siringa alberga in terra
 Molto più vaga de l'Aurora in cielo . . .
 (Rime degli Accad. Accesi, op. cit., 269, 1)

After the artifice of the parole identiche had become firmly intrenched as a rhetorical device very largely by means of its use in the sonnet, it found its way into other verse forms. It was first introduced into the strambotto, as in the following composition by Serafino Aquilano.

Come esser po chio rida e pianga a un trato
 Come esser po chio speri e tema a un punto
 Come esser po chio brami e sprezi a un trato
 Come esser po chio arda e giacia a un punto
 Come esser po chio canti e giema a un trato
 Come esser po chio viva e mora a un punto.
 Egliè che morte fa l'ultima forza
 Si come in lume quando al fin amorza.
 (Opere [Venice, 1519], L.)

When the strambotto was banished by Bembo and his school, the artifice was occasionally employed during the sixteenth century in the octave stanzas of longer compositions, as in an octave in Muzzarello's Fabula di Narciso.

Allor rimase priva della voce,
 Che da se stessa non può far parola,
 L'infelice Eco, e se ode un'altra voce,
 Risponde sempre al fin della parola,
 Ripetendo il tenor di quella voce
 Raddoppia il suon de l'ultima parola
 Così ad ognun dopo il parlar risponde
 Ne parla prima ma sempre risponde.
 (V. Cian in "Ancora di Giovanni Muzzarelli," Giornale storico della letteratura italiana, xxxviii [1901], 86.)

The only exception to this practice which I have been able to find is an octave attributed to Alamanni in Rime di diversi signori napoletani e d'altri nobiliss. ingegni . . . Libro Quinto (Venice, 1555), p. 465, bearing the rime words vita and sempre, and an octave by Ventimiglia in Rime degli Accad. Accesi . . ., op. cit., II, 45, bearing the rime words foco and neve.

But the most popular of the octaves of this class—soon imitated by French, Spanish, and Italian writers—is a lucubration in Anguillara's translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses: it combines in its eight verses the device of the parole identiche and that of the replicazione.

Pria che'l ciel fosse, il mar, la terra, e'l foco,
Era il foco, la terra, il cielo, e'l mare;
Ma'l mar rendeva il ciel, la terra, e'l foco,
Deforme il foco, il ciel, la terra, e'l mare.
Che ivi era e terra, e cielo, e mare, e foco,
Dove era e cielo, e terra, e foco e mare:
La terra, il foco, e'l mare era nel cielo;
Nel mar, nel foco, e ne la terra, il cielo.
(Metamorfosi di Ovidio [Venice, 1571], I, 3.)

Even more amazing, however, is a monstrosity by Mauritio Moro, whose fifty octaves have only two alternating rimes—ghiaccio and foco. We quote only the first stanza.

Amor io canto di Madonna il ghiaccio
E degli begli occhi ardenti il vivo foco.
Pena del cor amante e sì gran ghiaccio
Esca de' lumi, sì mirabil foco.
Serba (o gran meraviglia) incendio'l ghiaccio,
Nutre 'l rigido seno e ghiaccio e foco,
Per me scopersi un foco e per se un ghiaccio
Ne l'alta forza tua stempra quel ghiaccio . . .
(I tre giardini dei madrigali . . . Libro primo . . ., Venice, 1602.)

The following anonymous sixteenth-century poem is proof that our device was also applied to the barzellette.

Gran beltà promette un sì,	L'amor mio non merta un no,
Gentilezza è non dir no;	Ne tu dei negarmi un sì:
Bella sei: tu dei dir sì;	Però presto dimme un sì
Sei gentil: non dei dir no!	Ch'io so' morto se odo un no. <sup>19</sup>

Bembo, in a composition we have already quoted, appears to have been the first to introduce the device into a short canzone. In the longer canzoni or rather canzoni-sestine I have met with only two instances in which the artifice of the parole identiche is carried out. These compositions were written by Claudio Tolomei and Il Ferme. Through his famous sestina doppia: "Amor tu vedi ben che questa donna . . ." the influence of Dante, needless to say, is obvious.

<sup>19</sup> In Cinque barzellette tratte dalle raccolte musicali di Andrea Antico da Montona, Bologna: R. Tipografia, 1887.

Chi non sa ben, com'una fiera donna
L'altrui misere membra volga in pietra,
Mira il guardo crudel de la mia donna;
Che ha forza di cangiar ciascuno in pietra . . .
(Rime di diversi . . . Libro secondo, op. cit., 6v.-7v )

Sarebbe ogni un voler dar lume al sole
Lodar volendo la mia dolce Pietra
Datane in terra, come al mondo il sole
Ma l'avanza ella, & io quasi di pietra . . .
(Il sesto libro delle rime di diversi eccellenti autori . . . [Venice, 1553], 173-174.)

The idea of combining the device of the rime derivative and that of the parole identiche also started in the fifteenth century, but was happily destined never to become popular. Serafino, as might be expected, furnishes us with an example in a strambotto.

Io vivo, non so come al mondo viva,
Senz'alma e senza cor & pur son vivo;
S'io vivo el to bel volto vuol ch'i viva,
& in un momento mi fa morto e vivo . . .
(Le Rime, op. cit., pp. xlii-xliii.)

Of greater interest is the following sonnet by Lodovico Paterno.

Deh, quando sarà mai quel giorno o Dafne,
Che non seguirai più l'orme di Dafni?
S'ancor ti sprezza il giovinetto Dafni,
Volgiti ad altr'obietto, o stolta Dafne.
Hier finì del altr'anno un mese, o Dafne
Ch'ad ognihor hai pregato il tuo bel Dafni:
Tanto in un grave error t'indurò o Dafne.
Ciò volgea fra se stessa; & ecco Dafni
Le sovragiunse da man destra, e, o Dafne
Eterno, disse, amico hor ti fia Dafne.
In vece di risposta corse Dafne,
Come folgor ardente a baciare Dafni,
Ma ratto egli sparì beffando Dafne.
(Nuove fiamme, Lyons, 1568.)

Girolamo Muzio undertook to combine the device of the parole identiche with that of the consonanze in his sonnet "Aura che move . . ." It will be noticed that the only difference between the two rimes is the fact that in one word, pene, the n is single, whereas in the word, penne, it is double.

Aura che movi le veloci penne
Verso colei che move le mie pene,
Già non han l'ale tue cotante penne,
Quant'io porto nel cor gravose pene
Ma se giamai battesti le tue penne
Punta da'sproni d'amorose pene,
Ben mi dovresti un dì prestar le penne
Per isgombrarmi 'l cor da l'aspre pene
L'alma mia al suo desir portan le penne,
Ch'amor fatto pietoso a le sue pene
Ad hora ad hora a lei porge le penne.
Così senz'alma mi ripongo in pene,
Ma s'una volta mi darai le penne,
Sarò con l'alma, & sarò fuor di pene.<sup>20</sup> (Il secondo volume delle rime scelte . . ., Venice, 1565.)

Curious as the Muzio sonnet may seem, even more so is another type of sonnet which combines the devices of the replicazione, aliterazione, and the parole identiche. The usual two alternating rimes are here reduced to a monorime.

Una fiamma ch'eccede ogni gran fiamma,
(Anchor che fiamma non infiammi fiamma)
Con le sue fiamme infiamma ogn'altra fiamma,
Che sia infiammata, e ne la fa sua fiamma;
Io che infiammato mi pascio di fiamma
(Com'huom tenuto a l'amorosa fiamma)
Tosto infiammato fui da questa fiamma,
Ne mi voglio infiammar di nuova fiamma.
Fiamma infiammata de la vera fiamma,
Infiamma anchor con la pietosa fiamma,
La fiamma tua da la mia ardente fiamma,
Che infiammata non fia mai altra fiamma,
Come la fiamma mia de la tua fiamma
E infiammato sarò l'istessa fiamma.<sup>21</sup>
(L. Borra, Le amorose rime, Venice, 1542.)

<sup>20</sup> Cf. Biadene, "Morfologia del sonetto . . .," p. 154.

<sup>21</sup> Also attributed to Mantegna in Rime di diversi . . . Libro quinto . . . On Borra see F. Borri, "Luigi Borri, poeta parmigiano del Cinquecento" in Aurea Parma, xvi (1931).

Un bel lume, ch'illumina ogni lume,
 Anzi toglie col lume a i lumi il lume,
 Illuminò coi lumi ogni mio lume,
 Più che mai lume illuminasse lume:
 Erano i lumi miei privi del lume,
 Che mena i lumi illuminati al lume,
 Quand' i miei lumi illuminò del lume,
 Chi toglie a i lumi ogni terreno lume
 Lume da vero illuminato lume,
 Poi ch'i miei lumi van sprezzando 'l lume
 Cieco apo i lumi del tuo chiaro lume,
 Fa anchor co i lumi i miei lumi pel lume
 Scorta del lume, che ci adduce il lume,
 A te sian lume, com'a me il tuo lume.

(A. Mantegna, Rime di diversi . . . Libro quinto, op. cit.)

Il mio sole luce, e rilucendo, luce
 A gli occhi miei da con sua dolce luce;
 E se adombrata non si sia la luce
 Da qualche nube; eterna havrà la luce . .

(F. Lanci, Per donne romane: Rime di diversi [ed. Manfredi, Bologna, 1575], 762, II.)

Deserving of consideration in a separate group are a number of poems belonging to the seventeenth, eighteenth, and the first quarter of the nineteenth centuries. By this time the Petrarchistic movement had been replaced by Marinism, neo-classicism, etc., and the device of the identical rime words (which may be considered as a typical expression of Petrarchism) was banished from higher literary circles. Nevertheless, it continued to attract a few minor poets and can frequently be found in popular and dialect poetry, notably in the province of Naples, where it was employed for satirical or jocular purposes, and in Sicily, where it was applied to subject-matter of all sorts. The frequent use of the artifice by the Sicilian Petrarchists of the Accademia degli Accesi of Palermo had apparently given it the necessary stamp of authority to insure its transmittance and diffusion in the island for a considerable period of time. The ottava identica became at this stage even more popular than the sonnet.

Two interesting examples in the field of popular poetry are the following:

Parto, resto, non parto, io parto o resto?
 Vorrei restare, ma convien che parto;
 Per cagione d'amor convien che resto

Per cagione d'onor convien che parto.
 Su vincala l'amor; io già mi resto,
 Ma che diràn di me se poi non parto?
 Pena e per me se parto, e più se resto:
 Sempre pena è per me, o resto o parto.<sup>22</sup>
 (In D'Ancona, La poesia popolare italiana [Leghorn, 1906], 442-443.)

Ma chi deve amar voi, se non v'amo io,
 Chi de' amar me, se non m'amate voi?
 Chi de' speiar in voi, se non sper'io,
 Chi de' sperare in me, sola che voi?
 Vostro ben, vostra speme esser vogl'io;
 Mio ben, mia speme esser vogliate voi,
 E sete alfin dentr'al mio miser cuore
 Mio ben, mia speme degna del mio amore.<sup>23</sup>
 (In D'Ancona, op. cit., 458.)

In the Neapolitan dialect we have this amusing instance:

S'ha da fa co no pazzo, e co no ciuccio,
 Che non saie qual e cchiu, si ciuccio, o pazzo.
 Cride, ch'e pazzo, e tte lo truove ciuccio,
 Pienze ch'e cciuccio, e tte lo vide pazzo.
 E mentre 'n dubbeio staie ntra pazzo e ciuccio,
 Te resce sempe ciuccio e sempe pazzo.
 Ca chisso d'ogne tiempo e pazzo e cciuccio,
 Ca chisso d'ogne tiempo e ciuccio e ppazzo.
 Nzomma si lo vuoje pazzo e pazzo e cciuccio,
 E si ciuccio lo vuoje e cciuccio e ppazzo,
 Ch'è cciuccio e pazzo quant'è pazzo e ciuccio,

<sup>22</sup> D'Ancona (p. 443) also cites versions in Calabrian and in the dialect of Caprignano. For other dialect versions see also G. Vignoli, "Il folk-lore di Castro dei Volsci," Studi di Romanzi, XIII (1917), 150. Cf. also a strambotto by Luigi Pulci in Operette inedite 16-18, beginning: "Vo'mi partire & non mi so partire. . ."

<sup>23</sup> This version is from a codex of the seventeenth century. For later versions with the same rime scheme see D'Ancona, op. cit., p. 458. In the Vignoli article just cited another version is reproduced with bibliographical notes, pp. 144-145, indicating where further versions of the octave may be found. Also in the seventeenth century a similar pro-nominal rima identica device was used by Francesco Melosio in a six-line stanza.

E una minchioneria, credilo a me;
 Questi non stentan già per me oper te,
 Ma si ridon bensì di te e di me,
 E vengan pur mille malanni a te.
 Io son disposto sol vivere a me,
 E cancar venga a Francia a Spagna e a te.

See D. Gnoli, "Un freddurista nel Seicento," Nuova Antologia, LVI (1881) 583.

Anze, è tanto se vede e cciuccio e ppazzo,
 Che sempe è assaie chiu pazzo che n'è ciuccio:
 Che sempe è assaie chiu ciuccio che n'è pazzo.<sup>24</sup>

In his Castalia mormorante (Naples, 1679) Gio. Battista Santoro, presumably a Neapolitan, gives us several Tuscanized sonnet versions in which the artifice of the parole identiche is used. These we shall designate only by their rime words: monte-mare (p. 28); anno-giorno (p. 85); vita-morte (p. 140); huomo-Dio (p. 141); Apollo-Astrea (p. 197).

In Sicilian we have more abundant material to draw upon. Melchiorre Pome in La lira, a due corde. Sonetti e canzoni siciliane, eroiche e sacre Corda seconda (Palermo, 1732), wrote ottavas ending with the alternating rime words curuna-canna (67), spata-libru (68), and the following stanza (p. 62) in Amuri-Fortuna.

Ad ogni miu capricciu arrisi Amuri,
 A li mei imprisi militau Fortuna,
 O chi triumfi mi prumisi Amuri,
 O quanti glorij mi mustrau Fortuna.

<sup>24</sup> J. A. Parmiero in La violejda, Collezione di tutti i poemi in lingua napoletana (Naples, 1788), xxxii, 60.

Other interesting illustrations are:

E tanto digno de Vernacchie e Buffe
 Chisto, che ssempe vò Buffe e Bernacchie,
 Che quanno e cchino di Vernacchie e Buffe
 Tanto vole cchiu Buffe e cchiu Vernacchie . . .
 (Parmiero, op. cit., 76.)

Se a lo pertuso se nne stà lo Ragno;
 Si pe li fatte suoie va lo zelluso;
 E ba la Mosca a ttrommenta lo Ragno;
 E la Coppola lieve a lo zelluso . . .
 (Parmiero, op. cit., 103.)

T'avante essere Ammico è Nnamorato
 Ma non si Nnamorato e si Ammico;
 N'aviste tratte maje de Nnamorato,
 Ne viste aggio maje 'ntè parte Ammico . . .
 (Poesie napoletane di Domenico Piccinni [Naples, 1826], 180.)

Compà per chiajetare nce vo l'oro,
 E tutto puoje avere co denare.
 Li muorte pure fa parlare l'orò,
 E niente oggi se fa senza denare . . .
 (Geremia Priscolo: Mescuglia di chellete devote e passaiarelle, Parte seconna (Naples, 1831), p. 89.)

Ora sù cecu, mi tradiu l'Amuri;
 Ora sù nudu mi spughiau Fortuna.
 Mi rubbau l'occhii, e si li misi Amuri; 'Nchiuvau la Rota, e si partiu Fortuna.

The Rev. Sacerdote D. D. Stefano, Beneficial Melchiorre, in his Poesie siciliane, giucose, serie, e morali (Palerma, 1795) published octaves in patri-figghiu (p. 19), hic-haec (p. 177), celu-terra (p. 275), a series of four octaves in vita-morte (p. 288-89). A stanza on p. 11 in hic-haec: Sopra l'Articolo della Menzogna was recited in the Accademia del Buon-gusto.

Chi ci ha stato pri un hoc, un haec un hic?
 Cui dici chi minsogna avissi l'haec,
 Cui la chiama Diabolus, e avi hic,
 E comu Masculinu escludi l'haec.
 Cui la chiama mendacium, e voli hic;
 E comu neutru avi hoc, e un avi l'haec;
 Chi si applichi cui voli all'hoc, e all'hic;
 Pirch'iu mi appighirrà a l'articulu haec.

In the Poesie siciliane (Catania, 1816, 2) by Carlo Felice Gambino there is a curious octave in Anna-annu. Another octave in timu-amu appears on p. 125.

V'amu miu Criaturi, e non vi timu.
 Pirchi non timu veramenti v'amu:
 Comu amannuvi è signu ca non timu,
 Si non vi timu è signu ca iu v'amu.
 Cui non v'ama vi timi; iu non vi timu.
 Miu Diu si v'amu, e timu, amu e non amu.
 Sapiti sulu amannuvi chi timu?
 Ca no lu sacciu si abbastanza v'amu.

Antonio Veneziano, Muse siciliane (Palermo, 1645), 121, imitated the Anguillara octave which we have already cited.

A un motu lu miu focu, acqua, e airu e terra
 Transelementa terra, airu, acqua e focu,
 Und'iu perdu in miu focu, airu, acqua e terra,
 All'occhi l'acqua, a la facci la terra,
 L'airu a la vucca a lu cori lu focu,
 Acqua di chiantu, culuri di terra,
 Suspiri d'airu, arduri di focu.

Another Sicilian, Tommaso Campailla in his poem in volgare italiano, L'Adamo ovvero il mondo creato, poema filosofico (Siracusa, ed. 1783), canto vi, 36, also imitated Anguillara. In the same work four further examples of octaves illustrative of the device of the parole identiche may be found in Canto VII, 116, VIII, 179, IX, 93, XX, 58. Additional Tuscanized compositions employing the artifice were written by Melchiorre Pome, op. cit. They are all sonnets and bear the rimes: mano-senno (52), cielo-mare (139), sole-alba (151), marmo-foco (206).

Other lingering traces of the device of the parole identiche in the literary language may be found in the Rime piacevoli di Giov. Battista Fagioli, parte sesta (Florence, 1734), which contains two sonnets in cielo-terra (pp. 1 and 86). In a manuscript at the University of Chicago Library (MSS XXX, Poesie italiane) there are three anonymous sonnets in pace-guerra.<sup>25</sup>

<sup>25</sup> We reproduce two of them in full partly because they are inedita and partly because they illustrate a use of the sonetto identico which we have not as yet discussed in that we are dealing with an original sonnet and an answer or parody of the same per le rime.

La Guerra Aralda di Pace dedicata alle glorie immortali di Luigi il Grande, Re di Francia e di Navarra.

Guerra a Cesare muove e propon Pace
Pronto sempre egualmente a Pace e Guerra
Quel Re sì glorioso in Guerra e Pace,
Arbitro della Pace, e della Guerra.
Guerra dic'egli io porto, esorto Pace,
Ciò che vuol scielga il mondo o Pace o Guerra Giusta è la Guerra a chi non vuol la Pace,
Bell' è la Pace a chi non vuol la Guerra.
Fin di mia Guerra è il non voler la Guerra,
Voler la Guerra infin d'altrui Pace;
O facciam Pace in Pace o Guerra in Guerra.
Che gran Re? Che gran Guerra? Che gran Pace?
Mandar la Pace a principiar la Guerra,
Mandar la Guerra ad esibir la Pace.
(fol. 424)

Risposta verace

Perfido violator di Guerra e Pace,
Pronto al mal egualmente in Pace e Guerra,
Della fede nemico e della Pace
Muove a Pietro ad Augusto al mondo Guerra,
Se Guerra porti, a che esortar la Pace?
Se Pace esorti a che portar la Guerra?
A Guerra ingiusta a chi desia la Pace?
Giusta è la Pace a chi non muove Guerra.
Il fin della tua Guerra è voler Guerra
Con chi non ama che il sol fin di Pace
Onde non fai che pur la Pace in Guerra.

Though it is now very rarely used for other than satirical purposes in the poetry of our times, the device has not completely gone out of existence in the field of the religious lyric. Nino Oxilia, a young poet who met his death in the World War, has supplied us with an example through his collection—Gli orti: liriche (Milan, 1918).

Dio

Chiudo gli occhi e non vedo altro che buio,
 Apro gli occhi e non vedo altro che luce.
 Se fisso a lungo la violenta luce
 Mi si velano gli occhi e sento il buio.
 Se gli occhi fisso a lungo dentro il buio
 Stellano gli occhi ed io sento la luce.
 Così ritrovo Dio dentro alla luce.
 Così ritrovo Dio se fisso il buio.<sup>26</sup>

The device of the parole identiche prevalent in sixteenth-century Italy soon penetrated into other parts of Europe along with the epidemic of Petrarchism. In France, Du Bellay imitated the anonymous sonnet in Delle rime di diversi . . . in his Olive, sonnet cx.

Dieu, qui changeant avec obscure mort
 Ta bienheureuse & immortelle vie,
 Fus aux pecheurs prodigue de ta vie,
 Pour les tirer de l'eternelle mort:
 Celle pitié coupable de ta mort
 Guide les paz de ma facheuse vie,
 Tant que par toy, a plus joyeuse vie
 Je, soy conduit du travail de la mort.
 N'avise point, o Seigneur! que ma vie
 Se soit noyée aux ondes de la mort
 Qui me destrait d'une si doulce vie:
 Oste la palme a cet' iniuste mort,
 Qui ia s'en va superbe de ma vie
 Et mort soit tousiour pour moy la mort.
 (Marty-Laveaux ed. 136, 1)

---

Re indegno, Guerra infame, affiitta Pace;
 Offrir la Pace per voler la Guerra Voler Guerra, e non voler la Pace.

The third composition is a religious sonnet beginning: Nat'è Gesù, ei della Pace e Guerra . . . (371). Compare with the two sonnets cited above, a sonnet by A. Caro and a parody of the same by Lorenzino de' Medici in Del Lungo's article "Il Kaiser in due sonetti del cinquecento," Giornale d'Italia, Rome, Nov. 20, 1918.

<sup>26</sup> This poem is also quoted in a biographical sketch of Oxilia by M. D. in Nuova antologia, Nov. 16, 1918, pp. 205-07.

But this attempt, which might be expected to have brought about a number of imitations, proved abortive. Perhaps it was because the artifice of the parole identiche was associated with the rime equivоче in the minds of French writers, who ostracized both devices as products of the hated Marotiques.<sup>27</sup> At any rate, a detailed examination of all the major and many minor writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries has resulted in the finding of only one more example of the Italian parole identiche, an octave in Du Bartas' La Première semaine (Paris, 1603), p. 37, which is an imitation of Anguillara's stanza. Readers must, therefore, not accept at its face value the statement regarding the popularity of French versions of this kind made by Janet G. Scott in Les sonnets élizabéthains (Paris, 1929), pp. 40-41.

In Great Britain it fared slightly better. Two examples by Drummond and two by Sidney were pointed out some years ago by L. E. Kastner in "Drummond of Hawthornden and the Poets of the Pléiade," MLR iv (1908), 340-341. One of Sidney's sonnets: "Since that the stormy rage . . .," Arcadia, Bk. III, has the alternating rime words dark and light. The other is in Astrophel and Stella, son. LXXXIX.

Now that of absence the most irksome night
With darkest shade doth overcome my day;
Since Stella's eyes, wont to give me my day,
Leaving my hemisphere, leave me in night;
Each day seems long and longs for long-stayed night;
The night, as tedious, woos th' approach of day;
Tired with the dusty toils of busy day,
Languish'd with horrors of the silent night;
Suffering the both of day and night;
While no night is more dark than is my day.
Nor no day hath less quiet than my night,
With such bad mixture of my night and day,
That living thus in blackest winter night
I feel the flames of hottest Summer day.

Drummond wrote two sonnets with the alternating rime words life and death. One of them "Life to give life . . ." is in his Flowers of Sion; the other, quoted below, may be found in Vol. I of his Poetical Works, (ed. Kastner, Manchester, 1913), p. 45.

<sup>27</sup> Cf. Du Bellay's vigorous attack against the rime équivoque which was doubtless influential in banning the device in La Défense et Illustration de la Langue Française (ed. Chamard, Paris, 1904), pp. 263-265. Estienne Pasquier in his Œuvres (Amsterdam, 1723), I, 738, was one of the few who appreciated the device. "Je mettois volontiers entre nos jeux Poëtiques ce sonnet de du Bellay auquel il s'est joué sur ces deux paroles vie et mort, ce que n'estort que c'est une belle et sainte Oraison qu'il fait a Dieu."

So grievous is my Paine, so painful Life
 That oft I find mee in the Armes of Death,
 But (Breath halfe gone) that Tyrant called Death
 Who other killes, restoreth mee to Life;
 For while I think how Woe shall end with Life,
 And that I quiet Peace shall ioye by Death,
 That Thought even doth o'erpowr the Paines of Death
 And call me home againe to lothed Life;
 Thus doth mine will transcend both Life and Death,
 While no Death is so bad as is my Life
 Nor no Life such which doth not ende by Death,
 And Protean changes t'wine my Death and Life:
 O happie those who in their Birthe finde Death,
 But to languish Heaven affordeth Life.

The device of the parole identiche flourished in Spain, as can be seen from the twenty-seven examples listed below. Quite as early as the Italians the Spaniards showed a great predilection for contrasting rime words in consecutive lines, particularly favoring the opposites muerte and vida or their derivatives.<sup>28</sup> None of them are, however, parole identiche—these were introduced into Spain from Italy not earlier than 1550—but they clearly served to predispose the Spaniards to a ready acceptance of the Italian metrical artifice. Probably the first instance of a Spanish poem with identical rimes in opposites is a sonnet by Hernando de Acuña.

Alma pues hoy el que formò la vida,
 Y el que tiene poder sobre la muerte,
 Solo por remediar tu eterna muerte
 Diò el precio inestimable de su vida.
 Mira que es justo que en tì tengan vida
 Los mèritos y pasos de su muerte;
 Y conoce que es viento, sombra o muerte,
 Quanto el error del mundo llama vida;
 Y asì podràs saliendo desta muerte,
 Entrar en posesi3n de aquella vida,
 Que no acabarà tiempo ni muerte:
 Endereza el camino a mejor vida,
 Dexa el siniestro que te lleva a muerte
 Que el derecho es mäs llano y va a la vida.
 (Varias poestas [Madrid, 1804], 213–214.)<sup>29</sup>

<sup>28</sup> Instances of muerte and vida as end words in successive lines in the Cancionero del Siglo XV, Nueva biblioteca de autores espa1oles, II, which represents only a small portion of the poetic material of the century, are numerous enough to convince anyone that the device was very popular. Compare pp. 19, 38, 47, 125, 228, 247, 256, 531 (3 examples), 567 (2), 592 (2) and 716.

<sup>29</sup> Other sonnets employing the alternating rime words vida and muerte are the following:

The most refreshing and graceful Spanish poem in vida-muerte is an inedited sonnet in the manuscript cancionero Flores de varia poesía,<sup>30</sup> (Mexico, 1577), which occurs after the name of Licenciado Dueñas.

¿Qué es esto, dime Juan? Mi fe de muerte Calla, que vivo estás? Esta no es vida.
 ¿Qué sientes? Eso no diré en mi vida.
 Guarda que morirás. Yo quiero muerte.
 ¿Con qué te alegrarás? Con esta muerte.

---

Christo, Jesus, escudo a nuestra muerte
 Camino cierto, la verdad y vida
 Despues de haber en trabajosa vida
 Al padre satisfecho con su muerte . . .
 (López de Úbeda, Vergel del flores divinas, [Alcalá de Henares, 1588], 69v )

De tí muerto Jesu, nace la vida,
 Que muriendo a la muerte diste muerte
 Y de tu amor, nos vino aquella muerte
 Que nos levanta a nueva y mejor vida . . .
 (Pedro de Padilla, Cancionero espiritual [Madrid, 1585], 87v.)

Translated from Fiamma's Da te morto Giesu . . . Rime spirituali, 332.

El dolor grave de tu acerba muerte
 Dexó en tan triste soledad mi vida
 Ilustre caro amigo, que la vida
 En mí, sin tí, es retrato de la muerte . . .
 (Pedro Láinez in MS Esp 314 of the Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris, fol. 162.)

La vida que yo paso es propia muerte,
 Y aun deve ser peor tan triste vida,
 Porque suele dar sin muerte a la vida,
 Y esta vida no acaba con la muerte . . .
 (idem, op. cit. fol. 23v )

Translated from Goselini's La Vita, Amor, ch'io vivo . . . Rime, 1581.

Triste de mí que bivo ya sin vida
 Y procurando estoy siempre la muerte,
 Pareciendo me ser mejor la muerte,
 Que no tan trabajosa y triste vida . . .
 (Silvestre, Obras iv, Lisbon, 1592, 376.)

Other sonnets in vida-muerte were written by Manuel Ledesma (Cancionero of the Academia de los Nocturnos (Valencia, 1914), 90, iv), Gregorio Ferrer in the same cancionero, III, 60, Luis Gálvez de Montalvo in El pastor de Filida (Orígenes de la novela, 47, II), and an anonymous poet in the Revue hispanique xxxvii (1916), 289.

<sup>30</sup> MS. 2973 (previously M-268) and copy 7982 (previously V-366) in the Biblioteca nacional matritense.

¿Porqué desseas morirte? Por la vida.
 ¿Quién te podrá hazer bien? Quien es mi muerte ¿Quién es tu vida? Quien me da la muerte.
 ¿Pues luego amor te mata? El da la vida.
 ¿De que mal mueres? Que no es mal mi muerte
 Mal es si te haze mal. Tal sea mi vida.
 ¿Tal vida es para que? Para tal muerte.
 ¿Desseas alguna cosa? Que (en) mi vida
 Quisiese conocer quien me da muerte.

(fol. 236)

A very curious sonnet by Mercader in derivatives of vida-muerte deserves citation in full.

Tanto lloro el pensar que siempre	bivo
Y tanto siento el ver que no me	muero
Que en creyendo que vivo entonces	muero
Y en sintiendo que muero, entonces	bivo.
Enbuelto en la mortal angustia	bivo,
Y viendo della el fin, contento	muero;
Así que es la vida el gusto con que	muero,
Con tanto miedo de morirme	bivo,
Que puedo asegurar que siempre	muero
Y que pues no soy muerto siempre	bivo,
De suerte que en un tiempo vivo y	muero,
Pues con la muerte de la pena	bivo,
Y porque no se acabe, no me	muero.

(El prado de Valencia [ed. Merimée, Toulouse, 1907], 210.)

Just as the vida-morte rime probably had its origin in a religious composition, an innovation in gloria-pena introduced by the Spaniards perhaps had a like source. One of these compositions Pedro de Padilla includes in his Cancionero espiritual as a pendant to his vida-muerte translation from Fiamma.

A todo lo que el mundo llama gloria
 Dan los siervos de Dios nombre de pena,
 Porque es cosa imposible no ser pena,
 Lo que priva de eterno bien y gloria.
 Que mal puede quadrar nombre de gloria,
 Al bien que se pretende con tal pena,
 Y el temor de perdelle da más pena
 Que posseelle puede causar gloria.
 Solo Dios tiene verdadera gloria
 En premio prometido de una pena
 Que siempre fué a los justos dulce gloria

Porque tan breve y limitada pena
 No menos asegura que una gloria,
 Libre de miedo, sobresalto y pena.
 (Op. cit., 200v.)<sup>31</sup>

Two non-religious sonnet imitations of the above device are reprinted by Foulchè del Bosc in "136 sonnets anonymes", Revue hispanique, vi (1899), 388, 398.

In two hybrid sonnets, one in hielo-fuego, vida-muerte and the other in fuego-nieve, hielo-llama, Herrera may be following the procedure of Petrarch's sonnet, "Quando'io son . . ."; but in combining two popular forms of the Renaissance parole identiche he has done something for which we find no direct parallel among the Italians.

Ardo Amor, y non enciende el fuego al hielo,
 Y con el hielo no entropezzo al fuego;
 Contrasta el muerto hielo al vivo fuego
 Todo soy vivo fuego y muerto hielo.
 No tiene el frio polo tanto hielo
 Ni ocupa el cerco eterio tanto fuego,
 Tan igual es mi pena que ni el fuego
 Me ofende más ni menos daña el hielo.
 Muero y vivo en la vida, y en la muerte,
 Y la muerte no acaba ni la vida,
 Porque la vida crece con la muerte.
 Tu que puedes hacer la muerte vida,
 Porque me tienes vivo en esta muerte?
 Porque me tienes muerto en esta vida?
 (Biblioteca de autores españoles, xxxii, 342.)

Amor en mi se muestra ardiente fuego
 Y en las entrañas de mi Luz es nieve;
 Fuego no hay que ella no torne nieve
 Ni nieve que no mude yo en mi fuego
 La fría zona abraso con mi fuego
 La torrida mi Luz convierte en nieve;
 Pero no puedo yo encender su nieve,
 Ni ella entibiar la fuerza de mi fuego.
 Contrastan igualmente hielo y llama;
 Que fuera de otra suerte el mundo hielo,
 O su máquina toda viva llama;
 Mas fuera que risuelto ya en hielo
 O el corazón desvanecido en llama,

<sup>31</sup> This sonnet was falsely appropriated by Diego Murillo or his editors in the Divina dulce e provechosa poesía por el padre Fr. Diego Murillo (Zaragoza, 1616), p. 131.

Ni temiera su llama ni su hielo.
(Op. cit., 313.)

Lomas Cantoral's sonnet in día-noche is a translation of Fiorentino's poem in giorno-notte: "Deh non ritorni . . ."

Ay nunca buelva a descubrir al día
El alva, mas perpétua y ciega noche
Cubra este fresco valle, y sea la noche
A mis ojos, Aurora, Sol, y día . . .
(Obras poéticas [Madrid, 1578], 93, II.)<sup>32</sup>

Though Spanish examples of the parole identiche in opposites are common, instances of the other variety in which the rime words need not bear any strict relationship to one another are very rare. The only example of the latter that we have been able to discover is a sonnet by Pedro de Quiros.

A oposición del sol y de los cielos
Hizo el divino autor tu cielo y soles,
Fabricando aquí un cielo con dos soles,
Como allí, Celia, un sol y muchos cielos.
Allí es cristal el sol, zafir los cielos;
Vense aquí en breve cielo grandes soles;
Vese allí breve sol en grandes cielos.
Vencen al cielo y sol tu cielo y soles
Que solo por ser mas que sol y cielos,
Cielos son en beldad y en luz son soles.
Si no les opusieran sol y cielos,
Que siendo tan helados no son soles,
Que siendo tan crueles no son cielos.
(Poesías divinas y humanas [Seville, 1887], 8-9.)

Besides making use of the device of the parole identiche in their sonnets, the Spaniards also employed it in some of their octaves. One of these in claro-oscuro was addressed by Bernardo de Guimerá to El Brocense.

<sup>32</sup> Coming also from the pen of the same author is the only example of the rima derivativa which we have found in Spanish.

Sale la aurora colorada y blanca	Sale encendido el Dios de Cinthio blanco
Con tierno seno regalado y blanco	Y al rayo ardiente de su lumbre blanca
Huye la oscuridad al rostro blanco	Nace el roxo Narciso el lyrio blanco
Y de perlas se ve la tierra blanca.	Abre el sol de su luz mi diosa blanca
Aperece riendo mi luz blanca	Y al vivo resplandor dorado y blanco
De carmesí adornada verde y blanco	Rayos de luz engendró de mí blanca.
Y vuelve al descubrir del bulto blanco	( Op. cit. , 228, III)
Mi noche en clara luz su frente blanca

Qual hace el rutilante Apolo claro
 Todo cuanto la noche tuvo oscuro,
 Así vos maestro mío, lo más oscuro
 Hacéys con excelente ingenio claro
 ¿Qué autor uvo hasta agora menos claro
 O que menos deviera estar oscuro
 Que Juan de Mena? cuyo poema oscuro,
 Queda por vuestra industria buelto claro.<sup>33</sup>

Diego d'Avalos y Figueroa in his Miscelánea Austral (Lima, Peru, 1603), p. 20, translated Alamanni's stanza in vita-sempre, op. cit.; while Hojeda in La Cristiada, Biblioteca de autores españoles xxix, Bk. III, 425, wrote an octave in vida-muerte. In addition to these there are several octaves modelled upon Anguillara's jeu de mots, op. cit., by Balbuena in El Bernardo (B. A. E. xvii, 300), Acevedo in Creación del mundo (B. A. E. xxix, 247) and Tejada in Gallardo's Ensayo de una biblioteca española . . . (Madrid, 1863), iv, 1069-70. two examples.<sup>34</sup>

In Portugal where the tradition of the rima equivoca prevailed longer than in other countries, the artifice of the parole identiche is seldom found. We quote a sonnet by Fray Agostin da Cruz and an octave by Pedro Andrade de Caminha both belonging to the first division of the sonetto identico and ottava identica.

Amor truxe a Jesus da gloria a cruz,
 Amor nos leva a nos da cruz a gloria,
 Amor nos descobrió gloria na cruz,
 Amor nos deo na cruz posse da gloria.
 Amor me de a gloria pela cruz
 Amor de cruz ensena amor de gloria,
 Amor que gloria quer, funda-se em cruz.
 Amor fundado em cruz para na gloria.
 Amor e peso igual de gloria e cruz
 Amor nuve e de cruz, e sol de gloria.

<sup>33</sup> In Sanctii Brocensis, Opera Omnia (Geneva, 1776), iv, 222. See E. Buceta, "La crítica de la oscuridad sobre poetas anteriores a Góngora," Revista de filología española, viii (1921), 180.

<sup>34</sup> In closing our discussion of the subject with reference to Spain it is of some interest to cite a curious opinion on the rima equivoca given by Juan Díaz Rengifo in his Arte poética española (Salamanca, 1592), p. 123. "De mas de esto muchos usan él, de él, a él, como consonantes diferentes, siendo uno el significado con diferentes modos; luego tambien se podría usar el cielo, de el cielo a el cielo, aunque fuese una la cosa significada, pues el modo de significarse es tambien diferente." But on p. 124 he says: "Y si un vocablo se pusiere por consonante de sí mismo, no haviendo variedad en la significación, causara enfado. De donde concluyo, que es de esencia de el consonante el ser diverso en el significado, aunque en la voz sea uno mismo, y que no basta de ordinario la diversidad de los casos, sino que es menester haya diversidad en las cosas."

Amor porto e de gloria en mar de cruz,
 Amor ama na cruz, goza de gloria,
 Amor une ceo, terra, gloria e cruz,
 Amor donde ha mor cruz, tira mor gloria.
 (Obras [Coimbra, 1918], 198)<sup>35</sup>

Muitas vezes dao versos nome e vida
 A muitos que nam tem vida. nem nome:
 Filis da a quem canta nome e vida
 E o versos em que a canta vida e nome;
 Que como faltara nome nem vida
 A quem cantar tal vida e de tal nome?
 Quem quizer nome e vida, cante a Filis.
 Que vida e nome da o canto de Filis.
 (Poezias [ed. Caminha, Lisbon, 1791], 394.)

Although the sonnet form appeared in Germany for the first time in 1556 in Wirsung's translation of a work of Ochino, it was not until the last part of the seventeenth century that it became established, largely through the efforts of Weckerlin. Since by that time the vogue of the parole identiche had practically disappeared, we cannot expect to find many examples of our artifice in this language. Among the few writers who employed it was Franz Freiherrn Gaudy, who gives us—Sammliche Werke (ed. A. Mueller Berlin, 1844) VIII, 56—a bizarre adaptation of Berni's Ser Cecco . . .

Don Pedro kann nicht leben ohne Frauen,
 So wenig wie die Frauen ohne Pedro,
 Und wo du Frauen siehst, triffst du Don Pedro
 Und wo Don Pedro'n, triffst du auch die Frauen.
 Doch was beginnt Don Pedro mit den Frauen?
 Dasselbe was die Frauen mit Don Pedro:
 Stadtklatschereien referirt Don Pedro,
 Stadtklatscherei'n berichten ihm die Frauen.
 Die Frauen, sie verehren hoch Don Pedro,
 Und hoch verehrt Don Pedro auch die Frauen.
 O sel'ge Frauen, dreimal sel'ger Pedro!
 Mich überlauft ein Frösteln und ein Grauen,
 Muss ich die Frau'n und ihren theuren Pedro
 Bei'm Hofedienst der Assembleen schauen!

By extending the study on the parole identiche made by Parodi we have shown that the device has had a practically unbroken continuity from the earliest period of Italian literature to the present time. It was first employed rather infrequently, and was limited to two or three repetitions, identical in meaning, of the same rime word. During the first part of the Quattrocento its use was greatly expanded, and found its most natural habitat in the octave of the sonnet, whose two normal rimes made it easy to pair the identical rime words. Later, perhaps not until the beginning of the Cinquecento, the device was further extended to the sestet. This extension was doubtless patterned on a similar practice, which was regarded as elegant, that prevailed in the use of the rima equivoca<sup>36</sup>. Indeed, the sonetto identico seems to be scarcely more than an illegitimate offspring of the sonetto equivoco. The sonetto continuo form of the sonetto identico was adopted with alacrity by the Petrarchists, who showed a special preference for identical rime words in which the two rime words are antonyms, a natural expression of their excessive love of antitheses developed by their bookish imitation of Petrarch's Canzoniere. After Petrarchism, the provinces largely inherited the new rhetorical tradition. The simple type of our first subdivision of the parole identiche artifice also became popular and many fresh variations of the jeu de mots composed of alternating contrasting rime words made their appearance. Berni's satirical sonnet, an original application of a device crystallized by the school of Petrarch, found echoes in dialectal and Tuscanized poems, not only serving as a stimulating influence in the diffusion of the artifice, but also as a powerful agency in keeping it alive until our day.

<sup>35</sup> Also in the Coimbra Archivio bibliografico (1901), p. 192.

The spread of Petrarchism outside of Italy brought about the introduction of the parole identiche into other countries. In France, England, Portugal, and Germany, it soon died from inanition. But in Spain, in the guise of the form most favored by the Italian Petrarchists—the parole identiche in opposites—it proved to be just what the Spaniards wanted in order to give vent in a new way to their inordinate affection for contrasts in rime, the outgrowth, as we have seen, of a long native tradition. The fact that the bulk of the Spanish poems using this device were written during the last quarter of the sixteenth century is highly significant in that it demonstrates how the more artificial manifestations of Petrarchism (including the imitations of the Quattrocentists like Tebaldeo, Aquilano, and Panfilo Sasso) were playing their part in helping to create the movements known a little later as conceptismo and culturanismo.

JOSEPH G. FUCILLA

Northwestern University

<sup>36</sup> Antonio da Tempo writes, in the oldest of Italian verse treatises: "Non tamen necesse est, quod totus sonettus habeat equivocationes, licet pulchrius et elegantius facere sive compilare unum sonettum totaliter in consonantibus equivocis quam particulariter." (Delle rime volgari [Bologna ed. 1869], p. 161.)

SIDNEY'S ASTROPHEL AND STELLA RECONSIDERED

THE question I propose to discuss is that of the autobiographical element in Sidney's sonnet sequence, Astrophel and Stella. The discussion appears in all the older important studies of Sidney: those of Grosart, Symonds, Pollard, Fox-Bourne, Lee, Drinkwater, and Wallace, as well as in the two recent biographies by Miss Denkinger and Mrs. Wilson, and the study by Dr. Purcell.<sup>1</sup> But the verdict of these critics is divided. Also in my belief I have found certain new and valid arguments that the sonnets are not autobiographical, that is, that they do not record a deeply felt love of Sidney for Stella.

The argument in favor of the autobiographical nature of the poems rests primarily upon the reader's emotional reaction to the text. The critics who accept this argument admit that the first thirty-two sonnets are conventional and artificial; they add, however, that with sonnet 33, which expresses Astrophel's regret at losing Stella through his own hesitancy, the tone changes, and feeling so poignant is expressed that it must be based on reality. The object of his passion was traditionally Penelope Devereux, who, in 1576, was engaged to Sidney, and who, in 1581, married Lord Rich. This identification was supported by two sonnets, 24 and 37, which pun sarcastically on the word "rich," and which were interpreted as attacks on Stella's husband. Astrophel and Stella was accordingly assigned to the year 1581 and after.

While agreeing with these critics that the tone of the series from 1 to 33 is light and artificial, I cannot agree that it changes materially afterward, certainly not until 62 at least.<sup>2</sup> In general, up to this sonnet Sidney rings infinite changes on the Petrarchan cruel mistress theme. After 62, in which Stella admits that she loves Astrophel with reservations, the tone does grow warmer, but artificialities persist to the end.<sup>4</sup> I think that those who find deep emotion in the later poems have deceived themselves by assuming that the moods of regret and bitterness recorded in Sonnet 33 were permanent, and by allowing this assumption to color their reading. After 33 there are admittedly a number of sonnets that show some feeling, but it does not follow that they must therefore be autobiographical. Those who hold this view seem to me to forget the nature of lyric poetry or to define it very narrowly. They say: There is deep emotion here, the poem moves us profoundly when we read it. Therefore it must spring from the poet's own experience, and must reflect his firm convictions and his true character. They would surely hesitate to apply this standard of judgment to other types of poetry, such as narrative or dramatic poetry, yet lyric poetry is of the same stuff; it may display emotions other than settled convictions, and may make statements that are incorrect in fact. If we must take it literally, we arrive at absurdities. Shakespeare, for instance, was not elderly, although he says he was, when he wrote:

<sup>1</sup> Grosart, A. B., The Complete Poems of . . . Sidney, 1877; Symonds, J. A., Sir Philip Sidney (English Men of Letters Series), 1886; Pollard, A. W., Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophel and Stella, 1888; Fox-Bourne, H. R., Sir Philip Sidney, 1891; Lee, S. L., Great Englishmen of the Sixteenth Century, 1904; Drinkwater, J., The Poems of Sir Philip Sidney (Muses Library), 1910; Wallace, M. W., The Life of Sir Philip Sidney, 1915; Denkinger, E., Immortal Sidney, 1931; Wilson, Mona, Astrophel and Stella, 1931; Wilson, Mona, Sir Philip Sidney, 1932; Purcell, J. M., Sidney's Stella, 1934. In addition to these authors, there are comments in the important histories of English literature, and in special studies of Renaissance and Elizabethan literature.

<sup>2</sup> I can find no spark of genuine passion, and hence no change of tone, in the following: 42, Turn not away your eyes; if they kill me, a death caused by love is a triumph; 43, Cupid plays in Stella's eyes, lips, etc., but when he wishes to be undisturbed he retires to her heart, for no one can approach there; 44, Stella is pitiless, her nature is so heavenly that his complaints turn to tunes of joy at her ears; 46, He pities Cupid whom she has banished from her face, and will intercede for Cupid; 48, He is wounded by her eyes; let her keep gazing at him and slay him with speed; 49, As he rides his horse, so love rides him; the curb is fear, the saddle is fancy, etc.

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
 When yellow leaves, or none or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold.

I do not deny that a great deal of lyric poetry is written from the heart; I only protest against the theory that it must necessarily be so written. It can equally well spring from the poet's dramatic imagination working on the mood of the moment. Examples come readily to mind: Burns's lyrics, Byron's lyrics, Wordsworth's "Lucy" poems. Who would pronounce with certainty on the element of reality in them by merely reading the text?

If, therefore, we can find no proof of autobiography in the tone of the Astrophel and Stella sonnets taken by themselves, we must look beyond the text for supporting evidence in Sidney's character and environment.

<sup>4</sup> In 79 her kiss is the sweetness of sweetness, the pleasingest consort which guides Venus's chariot, the best charge and bravest retreat in Cupid's fight, a double key to her heart, a nest of young joys, a schoolmaster of delight, a friendly fray, a pretty death, poor hope's first wealth, a hostage of promised weal, and the breakfast of love; in 80 her sweet swelling lip is a succession of equally striking things; 89 is a tour de force, with every line ending in either "night" or "day"; in 101, when Stella is sick, Sweetness, Grace, and Beauty are sick, Joy weeps, Love moans, and Nature "sweats with care"; in 102 Stella's cheeks are pale in order that love may have paper perfectly white on which to write his story in beauty's reddest ink.

As for his character, all the critics, if I understand them, are in general agreement. He was serious, even grave, hot-tempered, but not impulsive in other ways; had a high sense of chivalrous and idealistic honor; and was ambitious to have a part in affairs of state. This evidence makes it seem very unlikely that Sidney would fall violently in love with any married woman, particularly the moment she married someone else, that he would be so carried away by his love as to try to make her his mistress, and that he would record these actions in poetry. Yet, with one exception, the critics have overlooked this difficulty.<sup>4</sup>

As for his environment, we must remember that he was not a modern gentleman but a Renaissance courtier, and hence was governed by a different code. A knowledge of literature was of course expected of him, but in judging it he stressed the moral element far more than we should be inclined to do. To be convinced of this, we have only to recall whole sections of his Defence of Poesy, in which, echoing the classic critics, he prefers poetry to history or philosophy as a means of inculcating truth and virtue. Poetry's advantage over history, we may remember, lies in the circumstance that it is not tied down to facts. Taken as a whole, The Defence of Poesy indicates that Sidney regarded poetry as an art and not as an expression of reality.

In addition to reading poetry, the Renaissance courtier was expected to write it. In meeting this social obligation, Sidney would find that he had a literary vehicle ready to his hand in a Neo-Platonic sonnet sequence modelled on Petrarch's sonnets to Laura. So many of these had been written that the poetry had become fixed in a conventional form: the man's love, roused by the lady's beauty, is at first sensuous; she refuses to yield and he bemoans her cruelty; gradually, under the influence of her staunch Platonism, his sensuous love is refined and elevated to spiritual love, and finally, if the process is carried to completion, to religious love which leaves behind earthly love in any form. Obviously, these poems were not taken very seriously, the more ardent was the declaration of passion, the more complimented the lady felt, and the more readily she handed the poems about to her friends. The question of the indelicacy of such a proceeding did not arise. So it is in Sidney's case, for Astrophel and Stella circulated freely in manuscript, as is proved by references in the text itself.<sup>5</sup> It is perhaps unsafe to argue that the poems, unless known to be convention, would have given offence in the somewhat free and easy court of Elizabeth, or that their moral respectability is guaranteed by the later editorial sanction of such a woman as Sidney's sister, the Countess of Pembroke, but it is not unsafe to argue that Sidney himself would have shrunk from exposing his real feelings in such a manner.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>4</sup> My view is shared by Fox-Bourne (Sir Philip Sidney, p. 241), Courthopc (A History of English Poetry, II, 228), Fletcher (Modern Philology, v, 264), and Drinkwater (The Poems of Sir Philip Sidney, p. 52). Wallace, the only one of the opposition who seems conscious of this difficulty, says that Sidney would have condoned moral lapses and justified himself in his own eyes during the affair with Stella (The Life of Sir Philip Sidney, pp. 237 and 255). In my opinion, Wallace makes Sidney indulge in far too much sophistry that is modern in tone.

We should, moreover, remember that Astrophel and Stella, preceded by only a few individual sonnets, is the first sequence of love sonnets in English. This important fact I have never seen sufficiently emphasized. Sidney was a pioneer. His model, since the prevailing literary theory of the 1570's called for imitation rather than originality of form and substance, had, therefore, to be a foreign one. Accordingly, he turned to Petrarch and to his host of Italian and French imitators. For a man like Sidney, who was a poet only among other things, to attain a high degree of success in transplanting a difficult foreign literary convention is in itself a great accomplishment. It is too much to expect a man in his circumstances and with his background to launch forth on the uncharted seas of personal revelation. "Real love" is a term incapable of exact definition, but nevertheless there can be no mistaking what, in Sidney's case, the critics mean by it. They mean a love for a specific woman which is

<sup>5</sup> Such are the following:

She heard my plaints, and did not only hear,
But them, so sweet is she, most sweetly sing,

(Sonnet 57)

How falls it then, that with so smooth an ease
My thoughts I speak; and what I speak doth flow
In verse, and that my verse best wits doth please?

(Sonnet 74)

My Muse, to some ears not unsweet;
I thought each place was dark but where thy light would be,
And all ears worse than deaf that heard not out thy story.
I said thou wert most fair . . .

(Sonnet 84)

And all I said so well, as no man it denied.

(Song 5)

<sup>6</sup> Only three critics have faced this difficulty: Miss Denkinger argues that only Stella would recognize the signs of true passion. The others, looking merely for convention, would find that and no more (Immortal Sidney, p. 180). This argument is too flattering to our self-esteem. How could a fact obvious to us be hidden from Sidney's contemporaries? We are in possession of no evidence unknown to them. I do not think our brains more acute than any then functioning in Elizabeth's court. Symonds (Sir Philip Sidney, p. 148) and Wallace (The Life of Sir Philip Sidney, pp. 255-256) say that the poems did not circulate and Wallace adds that "probably many of his best friends, like Languet, were unaware of their existence" (ibid., p. 231). Yet, as we have just seen, the fact of their general circulation is proved.

both physical and spiritual, a love so deep that, for a time at least, the whole course of his life was changed. This is the emotion that in all probability is lacking in Astrophel and Stella.

How then did the poems come to be written? From what source did Sidney get his emotional inspiration? For certainly emotion of some kind is necessary in the creation of fine poetry; it cannot be produced from the brain alone. If he had a definite woman in his mind and heart, he might well have felt for her a Platonic affection. Neo-Platonism was in the air he breathed and must have deeply affected a nature as idealistic as his. Indeed, since Neo-Platonism was, in literature, blended with the Petrarchan mistress-servant convention, going back as this does to chivalry and courtly love, it would have had a double appeal. To Sidney such a Platonic affection might well have furnished sufficient motive power for his poetry. But whether or not Platonic love animated him, his purely artistic impulse was certainly strong. There are many indications that Sidney was fundamentally an artist, a man bent simply on creating beauty. This statement does not rule out the possibility of real emotion; it means that to an artist a little reality goes a long way, the emotion being largely supplied by the very act of creation. Grierson puts it well when he says:

Poetry is the language of passion, but the passion which moves the poet most constantly is the delight of making poetry, and very little is sufficient to quicken the imagination to its congenial task. Our soberer minds are apt to think that there must be an actual, particular experience behind every sincere poem. But history refutes the idea of such a simple relation between experience and art.<sup>7</sup>

In creating, then, the artist is in a partly emotional, partly critical state of mind; he is strongly moved, but at the same time is able to hold his work at arm's length and analyse it. This artistic detachment, as it might be called, may appear in the writer's attitude toward either the substance or the form of his work. He may be interested in the general dramatic possibilities of the situation he is creating or in the technique of his art. In his various works, Sidney shows an interest in both aspects of writing. The Arcadia, with its lyrics in classical quantitative meters, shows him experimenting in the technique of poetry.<sup>8</sup> The Defence of Poesy, as we have seen, indicates that Sidney regarded poetry as dramatic art; and one of its few original passages again displays his interest in technique, the passage in which he discusses the fitness of various languages for poetry and similar prosodical matters.<sup>9</sup> In the case of Astrophel and Stella, also, there are strong indications that he regarded this sequence, like any poetry, as dramatic art. In this connection the date of composition is of some importance. The traditional date, 1581, is based largely on an interpretation of sonnet 30 which assigns to that year allusions to the political situation in various European countries. Dr. Purcell, however, argues for the year 1573, and my own independent investigation has tended to corroborate this view. There is a strong, though not conclusive case for the opinion that one sonnet at least was written in this earlier year.<sup>10</sup> If this point could be definitely established, it would be almost decisive, for in 1573 Sidney was in Italy in the midst of the grand tour that occupied him for three years. He was absorbed in the political, social, and artistic life of the countries he visited. His correspondence with Languet gives no hint of his being in love, and shows him to be in a state of mind wholly different from the passion and despair of Astrophel. He was, however, in direct contact with poets who were daily writing love sonnets to their mistresses, imaginary, Platonic, or otherwise in such enormous numbers that about three thousand were published in four years (1570-73) in northern Italy alone.<sup>11</sup> He very naturally tried his hand at the game, his motive being, perhaps, the same one that later animated both Spenser and Milton; he would write poetry that would put England on an artistic level with other countries. The date, however, is not vital to my argument. Even if we accept 1581 as correct, we should remember the great influence that Sidney's Italian experience must have had on his poetry. The Petrarchan tradition to <sup>9</sup> There is one passage that Wallace (The Life of Sir Philip Sidney, p. 248) finds significant: "But as I never desired the title [of poet] so have I neglected the means to come by it. Only, overmastered by some thoughts, I yielded an inky tribute unto them" Of this Wallace says. "Surely the natural interpretation of these words is that Sidney sought in his sonnets, or in those of them which he has in mind, to give expression to an overmastering passion which possessed him." To my mind a more natural interpretation is that Sidney is yielding to the poetic urge, to the overmastering desire for artistic expression which every artist must feel.

<sup>7</sup> Grierson, H. J. C., Donne's Poetical Works (1929), II, xxiii.

<sup>8</sup> This fact is of course connected with Sidney's membership in the Areopagus, a group interested in metrical experiment.

<sup>10</sup> The historical argument may be reinforced by a psychological one. The poem is a mere rhetorical exercise. A series of questions are asked Sidney regarding, in order, Turkey, Poland, France, Holland, Ireland, Scotland, he answers at random because he is thinking of Stella. It seems likely that he would begin the poem with references to what would first occur to him, the political events most in his mind at the time. In Italy in 1573 there was great concern over a possible Turkish naval attack, and Sidney was anxious to visit Poland, as he later did. In England in 1581, neither of these countries had any importance for him. Elizabeth's French marriage was the question that was of first importance, to which the sonnet makes no allusion.

<sup>11</sup> This estimate is based on the bibliography of Hugues Vaganay, Le Sonnet en Italie et en France en XVI<sup>e</sup> Siècle.

which he had been long exposed would have been hardly less fresh in his mind later in England than in Italy itself. It seems highly probable, therefore, that Sidney's artistry was responsible for the substance of Astrophel and Stella. And not only for its substance but for its form also, as is shown by the metrics of the interspersed lyrics. This fact has never before been noted, but it is highly significant. We find the metrical structure of the songs to be as follows:

1. iambic, 5 feet. a a b a. a's feminine rhymes
2. trochaic, 4 feet. a b b a. a's feminine rhymes.
3. iambic, 4 lines 6 feet, 2 lines 5 feet. a a b b c c. c's feminine rhymes.
4. trochaic, 4 feet. a a b b c c.
5. iambic, 6 feet. a a b c c b. almost all b's feminine rhymes
6. iambic, 3 feet. a b a b c c.
7. iambic 7 feet. a a b b c c.
8. trochaic, 4 feet. a a b b. b's feminine rhymes.
9. trochaic, 4 feet. a b a b b. b's feminine rhymes.
10. trochaic, 4 feet. a a b c c b. b's feminine rhymes.
11. trochaic, 4 feet. a b a b a. b's feminine rhymes.

Throughout the table, the suggestion of metrical experiment is strong, but it is almost overwhelming in the last four songs, where, keeping the same meter, Sidney has tried various rhyme schemes. It seems nearly certain that in this portion at least of Astrophel and Stella he is the conscious artist deliberately exploring the possibilities of lyric poetry, and not the lover hurried on by the pressure of a passionate reality. Yet 8 and 10 record his two attempts to persuade Stella to yield, and are the two poems which are supposed to be the most intimate in tone. I do not say that metrical experiment cannot go with real emotion, but I do say that it is very unlikely to do so.

I assume, then, that in writing Astrophel and Stella Sidney had a mixture of motives. He was just possibly giving utterance to a Platonic affection, perhaps emulating his Italian friends, perhaps honoring his country by his poetical efforts, and almost certainly giving himself the pleasure of artistic self-expression. Any of these motives, singly or in combination, would be quite sufficient to serve as the driving power of the poems.<sup>11a</sup>

If we assume such a mixture of motives, we find that Astrophel and Stella may be readily analysed. The story is a simple one, and the plot would require little dramatic imagination to construct.<sup>12</sup> The action does not begin until sonnet 62; up to this point Stella has given her lover no encouragement and he is in despair.<sup>13</sup> But Sidney has by this time rung all the changes he can think of on the themes of praise and desperation and now seeks variety. This he provides in two ways. he introduces songs, nine of the eleven coming between sonnets 63 and 87, and he makes Stella admit a qualified affection. This new situation provides material for ten sonnets, he expresses great gladness and rejoices in the signs of yielding he detects in her; in spite of her Platonic admonitions, he feels real desire. Then, proceeding a step further, he steals a kiss while she is asleep. This stolen sweet gives a fresh inspiration, expressed with extreme ingenuity, for ten more sonnets. Finally, having exhausted the poetic possibilities of even this prodigious kiss, Astrophel, like Oliver Twist, asks for more. Then follow her refusals, and his relapse into despair, though despair of a somewhat different quality from that shown in the beginning. Sidney intended, I think, to have Astrophel in the end shake off his love, following the approved Platonic pattern, and wrote "Leave me, O Love, which reachest but to dust" to serve as a conclusion.

<sup>11a</sup> Miss L. E. Pearson (Elizabethan Love Conventions, 1933, pp. 84-103) feels that Astrophel and Stella is a deliberate exposition of Sidney's philosophy of love: the necessity of the triumph of spiritual over physical love.

The foregoing analysis makes it easy to explain two details which are used as evidence of autobiography. The first is the existence of the two "rich" sonnets in the series. These are simply the result of Sidney's desire to imitate the plays on words in Petrarch's sonnets, and by his native Elizabethan fondness for puns. He had only to provide Stella with a rich husband, remembering, perhaps, certain poems of Marot which attack riches,<sup>14</sup> or the law of courtly love to the effect that avarice has no place in love. We have, therefore, in 24 a rich fool possessing Stella who can appreciate only money; and we have in 37 Stella rich in all desirable qualities, and having "no misfortune but that rich she is."<sup>15</sup> With these sonnets should be placed 78 since it also refers to Stella's husband: Jealousy is a monster; it is a pity that such a beast lacks horns. These three poems paint a picture of a conventional triangle. It is im-

<sup>12</sup> Mrs. Wilson feels that the action is very complicated and that "its advance and recoil, its recurrent and varied crises" were beyond Sidney's dramatic power (Sir Philip Sidney, p. 203). I feel that Mrs. Wilson confuses variety of mood with subtlety of plot. Sidney reacts in various ways to the same fundamental situation.

<sup>13</sup> Stella is as usual married. But in sonnet 33 Sidney has one really original and dramatic idea which he makes the most of: he might have married her himself if only he had not hesitated. This fact makes his despair the greater.

<sup>14</sup> Epigramme CCXVIII, which points out that a certain rich man is distinguished only for his wealth; and Chanson XIX, which curses the wealth that has caused his mistress to marry another.

<sup>15</sup> The spelling of "Rich" with a capital in this line in the 1598 edition, a point which militates against my theory, may be due solely to the printer.

portant to realize that the poems still have point even though there is no individual named Rich concerned in them. The fact that Penelope Devereux married a Lord Rich is merely a coincidence that confuses the issue. The second detail is the fact that four poems or parts of poems did not appear in the manuscripts or in the first printed edition of 1591, but were added by the Countess of Pembroke in her edition of 1598.<sup>16</sup> The explanation of this fact is very simple. Sidney did not circulate these poems, because he could not. They were not written when the finished manuscript was handed about, but were afterthoughts which came to him when he was revising his work. He thought of another punning sonnet on "rich," and wrote 37. He read over song 8, and, re-inspired by its dramatic situation, added the verses giving Stella's refusal of Astrophel's plea that she yield to him. The new version is much better psychologically and poetically. In song 10 he simply elaborated the thought. The evidence for the origin of these poems seems clear, but in the last case, that of song 11, it is almost beyond dispute. The significant fact here is that this song immediately follows sonnet 104. I imagine Sidney rereading this:

Envious wits, what hath been mine offence,
That with such poisonous care my looks you mark,
That to each word, nay sigh of mine, you hark,
As grudging me my sorrow's eloquence?
Ah, is it not enough, that I am thence,
Thence, so far thence, that scarcely any spark
Of comfort dare come to this dungeon dark,
Where rigour's exile locks up all my sense?
But if I by a happy window pass,
If I but stars upon mine armour bear—
Sick, thirsty, glad (though but of empty glass)—
Your moral notes straight my hid meaning tear
From out my ribs, and puffing, prove that I
Do Stella love: fools, who doth it deny?

And I imagine him struck by one phrase, "But if I by a happy window <sup>16</sup> These were: Sonnet 37, the second "rich" sonnet; stanzas 18-25 of song 8, giving Stella's refusal to yield; stanzas 5, 6, and 7 of song 10 which detail the delights of Stella's love that he bids his thoughts to dwell on; song 11, which records an interview under Stella's window. These are said to be the most intimate of the series, and to have been withheld from circulating with the others because of a desire on Sidney's part to spare Stella from too intimate an avowal of passion in public. Why 24, the other "rich" sonnet, was allowed to circulate when 37 was withheld is unexplained; but it is said to have been placed before 33, which mentions Stella's marriage, in order to disguise its intimate nature. No other sonnet is supposed to be so displaced. Again I think that the critics are reading passion into the text. These poems are no more revealing than many others.

pass." Why yes! There was a possibility he had not made use of. Song 11, giving Astrophel's interview with Stella beneath her window, is inserted immediately afterwards. It would seem, therefore, that the foregoing theory of the origin and development of the series explains all the facts.<sup>17</sup>

My main conclusion is this: Astrophel and Stella is a series of Petrarchan love sonnets. Sidney's purely artistic impulse was the chief motivating force, the emotion of joy in the creation of a thing of beauty. I read the series as a Renaissance production which follows the fashion of the time. I think that it was accepted by contemporaries without question simply as an unusually skillful example of courtly compliment, and I think that this very skill of Sidney's in dramatic imagination, and the fact that the Petrarchan convention has become obsolete, have misled some critics into judging Astrophel and Stella by the standards of the twentieth rather than of the sixteenth century.

THEODORE HOWARD BANKS

Wesleyan University

<sup>17</sup> The argument for autobiography derived from the last line of sonnet 1, "Fool, said my muse to me, look in thy heart and write," is based on the fallacy discussed earlier, that of taking the statements of lyric poetry literally. The more Sidney protests his sincerity, the more he compliments the lady. Moreover, the line may be interpreted as meaning that when he looks in his heart he sees Stella's image there, in which case it is merely a variant of one of the tritest of Renaissance conceits.

SIDNEY'S ASTROPHEL AND STELLA
AND GREVILLE'S CÆLICA

STUDENTS of Elizabethan sonnet literature have been aware of general resemblances between Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophel and Stella and Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke's Calica, but no one has ever printed a full comparison of the two sonnet sequences. That we might expect to find some resemblances between the works of Greville and Sidney could be implied from what we know of the close relationship of the two men. The title-page of the 1633 edition of Greville's works describes them as "written in his youth and familiar exercise with Sir Philip Sidney." Greville and Dyer were Sidney's closest literary friends, both sharing equally Sidney's books at his death. Greville was a member of the Areopagus, whatever its nature might be; and he and Sidney entered Shrewsbury School on the same day, and left college and went up to Court together. One of Greville's greatest boasts was his friendship with Sir Philip. It is not surprising, therefore, that when Sidney started to write a sonnet sequence Greville should follow suit, for the two men's interests were much the same. The similarities of Astrophel and Stella and Cælica are the natural results of the poets' friendship.

The correspondence of the names Stella and Calica is brought out by that of the poetic names of their lovers. Sidney as Astrophel, lover of the star, corresponds to Philocell (LXXVI, 219), lover of Cælica.

(The following parallel columns show the close relationship in thought and structure of the Sidney and Greville sonnets. The word sonnet is used in the loose Elizabethan sense.)

Astrophel and StellaCælica

I. First word is Loving. Lines 1-4 are united by reduplication of key words Loving, love; pleasure, pleasure; read, reading; know, knowledge; pity, pity.

I. First word is Love. Lines 1-4 are united by reduplication of key words. Delight, delight; virtue, virtue; reason, reason.

II. The poet says that he uses his wit to make himself believe he is not sick of love (12-13). Sidney says that his words of love may help to relieve his distress.

II. The poet says that the tongue of love can cure the injuries it causes (14). Greville asks love to bring words to help him in his distress.

III. Sidney says that fine words and fancies cannot adequately describe his loved one. (Sidney is criticizing just

III. Greville attempts with fine words and metaphors to describe his loved one.

Astrophel and Stella

the faults which Greville's Sonnet III exhibits.)

IV. Now that the poet is in love, he finds it difficult to maintain a virtuous mind (8).

V. In spite of all things, says the poet, "I must Stella love" (14).—Our thoughts ought to be on the "heavenly part." But the poet's are on love (1-4; 14).

VI. The first four lines of this sonnet are an obvious parody of the first four lines of Sonnet V of Callica.

VII. Stella's eyes have been the most effective instrument in making the poet love Stella.

VIII. Love lies in the poet's heart and cannot leave it.

The poet insists he will never change his attitude toward Stella.

Love is said to have wandered from place to place until it reached the poet's heart, and now it must remain there.

IX. "And poor I am their [Stella's eyes] straw" (14). The beauty of Stella has overcome the poet.

X. There is no kinship between love and reason (1, 2). One look from Stella's eyes will overthrow all the power of reason (12, 13).

XI. Love is called boyish as opposed to seriousness (1-2). The lover was attracted to Stella by her "each outward part"—eyes, cheek, and breast—(10-13). But the poet is cautioned not to attempt to win her love (14).

Callica

XI. Fear keeps lust repressed (8) until love (Cupid) enters the heart, and then lust cannot be restrained (10-14).

IV. "I have vowed . . . To love and never seek compassion" (13-14); and "thoughts from above" are over ruled by love (7-8).

V. The first four lines are parodied by Sidney's Sonnet VI.

VI. The poet's own eyes have been the instrument by which he has been brought to love his mistress.

VII. In Myra's eyes is the "doom of all change" (18).

Myra never varies (17), and all change in the universe is doomed to subordination to her. The universe has been undergoing constant change, but Myra remains constant and unchanging. The universe ceases changing when it comes before Myra's eyes.

VIII. "Self-pity's tears wherein my hope lies drowned" (1). The beauty of his lady has caused him tears and despair.

IX. Love can tyrannize over counsel (5-10). There is a close kinship between sorrow and love (13-18). Pity and sorrow can cause love (18-23).

X. Love is called the restless being of men's thoughts (1). The lover was first drawn to his lady by her eyes (3-6). But the lover is cautioned that ". . . those sweet glories which you do aspire, xii. "Cupid! Because thou shin'st in Stella's eyes" (1). Cupid thinks he has won Stella's heart, but the poet says he has not (12-14).

Astrophel and Stella

xiii. The chief figures mentioned are Phœbus and Cupid. Mars and Venus are coupled (7). Cupid is the hero of the action.

xv. Outward show—fine figures of speech and imitations of Petrarch—is not the expression of true love (9-10). If the poet beholds Stella, then he will be able to write great poetry (14).

xvi. The poet thought that love was not a disturbing emotion (1-8) until he met Stella and learned otherwise (9-14).

xvii. Cupid, with his bow and arrows falls to evil ("shrewd") turns (13-14). N.B. This sonnet is on the same theme as Calica, xiii.

xviii. The poet sacrifices all for Stella (1-12), and he is sorry only that he has no more to lose for her sake (13-14).

xix. Based on the metaphor of Cupid's bow (1). The poet disgraces his intelligence by continuing to love where he is scorned.

Calica

Must as ideas only be embraced . . ."
(21-22).

xii. ". . . to Myra's eyes the wanton [Cupid] strayeth" (9). Cupid possesses Myra's heart to spite the poet (13-14). Note, line 4, "Mine eyes I gave thee," and Astrophel and Stella Sonnet lxxv (8), "I gave to thee mine eyes."

xiii. The chief figures are Venus and Cupid. Mars and Venus are coupled (2). Cupid is the hero of the action. N.B. The theme is that of Astrophel and Stella, xvii.

xv. Outward show—excessive expression of love—causes the death of love (1, 2, 13), "as he that burns must freeze." The poet's eyes behold in Myra the reconciliation of "honour and beauty" (6-8).

xvi. The poet asks "foolish earth" (obviously, people) does it think love is not particularly glorious just because that "foolish earth" has not been stimulated by love (5-8)? Love, he answers, is above the "middle regions" of the passions (13-14).

xxx. Cupid (9) is accused of being a companion of, or is comparable to, an evil person ("good-fellow" = thief). His bow and arrows are also referred to.

xviii. Calica insists that the poet should sacrifice "all selfness" for her. He asks what is the reward for such sacrifice.

xix. Based on the metaphor of Cupid's bow (5, 9-12). Cupid is cautioned not to disgrace the service Calica has done him in exciting both old and young to love.

Astrophel and Stella

xx. Cupid is the subject of this sonnet, and his ambushing and shooting the lover with his arrow is the theme.

xxi. Built on contraries: 2, 4, 8, 9-10 The theme of this sonnet is the relation of Stella to the world. "Hath this world aught so fair as Stella is?" (14).

xxii. Note the importance of the word kiss in the last line. Stella's "Daintiest bare" stimulates love in others, but she is unaffected by their emotions (9-14).

xxiii. "Curious wits" (1) are deceived by the poet's manner. They think they understand what moves him, but are mistaken (12-14). Sidney calls them "fools" (12).

xxiv. "Wealth" breeds "want"; the "rich, more wretched grow," for they possess wealth, and with it folly, not virtue. The beauties of love and life are not to be enjoyed by "Rich fooles."

xxv. The subject of this sonnet is love and virtue. The poet, since he recognizes virtue in Stella, loves virtue. The poet loves virtue when Stella is this virtue.

xxvi. Stella's eyes serve as the poet's guide, when other guides fail him (12-14). This guidance is a comfort and assurance (9-12) xxvii. His desire for Stella is so great that the poet becomes careless xx. Cupid is the subject of this sonnet. Cupid roams the "coverts," seeking to slay mankind with his weapons.

Caelica

xxi. Built upon contraries. the "half-fast mind," the contrary uses of the breath, and the contradictory nature of women's characters. The theme is the similarity of women to the world—chiefly a contrary world.

xxii. Note the importance of the word kiss in the last line. Myra's "beauties white" stimulated the poet to love, yet Myra herself was never affected by this emotion even though she was the cause of it in others (25-27).

xxiii. Merlin (certainly a curious wit), says Greville, "Took great delight to laugh such fools to scorn,
As thought by nature we might know a brother." (3-4).
By "brother" Greville means, as the rest of the poem shows, mankind in general.

xxiv. "Want" is the loss of "worthiness," "Nature," "art," "Kindness," "courtesy." He who would prove his true worth should "cipher love."

xxv. The subject is love and virtue. Myra's virtue makes love sad. Note that Greville's reaction is the opposite of Sidney's. Cupid weeps because Myra is virtuous.

xxvi. Caelica's eyes "where love and beauty play" serve to guide the poet to a better frame of mind (9-12).

xxvii. His desire for Myra is so great that the poet has sacrificed his

Astrophel and Stella

of his friendships and is accused of pride for not noticing his friends.

xxviii. This sonnet begins with the poet asking that he be not asked to express in eloquence or philosophy the whys and wherefores of his love for Stella (1-4; 9-11). The poet loves Stella "in pure simplicity" of heart (12-14). The poet is contented in his love for Stella (7-8).

xxix. Stella and Love war for Stella's heart; the heart escapes from Love, but the poet is caught.

xxx. Refers to Turkey in Line 1. The subject is the variability in national affairs; the poet explains this variability to his friends as best he may, but all the time he is hardly aware of what he says, the reason being that all he knows is that he loves Stella. The poet remains constant.

xxxI. Addressed to the Moon. The poet declares that his constant love is scorned, and his virtue is called ungratefulness.

xxxII. The beauties of Stella, which the poet sees in his sleep, are those produced by the machinations of Morpheus and his sire.

xxxIII. Refers to the lovers Paris and Helen (6). The poet, through his own folly, has caused his loved one to turn from him (1-12). His wit has offended the young lady.

xxxIV. The poet wants to write words to relieve his "burthened heart," reason, memory, and sense to love.

Cælica

xxviii. This sonnet begins with the poet asking if Cupid would like to know the reasons why the poet loves Myra (1-14); and then he proceeds to give the reasons (5-8). The poet loves Myra because of inspiration given him by her graces (9-10). The poet says he has been deceived into loving Myra (5-14).

xxix Fortune and Love dispute which has the greater power; and the poet gives himself up to Love.

xxx. Refers to Rome in line 1. The subject is the variability of the Roman Empire. The poet does not explain this variation, but he says that its results were disastrous. His conclusion is that Myra also loses something of her true worth by her variable attitude toward her lover. Myra is not constant.

xxxI. Addressed to Cynthia (= goddess of the moon). Cynthia refuses to acknowledge that she even recognizes that the poet loves her. lv. addressed to the moon, is more comparable to Sidney's xxxI.

xxxII. If Myra changes as other women do, the fault, says the poet, will be the machinations of Cupid and Venus.

xxxIII. Refers to the lovers Danaë, Europa, and Leda, the mother of Helen. The folly of Cupid has bleared "sweet Myra's eyes" (1). In Cælica, lxII, the poet declares wit to be "The greatest pride of human kind," and adds "No wit can comprehend the ways of love."

xxxIV. Greville speaks in more general terms than Sidney upon this topic.

Astrophel and Stella

though words are the instruments which vex him. That is, words, though they cause sorrow, will also bring the poet relief (1-3). It is Stella's action which has hurt the poet (14). The poet hopes that his words will react upon Stella (13-14).

xxxv. "Cupid is sworn page to chastity" (8). "Within what bounds can one his liking stay," asks the poet, and the implied answer is, "none" (3-4). Though his love is hopeless of reward (7-8), yet the poet cannot escape loving Stella (5-6).

xxxvi. "Sweet Nature" (9) overcomes every resistance offered by the lover to the loved one's charms. Sense cannot resist the maid's "sweet nature" (14).

xxxvii. The riddle sonnet. The poet announces the riddle, and tells it in lines 5-14. The answer to the riddle is not given.

xxxviii. At night (while asleep) the poet's mind possesses Stella, but on waking he loses this image of her.

xxxix. The poet and Stella are not on good terms (5-7). The poet calls on sleep, "the certain knot of peace," to relieve him of the pain of Stella's disapproval.

xl. If Stella, seeing that the poet loves her (5-8), gives him no sympathy, there is danger of the poet's love being destroyed (14).

(From this point on, except for the sonnets numbers LXII to LXVIII the parallelisms are fewer and more widely scattered.)

xliv. The poet constantly shows his devotion and love for Stella, but the

Caelica

The Gods take the instruments with which they punish mankind and burn them to relieve men's sufferings (1-4). It is Myra's actions which have hurt the poet (7-8, 13-14). The poet wants revenge upon Myra.

xxxv. Cupid is injured by wanton passion (8). No sooner does the poet see "sweet Myra's eyes" than his whole emotion goes beyond the bounds of propriety (6-8). The poet cannot "scape away" from Myra's charms (11).

xxxvi. "Sweet nature" (11-12) yields to the lover's blandishments. Sense (14) has not decided whether to be "ill or easily led" is worse for "sweet nature" (13-14).

xxxvii. This song begins with a riddle (first four stanzas). The riddle is solved in the last line,—"hope is untrue."

xxxviii. Overnight Caelica has "finely used" the poet, but, apparently the next day, rumor has come to the lady's ears, and so she forbids the poet to come near her.

xxxix. The poet and Caelica are not on good terms (13-14). To "comprehend" that "heavenly peace" in "Caelica's fair heart" (9-10), the poet labors to understand Caelica's heart.

xl. If Caelic does not in her youth give herself to love (9-12), there is likelihood of the poet's love turning to lust (13-14).

xli. The poet asks himself if he thinks he can master love by true more he shows it the less favor she exhibits toward him (1-6).

Astrophel and Stella

XLV. Stella sees that the poet acts strangely (1), and his behavior is called forth by her unsympathetic attitude toward him (3-4); notwithstanding, she does not show him sympathy.

XLVI. Stella protests that love must be without desire (5-8). The poet answers (12-14) that this will be when "without fuel, you can make hot fire."

LIV. "Dumb swans not chattering pies, do lovers prove;—They love indeed who quake to say they love" (13-14).

(Both sonnets say that excessive display of emotion is not evidence of true love. The true lover is inarticulate.)

LVI. A sonnet on Patience in love.

LIX. The happiness of loving Stella is painful.

LXII. Stella approves only of that love which is not blind (6); that is, a love which stoops not from the nobler courses of virtue (7, 8, 11). Stella maintains, therefore, that earthly love is base, and virtuous love is noble.

LXIII. The theme is the relationship of grammar to love. Grammar says that Stella loves the poet (9-14), though actually this is not true (5-8).

LXIV. The poet declares he needs no counsels (1); he does not envy Aristotle's wit or Cæsar's fame (9-10); for Stella is all his wit and virtue (14).

LXV. The poet declares that he has lodged Cupid in his heart (7). This devotion (1-2). His answer is that no change can be produced in Myra's heart in his favor (5th stanza).

Cælica

LX. Cælica notes that the poet acts strangely (1-2). This behavior is caused by Cælica's unsympathetic attitude toward him (12). There is no evidence that Cælica will learn to sympathize with the poet.

LVI. This lyric seeks to prove that love and desire cannot be severed. (lines 18-20, and the last 10 lines).

LIV. "Light, rage and grief, limbs of unperfect love,
By over-acting ever lose their ends" (1-2).

"Then teach desire hope; not rage, fear, grief, Powers as unapt to take, as give relief" (17-18).

XLVI. A sonnet on Patience in love.

LIX. Who would move Cælica to love must enjoy suffering the woes of love.

LXII. The poet declares of those who worship Cupid (blind love), "Their joys be dallies and their wealth is play" (1-5). Such a love is unworthy. Those who seek true glory "must look to the sky."

LXIII. Wit examines all art and reduces it to method (1-2). Yet "wit cannot comprehend the ways of love" (6).

LXVI. Cælica requests the poet to read books (2) so as to improve his wit (3-5). But the poet says that he will not obey (7). "Wisdom springs from truth within" (47).

LXV. The poet says to Cælica: "hide me in your heart" (14). This sonnet is sonnet is built up from this metaphor of love being buried in the heart and the consequences thereof.

Astrophel and Stella

LXVI. Stella has turned from the poet; but he sees some hope still, because he thought he saw love in Stella's eyes as she turned from him when he looked at her (9-14)

LXVII. The poet is willing to be satisfied with hope (12-13) lest more definite knowledge cause him greater pain than he already feels (14). The poet's happiness will be preserved if he limits his knowledge. The poet prefers uncertainty to certainty.

LXVIII. Stella is everything to the poet, "light of my life," "life of my desire," etc. (1-4) Stella seeks to repress the poet's love (5-8). The poet does not despair though the lady turns from him, but he rather joys in her virtue.

LXXI. Who would know perfection must look on Stella. For "beauty draws the heart to love," but still lust ("Desire") asks satisfaction.

(The theme of both these poems is that love cannot be severed from lust, but in both instances the beloved has repulsed the poets' advances.)

LXXXVII. The poet finds Stella sad-faced because he is going to be absent from her. His coming does not cheer her up. The tears, sighs, and sad words of Stella so move the poet that he responds with tears, sighs, and sad words.

LXXXIX. The poet's lady has turned from him: "darkest shade, doth overcome my day" (2). The lady is called built up from the metaphor of hiding the lover in the lady's heart. This is to be a consequence of the conditions referred to in lines 1-13.

Caelica

LXIV. Caelica has turned from the poet (9); but his love has not changed (12), because her back shows him that her virtue is recognized by all, whereas, before he thought that he alone recognized it (10-11).

LXVII. The poet declares that the elimination of unhappiness (17) can be obtained if one will limit his desires and what he wants to know. Such limitation of knowledge will bring comfort to man's heart (18)

LXVIII. The poet has sacrificed his desire and faith to love (1-2). Love offers the poet no encouragement; in fact love has deserted the temple (the lady's heart) where the poet worships (3-4). The poet, exiled from the loved one gets some pleasure from his exile (13-16) and reacts "with songs, not cries" (17).

LXXI. Love went "forth enamelled fair with hope," but returns "lean with despair." The cause is that lustfully pursuing Caelica, Love was repulsed.

LXXIV. When the poet goes to see Caelica, he finds her sad-faced. It was his absence which caused this sadness in her (15-16). The evidence of this sadness in Caelica's countenance so moves the poet that "his tongue cannot speak of love" (52).

LXIX. The poet's lady is called his "sun" (15). Her turning from him he calls his "night" (5).

Astrophel and Stella

the poet's "day" (3); her turning from him he calls his "night" (4).

Eighth Song<sup>1</sup> A dialogue between the poet and his lady. The poet meets Stella in May and makes unwelcome advances toward her (stanzas 13-17). Stella repulses the poet on the grounds only of defending her honor (stanza 24). The last line of this song is: "therewith my song is broken." Line 4, Stanza 25 reads: "I should blush when thou art named."

LXXXVIII: Cannot the good of life, once recognized, keep men from base desires? (7-8). The poet implies (10-14) that it can.

CIX.<sup>2</sup> This sonnet is an attack upon desire, considering it a weakness which leads man's soul to destruction.

CX.<sup>2</sup>

In their respective poems Sidney and Greville plead for man to turn from love which is "with fleshly lustings shaken" (Cæl. LXXXVII) and "reacheest but to dust" (A. & S. CX), and to aspire to heaven and eternal love.

These similarities are indeed striking. It is significant that the parallelisms are most numerous in the first forty sonnets of each cycle. This implies, I believe, that Greville and Sidney were in communication at the time of composition of the first half of their sequences, and each diverged to follow his own bent after he had got into the swing of lyrical composition.

<sup>1</sup> Janet Scott, Les sonnets elisabéthains, pp. 59-60, is struck by the resemblance between the Eighth Song of Astrophel and Stella, lines 1-6 and 101-102, and Sonnet LXXXVI of Cælica, lines 1-8 and 19-20.

<sup>2</sup> These sonnets are so numbered in Grosart's editions of Astrophel and Stella. They are numbered 13 and 14 under the heading "Certain Sonnets," pp. 173-174, of Pollard's edition. They are not included in Lee's edition in Vol. I of his Elizabethan Sonnets, but are part of Astrophel and Stella in Drinkwater's edition. Pollard (p. 229), E. M. Denlinger, Immortal Sidney (1931), p. 195, and Mona Wilson, Sir Philip Sidney (1931), p. 202, all believe these two sonnets were intended by Sidney to conclude Astrophel and Stella.

Cælica

LXXXVI. A dialogue between the poet and his lady. In the evening of a spring day (1-8), Philocell meets Cælica and asks of her a familiarity which she angrily refuses (147-158). One of her reasons is that her conduct might "rumour move" (179). It is her "honour" which prompts her to deny Philocell, so the poet says (219). The line introducing the last short section of this poem is (192): "Here my silly song is ended." Line 16 of Sonnet XXXII reads: "I who did make her blush when I was named"

LXXXVIII Man's life, "the light of human lust," burns out, and generations turn to corruption (1-4). Then man dying wishes to live again just so that he might amend his errors (5-6).

xcvii. The theme is the same as in Astrophel and Stella. CIX.

LXXXVII.

Besides the great number of common thoughts and phrasings, it is notable that the parallelisms occur in similarly numbered poems of each sequence, Sonnet 1 of Astrophel and Stella corresponding with 1 of Calica, and so on, with a few exceptions which are themselves notable. These exceptions may be errors in the arrangement of the Astrophel and Stella sequence, for Greville's manuscript, as corrected in his old age, is still preserved for us at Warwick House. Sidney's sonnets, however, so far as we know, never received a careful editing by their author's hand, so that errors in arrangement may have crept in when his friends or relatives attempted to arrange them.

An explanation of the parallelisms in Astrophel and Stella and Calica is that Sidney and Greville, as a result of their discussions of poetry, suggested topics for sonnets, and then wrote upon these subjects, or used the ideas, figures, or other materials brought out in their discussions. If one sequence were an imitation of the other, then the similarities should be more obvious and should extend throughout a greater number of poems. Sidney's treats wholly of the love affair of Astrophel and Stella; whereas Greville, after some seventy sonnets, in which three different women are addressed—and one of them might be Sidney's Stella—turns to religion, government, and other topics of a less poetic type.

There are sufficient parallels to imply consultation, but not enough to sustain a charge of imitation or plagiarism against either writer. Their common intellectual interests, especially their common interest in poetry, and their close friendship would tend to result in the use of similar thoughts and forms of expression. But the parallels would certainly be fewer were they the result of chance.

Only slightly more than half the sonnets of Astrophel and Stella and Calica contain parallel ideas and forms of expression.

Additional support is given my view that the parallelisms are the result of consultation by the fact that certain of Sidney's sonnets (note especially LXXIV and LXXXIV) make it clear that Sidney was consulting friends and "wits" about his poetry, and that they were offering criticisms and generally approving of his work. In certain sonnets (note XIV, XXI, and LXIX), Sidney speaks of a "friend," and this friend advises him about his conduct and behavior generally, as well as toward Stella specifically. This friend could well have been Greville, for we know of no one, except the elderly Sir Francis Walsingham, Sidney's future father-in-law, with whom Sidney maintained closer relations. Final proof, however, either of consultation or intentional imitation, can be determined only by the discovery of corroborative facts outside the sonnet sequences themselves.

J. M. PURCELL

THE COMPOSITION OF THE SHEPHEARDES CALENDER

THE teasing sense of mystery felt by the student of the biography of Spenser is nowhere more noticeable than with regard to the Shepheardes Calender. C. H. Herford's statement is still too near the truth:<sup>1</sup>

Except that the authorship is absolutely certain, posterity knows very little more about the circumstances in which the Shepheardes Calender was composed than "E. K." has chosen to tell us.

Something of this mystery would be removed if it could be shown how the poem as we have it probably came into being. Concerning this question, there are two possible and, at first glance, tenable opinions: either the plan which underlies the whole was conceived and somewhat matured before the writing of the separate eclogues was begun, or the composition of at least part of the individual pieces antedates the formulation of the underlying plan. Typical of the first view is W. J. Courthope's statement:<sup>2</sup>

If we look away from the authorized account of Spenser's design in The Shepheardes Calender to the actual gestation of the poem in his imagination, it is plain that, before constructing his general idea, he had carefully studied the pastoral practice of Theocritus, Bion, Vergil, Mantuan, and Marot. His sympathetic intelligence had been impressed by many imaginative passages in these authors, and he desired to reproduce them in a novel form. For this purpose, he chose, as the basis of his entire work, an allegory founded on the widely popular Kalendrier des Bergers . . . and resolved to include within his poetical edifice the various subjects hitherto handled in the eclogue.

The other possibility was in Henry Morley's mind as he wrote:<sup>3</sup>

Probably some parts of the Calender were independent pieces, written by Spenser in college days as exercises in his art, and woven afterwards into the texture of "The Shepheardes Calender." The song in praise of Queen Elizabeth,

<sup>1</sup> In his edition of the Shepheardes Calender (London and New York, 1907), p. xiii.

<sup>2</sup> Cambridge History of English Literature (New York and Cambridge, 1907-19), III, 250 f.—H. J. C. Grierson, Cross Currents in English Literature of the XVIIth Century (London, 1929), pp. 42-43, seems to imply an orderly process of composition beginning with January and ending with December.

<sup>3</sup> English Writers (London, Paris and Melbourne, 1891-97), IX, 36 f. Cf. The Shepherd's Calendar, ed. W. L. Renwick (London, 1930), p. 167.—Frederick Morgan Padelford (M. P., XI, 98) admits the possibility that Spenser "may have followed his practice of incorporating certain verses written at an earlier time" in the poem, as did also Edwin Greenlaw in PMLA, XIX (1911), 448. C. H. Herford (op. cit., p. 150) alludes with favor "to the view that the eclogues were composed independently and at different times."

the fable of The Oak and the Brere, for example, may have been thus written before "The Shepherd's Calendar" was planned. Spenser looked back with reverence to Chaucer as the Master Poet, and studied his simplicity of speech. The Oak and the Brere may have been at first chiefly an exercise in writing, as Chaucer wrote, with homely words, well weighed.

Other writers, with both possibilities in mind, have preferred not to commit themselves or have regarded a decision as impossible. Professor Padelford, for example, writes:<sup>4</sup>

In conclusion, though Spenser may have followed his practice of incorporating certain verses written at an earlier time, all of the evidence goes to show that the Shepherd's Calendar, in the form in which we have it, was conceived, written, and finished . . . while the poet was secretary to Bishop Young.

It is desirable to replace the uncertainty which these three quotations show by certainty or probability so strong as nearly to approach it. Although internal evidence must needs be handled with caution, here where it is supported in some measure by other evidence, it is strong enough to justify at least a tentative acceptance of the second of these views. Such acceptance will throw a certain amount of light on Spenser's activity during the puzzling years intervening between his leaving Cambridge and his arrival in Ireland.

The plan underlying the Shepherd's Calendar involves two major unifying features—Colin's love story and the calendar idea, and neither is so perfectly developed as a good literary craftsman might be expected to develop it, had he had it in mind from the very beginning. In the first place, the individual eclogues are not so carefully suited to their positions as the title page, E. K.'s comments, and those of some of the later commentators might lead one to expect.<sup>5</sup> In fact, several give no hint as to the month for which they were intended. For instance, the August eclogue might equally well have been used for July; and the time of year is in no way indicated except for a reference to the "scorching heate" of the sun. Both the spirit and the specific details of the ninth pastoral are as appropriate to October or November as to September.<sup>6</sup> Equally uncolored by the month to which it is assigned is October, which would as well serve to represent May or February.<sup>7</sup> One eclogue at least is manifestly inappropriate to the position it occupies. The presence of the lines concerning the sun's being in Pisces (they have no counterpart in the eclogue by Marot which Spenser is here paraphrasing) indicates that November was originally intended for the month of February.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>4</sup> Loc. cit

<sup>5</sup> See The Complete Works . . . of Edmund Spenser, ed. Grosart (privately printed 1882-84), I, 113 ff. and Courthope, op. cit, III, 256—Alexander Pope, in his Discourse on Pastoral Poetry, notices this weakness but takes it to lie rather in the plan than in the execution. "Yet the scrupulous division of his pastorals into months has obliged him either to repeat the same description, in other words, for three months together, or, when it was exhausted before, entirely to omit it; whence it comes to pass that some of his eclogues (as the sixth, eighth, and tenth for example) have nothing but their titles to distinguish them. The reason is evident, because the year has not that variety in it to furnish every month with a particular description, as it may every season." One suspects, however, that Pope is more interested in explaining why he has written only four instead of twelve eclogues than in understanding reasons for Spenser's failure entirely to conform to his avowed plan.

<sup>6</sup> Line 51, "Beating the withered leafe from the tree," is not particularly well suited to September. Notice the foliage on the trees in the woodcut set at the head of September.

<sup>7</sup> As C. H. Herford suggests (op. cit., p. 172), "Thys long lingering Phoclus race" (l. 3) seems a reference to the time of day rather than to the time of year.

<sup>8</sup> That February and November may have been transposed, one of the suggestions which Professor W. L. Renwick made (op. cit., p. 184) to account for this flaw, Doctor G. C. Moore Smith refuted (M.L.R., xxvi, 458) by pointing out that "the whole context in November, 'But nowe sadde Winter welked hath the day,' agrees much better with November than with February, and similarly the opening couplet of February with its expectation of winter's assuagement and the later reference to the 'rather lambes,' agree with February and not November." The last point is sound; his conclusion, however, that it is "simpler then to impute to the poet an error in astronomy," does not necessarily follow, for another of Professor Renwick's suggestions (loc. cit.), that November was originally the February poem and was displaced by the present, more recently composed occupant of that position, is not open to the same objections. There is nothing in November that will not fit February equally well. It might be argued, however, that the last line of the following passage is proper only to November.

Thenot, now nis the time of merimake.
Nor Pan to herye, nor with love to playe:
Sike myrth in May is meetest for to make,
Or summer shade under the cocked haye.
But nowe sadde Winter welked hath the day. (November, 9 ff.)

But the argument is unsound. The lines state Colin's reasons for refusing Thenot's request that he sing of love or in praise of Pan. "Such songs as you request," he says, "are quite in keeping in pleasant weather, but winter makes them unsuitable." But nowe, in other words, may mark a contrast to the preceding thought instead of indicating that just recently the coming of winter has rendered jollity unseemly.

The point rests in part upon Spenser's knowledge of astronomy, and, although no thorough treatment of the question exists, the evidence is against his having been likely to make a blunder in a matter of almost common knowledge. Harvey (Marginalia, ed. G. C. Moore Smith [Stratford, 1913], p. 162) gives him credit for some astronomical knowledge; Spenser, with no suggestion from Marot, one of whose eclogues he is there paraphrasing, adds to December (ll. 83 ff.) a statement of his training in astronomy; he connects Pisces and February in the Faerie Queene (vii, 7, 43); and his correct use of astronomical information in many passages of his works shows him to have had sufficient knowledge of the subject to avoid such an error. See, for instances, F.Q., Prol. to Book v, 4 ff., v, 1, 11, vii, 7, 32-43; Mother Hubberds Tale, 1-8; S.C., vii, 17-24.

Nor, as W. W. Greg makes clear,<sup>9</sup> is one more successful who interprets the phrase, "proportionable to the twelve monethes," as meaning that "the moods of the various poems were to be made to correspond with the seasons represented." His statement of the case is that the conceit is not fully or consistently carried out. In several of the eclogues not only does the subject in no way reflect the mood of the season—the very nature of the theme at times made this impossible—but the time of the year is not so much as mentioned.

In the second place, the unity of the Calendar can be challenged. Several of the eclogues—February, March, May, and July—have no connection with the story of Colin's unhappy love for Rosalind, and in another—September—the only connection lies in Hobbinol's presence as one of the speakers and in the lines

Colin Clout, I wene, be his selfe boye,
(Ah for Colin, he whilome my joye!)<sup>10</sup>

As J. J. Higginson has pointed out,<sup>11</sup> these lines may well be an insertion made a considerable time after the completion of the eclogue in order to bring it into closer relation with the rest of the group; not only could they be omitted without injuring the sense of the passage in which they are found, but such omission would make the reference of the following line clearer. In other words, four, perhaps five, of the twelve eclogues bear no relation to the narrative theme of the poem.

Furthermore, four of these five—February, May, July, and September—form a somewhat unified group among themselves, "not only because of their political and ecclesiastical satire and their use of the fable, but also on account of their more elementary meters—i. e. the accentual and the ballad—, their separation from the Romance of Colin, and their lack of allusion, in general, to the people of the Court, such as Queen Elizabeth and the Earl of Leicester."<sup>12</sup> Certainly it is not laboring the evidence to conclude that these conditions indicate the dominance in the poet's mind of no very well-considered plan during much of the process of composition.

The variations of Spenser's poetic technique may be taken as further evidence in support of the idea. The great variety of metrical forms employed and the wide variation in the number of dialectal and obsolete

<sup>9</sup> Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama (London, 1906), pp. 91, 92.

<sup>10</sup> September, 176-77.

<sup>11</sup> Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar in Relation to Contemporary Affairs (New York, 1912), pp. 42-43.

<sup>12</sup> Higginson, op. cit., p. 42.—Herford (op. cit., p. 96) felt that the February eclogue was irrelevant.

words used in the different eclogues, as well as the considerable variety of intellectual interests displayed, may well be the result not only of an extended period of composition, but also of the absence during the process of composition of any definite informing plan.

To turn to a different type of evidence, the Shepherd's Calendar contains such contradictions in subject-matter and character as no able author would have allowed had he been working deliberately and from a well-formulated scheme. Several might be mentioned. Greenlaw remarked:<sup>13</sup> in "August," Cuddie repeats one of the songs said to have been made by Colin, though this song contradicts the situation detailed in "June."

It should be remembered that, as the Calendar progresses, Spenser takes care to let us know that Colin is growing older. In January he is young, although his ill success with Rosalind makes him feel old, and in April he is still a lad; but in June he is a "man" of "ryper age" who has lost his delight in piping and dancing. By December he has become an old man with furrowed face and "head besprent with hoary frost." Colin grows old gracefully enough, and his doing so is not greatly at variance with the plan of the Calendar, although one might expect from the title that the time represented be only one year; few, however, of the other characters do. The eternal youth of Rosalind is, of course, in no way surprising in view of her relation to the Petrarchan tradition. Thenot we see in February as a shepherd ninety years old, who scorns love, defends old age against the eager attack of young Cuddie, and believes that the world grows worse every day. By April he has become a man of indeterminate age with a fondness for poetry and none of the cynical outlook upon life so much in evidence in February, while by November, stranger still, he is a poet for whose "light vielayes, and looser songs of love" even the great Colin has several words of praise!<sup>14</sup> Somewhat less unnatural, perhaps, but no less striking is the change wrought in Pali-node. In May he appears as a pastor, not a young man but still sensitive to the urge of the spring in his blood, who defends his worldly brothers and whose ideas of the pastor's life shock the more puritanical Piers; in July we find that he has returned from a pilgrimage with words as severe as those of Piers for the worldliness of a certain type of pastor. Such reformation is not inconceivable, but a bit surprising.<sup>15</sup>—The alterations of character in the cases of Thomalin and Piers are, perhaps, not so striking. The former appears in March as a gay young shepherd who tells of his encounter with Love, in July we find him a learned theologian, easily citing Biblical passages to support his points, even though he does, from time to time, remember his pastoral identity long enough to forget a name. In October, Piers shows an interest in love, poetry, and tales of chivalry entirely unexpected in one who in May was so thoroughly committed to an ascetic life for the clergy.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>13</sup> PMLA, xix (1911), 447.

<sup>14</sup> See Herford, op. cit., p. xl.—Professor Renwick (loc. cit.), remarking that "Thenot appears in April and November," says that "the reappearance of the same name may imply the same person, but we cannot be quite sure." There is no necessity for believing that, because a character is the allegorical representation of one of Spenser's acquaintances in one eclogue, he is so in every other eclogue where he appears, on the other hand, there was little purpose in Spenser's using the same name unless the same pastoral character was meant.

In addition, Spenser violates narrative propriety in June by making Hobbinol urge Colin to leave the hills and come to the vales where he himself is so happy. This E. K. explains as Hobbinol's way of advising Colin to leave the "Northpartes" and to come to the "Southpartes." Yet, as early as April, Colin is "the Southerne shepheardes boye," a position he has probably held since January.<sup>17</sup>

It is particularly significant that all these inconsistencies and contradictions occur between the different eclogues, never between parts of the same eclogue. This is strange if the deficiencies of the poem are due to Spenser's inability to plan well and to write according to the plan; it is not very unnatural if a majority of the eclogues were written at somewhat widely separated times and with little or no idea of combining them to form a larger whole. It is, in fact, what one might then expect.

Such inconsistencies in characterization and narrative together with the inferior development of the major unifying themes of the poem constitute the evidence against the belief that the Shepherd's Calendar was methodically composed from a more or less carefully matured plan. If, in the face of this evidence, we still hold to the view that the poem was written only after having been planned in some detail, we are forced to an unwelcome conclusion. At the age of twenty-seven Spenser must have been unable to tell the simplest of stories with any adequate attention to detail; he must have possessed only the most rudimentary sense of character and, even for his own time, must have been a very haphazard scholar. That the publication of the Shepherdess Calender dates from the period when he was beginning work on the Faerie Queene and that these deficiencies in narrative ability are not much in evidence in the latter work are reasons for doubting such a conclusion. Inconsistencies and flaws in the narrative technique of the Faerie Queene any attentive reader notices,<sup>18</sup> but it is more immediately apparent that the author demonstrates marked ability to tell a complicated story with considerable attention to the sort of detail which he shows himself least able to manage in the Shepherdess Calender. What the Faerie Queene would have been like had it been written by a man whose powers were no greater than those which this view allows the poet of the Shepherdess Calender, it is difficult to imagine; in comparison chaos would have been orderly.

<sup>15</sup> So marked is this change that Higginson (op. cit., p. 105 n.) says: "This Palinode cannot be identical with the Palinode of the 'May'; there, he is the object of Spenser's satire, here, he is the friend of Spenser's representative, Thomalin." Francis T. Palgrave (in Grosart's edition of Spenser's works, iv, li) remarks, "It is noteworthy that Palinode, who in that poem ['May'] represents Roman Catholicism, is now spoken of as having travelled to Rome, where the pomp of the Papal Court has impressed him unfavorably."

<sup>16</sup> C. H. Herford (op. cit., p. 150) notes some of these peculiarities and remarks, "Spenser makes no attempt to use the names with uniform consistency. . . . This adds strength to the view that the eclogues were composed independently, and at different times."—One might add that it strengthens also the view that many of them were composed before the idea of combining them into a unified piece occurred to the poet.

<sup>17</sup> See January, 1.

Therefore, before accepting this view, it is well to consider the alternative: that the Shepherdess Calender resulted from a somewhat hasty gathering together of poems already composed and an equally hasty fitting of them into a unifying plan.

Such a theory has several considerations to recommend it. In the first place, it fits in with what we know of Spenser's life during this period. At this particular time, Spenser was desirous of advancement (E. K. tells us that, at Harvey's advice, he came south "for his more preferment"<sup>19</sup>), and, though his acquaintance was growing, he was still known to but few who held political preferment in their power. What could be more natural than that he, already markedly interested in poetry and already recognized as something of a poet by his friends, should attempt to overcome this obstacle by publishing a series of poems containing compliments to persons of influence? That he had in some measure dedicated himself to the work of a poet we may judge from the preoccupation with literature that appears in his letters to Harvey and from the number of "lost" works mentioned by Harvey, E. K., and the poet himself; that some at least of his friends recognized his abilities may be inferred from his acceptance by the literary coterie surrounding Sidney and perhaps from Rosalind's reference to him as her "Segnior Pegaso." By a judiciously planned publication, he could compliment those persons of influence, as Leicester and Young, whom he already knew, and seek to make new friends at the same time that he was giving a very convincing proof of his abilities as a poet. His somewhat recent introduction to Leicester and other members of his party provided a suitable opening for such a publication. He may well have felt that certain poems he had by him represented as good work as he could then do and that his time might be more profitably spent in revising and welding together those older pieces according to a unifying scheme than in an attempt to compose new ones. Nor is it strange if he were desirous of taking advantage of the work already done on poems which had been praised by his friends.<sup>20</sup> So let us suppose he set to work with enthusiasm, fitting poems already written into a framework, altering and rewriting where he saw the necessity, and writing new poems where that was necessary. Then the gloss was made with the result that, by the April of 1579, the poem was complete in approximately its present form,<sup>21</sup> although it had not been given the last touches necessary to make it a finished piece of work. Even the dedication to Sidney had been decided upon.<sup>22</sup> Then, for some reason, the project was laid aside. Nor are reasons for such action difficult to imagine; it may have been because of the lack of what he deemed a suitable occasion for publication, because of the feeling in some quarters that printing one's works was not quite the proper thing to do, because of his desire to avoid "over-much cloying their noble eares," or because of the abatement of his enthusiasm. Be that as it may, the project was apparently laid aside, and it is plausible to think that between April and October little work was done on the Calendar; there is slight probability that Spenser would have spent much time in polishing a piece he had decided not to circulate. In October, however, the prospect of representing Leicester in France recalled the plan and convinced Spenser that the time was ripe for <sup>20</sup> Professor W. L. Renwick's statement, in Edmund Spenser; An Essay on Renaissance Poetry (London, 1925), p. 36 f., that Spenser deliberately chose the pastoral as the most fitting literary type with which to make his bow to his audience in no way contravenes this idea; what he says of a series of poems would be equally true of each of these poems considered separately. His statements probably also indicate the reasons for the choices Spenser made from the body of poetry at hand at the time when the Shepherd's Calendar was put together. E. K.'s reference, in his notes to March, to Spenser's translation of "Moschus his Idyllion of Wandring love" makes probable the belief that Spenser had by him a considerable body of pastorals at this time.

<sup>18</sup> Some of these inconsistencies are traceable to Spenser's sources. See H. S. V. Jones, A Spenser Handbook (New York, 1930), p. 243.

<sup>19</sup> In the notes to June.

<sup>21</sup> See E. K.'s prefatory epistle to Harvey, dated April 10, 1579.

<sup>22</sup> It is possible that E. K.'s epistle to Harvey may originally have contained Leicester's name where we now find Sidney's and that the passage was changed to its present form by Spenser only after he later decided to address himself to Sidney; on the other hand, Spenser's letter to Harvey of October 16, 1579, does not read as though that were so; it rather sounds as though Harvey had been trying to persuade Spenser, against a fairly settled conclusion, to make his address to a greater and more powerful man than he had originally intended.

attempts at personal advancement. So much is clear from his advice to Harvey.<sup>23</sup>

And indeede for your selfe to, it sitteth with you now, to call your wits and senses together, (which are alwaies at call) when occasion is so fairely offered of Estimation and Preferment.

Clear also from the same letter is his belief in the desirability of a certain amount of haste; "for whiles the yron is hote, it is good striking, and minds of Nobles varie, as their Estates."<sup>24</sup> He understood that it behooved him to make the most of this opportunity before some quick shift of court politics put it out of Leicester's power or inclination to reward his supporters. And it appears that Spenser's apprehensions were justified, for there is no reason to suspect that Leicester ever tried to do for Spenser what the poet wished him to. For these reasons, the Shepheardes Calender was probably sent off to Hugh Singleton after a few hasty, last-minute touches.

Though we have no positive indication that these considerations led Spenser to follow the process outlined, what evidence we have supports the idea; and it must be admitted that such action growing from such an evaluation of circumstances was both natural and probable.

Nor is the combination of pieces already written into a larger whole, the unifying idea of which is later, unusual among poets. Thus, for example, did Chaucer build the Canterbury Tales in part from pieces already at hand; and it is pertinent to notice that in the Canterbury Tales are to be found certain discrepancies of a type similar to those pointed out in the Shepheardes Calender. In Spenser's own case it is generally accepted that he was accustomed to rework earlier pieces and that at least some of the "lost" works are to be found incorporated in later pieces. Judging from the letter in which he dedicates his Hymns to the Countesses of Cumberland and Warwick, the 1596 versions of the first two may represent considerable changes from their earlier form. Reasons for believing that Mother Hubberds Tale was written years before it was published and was subjected to a somewhat thorough revision before its publication are summarized by Professor H. S. V. Jones in his Spenser Handbook.<sup>25</sup> The case for Spenser's authorship of the translations from the works of Du Bellay and Petrarch in the Theatre for Voluptuous Worldlings rests upon the supposition that he later revised and published, or allowed to be published, pieces of his earlier work. Professor Renwick has suggested that The Ruines of Time was "constructed out of a poem commendatory of Camden's Britannia

<sup>23</sup> The Works of Gabriel Harvey, ed. Grosart (privately printed, 1884-85), I, 7.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid.

<sup>25</sup> Pages 99 ff.

... , an elegy on Sidney the place of which was eventually taken by Astrophel, and bits of the old Dreames or Pageants."<sup>26</sup> From these instances, it would appear that Spenser was economical of his lines and that, if he made up the Shepherd's Calendar in part from earlier unpublished works, he was behaving in no very uncharacteristic fashion.

In the second place, this supposition concerning the making of the Shepherd's Calendar finds support in the fact that by it, and only by it, are many of the peculiarities of the poem explained. If the process by which it was made was such as has been described, the very flaws and inconsistencies, existing as they do, not within the eclogues but between the various ones, are not unnatural. For instance, even a good poetic craftsman might feel that in using the same pastoral name for a minor character in several independent poems, he did not obligate himself to present under it a character consistent in all cases; the feeling might be even stronger if the name were borrowed from earlier writers of the pastoral, as are many of Spenser's names. With such poems at hand, the same writer might not, especially if hurried, make the character perfectly consistent when the poems were being placed in a larger, unifying setting. Such inconsistencies would be most likely to escape the poet's eye and, once found, would be most difficult to remove. On the other hand, it must be agreed that the flaws in the Shepherd's Calendar are not of the sort that an able writer would be likely to permit had he begun with a plan of the whole from which he turned his attention to the composition of the parts.

From our scanty knowledge of Spenser's life in the months just preceding the publication of the poem, it is clear that, once the final decision to publish was made, there was little time available for last-minute revisions. His letter of October, 1579, to Harvey tells us that he has at last been persuaded by his friend to abandon his idea "for a while to have intermitted the uttering" of his writings<sup>27</sup> and that he is now undecided whether to dedicate the Calendar to Sidney or to Leicester. If these inferences represent the truth of the matter, then between October 16 and December 5, when the work was entered at Stationers' Hall, Spenser must have decided to publish with a dedication to Sidney, Singleton must have been secured as publisher, such revisions as were to be made had to be worked out, and the poem may possibly have been printed.<sup>28</sup> If it be taken into consideration that Spenser was, during

<sup>26</sup> Complaints, ed. W. L. Renwick (London, 1928), p. 190.

<sup>27</sup> Harvey, ed. cit., I, 6.

<sup>28</sup> By not recognizing that Spenser's final decision to publish came in October rather than in April, Professor Jefferson B. Fletcher (M.L.N., xv, 331) is led to state that "during the interim of approximately eight months [from April 10 to December 5] the volume was presumably passing through the press." The evidence of Spenser's letter seems at least a few days of the time, excited over the possibility of being sent abroad and for an additional period probably disappointed over the failure of his hopes (if, indeed, the foreign journey did not take place); that he may have been occupied with the composition of other poems, e.g., Mother Hubbard's Tale or Virgil's Gnat, that in the interval he may have married Machabyas Chylde;<sup>29</sup> then we are able to see why the poem should have been hurriedly prepared for the press. That there was, however, a slight revision of the sort one might expect from the circumstances is clear, as we shall see.

In E. K.'s Glosse, too, are peculiarities that can best be accounted for by the belief that the publication was somewhat hasty.<sup>30</sup> The arrangement of the notes there follows the order of the occurrence of the words in the poem in the case of only one eclogue: June. From one to five of the notes to the other eleven eclogues are out of the expected order. In some, e.g., February or March, the disarrangement is such as to make its being a printer's blunder improbable.<sup>31</sup> Likewise, E. K. sometimes gives explanations that misinterpret Spenser's meaning. A case in point is his explanation of wonne<sup>32</sup> as "to haunt or frequent"; the meaning is clearly enough "were wont." There are several other cases of the same sort.<sup>33</sup> The omission of the dates from his note on Saxon king in September gives the impression of hurried work. These errors were probably all due originally to the carelessness occasioned by haste or perhaps at times ignorance; but their presence in the published work indicates no very careful editing of the Glosse by the poet himself. Two reasons for the lack of such revision—a hurried publication, and absence of the poet and the consequent supervision of publication by one of his friends—have some color of probability; carelessness due to lack of interest on Spenser's part can surely be dismissed as a possibility if one considers how much the poet had at stake in this, the first public flight of his matured muse.

Probably he was in London and did use all the care for which he could conclusive against such a belief. It is possible that the printing was subsequent even to December 5; see Ronald B. McKerrow, An Introduction to Bibliography (Oxford, 1927), p. 137.

---

<sup>29</sup> Mark Eccles, L.T.L.S., December 31, 1931, p. 1053.

<sup>30</sup> Professor John W. Draper (J.E.G.Ph., xviii, 556-574) remarks that the Glosse "certainly seems to have been carelessly or hurriedly put together" and later (p. 573) that "such errors as the definition of glen as hamlet, even in the most obtuse editor, could result only from carelessness or haste—and E. K. was probably not obtuse."

<sup>31</sup> The presence of printer's errors is, however, probable. The error which G. L. Craik, Spenser and His Poetry (London, 1845), I, 82 n., suspects in the Emblem for October is probably one.

<sup>32</sup> S.C., II, 119.

<sup>33</sup> See C. H. Herford, op. cit., p. xxiv; John W. Draper, op. cit., pp. 568-70; and W. L. Renwick's edition of the Calender, p. 197, note to l. 179 and p. 200, note to l. 100.

allow himself time; certainly he gave the poem some revision after the completion of the Glosse. In the first place, the Glosse has explanations of words not in the poem as published. Neither bett nor soote, upon which comments are found in the notes to July and September respectively, appears in the eclogue in question. Better occurs twice in July, in lines 7 and 230. Possibly the better of line 230 is a printer's error for bett; the meter would thus be smoother. For the glossing of soote, there can be no such excuse. Consequently, it would appear that in at least one instance Spenser removed a passage after the explanatory notes were composed. Further indication of a last-minute revision of the text lies in the fact that the sestet in August has no notes.<sup>34</sup> One can scarcely believe that so diligent an annotator as E. K. would have foregone the pleasure of explaining certain passages of this lyric had it been part of the eclogue when he was working over it; on the other hand, it is quite conceivable that, when the Glosse was made, August contained only the first 138 lines of the present eclogue—those lines form a well-rounded unit, the last line of which contains the last two expressions explained in that section of E. K.'s notes—and that only just before turning the poem over to Singleton did Spenser decide that it would be improved by the addition of the more serious sestet. Because of these discrepancies between the poem and the Glosse it would seem that Spenser did look over the manuscript after the supplying of notes and it is probable that the discrepancies between poem and notes owe their presence in the published work to a somewhat hurried final preparation of it for the press.

As here presented, then, the case for believing that the Shepheardes Calender is made up in part of poems of a date earlier than the unifying ideas of the whole work, and that these earlier poems were rather hurriedly revised and supplemented by others after the idea of the publication occurred to the poet may be summarized thus: its unifying themes are imperfectly executed, some of the eclogues bearing no relation to the plan of the whole, and many containing marked contradictions in character and incident; moreover, both the poem and the Glosse bear other unmistakable evidences of haste. The idea here advocated is consonant with what we know of Spenser's life and thoughts at the time and is the only one which allows a concept of the author of the Shepheardes Calender corresponding even remotely with Spenser's abilities and practices as we know them from his other works.

ROLAND B. BOTTING

State College of Washington

<sup>34</sup> Mention of it in the "Argument" may indicate that the arguments were written later than the Glosse.

XXVIII

NOTES ON THE ELIZABETHAN ELEGIE

IN modern English usage, the term elegy bears a distinct connotation of threnody: broadly, it indicates any funeral poem or lament for the dead; more precisely, it describes a lengthened, dignified poem which either mourns reflectively for a deceased person or broods with a more inclusive sorrow over the tragedy men encounter in living. In this narrower sense, the elegy is a reflective lyric, suggested by the fact or fancy of death. The emotion, personal or public, finds utterance in keen lament, to be allayed, however, by tranquil consideration of the mutability of life, the immutability of Something which justifies life and death,<sup>1</sup> or, in the words of Edmund Gosse, it is a poem of lamentation and regret, called forth by the decease of a beloved or revered person, or by a general sense of the pathos of mortality. . . . It must be mournful, meditative, and short without being ejaculatory.<sup>2</sup>

Such significance, however, has not always been associated with the elegy. When sixteenth-century writers coined the English word as the equivalent of the Greek ἐλεγεία and the Latin elegia, they used it in many different contexts with meanings not at all compatible. Having discovered that the identifying trait of the ancient genre, its metrical form, resisted naturalization in English, they applied the name to poems which paralleled in spirit and substance the works of the classic elegists. But in this respect they found the ancient elegy variable between limits widely apart. As a result, elegie was "vaguely used . . . apparently originally including all the species of poetry for which Greek and Latin poets adopted the elegiac metre."<sup>3</sup> So little have scholars interested themselves in the elegy as a type of English poetry that they have commonly dismissed such obsolete usages thus summarily.<sup>4</sup> I suggest,

<sup>1</sup> C. M. Gayley and B. P. Kurtz, Methods and Materials of Literary Criticism, Lyric, Epic, and Allied Forms of Poetry (New York, 1920), p. 28.

<sup>2</sup> Encyc. Brit. (11th and 14th edd.), "Elegy."

<sup>3</sup> The Oxford Dictionary, "Elegy," second definition.

<sup>4</sup> See R. M. Alden, Introduction to Poetry (New York, 1909), p. 68; cf. Gayley and Kurtz, op. cit., p. 392.—No comprehensive study of the elegy as a type of English poetry has yet been published. J. W. Draper's Funeral Elegy and the Rise of English Romanticism (New York, 1929) is a thorough investigation of one aspect of the subject, and a storehouse of material. There are brief discussions of the elegy as a whole by Gayley and Kurtz, op. cit., pp. 28 ff. and 392 ff.; by J. C. Bailey, English Elegies (London, 1900), introd.; and by Arthur Quiller-Couch, Studies in Literature (3rd series, Cambridge Univ., 1929), Chaps. I and II.

however, that a more careful examination of Elizabethan practices proves valuable, by demonstrating that the outworn meanings of elegy, although diverse, were not wholly vague, and by raising several challenging problems, in answering which the investigator finds himself in a wide field of literary history that has long lain uncharted, even unnoticed.

1. The most logical, if not the earliest, use of the word elegy in English depended upon the denotation of the parent words in Greek and Latin. The Arte of English Poesie (1589), attributed to George Puttenham, devoted a chapter to the elegy, and described "a limping Pentameter after a lustie Exhameter" as a distinguishing characteristic.<sup>5</sup> Some years earlier, the champions of an Anglo-classic prosody had already experimented. Beside "English hexameters" we find "English elegiacs," as, for example, in Harvey's Familiar Letters (1580) and in Sidney's Arcadia (written ca. 1580). Again, when in his Observations in the Art of English Poesie (1602) Thomas Campion made a last valiant fight to establish classical rhythms, he synthesized "English elegeick verses," finding them "deriu'd out of our own naturall numbers as neere the imitation of the Greekes and Latines as our heauy sillables will permit;"<sup>6</sup> and he illustrated his principle in amorous elegy and in epigram. But Campion's efforts proved as futile as Harvey's, and it scarcely needed Daniel's reply in the Defense of Rhyme (1603)—which curtly asserted that "elegiack verse" was "no other then our old accustomed measure of fue feet"<sup>7</sup>—to silence the discordant rumblings of ancient metres in English.

2. A second inconsequential usage, also resting upon form rather than content, and following a fashion set by the Augustan elegists, linked the word with epistolary poems, usually of love or of complaint. Davison's Poetical Rhapsody (1602) contained an anonymous amatory-didactic piece of no great literary merit entitled "An Elegie, or Letter in Verse."<sup>8</sup> Among the many commendatory verses prefixed to that remarkable book, Coryats Crudities (1611), we find one headed "Mr Laurence Whitakers Elogie of the Booke," with the author's explanation, "This epistle was written . . . as his censure or Elogie that my Booke might be printed."<sup>9</sup> Here, indeed, the word may refer less to the letter than to the recommendation or "eulogy," but the two meanings seem so blended that elogie implies a "message of approbation." Less ambiguous and more learned examples come from Drayton's Elegies vpon Sundry Occasions (1627), in which most of the constituent poems, regardless of

<sup>5</sup> Elizabethan Critical Essays, ed. G. G. Smith (Oxford, 1904), II, 51.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., II, 344.—Cf. Webbe's Discourse (1586), ibid., I, 285.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., II, 377.

<sup>8</sup> Ed. A. H. Bullen (London, 1891), I, 112.

<sup>9</sup> Reprint, James MacLehose & Sons (Glasgow, 1905), I, 149.

My noble friend, you challenge me to write
To you in veise . . . and to send you newes;
. . . I should report
In home-spunne prose, in good plaine honest words
The newes our wofull England vs affords—<sup>10</sup>

3. Occasionally, the Elizabethans employed elegie to indicate a didactic poem. Sharing the common Renaissance theory that art is justified largely by its power to instruct, more than one writer discovered a preacher's purpose not only in the gnomic and hortatory elegies of the early Greek period but also, apparently, in the sentimental and sensual love elegies of Augustan Rome. Witness Sidney's belief that the lamenting Elegiack . . . surely is to be prayed, either for compassionate accompanying iust causes for lamentation, or for rightly paynting out how weake be the passions of wofulnesse.<sup>15</sup>

<sup>10</sup> Drayton's Minor Poems, ed. Cyril Brett (Oxford, 1907), p. 118.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., pp. 91, 108, 93, 99, respectively. The first mentioned opens:

Friend, if you thinke my Papers may supplie
You, with some strange omitted Noueltie, and concludes:

So (noble Sandis) for this time adue.

<sup>12</sup> Elizabethan Sonnets, ed. Sidney Lee (An English Garner series, Westminster and New York, 1904), I, 241, 257, 262; the last two Barnes calls "letters."

<sup>13</sup> Poetical Works (Hunterian Club, 1873), "The Amorous Songs, etc.," p. 121.

<sup>14</sup> See Elegiae i, iv, vi; cf. Campion's Latin elegies, Works, ed. S. P. Vivian (Oxford, 1909), pp. 315-324. <sup>15</sup> Eliz. Crit. Essays, ed. cit., I, 176. <sup>16</sup> Ibid., II, 209.

<sup>15</sup> Eliz. Crit. Essays, ed. cit., I, 176.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., II, 209.

Reynolds Esquire, of Poets & Poesie" undertakes an historical survey of poetry in England and a critical estimate of the more important writers, living and deceased; "To the . . . Lady I. S., of worldly crosses" repeats to a suffering and maligned lady the homely philosophy of virtue nourished and matured through sorrow.<sup>17</sup> The most notable instance of the didactic elegy, however, we find in John Davies's Nosce Teipsum (1599). A disquisition upon the human soul and its attributes, this metrical rendering of a chapter of Scholasticism bears the subtitle: This Oracle expounded in two Elegies; and each "elegie" is a canto-treatise which records a learned pronouncement, the first "Of Human Knowledge" and the second "Of the Soul of Man, and the Immortality thereof."<sup>18</sup> Milton's sedate sententiousness in his Latin elegiacs suggests his general agreement with Davies's conception of a didactic elegy.<sup>19</sup>

4. Again, English writers of the Renaissance frequently implied by elegie a poem of general lament. In this custom they followed ancient theory more than ancient practice. The Horatian notion that the elegy was first of all an expression of sorrow,<sup>20</sup> although scarcely attuned to the spirit exhibited in the elegies of Horace's contemporaries, and although ignored by so important a neo-classic scholar as Vida,<sup>21</sup> was not forgotten, and was echoed in critical writings like Ronsard's and Sidney's.<sup>22</sup> As early as 1514, Alexander Barclay used the word to signify a complaint; his phrase "I tell mine elegy" is apparently the same as "I make my moan."<sup>23</sup> George Gascoigne described his Complaynt of Phylomene (1576), a partly narrative and partly lyrical version of the princess-nightingale myth, as "an elegye, or sorrowefull song."<sup>24</sup> Similarly, Thomas Nashe in The Unfortunate Traveller (1594), after telling how the lady Hericlide's husband and children succumbed to the plague and how she was ravished by a brigand, exclaims: "Let not your sorrow die, you that haue read the proeme and narration of this eligicall historie."<sup>25</sup> The same notion of general lament Spenser attached to the

<sup>17</sup> Drayton's Minor Poems, ed. cit., pp. 108 and 99, respectively.

<sup>18</sup> Some Longer Elizabethan Poems, ed. A. H. Bullen (Westminster and New York, 1903), pp. 41 ff. <sup>19</sup> See especially Elegia, i, vi, vii. <sup>20</sup> De Arte Poetica, l. 75.

<sup>21</sup> Vida recognized only the plaintive-erotic elegy. See A. S. Cook, The Art of Poetry (Boston, 1892), p. 42.

<sup>22</sup> Ronsard's Abrégé de l'Art Poétique, in Œuvres Choiesies, par Eugene Voizard (Paris, 1890), p. 303; Sidney's Defense of Poetry, in Eliz. Crit. Essays, ed. cit., i, 176, where he speaks of the "lamenting Elegiacke who bewailes . . . the weakenes of mankind and the wretchednes of the world."

<sup>23</sup> Edogues, fifth, l. 69.—On the other hand, Harington's reference to the "mourning" elegy, cited above, obviously implies a pseudo-serious erotic plaint.

<sup>24</sup> In the dedicatory letter, cf. the title page. Complete Works, ed. J. W. Cunliffe (Cambridge, 1907-1910), II, 177 and 175, respectively.

<sup>25</sup> Works, ed. R. B. McKerrow (London, 1904), II, 292.

term in his Tears of the Muses (1591), where he portrays Erato bewailing:

Now change your praises into piteous cries,
And Eulogies turne into Elegies <sup>26</sup>

Drayton, who employed the word in every conceivable sense,<sup>27</sup> sometimes indicated by it a poem of regret. He found himself "enforc'd this Elegy to write" when Lady Ashton's departure for Spain made him long for her "missed sight."<sup>28</sup> Again, writing of corruption in politics and society, he thus checked his bitter denunciation:

This is pure Satire, . . . and I
Was first in hand to write an Elegie,<sup>29</sup> and his meaning he amplified a few lines later:

For now as Elegiack I bewaile
These poor base times; then suddenly I raile
And am Satirick—

In this context, elegie obviously implies a sincere lament over abuses widespread and many-headed, which the poet might ridicule.

5. Rarely in Elizabeth's reign, but more often as the seventeenth century advanced, the word was applied to funeral poems or to verses intended to commemorate a particular person deceased. Although the ancient classical poets used the elegiac distich for epitaphs, they seldom made it serve for obituary lyrics (as we should now call them), and the Alexandrian and Roman pastorals from which Marot and Spenser borrowed the eclogue-elegy scheme, not being composed in elegiacs, were not elegies in their native literatures; the specialized threnodic significance of the term, therefore, seems to have been arrived at indirectly and slowly. When in Phyllyp Sparowe (ca. 1509) Skelton wrote of the "elegy" of an epitaph<sup>30</sup>—thereby apparently first using the English word<sup>31</sup>—he indicated only the Latin lines which conclude the

<sup>26</sup> Poetical Works (Oxford, 1929), p. 484.

<sup>27</sup> In his introduction to the Minor Poems, Brett remarks: "The Elegies comprise a great variety of styles and themes; some are really threnodies, some verse letters, some laments over the evil times, and one a summary of Drayton's literary opinions." Elsewhere Drayton applies the name to amorous poems.

<sup>28</sup> Drayton's Minor Poems, ed. cit., p. 105.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., p. 119.

<sup>30</sup> Poetical Works, ed. Alexander Dyce (London, 1843), I, 76; the epitaph in broken elegiacs follows immediately.

Flos folucrum formose, vale!
Philippe, sub isto

Marmore jam recubas,
Qui mihi carus eras . . .

See the writer's note in LTLS (Dec. 13, 1934), p. 895.

<sup>31</sup> The Oxford Dictionary records the earliest use of the term as in Barclay's fifth eclogue, published in 1514; scholars generally agree in dating Phyllyp Sparowe not later than 1509.

lament; and the word was suggested by the classic practice of composing sepulchral inscriptions in elegiacs. Tichbornes elegie, written with his owne hand in the Tower before his execution (1586) owed its name less to the imminent death of its alleged author than to the general lament it expressed for his hapless fate alive.<sup>32</sup> Spenser was the first poet of note to apply the name to a chant of personal grief inspired by the loss of a beloved and revered person, in his Daphnida. An Elegie vpon the death of the noble and vertuous Douglas Howard (1591) and in Astrophel. A Pastorall Elegie<sup>33</sup> (printed 1595). Comparatively few of the later pastoral laments, however, bore similar labels, and the title attached itself to non-pastoral poems, such as John Lane's Elegie on the death of Queen Elizabeth<sup>34</sup> (1603), Donne's "Funerall Elegie" for Elizabeth Drury (1610), and his "Elegie upon the untimely death of the incomparable Prince Henry"<sup>35</sup> (1613), Drayton's Elegies (1618) "Vpon the three Sonnes of Lord Sheffield, Drowned in Hvmbre" and "vpon the death of the Lady Penelope Clifton,"<sup>36</sup> Quarles's Alphabet of Elegies<sup>37</sup> (1630) on Dr. Ailmer, Jonson's "Elegy on my Muse . . . the Lady Venetia Digby"<sup>38</sup> (printed 1641), or the "Elegies upon the Author" published in the posthumous edition of Donne's poems<sup>39</sup> (1633). It is interesting to note that with the threnodic meaning the name rarely stands alone, the titles run "funeral elegy . . ." or "elegy upon the death of . . .";<sup>40</sup> and to observe further that, generally, the motif is less the sorrow of the poet than an encomium of the departed. We may judge that the Elizabethans thought of the obituary "elegies" not as subjective, and certainly not as reflective, poems of mourning—although many are both—but as long epitaphs, in which species of composition the characteristic note is praise of the deceased and the object is perpetuation of his name and fame.<sup>41</sup> The fact that many threnodic pieces resembling the "elegies" in every detail were called epitaphs, and the principle of nomenclature laid down by Puttenham in his chapter on the epitaph<sup>42</sup> corroborate this

<sup>32</sup> Poetry of the English Renaissance, ed. J. W. Hebel and H. H. Hudson (New York, 1929), p. 196.      <sup>33</sup> Poetical Works, ed. cit., pp. 527 and 546, respectively.

<sup>34</sup> Fugitive Poetical Tracts, 2nd series (Roxburghe Library, n d.).

<sup>35</sup> Poems, ed. H. J. C. Grierson (Oxford, 1929), pp. 221 and 243, respectively; cf. other examples, pp. 254 ff.

<sup>36</sup> Minor Poems, ed. cit., pp. 97 and 102, respectively; cf. other examples, pp. 114, 121.

<sup>37</sup> Complete Works, ed. A. B. Grosart (Edinburgh, 1881), III, 5.

<sup>38</sup> Part IX of a longer commendatory poem; Works, ed. Cunningham (London, 1875), III, 350.

<sup>39</sup> Poems, ed. cit., pp. 339 ff.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. the facsimile reprints of popular funeral elegies published originally as broadsides in A Century of Broadside Elegies, ed. J. W. Draper (London, 1928).

<sup>41</sup> Cf. J. C. Bailey, English Elegies (London, 1900), p. xlii.

<sup>42</sup> Eliz. Crit. Essays, ed. cit., II, 58.

view. Gradually, however, the conception changed, so that Isaac Walton in his "Elegie upon Dr Donne" (1633) avoided panegyric and confined himself to lamentation with the statement that, since Donne's virtues surpassed his powers of description, he would "write no Encomium, but an Elegie."<sup>43</sup> Walton's distinction was common with later writers.

6. Yet, during the sixteenth century, commonly elegie implied to the Elizabethans a love lyric, especially a plaintive love lyric. The eroticism which pervaded the Latin elegy in the Golden Age caused such a meaning to be accepted generally throughout the Renaissance. In Italy, Vida's influential Ars Poetica (1527) declared that "soft elegies our pity move, and show the youth in all the flames of love",<sup>44</sup> in France, Ronsard's Abrégé de l'Art Poétique françois (1565) explained that, although the elegy first sang "des morts les gestes et les faicts," "amour, pour y regner, en a chassé la mort."<sup>45</sup> The Arte of English Poesie (1589) remarked: there were an other sort, who sought the fauor of faire Ladies, and coueted to bemone their estates at large & the perplexities of loue in a certain pitious verse called Elegie . . . such among the Latines were Ouid, Tibullus, and Propertius;<sup>46</sup> and stated of species of poetry that a "third sorrowing was of loues, by long lamentation in Elegie, so was their song called."<sup>47</sup> Harington's apology for "scurrilite and lewdnesse" in the elegy (1591) indicates that he thought it to be both erotic and melancholy.<sup>48</sup> Significantly, Campion in his Observations (1602) employed his English elegiacs for a disappointed lover's complaint.<sup>49</sup> Shakespeare used the word in this sense only: in As You Like It (c. 1599) Orlando "hangs . . . Elegies on brambles; all (forsooth) deifying the name of 'Rosalinde'";<sup>50</sup> in Two Gentlemen of Verona (c. 1593) Proteus explains the gallant manner of wooing:

You must lay Lime, to tangle her desires
By walefull Sonnets . . .
After your dire-lamenting Elegies
Visit by night your Ladies chamber-window . . .<sup>51</sup>

Nor was Shakespeare alone in connecting the elegy with the amorous Petrarchan sonnets; abundant evidence shows that the wailing cycles of the 1590's impressed their authors as eminently elegiac. In Astrophel and Stella, the channel through which the high-tide of Petrarchism

<sup>43</sup> The Poems of John Donne, ed. cit., p. 346.

<sup>44</sup> Cook, The Art of Poetry, p. 42.—Vida wrote (ll. 45-46): " . . . sive elegis juvenum lachrymas quibus igne medullas urit amor. . . "

<sup>45</sup> Œuvres Choiesies, ed. cit., p. 303.

<sup>46</sup> Eliz Crit. Essays, ed. cit., II, 26.

<sup>47</sup> Ibid., II, 51.—In the same chapter, Puttenham places funeral songs in a different category.

<sup>48</sup> Ibid., II, 209.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., II, 345.

<sup>50</sup> III. ii. 340.

<sup>51</sup> III. ii. 68-9, 82-3.

flowed into English literature, Sidney included eleven lyrics not in the sonnet form, but equally amatory and tearful in mood, which he entitled "Songs." The elder Giles Fletcher's Licia (1593) contained beside the sonnets a half-dozen "Odes and Elegies" that run parallel to Sidney's "Songs";<sup>52</sup> so too, Barnabe Barnes's Parthenophil and Parthenophee (1593) included twenty-one "Elegies."<sup>53</sup> Thomas Lodge headed his series Phyllis Honoured with Pastorall Sonnets, Elegies, and amorous delights<sup>54</sup> (1593), and Alexander Craig's belated cycle bore the title Amorose Songes, Sonets, and Elegies<sup>55</sup> (1606). The spirit of sonnet and song being identical, it needed but a gesture to confer elegiac rank upon the "quatorzains" themselves; this Drayton did when he bestowed the name directly upon his sonnets, beginning Ideas Mirrour (1594): "Reade heere (sweet Mayd) the story of my wo, . . . My liues complaint in doleful Elegies."<sup>56</sup> Shakespeare, as we have seen, employed "wailful sonnets" and "dire-lamenting elegies" as synonymous phrases. At any rate, so generally did elegie signify a love plaint that Francis Meres in Palladis Tamia (1598) classed with the ancient elegists Mimnermus, Philetas of Cos, Tibullus, Ovid, and others, the English sonneteers Wyatt, Surrey, Sidney, Spenser, Daniel, Drayton, Shakespeare, and other authors of erotic poetry, declaring that as the ancients named were "famous for Elegie," so the English "are the most passionate among vs to bewaile and bemoane the perplexities of loue."<sup>57</sup>

7. But in Elizabethan England, as in Augustan Rome, the amatory elegy did not always wail and moan; for like their predecessors love-smitten Englishmen "gave the name of elegy to their pleasantries as well as lamentations."<sup>58</sup> Before the Petrarchan vogue began, William Webbe's Discourse of English Poetry (1586) assured its readers that "light matters, as Epigrammes and Elegies" were written "with much pleasant dalliance,"<sup>59</sup> and that the elegiac verse "serueth especially to the handling of loue and dalliances, whereof it taketh the name."<sup>60</sup> Webbe made the matter even more explicit. Grouping all poetry in three categories, "Comicall, Tragicall, and Historiall," he continued: Vnder the first may be contained all such Epigrammes, Elegies, and delectable ditties which poets haue deuised respecting onely the delights thereof: in the seconde, all dolefull complaynts, lamentable chaunces, and what soeuer else is poetically expressed in sorrow and heauines.<sup>61</sup>

<sup>52</sup> Elizabethan Sonnets, ed. cit., II, 71 ff.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., I, 238 ff.

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., II, 1.—The collection contained only one "Elegie," which is omitted in this edition.

<sup>55</sup> Hunterian Club, 1873.

<sup>56</sup> Drayton's Minor Poems, ed. cit., p. 2.—This introductory sonnet did not reappear in the revised versions of Idea.

<sup>57</sup> Eliz. Crit. Essays, II, 320.

<sup>58</sup> Shenstone, "A Prefatory Essay on Elegy."

<sup>59</sup> Eliz. Crit. Essays, I, 238.

<sup>60</sup> Ibid., I, 285.

<sup>61</sup> Ibid., I, 249.

Thus, Webbe, a student and university graduate if not a ripe scholar, regarded the elegy as playfully erotic in subject, and comic rather than tragic in mood. Songs of dalliance and the delights thereof are the three "Elegies" of Fletcher's Licia, which have the spirit of a love anything but thwarted; and not all of Barnes's can be styled dire-lamenting. Even livelier are the Elegies of Donne, which, although not printed until 1633, date from the last decade of the sixteenth century when the sonnet fashion was at its peak.<sup>62</sup> Contemptuous toward the Platonic amours of the Petrarchans and frankly sensual, "The Anagram," "Loves Progress," "Loves Warre," "Going to Bed," and the other pieces are ingenious witticisms which interpret a more realistic aspect of love, much the same as that celebrated by the Latin elegists; even the more sedate "Julia" and "The Autumnal" describe a vigorous, joyous mood. According to this usage, then, the sole distinctive note of the elegy was its eroticism. All the Elizabethan critics and most of the poets agreed in considering the elegy an amatory lyric, either plaintive or sportive.<sup>63</sup>

8. A few theorists, cognizant of the Greek and Latin practice of composing epigrams in the elegiac distich, associated the elegy and the epigram. Webbe wrote of "Epigrammes and Elegies" as kindred "light matters," and Campion used his English elegiacs for epigrams.<sup>64</sup>

Although in particular instances confusion might have resulted merely from a loose shifting of names, the diversity we have reviewed was due largely to a diversity in the elegiac tradition handed down from antiquity to the Renaissance, for no kind of Elizabethan "elegie" fails to exhibit traits identified also with more than one of the classic elegies. The well-marked variety of meanings at first attached to the English word leads to two conclusions. First, the English elegy, as we now define it, was no simple outgrowth of the ancient elegy, which, at least as Renaissance writers understood the ancients, was not uniform but multiple. Second, even in English, from the sixteenth-century critics and poets to our contemporaries an evolution patently has taken place—perhaps in nomenclature only, perhaps also in the theory of poetic types.

FRANCIS WHITE WEITZMANN

Cornell University

<sup>62</sup> Poems, ed. cit., pp. 71-109.

<sup>63</sup> Cf. Milton's comment, Elegia vi:

Namque elegia levis multorum cura deorum est . . .
Liber adest alegis, Eratoque, Ceresque, Venusque,
Et cum purpurea matre tenellus Amor.

<sup>64</sup> Works, ed. S. P. Vivian (Oxford, 1909), pp. 48-49; cf. his use of the distich for Latin epigrams, ibid., pp. 235 ff.

INFORMATION FURNISHED BY THE MERCURE GALANT
ON THE FRENCH PROVINCIAL ACADEMIES
IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

THE documentary value of the Mercure galant, the review founded in 1672, which La Bruyère considered to be "directement au-dessous de rien," has not ceased to increase with the passage of time. Interspersed among frivolous poems, conundrums, descriptions of festivals and of styles, one finds announcements of new books, of military campaigns, and (what interests us here particularly) accounts, often filled with picturesque detail, of the foundation and the sessions of literary bodies organized in the provinces in the seventeenth century, in imitation of the French Academy. Some of these still have vigorous existence. In most instances, the Mercure is the chief source of information on these early years, and, strangely enough, has been neglected by the historians of the provincial academies.

Thanks to the Mercure and to de Visé, who was many years its editor, we learn that frivolous or serious provincial assemblages sprang up everywhere like mushrooms during the last quarter of the century. Thus the Mercure speaks of an Académie de beaux-esprits, organized by Mme La Viguière d'Alby, where lovers were not admitted (juillet, août, oct. 1681); announces the Académie galante of Avignon, from which love and gambling were excluded, "de sorte qu'il ne s'y parle que de choses fines, & dignes d'occuper des gens d'un raisonnement solide" (avril 1687); and, in contrast, mentions yet a third where love was the principal subject of conversation (juin 1682). In a certain Académie aisée, the discussion revolved around "l'homme accompli" (fév. 1683).

There were other academies slightly worthier of the name: that of Villeneuve, which, far from Paris, had the really academic preoccupation of praising the king (avril 1687), one organized by lawyers of Riom, where members discussed literary questions as well as matters of law—but not too seriously, since they wondered, for example, whether love is stronger than eloquence, and decided in favor of love! (juin, déc. 1698, established five years before). Vernon had its academy, presided over by a clever woman, whose comedies it played and whose poetry it praised (mars 1698). The society at Coutances appears most academic of all: every member was obliged to make an address, the purity of the French language was discussed, and new works were examined (jan., juillet 1698). Madame Royale founded in her palace in far away Turin an Académie des esprits choisis, where it seemed obligatory to praise the directress, who lavished presents and pensions on the members. The Mercure mentions four members: Saint-Réal, the bishop of Fossan, de Martignac, translator of Terence and of Horace, and the abbé Deville, reputed to be a brilliant young preacher, who pronounced a rather flat speech at his reception. (See the Mercure for sept. 1677, mai 1679, juin 1680, juillet 1685).

These instances suffice to show that the organization of bureaux d'esprit had become at the end of the great century a veritable fad. As a certain contributor puts it, "Il a pris a mes Provinciaux une étrange démangeaison de faire . . . une Académie galante . . . Je croy qu'ils en deviendront fous" (juillet 1682). It is evident that these academies show too plainly the influence of the bad préciosité and of the Hôtel de Rambouillet in its decline, to have had more than transitory existence. The Mercure renders us a much more important service in its information regarding the organization of such academies in the real sense of the word as played vital rôles in the literary life of their time. They will be discussed in the order of their foundation.

The Academy of Arles.<sup>1</sup>—The Academy of Arles, the oldest and most important of the provincial academies, one of the few to receive the title of royale, was founded by letters patent from the king in 1668 and enjoyed thenceforth the same privileges as the French Academy. The Mercure tells us that it had a director, whose term of office seems to have been a year, a secretary, and a chancellor, both elected for life, and a protector, who was chosen by Louis XIV from the French Academy. The first protector was Saint-Aignan, that "honnête homme" who charmed Paris by his wit. Upon his death in 1687, he was followed by the marquis de Dangeau, of the famous Journal. The escutcheon of the society was adorned with two green laurels, planted on a mound, intertwining their branches and surmounted by a radiant sun, with the motto, Foventur eodem (oct. 1687). The number of members was first limited to twenty, whom the king required to be of the nobility, and was increased to thirty in 1677 (jan. 1688).<sup>2</sup>

Early in its history, it was affiliated with the French Academy, which treated it as a daughter, graciously receiving its members when they visited the capital, offering them the opportunity to make addresses and to take part in the discussions on the dictionary, and showering upon them praises and jetons de présence.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See the following numbers of the Mercure: août, sept. 1677; jan. 1678; juillet, oct. (t. II) 1678; jan., fév., mai, août 1680; jan., août, déc. 1681; jan., mars, juin, nov., déc. 1682; mai, nov. 1683, avril, juin, juillet, août, nov. 1684; jan., fév., avril, mai, sept. 1685, fév. (t. II), mai 1686; mars, sept., oct. 1687; mars 1688; avril 1689; juin, déc. 1690; mars 1691; avril 1693; juillet 1694.

<sup>2</sup> According to an issue of the Mercure in 1689, the number was forty at that moment, but that figure can very well be a typographical error or a mistake of the editor. The number was still only thirty in October, 1687.

In 1687, the city of Arles offered for its meetings, which took place on Mondays, a magnificent apartment in the Hôtel de Ville, of which Mansard had made the plans. Vertron, one of its noted members, recalls to his associates that the reason the illustrious French Academy had deigned to receive in its alliance the Royal Academy of Arles was that there might be more hands to write of the conquests, and more tongues to publish the praises, of the monarch (déc. 1681). And, in fact, we can easily believe such testimonies, when we read the great number of extravagant (and often banal) eulogies of the king, made by the academicians of Arles, with which the Mercure embellishes its pages. For the glory of the king, the society decided to offer a gold medal of Louis XIV every year that the French Academy did not give a prize. Here are two samples of subject of contest: Que le Roy parait toujours tranquille, quoi que dans un mouvement continuel (mars 1682, pp. 262-265); Sur la satisfaction que le Roy a d'avoir un Fils digne de luy, & sur les premières Conquêtes de ce jeune Héros (avril 1689, pp. 245-248). At the session of November 1682, which was devoted to the celebration of the birth of the duke of Burgundy, each member—and there were thirty of them—read a work of his own composition in honor of the young prince! In 1687, they fêted the king's return to health in a brilliant ceremony, in the chapel of the Pénitents gris, where they held their extraordinary sessions, “à cause de sa vaste étendue & de la richesse de ses peintures & de ses dorures,” of which the elegance was augmented on that particular day by a display of candles, silver, and a large portrait of Louis XIV by Mignard, as well as by the presence of handsomely gowned women (mars 1687, t. 1, pp. 66-76). The academy took an active part in the project of sending to the king the Venus discovered at Arles in 1651, and it was presented to His Majesty by the marquis de Robias, academician, and placed in the great gallery of Versailles, on the fifteenth of April, 1685.<sup>4</sup> The members participated in the lively discussion as to whether the statue represented Venus or Diana, leaving the final de-<sup>3</sup> At the suggestion of Charles Perrault, in order to encourage regular attendance and hence to stimulate the work on the dictionary, the French Academy had adopted these jetons de présence, which had some intrinsic value, one of which was distributed to each member at every meeting. Corneille, provident Norman that he was, is said to have been particularly assiduous in his attendance.

<sup>4</sup> The statue, on which Girardon made some unfortunate restorations, is now in the Louvre. See Jules Formigé, Note sur la Venus d'Arles. (Académie des inscriptions et belles-lettres. Comptes rendus des séances de l'année 1911, Paris, 1911, in-8), cision to the king (avril, mai 1685). When an obelisk was unearthed at Arles, the academy conceived the idea of making an engraving of it to offer to Louis XIV. The latter ennobled the marquis de Roubin, who made the presentation (août 1677, pp. 112-126; sept. 1677, p. 64 ff.). Since religion was a question of loyalty to the king, the academy rejoiced at the abjuration of a certain de Blansac and received him into its midst. If Vertron was one of its most esteemed members, it was thanks, not to his Nouvelle Pandore, which has come down to us, but rather to his inexhaustible talent in lauding the king, whom he glorified in countless little poems and in three voluminous works, which won for him the title of historiographer.<sup>5</sup>

At the death of Saint-Aignan, the academy rendered him sumptuous honors in the chapel of the Pénitents gris. Among the realistic decorations were skeletons, skulls, bands of black velvet, silver tears, an emblem formed with two intertwined palm leaves to represent the alliance of the two academies contracted through the efforts of the duke, forty tapers to represent the French Academy and thirty for the Academy of Arles, etc. (oct. 1687, pp. 142-206).

There are added to this study, for reference, the names of all the members mentioned by de Visé, with the chief information about each. This list indicates that they were orators, historians, ecclesiastics, philosophers, poets, all interested in literature, several rather prolific writers, but not of merit great enough to survive, not even the illustrious Vertron nor Magnin, whose mottoes and poetry for a long time enriched half the numbers of the Mercure and all of the province. A brilliant exception, however, is Mme Deshoulières, the first woman to be invited to membership in a French academy, elected to Arles in March, 1689.

One may conclude for the Academy of Arles that it was an extremely active body in the seventeenth century, very proud of its privileges, enthusiastic in its duties to the king, active in its propagation of literature in Provence, and in close relations with its foster mother in Paris.

The Academy of Soissons.<sup>6</sup>—Upon the publication of the history of the Academy of Soissons in Latin by Héricourt in 1689, the Mercure reviewed the formation of that body (mars 1689, pp. 171-180). We learn that, as early as 1650, four men of letters gathered each Wednesday to discuss what they had read and composed during the week and mutually prescribed the matters on which they should write. In 1652 they augmented their group by the addition of five other members. Thanks to the aid of Patru and of Pellisson, both of the French Academy, and in spite of the opposition of chancellor Séguier, after having added eight more members, they obtained from the king in June, 1674, their letters patent, which fixed their membership at twenty. Their organization was conditioned on their sending to the French Academy every year, the day of Saint-Louis (August 25), a work glorifying the king, "comme par une manière de tribut." The young society seems to have been faithful to this charge, for de Visé has occasion very often to publish these panegyrics. Sometimes the author himself presented his work, always being received with civility by his Paris confreres, who invariably found great beauty in his achievement. Soissons, as well as Arles, was affiliated with the French Academy, and was spoken of as its daughter.

<sup>5</sup> Histoire panégyrique du Roy en quatre langues; Parallèle de Louis-le-Grand avec les autres Princes qui ont esté surnommez Grands; Dictionnaire historique des conquestes de Louis XIV depuis 1643 jusques en 1679.

<sup>6</sup> See the following numbers of the Mercure: juin 1677; mars, oct. 1678; sept. 1679; jan., avril, oct. 1680, sept. 1687; fév., mars 1689; juin, sept. 1691; fév., mai 1693; juin, juillet, oct., nov. 1694; mai, 1695; jan., déc. 1696; août, sept. 1697; mai, nov., déc. 1699; mai 1700.

Its first protector was cardinal d'Estrées, who had often attended its meetings when he was bishop of Laon. His promotion to the cardinalate was the subject of extravagant commendation by the academician Hébert (juin 1677, pp. 21-30).

To testify its keen gratitude for the part that Pellisson had played in its foundation, the academy celebrated a solemn service for the repose of his soul after his death in 1693 (mai 1693, pp. 242-245).

Three members alone seem to have sustained the glory of this body. Hébert, treasurer of France, appears in the rôle of official orator. He wrote a well-turned speech when the king passed by Soissons in April 1680; eulogized Colbert when the latter visited the city in October of the same year; represented his associates by allocutions before the French Academy; and finally spoke so much and so well that he deemed it fitting to publish a Recueil de discours & de Harangues, which discourses, according to the Mercure were models of the genre (nov. 1699, pp. 161-163). Some were for the monarch, some for the queen, and still others for the dauphiness, for Madame and for various great personages. Bosquillon, known for his funeral oration on chancellor Séguier in Latin, was a great friend of Mlle de Scudéry, to whom he addressed many poems and whose Conversations he admired. His translation from the Greek of the Quatre discours de la composition of Saint Ephraim of Syria made a furor. People talked of nothing else at court—"il se fourroit par tout, jusqu'à la toilette des dames" (août, sept. 1697). The abbé Héricourt, twice director (in 1688 and in 1693), wrote rather good poems to the glory of the dauphin and of the king, and was the historian of the academy.

The fact that the appended list of members shows a great preponderance of ecclesiastics may explain the scanty literary productions of the group. Nevertheless, one can see that, like its elder sister, the Academy of Soissons desired earnestly to act in a fashion worthy of its name and of its foster mother.

The Academy of Villefranche en Beaujolais<sup>7</sup> (Villefranche-sur-Seine).—The Academy of Villefranche was organized as early as 1677, was functioning very actively by 1680, but did not receive its lettres patentes until 1695, and did not assume immediately the pretentious title of academy. De Visé informs us in detail of its organization.

De Villeroy, archbishop of Lyons, whose brother was preceptor of the king, was its protector until his death in 1694. It made certain regulations confirmed by him, adopted a costume of ceremony (long forerunner of the habit vert), chose, as its patron, the patron saint of Louis XIV, and took as its emblem a diamond rose bearing these words: Mutuo clarissimus igne (sept. 1680, pp. 252–257; juillet 1680, pp. 28–34, oct. 1681, pp. 16–22). There was a director, who seems to have held office for a year, and a permanent secretary. The regular, as well as the extraordinary sessions, were held in a large hall, “une des plus magnifiques & des plus spatieuses de tout le Pais,” sumptuously adorned with Turkish and Persian rugs, in the home of their permanent secretary, Bessie du Péloux. Each new member was obliged to give an address, to which an old academicien replied. These discourses were filled with the customary praises of the king and of the assembly. In only one case, one small page was devoted to the predecessor! The society was composed of fifteen members in 1680 and of twenty as early as 1688.

The splendor of the festivals of Saint-Louis was enhanced by the presence of women “dans une très grande parure” and of all the official bodies of the city: “le baillage, l’élection, les échevins, la prévôté, les corps ecclésiastiques & les réguliers.” On that day special speeches were given, and two gold medals of the king, established as prizes as early as 1688, were awarded. Here are the subjects for 1688: Que les Académies de Belles-Lettres sont non seulement établies pour apprendre à bien parler, mais encore pour apprendre à bien vivre; in poetry: l’Empire de Louis le Grand sur les mers (mars 1688, pp. 304–305). The competition gave such rich results that the academy published that year a Recueil of the works submitted.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>7</sup> See the following numbers of the Mercure: juillet, août, sept. 1680; avril, oct. 1681; jan., oct. (t. II) 1682; mars, sept. 1686, nov. 1687; fév., mars, août, sept., déc. 1688; mai, juillet 1694.

<sup>8</sup> Recueil de plusieurs pièces d’éloquence et de poésie présentées à l’Académie de Villefranche en Beaujolais. Pour le prix proposé l’année 1688. Villefranche: chez Antoine Martin, Imprimeur & Libraire de la Ville, & de l’Académie. 1688, in-12.

It is easy to divine the principal occupation of these gentlemen. "On peut dire," declared the abbé Baudry at his reception, "que vos Plumes & vos Langues sont entièrement consacrées à la gloire du plus sage & du plus grand Prince de l'Univers" (nov. 1687). Their director exhorts:

Aimons la Gloire & ce qui peut nous l'acquérir, celebrons sans cesse les faits heroïques de nostre Monarque; que ce soit le premier, ou plutost l'unique but de nos entretiens; & pour peu que nos Plumes s'exercent à toucher les traits de la gloire qui l'environne, soyons certain qu'il en rejaillira assez de rayons sur nos fronts, pour les ceindre des couronnes de l'immortalité.

In spite of these statements, there is, happily, evidence that this illustrious body also had really academic preoccupations: that it concerned itself with the purity of the language and with questions of style.

At the session of August 25, 1688, there was unveiled in the room where the meetings were held, a bust of the king, flanked by portraits of the archbishop of Lyons and of Mlle d'Orléans, cousin of Louis-le-Grand, sovereign of Dombes and lady of the province of Beaujolais, whom the academy often honored by addresses and poems.

The members listened with pleasure to extravagant eulogies of themselves, of "ces sublimes Esprits qui remplissent vostre Académie" (abbé Baudry, nov. 1687). One day their director declared:

Vous avez, Messieurs, remply & soutenu nos Conférences d'un si grand nombre de beaux discours, que si l'exercice en est continué d'une force égale, nos Registres pourront fournir une assez riche & ample matière pour former des Volumes entiers, & donner à nos Académiciens un rang d'honneur & de gloire parmy les Auteurs les plus celebres. La décision des Problemes, la pointe des Epigrammes, les fleurs de l'Eloquence, la pureté du Discours, en un mot tout ce que la Poésie & l'Oratoire ont de subtil & de majestueux, commence d'estre en usage parmy nous. On jugeroit, si je l'ose dire, à voir nos ouvrages & nos productions, que nostre Compagnie est un de ces Corps qui naissent dans un instant par la vertu d'une main puissante & infinie, & qui ne finissent jamais . . . Nostre Académie estant un Corps formé dans un instant, paroît achevé & parfait du premier coup dans toutes ses parties, & mis au jour avec tous ses ornemens & toutes ses beautés . . ." (jan. 1682).

The Academy of Nîmes.<sup>9</sup>—The Mercure verifies and completes the information furnished by Ménard on the Academy of Nîmes in his history of that city.<sup>10</sup> Known for several years by the title of Conférences sur les belles-lettres, the society succeeded in August 1682 in obtaining its letters patent, thanks to the efforts of François Faure-Fondamente, at whose home the sessions had been held, and of the duke de Noailles, commander in Languedoc. The membership was fixed at twenty-six, with Jacques Séguier, bishop of Nîmes, as its first protector, followed at his death in 1689 by Fléchier, of the French Academy. The coat of arms adopted represented a crown of palms with the device, Aemula lauri, in imitation of the French Academy, whose symbol is a crown of laurels bearing the inscription, A l'immortalité (oct., t. II, 1682, pp. 262-267). According to the Mercurie galant, the first meeting took place September 18, that is, after the reception of the letters patent, and not April 1, as is stated by Ménard, nor March 28, as Albert Puech has it.<sup>11</sup> The body enjoyed the same privileges as the French Academy and was affiliated with it (nov. 1692, pp. 129-140, fév. 1693, pp. 85-96). It manifested its desire to please the king by celebrating the birth of the duke of Burgundy in its first session and in honoring the memory of the queen by a public gathering September 29, 1683, in which lugubrious black hangings measured the depth of the young academy's grief (oct., t. I, 1683, pp. 135-139).

<sup>9</sup> See the following numbers of the Mercure: oct. (t. i) 1682; oct. (t. i) 1683; fév. 1686; oct., nov. 1689; avril 1690; mars, juin, nov. 1691; nov. 1692; fév., avril 1693; fév., juin 1694; mars 1696.

<sup>10</sup> Ménard, Histoire civile, ecclésiastique, et littéraire de la ville de Nîmes (Paris 1754, 7 vol. in-4), vi, 117-135.

The seats having to be solicited as in the French Academy, a certain member boasted that he had been received at his first request (juin 1691, pp. 48-60). The receptions were open to the public; sometimes, even, visitors took part in the eulogies of the recipient. Thanks to the intervention of Fléchier in 1692, the French Academy accorded to the body at Nîmes, "comme à un corps célèbre," the privilege of affiliating with it, and paid honor to a deputation of three gentlemen from Nîmes, accepting their advice on certain words for the dictionary (nov. 1692, pp. 129-140). To manifest its gratitude, the provincial academy, on May 14, 1693, hastened to receive La Chapelle, who was passing through the city, in a brilliant academic session, with a dissertation on ancient medals by the learned Graverol and a hymn to the glory of Saint Francis of Sales by "l'illustre" Santeuil (avril 1693, pp. 247-253).

Nîmes seems to have been interested in really literary questions. Certainly under the direction of that delicate littérateur, the abbé Fléchier, it would not have been content to limit itself to inane eulogies of Louis-le-Grand. Allowing somewhat for flattery, there is doubtless a great deal of truth in the words pronounced by canon Marsolier at his reception (juin 1691):

<sup>11</sup> Albert Puech, les Nîmois dans la deuxième moitié du XVII<sup>e</sup> siècle. (Mémoires de l'Académie de Nîmes, année 1887, in-8, pp. 134-139. Puech declared elsewhere (Une Page de l'histoire de l'Académie de Nîmes—Bulletin de l'Académie de Nîmes, année, 1879, in-8) that nothing was known of the academy's history in the seventeenth century except what Ménard had written about it.

Qui ne seroit agreablement flaté de se voir assis avec les Sages, avec tout ce que cette Province, où l'air même que l'on y respire, semble donner de l'espiit, a de plus fin, de plus delicat, de plus sçavant, de plus capable enfin de soutenir la réputation d'une Académie, qui a la gloire d'avoir esté fondée par Louis le Grand?

Its close association with its neighbor, the elder daughter of the French Academy—interchange of visits, and of addresses, of views on questions of the moment—furnishes an interesting chapter on the intellectual life in the province in that day.

The Academy of Angers.<sup>12</sup>—The Mercuré galant furnishes much detailed information on the Academy of Angers: charter members, statutes, letters patent, special ceremonies, prizes, etc. (See especially déc., t. 1, 1686, pp. 162–211; juin 1687, pp. 22–35, août 1687, pp. 24–44).<sup>13</sup>

The first plans for an academy at Angers were formulated by mayor Charlot during his administration but were not executed until after the expiration of his office. He was known for having embellished the Hôtel de Ville, of which Pierre Poyet was the architect and which, according to the Mercuré, was considered one of the most beautiful edifices of the kingdom. Three men, the comte d'Armagnac, grand écuyer de France, and governor of the province of Anjou, de Chasteauneuf, secretary of state, and Grandet, conseiller au présidial of Angers, solicited the king's permission to found the academy.

The first assembly, held in the Hôtel de Ville, as were all succeeding extraordinary gatherings, took place with great pomp the first of July 1685. The fête was announced at daybreak by the discharge of cannon and the beating of drums. The bishop of Angers ordered that all the bells of the churches ring for an hour. All work ceased and the shops closed. The path to the Hôtel de Ville was draped with twenty-four flags. Notable personalities of the city, of the province, and of the neighboring provinces, were present. The three places of honor were occupied by Arnauld, bishop of Angers, who was elected its first director, Antichamp, lieutenant of His Majesty and commander in the city and in the château of Angers, and de Nointel, maître ordinaire des requêtes de l'Hotel de Ville et intendant de la généralité de Tours, and the one to whom the king had sent the formal order to found the academy. There were many women present, "dont la beauté sembloit disputer à l'Académie l'honneur de cette feste" (déc. 1686). Out of gratitude to the king, the city officers, who regarded this new company as one of the greatest ornaments of their province, erected a statue of Louis-le-Grand in the gardens of the Hôtel de Ville and unveiled it after the addresses had been made. The magnificent banquet for the "personnes de qualité" which followed lasted until nightfall, when the houses, church steeples and neighboring villages were seen to be a blaze of light. Fireworks and illuminated mottoes in honor of His Majesty finished the long and brilliant ceremonies. Surely the "Roi-Soleil" must have been satisfied with the honors shown him in this "garden of France"!

<sup>12</sup> See the following numbers of the Mercuré; oct, déc. 1686; jan., juin, août, sept. 1687; jan., juin (t. 1), sept., oct. 1688; juin, juillet 1689; jan., août 1690; juin 1691; déc. 1693; juillet 1694; avril 1695; jan. 1697.

<sup>13</sup> An Angevin, and academician, Petrineau des Noulis, planned to write an elaborate history of the city of Angers, which would include an account of the academy, but never carried out his project. See his Project de l'Histoire d'Anjou, s.l.n.d., in-8.

Louis XIV named all the charter members, whose number was fixed at thirty, but allowed the company to elect new members as vacancies occurred. These must be natives of Angers or of Angevin parentage, and, as far as possible, residents of Angers. However, Angevins living elsewhere, or strangers of especial merit established in Angers, might be elected. Among the members was a professor of the faculty of law in the University of Paris (who, indeed, might have been called there from Angers). Besides the thirty academicians, the statutes permitted the membership, during their term of office, of certain dignitaries of the city. The presence of at least fifteen members and a two-thirds majority were required to elect a new member. At the death of an academician, two were chosen to pronounce his eulogy, one in prose and one in verse. The meetings were held every Wednesday at two o'clock, without summer interruption. No deliberation could take place if less than ten were present. The receptions of new members and the distribution of prizes were open to people of prominence. The officers were a director and a chancellor, each elected for six months, and two permanent secretaries. The letters patent, given by the king at Versailles in June, 1685, accorded to the body the same privileges as those enjoyed by the French Academy, except that of committimus (privilege of appeal of cases to higher court).

Two gold medals bearing the effigy of His Majesty were distributed annually on May 14, the day on which Louis XIV began to reign. The city offered the prizes the first year; after that, a member, often the director, furnished them. The thirty members constituted themselves the judges. The subjects, one in eloquence, one in poetry, were designed to glorify the king, but seem less banal than some selected by other bodies. For example, those for 1686 were: le Triomphe du Roy sur l'Hérésie (the Edict of Nantes was revoked in 1685), and le Canal de la rivière d'Eure. Magnin, of the Academy of Arles, who wrote the prize-winning ode on the latter topic, eulogized the king extravagantly, but forgot to mention the engineer who constructed this important waterway (juillet 1689, pp. 101–112)! The subjects for 1688 are not without interest: eloquence, les Sages ordonnances du Roy pour la réformation de la justice; poetry, les Sentimens de respect & d'admiration dont les peuples les plus éloignez ont donné des témoignages au Roy par de celebres Ambassades (jan. 1688, pp. 40–46).

While the chief public duty of the society was to praise its august founder, occasional remarks of de Visé permit us to imagine that the weekly gatherings were filled with more literary activities. Thus we know that as early as December 1686, the members had contributed enough works in prose and in verse that the reading of them would occupy several sessions. On one occasion, a passage of Virgil, which was baffling scholars, was the cause of a lively dispute (jan. 1697, pp. 35–47). Doctors' theses were dedicated to the academy and furnished subjects of discussion, as was the case in some of the other academies. The statutes forbade the mention of religion. The above-mentioned subject for eloquence in 1686 seems, however, to contradict that regulation.

The Academy of Angers had the honor of counting among its number two men of letters famous in the seventeenth century: Bernier, noted for the relation of his travels in the Orient (he and Chardin were the most celebrated writers of travels of their time), and Ménage, preceptor of Mme de Sévigné, one of the most erudite men of his day and a brilliant figure in the salon of the marquise de Rambouillet. The list of members here affixed shows the customary preponderance of men of the law courts, others with distinctly literary interests, and, as a new element, several professors of the University of Angers.

The Academies of Toulouse.—I shall not speak here of the Jeux Floraux, that Collège de gaie science, founded in 1323, and so famous that the very frequent mention of it by the Mercure does not add much to our knowledge of this most ancient literary body of Europe. This same Mercure is, however, in regard to two other literary academies in Toulouse, the only source of information which permits us to correct serious errors made by the historians of the present Academy of Sciences, Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres of that city. Augustin Larrey, Desbarreaux-Bernard and Lapierre<sup>14</sup> all confuse two entirely separate organizations, which existed simultaneously, i.e., the Lanternistes, and another academy which called itself Conférences des Belles-Lettres, or Académie de Toulouse, or Société des Belles-Lettres. Neither Larrey nor Lapierre suspects the existence of any other body than the Lanternistes in the seventeenth century. Larrey declares that no source of information on their history during that period exists. Desbarreaux-Bernard is troubled by an allusion in Raynal's Histoire de la ville de Toulouse (p. 384) to other attempts than that of the Lanternistes to establish an academy at Toulouse, but dismisses the idea, because he finds no trace of such efforts. All three confuse members and founders of the two bodies and suppose that the Lanternistes were the forerunners of the present academy. The information in the Mercure is ample to prove that the Lanternistes had nothing to bequeath to posterity, and that the Société des Belles-Lettres was the real ancestor of the present Academy of Toulouse. These three historians ought, however, to have had recourse to the Mercure, which, indeed, as Lapierre tells us, was printed in Toulouse from 1694 to 1702.

<sup>14</sup> Augustin Larrey, Notice historique sur les travaux de l'Académie Royale des sciences, inscriptions et belles-lettres de Toulouse, depuis son origine jusqu'à ce jour. (Mémoires de l'Académie des sciences, etc., de Toulouse, 3<sup>e</sup> série, Toulouse 1847, in-8, III, 97–132.

Desbarreaux-Bernard, Essai sur les réunions littéraires et scientifiques qui ont précédé, à Toulouse, l'établissement de l'Académie des sciences. (Mémoires de l'Académie des sciences etc., de Toulouse, 3<sup>e</sup> série, Toulouse, 1849, v, 392–424.

Lapierre, les Bouts-rimés des Lanternistes. (Mémoires de l'Académie des Sciences, etc., de Toulouse, 8<sup>e</sup> série, Toulouse, 1887, ix, 269–286.

The Lanternistes.<sup>15</sup>—The first mention of the Lanternistes is found in the April issue of 1694, which informs us that the first distribution of prizes occurred the year before. A manuscript Registre des Lanternistes, to which Lapierre had access, also indicates that they existed in 1693. The ten members met at irregular intervals, clandestinely, in the evening, each one carrying a lantern to the rendezvous, hence their name, which they had assumed in imitation of certain Italian academies, such as the Innominati, and the Humoristi. They met for a time, at least, at the home of a certain Lucas, conseiller clerk au parlement, who furnished the prize. Later, Morant, premier président du parlement, received them for the awarding of the prize, which took place Saint John the Baptist's day. The prize was a silver medal representing Apollo playing a lyre, with the inscription, Apollini Tolosano, on one side and on the other, Lucerna in nocte. At the awarding of the prize, the picture of the winner was displayed, crowned with laurels.

The sole purpose of the society was to cultivate the genre of bouts-rimés, that is, sonnets written with certain rhymes, selected in advance. It was a fad which had struck the capital and swept through the province and which was prolonged—unduly—by the Lanternistes. As early as April 1683, the Mercure announced that it had received four thousand sonnets in bouts-rimés in a certain contest. Soon after their organization, and at frequent intervals thereafter, the Lanternistes felt the necessity of defending the genre, which was vigorously attacked as extravagant and good only for treating burlesque subjects. However, they glorified no lesser personages than the king and the princesse de Conty and required that the sonnets be written in Alexandrine verse, shorter verses not being sufficiently dignified for the subjects treated! Mlle Lhéritier and Fevrierie took up their defence; even Mlle de Scudéry showered praise upon the project of the Lanternistes. "Les bouts-rimés," declared de Visé in March 1695, "ont agréablement inondé la Cours & la Province." Shortly before, however, he had been afraid that the public was beginning to weary of them, and so spared it the reading of more than one hundred sonnets in buste, glaçons, etc., which he had received (août 1694, p. 203). Campistron, brother of the dramatist, received the first prize awarded; Mlle Lhéritier, author of the famous fairy story, l'Adroite princesse (so often attributed to Charles Perrault), received another, and, contrary to the rule of most academies, which excluded women, was elected to membership. The invitation, subject of a long article in the Mercure, was superbly and gallantly couched on vellum (juin 1698, pp. 77-94).

<sup>15</sup> See the following numbers of the Mercure: avril, mai, juin, juillet, août 1694; fév., mars, mai, juillet, août, sept. 1695, jan., fév., juillet, nov. 1696; jan., juillet, août 1697; mars, mai, juin, juillet, nov. 1698; jan., fév., juin, juillet 1699; fév., juillet 1700

We know from certain Mémoriaux annuels des Lanternistes referred to by Lapierre, that, as the members died, others were not elected to succeed them. Thus, in 1720, there were eight, in 1730, four, and in 1742, as the last member died, the bouts-rimés expired with him.

The Société des Belles-Lettres of Toulouse.<sup>16</sup>—Several more or less successful attempts were made to establish an academy of belles-lettres in Toulouse, the first one antedating by many years the vogue of the bouts-rimés. Perhaps the wars and the large Huguenot element, and certainly the Jeux Floraux were detrimental. Louis XIV refused to grant letters patent to the young organization, which received none until 1745, but did give to the Jeux Floraux their statutes in 1694, with exclusive jurisdiction over prose and verse, whereupon the Lanternistes declared with some humor that they supposed they would be allowed by the Jeux Floraux to continue to function, since they confined themselves to their bouts-rimés, leaving to the former the ode, the elegy, and the eclogue. In spite of discouragements, a literary body was formed, de Visé tells us, thanks largely to the guidance of Pellisson, who, we know, had a veritable passion for academies. Born in Béziers in 1624, he founded an academy at Castres in 1648, was one of the chief organizers of the Academy of Soissons, and was a most active member and the historian of the French Academy. Desbarreaux-Bernard informs us that Pellisson was scarcely eighteen years old when he contributed to the establishment of the Lanternistes (whom Desbarreaux-Bernard confuses with the Académie des Belles-Lettres). From the Mercure, we know that Pellisson, who lived for several years at Toulouse, formed the academy soon after the establishment of the French Academy, which dates from 1634; in 1693 its organization is referred to as having taken place thirty-five or forty years before. See the Eloge funèbre de M. Pellisson prononcé à l'Académie de Toulouse (Mercure, mai 1693, pp. 120-140).

<sup>16</sup> See the following numbers of the Mercure: oct., nov. 1689; juin, oct. 1692; mai 1693; juin, juillet 1694; juillet 1696; mars 1698; fév., mai 1699.

The society languished and was reorganized in 1689, under the impulse of de Baviile, intendant de la province, and of de Malepeyre, who had aided Pellisson in its initial organization and who continued to be one of its most persistent animators (oct. 1689, pp. 21-48, Fondation de l'Académie de Toulouse). The group originally met at the home of Malepeyre and still did so frequently. He appears to have been also one of the leading spirits among the Lanternistes, which may partly explain the confusion over the two bodies. The new group, whose membership was fixed at twenty, proposed, undoubtedly to distinguish itself radically from the Jeux Floraux, to unite in its weekly gatherings the study of the sciences as well as of the arts. They laid out for themselves a very definite academic program. The three-hour session began with an address by a confrere on a problem proposed by the company, after which there followed a general discussion on questions of literature, history, or physics, and especially of the French language, of which the purity was the principal object of their exercises. Some of the speeches were made in Latin. Some subjects discussed were: whether women should be admitted into the academies; whether it is easier to resist pleasure or pain; who are more apt to succeed in the sciences, melancholy or gay persons. Experiments and anatomical dissections were performed in the meetings. A eulogy in Latin of Queen Christina of Sweden was pronounced at her death. Frederick of Denmark was received in Oct., 1693.

Beginning with 1694, the best eulogy of the king was awarded a prize of eloquence, a gold medal, valued at ten louis, bearing on it effigies of His Majesty and of Pallas, with the inscription, Olim flores, nunc fructus, meaning that if Pallas had hitherto furnished only poets by the prizes of silver flowers which had been offered (a thrust at the Jeux Floraux), she would in the future produce orators, whose writings are more virile. At the special session held on July 1 of that year at the home of Malepeyre, which was open to the public, women were invited and were even allowed to participate in the contest, the subject being, les Généreuses offres de paix aux ennemies par le Roy (juillet 1694, pp. 154-178). On August 25, 1698, three prizes were awarded: (1) for a French translation of an oration of Cicero, (2) for an historical account of the conspiracy of the Pazzi in Florence, (3) for a discussion of the cause of the fall of celestial bodies (announced mars 1698, pp. 117-123). The customary gold medal was given as a prize for the first, and silver medals for the other two, bearing on them the figure of Pallas, and the inscription, condita labore.

The organization decided finally to call itself Société des Belles-Lettres. From the Mercure we know that it continued to function very actively to the end of the century, the only one of the provincial academies to combine the study of literature and of the sciences. One of its members, Martel, did an interesting bit of comparative literature, discussing, two centuries before Mme de Staël's de l'Allemagne and Corinne appeared, the influence of the climate on the German and on the Italian mind (juillet 1696). Louis XV allowed the organization to continue to exist only as an Academy of Sciences, but later it was granted jurisdiction over inscriptions and finally over belles-lettres. Thus it is quite clear that the seventeenth century academy of Toulouse was the direct ancestor of the present body, with which the Lanternistes had nothing to do.

The Academy of Caen.<sup>17</sup>—Curiously enough, the Mercure mentions only incidentally what was perhaps, from the point of view of the celebrity of its members, the most brilliant of all the provincial academies, established in that city which Mme de Sévigné esteemed "la plus jolie, la plus avenante, la plus gaie, . . . la source de tous nos plus beaux esprits." Bayle declared in his République des lettres (juillet 1684), "Il n'y a point d'académies composées de plus d'habiles gens que celle-ci." In fact, the Academy of Caen, founded in 1652, only eighteen years after the French Academy, although not receiving its letters patent until 1705, counted among its members Segrain, the learned abbé Huet, Ménage, whom we have already met at the Academy of Angers, Galland, who introduced Oriental folklore into France by his translation of the Mille et une nuits, Titon du Tillet, author of la Nouvelle Pandore, Tanneguy Le Fevre, father of Mme Dacier, and Moisant de Brieux, its founder, who was considered the greatest Latin poet of his time in France. The academy has subsisted until the present with slight interruptions and a reorganization (as was the case with all academies) during the Revolution.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>17</sup> See the following numbers of the Mercure: oct. 1685; juillet 1689; nov., déc. 1697; oct. 1699.

<sup>18</sup> Caen is one of the few academies on which documents are available. See A.-R. R. de Formigny de La Londe, Documents inédits pour servir à l'histoire de l'ancienne Académie Royale des belles-lettres de Caen, Caen 1854, in-8; M.A. Charnes, Discours d'ouverture.

The Mercure mentions the Academy of Caen only five times from 1672 to 1700, and names only three of its members: Segrails, its chief, at whose home it met—it was then called the Academy of Segrails—de Poissy, a poet, and the abbé de Blainville of Blois, who delivered the address of welcome to Foucault, the new intendant of Caen and future protector of the academy. The Mercure tells us that Segrails erected a statue to Malherbe, who was a relative, and recalls the inauguration of a statue of Louis XIV in the square where Segrails lived, in which the academy participated. De Poissy won the prize in 1697 given by the Palinots of Caen, a literary body dating from the Middle Ages, devoted to the praise of the Virgin, whose existence undoubtedly retarded the recognition by the king of the Academy of Caen. Perhaps the ordinary activities of the latter were too strictly academic to attract very largely the attention of the Mercure galant.

The Mercure, then, gives an illuminating picture of a vigorous intellectual life in the provinces<sup>19</sup> during a period in which we are accustomed to think of culture as being highly concentrated in the capital and at Versailles. Those beaux-esprits such as Fléchier, whose duties kept them away from the court at a time when not to be seen at the petit lever and the grand lever meant social ostracism, doubtless found great consolation in the association with a provincial academy as a means of keeping in touch with the court. The Mercure galant indicates many interesting relationships between the province and Paris. The French Academy called Arles, Soissons, and Nîmes its daughters, cordially welcoming their members who visited the capital. It furnished protectors to several societies and its statutes served as a model to others. We have seen that Soissons was required to send every year to its foster mother a eulogy of the king. The visit of a member of the French Academy was the occasion of special ceremonies in the province. The provincial societies maintained interesting intercourse with each other. Thus we read that Martel, secretary of the Academy of Toulouse, in accordance with his promise to keep up a correspondence with Roubin of Arles, sent him a lengthy account of the annual distribution of prizes (fév. 1699). Since the members constituted themselves judges of the works submitted, and could not, therefore, compete in their own contests, they very often won prizes from their fellow societies. A few writers belonged to more than one provincial academy. Vertron, Mlle Lhéritier, Magnin, Martel, etc., were affiliated with each other by virtue of membership in the academy of the Ricovrati, of Padua, that Italian society which received cordially so many French men and women of letters. Many academicians made interesting contributions by their published works to the study of local history, geography, archeology, etc.

---

(Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences, arts et belles-lettres de Caen, Caen 1855, in-8); René Delorme, Moisant de Brieux, fondateur de l'Académie de Caen, 1614-1674. (Mémoires de l'Académie nationale des sciences, arts et belles-lettres de Caen, Caen 1872, in-8); Robert de Lastérie, Bibliographie des travaux historiques et archéologiques publiés par les sociétés savantes de la France, (Paris 1906, 6 vol. in-4).

<sup>19</sup> We know by chance allusions that academies existed also in Grenoble and Rouen in the seventeenth century.

Although the academies were rather well scattered over the various parts of the kingdom, with a preponderance in the far-off Midi, the king kept a firm hand over them. Their official organization must come from him. He refused to recognize such brilliant bodies as those of Caen and Toulouse. He assumed the right to name the charter members at Angers and to appoint the protectors of several societies. It is due to no idle chance that all these organizations, even the frivolous Lanternistes, repeated to satiety meaningless praises of Louis-le-Grand and that their prizes were almost without exception medals bearing his effigy. Thus what appears at first as a scattering of the intellectual life of France in the seventeenth century, the Mercure shows to be a life highly controlled and generously encouraged by the king, whose genius for establishing hierarchies was his great strength as well as the cause of the ultimate weakness of the monarchy.

Except for slight information on the Academies of Nîmes and of Caen and incorrect data on Toulouse, the majority of these facts about the history of the literary academies in the seventeenth century can be obtained, as far as I know, only in the Mercure galant.

LISTS OF MEMBERS

Academy of Arles

(The following list of members given in the order of reception is found in the Mercure for jan. 1678.)

de Gageron Méjane reared at the Court of Savoy.

de Sabatier formerly page of the king and of de Guise. Author of many poems and of Épîtres morales. Director of the academy in 1682.

de Giffon

"écrit en Vers & en Prose avec une facilité admirable." Composed in three days a comedy for a carnival at Avignon.

Abbé de Barreme

conseiller clerc au parlement de Provence.

de Cays, seigneur de La Fossette

Marquis de Boche

"d'une illustre famille de Provence."

Bouvet

"Fait de très jolis vers, travaille à une traduction de Pétrarque."

Marquis de Robias d'Estoublon

"On n'a jamais vu une Personne de sa qualité avoir tant d'ardeur qu'il en a pour les belles lettres." Wrote prose and poetry in Latin, Spanish, and Italian, published anonymously. Perpetual secretary. Director in 1683 Offered a beautiful portrait of the dauphin as prize in 1689.

Abbé de Boche

de Castillon

"prédicateur consommé." sénéchal d'Arles.

de Manville

avocat général. Pronounced funeral oration of Saint-Aignan in 1687.

Marquis d'Aymard Chasteau-Renard

"capitaine distingué." Chosen by the academy to thank the king for the lettres patentes ("Sa Majesté a dit plusieurs fois à sa louange qu'elle n'avoit jamais esté complimentée de meilleure grâce, ny plus spirituellement"); to petition the French Academy for its alliance; to thank Séguier for having put the seal on the lettres patentes; and to demand of the king a new protector after the death of Saint-Aignan.

de Saint-Veran de Moncalin avocat de Toulouse. "Savant en grec, l'écrit avec autant de facilité que le français"

Marquis de Roubin.

de Chambonas

évêque de Lodève.

Le Pays

"Ses galants ouvrages l'ont fait connaître à toute la France."

de Ranchin

conseiller au parlement de Toulouse. "Talent admirable pour la poésie. . .

Toutes les Pièces que nous avons de luy ont un tour si fin & si délicat, qu'elles ne tiennent rien de l'air qui semble attaché à la Province."

Abbé de Verdier

de Venal

Director in 1687.

conseiller au parlement de Provence.

d'Arbaud

de Beaumont des Arlatans

Abbé d'Abeille

"grand latiniste."

(There were non-resident members who maintained close relations by letters and works which they sent from time to time to the academy, among them, Mme Deshoulières. The following active members were added after 1678.)

Guyonnet de Vertron elected 1680. Historiographer of the king. Member of the Ricovrati.

Magnin

conseiller honoraire au présidial de Mâcon.

Saint-Aignan

protector from 1685 to 1687.

Marquis de Dangeau

2nd protector, choice announced Sept. 1687.

du Port

prêtre. Published a Histoire d'Arles, Arles, chez Cavelier, 1690.

Marquis d'Urbaye de Vachières named in 1686 at age of 26 premier consul et gouverneur de la ville. Director in 1681 and 1686

Arbaud, baron de Blanzac (or Blansac) born in Arles, lived in Nîmes. Relative of d'Arbaud above?

de Faure-Fondamente who helped to found the Academy of Nîmes.

Abbé d'Arnoye de Poussant licencié en Sorbonne. "A fait des sermons éloquentes."

Abbé Flèche

Discours sur les comètes, Mercure, jan. 1681.

Abbé Petit

"fort estimé par sa profonde érudition... connaissance parfaite des langues grecque, latine et française."

Chaluet

avocat au parlement de Marseille. Erected in that city an equestrian statue of the king.

Père Hyacinte Recolet

Père Restaurand

docteur de Sorbonne, prédicateur ordinaire de la duchesse de Toscane.

Bertrand de Meyrand

Chevalier de Romière

Academy of Soissons

(Four charter members.)

Bertrand

Arnoul

ecclésiastique.

Bailly

(Added before the reception of the lettres patentes.)

du comté de Soissons.

Guérin

Gilluy

avocat du roi au présidial.

chanoine de la cathédrale.

Morant

Hébert

officier de l'élection.

chanoine de la cathédrale. Probably a relative of the Hébert elected in 1682.

(Added in 1682.)

Hébert

trésorier de France. Author of Recueil de discours et de harangues.

de Préaux

conseiller au présidial.

Hasterel de Preaux

Quinquet

conseiller au présidial.

conseiller au présidial.

de Sueur

Durand

avocat au parlement.

avocat au parlement.

Paret

Berthemet

capitaine de cavalerie.

avocat au parlement

Cousin	Le Vasseur
docteur en Sorbonne.	prieur d'Ouchies.
de Froidour	Abbé de Héricourt
lieutenant général au baillage de la	son of the author of the Histoire .
Fère.	Director in 1688.
Default	(Received in 1688.)
président au présidial.	Bosquillon
(Received in 1679.)	Mercure full of his madrigaux and Morant	other poems.
ecclésiastique.

Academy of Villefranche

Charles de Bernage
Had completed writing at the age of eighty the fables of Phèdre en rondeaux .
de La Fons
Mignot de Bussy
lieutenant du baillage de Beaujolais. Delivered many speeches and read original poetry before the academy. Director in 1688.
Bessie du Peloux
perpetual secretary.
Terrasson
de l'abbaye royale de Jouxdiou. Director in 1680 and 1682.
Saladin
ecclésiastique. Gave eulogy of saint Louis, oct., 1681.
Botu de La Barmondiere
"Fort connu par plusieurs ouvrages d'éloquence et de poesie." Speech in honor of Mlle d'Orléans, Oct. 1681.
Mercier
docteur en médecine. Director in 1686. Gave speech on le Triomphe de l'hérésie .
Dubost	de La Roche-Poncié
Wrote poem in Latin on same subject.	avocat du roi. Director in 1688.
Abbe Baudry
prieur de Saint Thibaut, "pasteur très zélé." Known for several poems published in the Mercure , among others, an ode of 240 lines, on the unveiling of the bust of the king.
Bernard de Haumont of Saumur, received Aug. 1688. Author of various poems, to the king, to the dauphin, of an ode on the taking of Philipsbourg, etc. Says that his only title to the honor of academician is his "empressement à louer le roy."
Chassebras de Cramailles
Discours de réception, déc. 1688.

Academy of Nîmes

(List of members, Mercure, fév. 1686, pp. 31-45.)

François Faure-Fondamente
one of the founders. Pellisson dedicated to him his Histoire de l'Académie française. Died 1686.

Abbé Saurin

translated from the Latin the Hymnes and Inscriptions of Santeuil.

Marquis de Peraud

perpetual secretary; first meeting at his home.

de La Baume

conseiller au présidial. First director; service for queen at his home, Oct. 1683.

Graverol

famous for his erudition and his inscriptions. Made devices for the Arc de Triomphe and for the Academy. Member of the Ricovrati.

de Chateauneuf

Mustret

ministre et secrétaire d'état.

director in 1683.

Ménard

prieur d'Aubers. Eulogy of the queen, Oct. 1683.

Abbé Bégault

speech in honor of Saint Louis, Oct. 1689; of thanks to Fr. Acad., Nov. 1689.

La Grange

avocat au parlement de Paris, fils d'un secrétaire du roi. Received Oct. 26, 1689, received a prize of eloquence at Angers.

Jacques Séguier

Abbé Fléchier

évêque de Nîmes, first protector.

second protector.

Abbé Baudy

known for several poems in honor of the king. Received in 1687.

Demerés

chanoine à la cathédrale de Nîmes. Director in 1691.

Abbé de Marsolier

chanoine d'Uzès. Parisian by birth; author of several "beaux ouvrages"; published Histoire du cardinal Ximénès; Mercure of March 1696 announces forthcoming publication of a Histoire de Henry VII d'Angleterre, avec épître dédicatoire au duc du Maine. Non-resident member, received Jan. 1691; reception speech, Mercure, mars 1691.

François Annibal de Rochemore

président, juge-mage et lieutenant général en la sénéchaussée et siège présidial de Nîmes.

Jean Saurin

docteur et avocat.

Claude de Roverié

seigneur de Cabrières.

Pierre Causse

prêtre, deuxième archidiacre de la cathédrale de Nîmes.

Antoine Tessier

docteur et avocat. The Mercure (fev. 1686) states that he had published two religious works, and les Eloges des hommes illustres, tirés de l'Histoire de Thou, avec notes, and was about to publish la Bibliothèque des bibliothèques du père Labbe, augmentée.

Antoine Rouvière

docteur et avocat.

Claude Maltret

docteur et avocat.

Honoré de Trimond

prêtre, conseiller clerc en la sénéchaussée et siège présidial de Nîmes.

Jean Pierre Chazel

conseiller du roi et lieutenant principal en la sénéchaussée et siège présidial de Nîmes.

Louis de Trimond

chanoine de la cathédrale. Translated les Eloges des hommes de lettres from the Italian of Lorenzo Crasso.

Henri Cassagnes

conseiller du roi en la sénéchaussée et siège présidial de Nîmes Was soon to publish ( Mercure, fev. 1686) translation of the Courtisan de Baltasar Castulioni Brother of the abbé Cassagnes of the French Academy.

Henry Guiran

Pierre Petit

conseiller au parlement d'Oranges. écuyer.

Mesnard

conseiller au présidial de Nîmes. Received Jan. 1691 at which time he was preparing a Histoire de Nîmes payenne, in which he tried to prove that Nîmes had never been a Roman colony!

Travenol

avocat.

Dayglun

docteur de Sorbonne. Pronounced funeral oration of Séguier (mars. 1691).

de La Granche poem, De la Conspiration des planètes et de la comète contre le soleil (nov. 1691); sonnet (juin 1691).

Guinrandy d'Avignon

Ode sur l'alliance de l'Académie de Nîmes avec l'Académie française (fev. 1693).

Paulian

conseiller au présidial de Nîmes. Discourse in Latin (mars 1696).

Cheiron

director in 1693.

Santeuil

Hymne latine à la gloire de saint François de Sales; inscriptions in Latin

Abbé Poncet

"très connu à Paris, Nîmes, Uzès, Montpellier." Received Feb. 30, 1696, by Fléchier.

Restaurant

avocat consultant. Director 1696.

The Mercure (fév. 1686) gives the names of 4 non-resident members from Montpellier, Avignon and Lyons.

Academy of Angers

Arnauld

évêque de Nîmes.

Bautru

chevalier, comte de Serrant, conseiller du roi en ses conseils, ci-devant chancelier de Monsieur. Director in 1689.

Abbé Ménage

“connu par un très grand nombre de beaux ouvrages en plusieurs langues ”

Arthaud

docteur et doyen de la faculté de théologie dans l'université d'Angers. Founded a chair of theology.

Bernier

docteur en médecine, “fameux par ses longs voyages dans le Levant, par les relations qu'il en a données, & par l'abrégé en Latin & en français de la philosophie de Gassendi.”

Verdier

professeur royal du droit français dans l'Université d'Angers.

Le Roye

docteur régent en droit dans l'Université d'Angers.

Grandet

conseiller au présidial d'Angers, “à qui Angers est redevable des soins qu'il a donnés, pour solliciter en Cour l'établissement de l'Académie.”

de Launay

avocat au parlement de Paris, professeur de droit français à l'Université de Paris.

Frain du Tremblay

ci-devant conseiller au présidial d'Angers. Mercure announces forthcoming publication of l'Idée d'un parfait magistrat (jan. 1687).

Nivart

Daburon

avocat au parlement.

avocat au parlement.

Of the 30 academicians whose names are published in the Mercure for Jan. 1687, the 12 foregoing are the only ones about whom any interesting details are given. The following are named in other issues:

Chevalier de Longueil

Discours sur la devise du roi (oct. 1686).

Comte d'Armagnac

grand écuyer de France et gouverneur de la province d'Anjou.

de Chasteauneuf

secrétaire d'état.

de Nointel

maître ordinaire des requêtes de l'Hôtel, intendant de la généralité de Tours. Received order to found the Academy; gave opening speech; director before 1689.

Beaumont d'Autichamp lieutenant du roi et commandant dans la ville et dans le château d'Angers.

Gobin

premier président du présidial. First chancellor of the Academy.

du Plessis de Geste évêque de Saintes; “d'une des plus vieilles maisons de la province d'Anjou.”

Abbé Le Pelletier

Author of Vie du Pape Sixte V, translated from Italian; of a Histoire de la guerre de Chypre, translated from Latin. Published in 1689 a Histoire de la Chine in German. Pronounced a eulogy of the king (mai 1689).

Constantin

grand prévost d'Anjou, "militaire et savant dans les belles lettres." Elected to replace Le Roye, who died 1686.

de Béchameil

Grandet

maire d'Angers (1689). Named chancellor, June 1689. Same as Grandet above?

Goureau

Petrineau des Noulis

perpetual secretary, 1691.

gentilhomme, perpetual secretary, 1695.

Livonnaire Pocquet

Received prize of eloquence of the Academy of Villefranche, 1688.

(The following officials are named in Jan. 1687 as being members during their term of office: l'évêque d'Angers; le lieutenant du roi de la ville et du château; le premier président du présidial, le lieutenant général de la sénéchaussée et siège présidial; le maire de la ville, le procureur du roi au présidial, the last one named by an order sent after the lettres patentes.)

Les Lanternistes

(The Mercure gives the names of many persons who won prizes from the Lanternistes, but mentions only 6 members of the society, stating that the latter was composed of "quelques conseillers du parlement de Toulouse, quelques cavaliers, abbés et savants de tous étages.") author of Œuvres Meslées, Paris 1695, in-12; la Tour ténébreuse et les jours lumineux, contes anglois, Paris 1705, in-12, etc. Member of the Ricovrati.

Mlle Lhéritier

de La Fevrierie

Defends the genre of bouts-rimés (mai, 1695).

Morant

premier président du parlement de la province. Prize awarded in his home, June 24, 1697.

Arnaud Laborie

Lucas

secretary in May, 1698.

conseiller clerc au parlement.

Malepeyre (or Malapeire) named as member of the Académie des Belles-Lettres and as "chef de celle qui est sur le point de s'établir à Toulouse," i.e., the Lanternistes (oct. 1689).

Société des Belles-Lettres of Toulouse

(First attempt to found the academy in the neighborhood of 1640 by Pellisson. Of the 13 members who composed this body in 1689 and whose names the Mercure gives (oct.), the following are the only ones about whom some interesting information is given.)

de Malepeyre

"On voit peu d'esprits d'une si grande étendue." Wrote a book on the planets, was a connoisseur of the arts, travelled in Italy.

de Rocolles known for introduction to l'Histoire et le monde, by the abbé Botero, work praised by Mézeray; was historiographer of France; one of 24 honorary doctors of the faculty of law, University of Paris.

de Mazades

“né pour la conversation . . . il sçait tous les beaux endroits des meilleurs Auteurs.”

du Puy avocat, “fait des oraisons latines qu’on trouve si belles, que l’on a peine à les mettre au dessous de celles de Cicéron.”

Montaudier

“Si Quintilien vivoit, il auroit trouvé en luy l’Orateur parfait, dont il ne nous a donné que l’idée.”

de Baviile

intendant de la province.

(The following are named in later issues.)

de Carrières

The society met often at his home (juin 1694).

Martel

secretary in 1694 and in 1696. Member of the Ricovrati.

de Mondran

The society met regularly at his home (juillet 1696).

MARY ELIZABETH STORER

Beloit College

XXX

MILTON AS A HISTORIAN

ONE of the most puzzling of literary problems is the fact that John Milton, though unquestionably one of the world's great poets, spent the prime of his life in writing chiefly prose. By 1640 he had written some poems which the world has not willingly let die. But with the exception of a few sonnets (many of which are occasional poetry or mere society verse) he wrote hardly any poetry from 1640 to 1658—that is, roughly, between the ages of thirty and fifty. A careful reading of his History of Britain, however, sheds some light on this situation and reveals an important trait of Milton's which is seldom fully recognized. Coming to the History of Britain with no preconceived notion of Milton's character or purpose, one is increasingly impressed with the idea that for Milton the writing of poetry was unusually difficult, and that his mind tended more naturally to prose criticism. (I hope soon to publish a study of Milton's satire which will support this view.) To say that Milton was no poet or that poetry can be defined only as the product of untrammelled fancy is ridiculous; it is a bent, a matter of degree rather than of kind. But there is some justification for thinking of Milton as a reluctant poet.

Before analyzing the History of Britain in any detail, however, we may profitably recall a few facts about Milton's life. Milton came home from his Italian tour because of the Bishop's War, feeling it "base to be travelling for amusement abroad, while my fellow-citizens were fighting for liberty at home."<sup>1</sup> He soon threw himself heart and soul into the midst of ecclesiastical and political controversies, turning out pamphlet after pamphlet of stirring recrimination. Before long he entered public life as Latin Secretary, and held the office for some ten years. These facts help to explain his lack of time and energy for the writing of poetry; they do not, however, explain his actual failure to write poetry. One who writes poetry because of an uncontrollable inner urge will not be diverted by considerations of public conditions and his own lack of leisure. He will write anyhow.

One consideration influencing Milton was undoubtedly the low esteem in which poetry seemed in his time to be held. As he looked about him for poets, what he saw was "libidinous and ignorant poetasters,"<sup>2</sup> with an occasional "vulgar amourist, or the trencher fury of a rhyming parasite."<sup>3</sup> The poems of Herrick and Herbert, of Donne and Suckling, even if Milton knew them, seem to have done little to alter his opinion. For poetry, the time seemed out of joint, and for some years John Milton was not at all sure that he had been born to set it right.

<sup>1</sup> Second Defence, Prose Works, I, 256.—All references in these notes are to the Bohn edition.

<sup>2</sup> Reason of Church Government, P. W., II, 480.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., II, 481.

Another cause was his absorption in study. He mentions in Areopagitica with some pride "the industry of a life wholly dedicated to studious labours."<sup>4</sup> He speaks elsewhere of "the wearisome labours and studious watchings, wherein I have spent and tired out almost a whole youth."<sup>5</sup> Again:

My father destined me from a child to the pursuits of literature; and my appetite for knowledge was so voracious, that, from twelve years of age, I hardly ever left my studies, or went to bed before midnight.<sup>6</sup>

One may be too studious, too hot on the trail of fact, to write poetry.

Still another cause, I believe, was the growth of Milton's critical powers. He was in reality two men within one body. One was a poet, entranced by the pictures of his imagination, and glorying in sounds and images and emotions. It was this John Milton who penned the famous phrase about poetry, that it is "simple, sensuous, and passionate."<sup>7</sup> It was he who wrote "L'Allegro," "Lycidas," the sonnet on arriving at the age of twenty-three, the invocation to light in Paradise Lost, and most of Samson Agonistes, to take a few among possible examples. The other half, the prose-man, the man of stern intellect, spurning the imagination, was in the ascendant in the first of the Tetrachordon sonnets, many passages in Book XII of Paradise Lost, most of the pamphlets (though not all), and most notably in the History of Britain.

Milton's temperament in the History of Britain is almost exactly that of the pure scientist. Truth is his aim, and the elimination of untruth is essential. Every page of the work is a flat contradiction of its professed purpose:

I have therefore determined to bestow the telling over even of these reputed tales; be it for nothing else but in favour of our English poets and rhetoricians, who by their art will know how to use them judiciously.<sup>8</sup>

Here is a plain statement of the imaginative, the poetical view of history; the book is to provide the material from which the artist of imagination may create the Hamlets and Prince Arthurs of literature. That many of the passages are no more than "reputed tales" is unimportant to the "poets and rhetoricians." The vital need is that by "their art" they

<sup>4</sup> P. W., II, 53.

<sup>5</sup> Apology for Smectymnus, P. W., III, 96.

<sup>6</sup> Second Defence, P. W., I, 254.

<sup>7</sup> On Education, P. W., III, 473.

<sup>8</sup> History of Britain, P. W., V, 165.

may "use them judiciously." But in practice Milton flings aside ruthlessly the imaginative elements, retaining only well-documented facts. King Arthur and Macbeth, for example, get short shrift, and the few traditions and superstitions which remain are only grudgingly admitted. A whimsically minded critic acting solely on "internal evidence" might easily prove that the author of this work could not possibly have written Paradise Lost.<sup>9</sup>

Milton thus judges his material as a historian should, on accuracy rather than on interest. And it seems to me that it is not without significance to notice, in passing, that Milton's scholarship is so often stressed by both himself and his biographers. Several references in his own writings have just been quoted. Among the biographers, Edward Phillips, who of them all knew Milton best, spoke in glowing terms of Milton's retirement from the Barbican home to High Holborn, where he lived a private and quiet life, still prosecuting his studies and curious search into knowledge, the grand affair perpetually of his life.<sup>10</sup>

After the strain of the "Defence" pamphlets, Phillips stresses Milton's delight in having "leisure again for his own studies."<sup>11</sup> Finally, it is strange that Milton found it so difficult to write Paradise Lost. He informed Phillips, it will be remembered, that his vein never happily flowed but from the autumnal equinoctial to the vernal, and that whatever he attempted [otherwise] was never to his satisfaction, though he courted his fancy never so much, so that in all the years he was about this poem, he may be said to have spent but half his time therein.<sup>12</sup>

In connection with this distrust of pure imagination, there is also something queerly naïve in the anecdote, told by the anonymous biographer, of Milton's enthusiasm in dictating the lines which he had composed; how when his amanuensis was later than usual in coming in the morning, Milton complained that he "wanted to be milked."<sup>13</sup> One is thus prepared to meet a poet who was, as it were, a part-time poet only. He was a poet by spells, by grace of circumstances—not by irresistible inner compulsion. He lisped in numbers, not because the numbers came to him (any more readily, perhaps, than they did to the conceited little bard of Twickenham), but because he girded himself

<sup>9</sup> Thus there is within Milton's own mind something of the "Battle of the Books" which Professor Edwin Greenlaw pointed out among the Elizabethan historians; see his Studies in Spenser's Historical Allegory (Baltimore, 1932), Chap. I.

<sup>10</sup> Quoted in Laura E. Lockwood's introduction to Milton's Of Education, Areopagitica, The Commonwealth (Boston, 1911), lxxii.—The italics are mine.

<sup>11</sup> Ibid., lxxv.—Italics mine.

<sup>12</sup> Ibid., lxxvi.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., xxxvi.

manfully to write poetry and set himself to a stupendous and heroic accomplishment.

The critical, sceptical spirit dominates the History of Britain from beginning to end.

The beginning of nations, those excepted of whom sacred books have spoken, is to this day unknown. Nor only the beginning, but the deeds also of many succeeding ages, yea, periods of ages, either wholly unknown, or obscured and blemished with fables.<sup>14</sup>

It is these "fables" which he sets himself to wipe out by relying in so far as possible on thoroughly authenticated sources.

But to examine these things with diligence, were but to confute the fables of Britain, with the fables of Greece and Italy.<sup>15</sup>

It is always with an apology that he introduces the mythical material:

And here with leave bespoken to recite a grand fable, though dignified by our best poets.<sup>16</sup>

He is relieved to approach the end of the first book, covering the obscure pre-Roman period so full of unsupported legends and superstitions:

Thus far, though leaning only on the credit of Geoffrey Monmouth, and his assertors, I yet, for the specified causes, have thought it not beneath my purpose to relate what I found. Whereto I neither oblige the belief of other person, nor over-hastily subscribe my own. Nor have I stood with others computing or collating years and chronologies, lest I should be vainly curious about the time and circumstance of things, whereof the substance is so much in doubt. By this time, like one who had set out on his way by night, and travelled through a region of smooth or idle dreams, our history now arrives on the confines, where daylight and truth meet us with a clear dawn.<sup>17</sup>

In other words, Milton's primary question in the History of Britain, though it seems to be offered as a vade mecum for Shaksperes, is not that which would be the most essential to a Shakspeare: Is it interesting? Is it a good story? Does it show character? Is it true to the fundamentals of life and personality? His question is rather: Are the facts sufficiently documented? Is there reliable and sufficient proof of the events described and narrated? Did they actually happen? An admirable spirit in a historian, to be sure, and a welcome relief to succeeding historical scholars from the credulity and scrap-heap methods of some predecessors; but not the spirit of a Spenser or of a Keats—or even of a writer of Paradise Lost. The creator of a Macbeth or of a Una or of a Satan is

<sup>14</sup> P. W., v, 164.

<sup>15</sup> P. W., v, 169.

<sup>16</sup> P. W., v, 173.

<sup>17</sup> P. W., v, 184. I have corrected the Bohn misprint reigon to region.

satisfied if he has drawn a moving, convincing, and universal character. I doubt whether Shakspeare would have been appreciably dismayed to discover that Macbeth never existed in the flesh. But Milton's poets are to have their facts one hundred per cent guaranteed against unreliability.

His consequent admiration for the classical historians and his preference for them over the English writers becomes very marked in Book II.<sup>18</sup> Though he grudgingly takes a few facts from Geoffrey of Monmouth, he spurns more:

the rest, as of Hano the Roman captain, Genuissa, the emperor's daughter, and such like stuff, is too palpably untrue to be worth rehearsing in the midst of truth.<sup>19</sup>

For the Scotch historian, Buchanan, who approached the novelizing manner of a Strachey, Milton has a stern rebuke:

With no less exactness of particular circumstances he takes upon him to relate all those tumultuary inroads of the Scots and Picts into Britain, as if they had but yesterday happened, their order of battle, manner of fight, number of slain, articles of peace, things whereof Gildas and Bede are utterly silent, authors to whom the Scotch writers have none to cite comparable in antiquity; no more therefore to be believed for bare assertions, however quaintly drest, than our Geoffrey of Monmouth, when he varies most from authentic story. But either the inbred vanity of some, in that respect unworthily called historians, or the fond zeal of praising their nations above truth, hath so far transported them, that where they find nothing faithfully to relate, they fall confidently to invent what they think may either best set off their history, or magnify their country.<sup>20</sup>

Particularly remarkable is Milton's treatment of Arthur. Milton had been meditating, it will be remembered, an epic on the subject of Arthur. In his poem to Manso, he voiced the wish that he might some time recall in song the kings of my native land, and Arthur, who carried war even into fairyland. Or shall I tell of those great-hearted champions bound in the invincible society of the Round Table?<sup>21</sup>

But in his History of Britain he gives a very curt account of Arthur, who was, he says, "more renowned in songs and romances, than in true stories."<sup>22</sup>

But who Arthur was, and whether ever any such reigned in Britain, hath been doubted heretofore, and may again with good reason. . . . And as we doubted <sup>18</sup> Compare his eulogy of Greek literature in the letter to the Athenian Philaras, January, 1652 (P. W., III, 504).

<sup>19</sup> P. W., v, 202.

<sup>20</sup> P. W., v, 243.

<sup>21</sup> "Mansus," ll. 80-83 (Moody's translation).

<sup>22</sup> P. W., v, 255.

of his parentage, so may we also of his puissance; for whether that victory at Badon-hill were his or no, is uncertain.<sup>23</sup>

In fact, he condemns as unreliable the whole crowd of chroniclers who wrote of Arthur:

the age whereof we now write hath had the ill hap, more than any since the first fabulous times, to be surcharged with all the idle fancies of posterity.<sup>24</sup>

Such ill examples it is far from Milton's intention to follow:

But he who can accept of legends for good story, may quickly swell a volume with trash, and had need be furnished with two only necessities, leisure and belief.<sup>25</sup>

But Arthur is only one example of many; in fact, the story of Arthur is merely typical of the attitude throughout the book. If Milton includes a legend or story which he does not believe, it is usually with an apologetic tone, with some statement of the condoning circumstances:

the story goes, if it be worth believing . . . which I had not noted, being unlikely, but for the place where I found it.<sup>26</sup>

He often dropped out anecdotes, with some such disparaging remark as: "saith Mat. Westm. annexing thereto a long unlikely tale."<sup>27</sup> William of Malmesbury he rebukes because "he refused not the authority of ballads for want of better."<sup>28</sup>

The culmination of Milton's indictment of untruthful historians comes in his farewell to Bede, who, though a monk and therefore anathema, was more reliable than most of his fellows. Around him is woven Milton's denunciation of historians in general, in terms which are reminiscent of his prelatial and Salmasian pamphlets:

Beda surceased to write. Out of whom chiefly has been gathered, since the Saxon's arrival, such as hath been delivered, a scattered story picked out here and there, with some trouble and tedious work, from among his many legends of visions and miracles . . . which leaves us uncertain whether Beda was wanting to his matter, or his matter to him. Yet from hence to the Danish invasion it will be worse with us, destitute of Beda. Left only to obscure and blockish chronicles; whom Malmesbury, and Huntingdon, (for neither they nor we had better authors of those times,) ambitious to adorn the history, make no scruple oftentimes, I doubt, to interline with conjectures and surmises of their own; them rather than imitate, I shall choose to represent the truth naked, though as lean as a plain journal. Yet William of Malmesbury must be acknowledged, both for style and judgment, to be by far the best writer of them all: but what labour is to be endured turning over volumes of rubbish in the rest, Florence of Worcester,

<sup>23</sup> P. W., v, 258-259.

<sup>24</sup> P. W., v, 258.

<sup>25</sup> P. W., v, 259.

<sup>26</sup> P. W., v, 275, 294.

<sup>27</sup> P. W., v, 301.

<sup>28</sup> P. W., v, 336.

Huntingdon, Simeon of Durham, Hoveden, Matthew of Westminster, and many others of obscurer note, with all their monachisms, is a penance to think. Yet these are our only registers, transcribers one after another for the most part, and sometimes worthy enough of the things they register. This travail, rather than not to know at once what may be known of our ancient story, sifted from fables and impertinences, I voluntarily undergo; and to save others, if they please, the like unpleasing labour; except those who take pleasure to be all their lifetime raking the foundations of old abbeyes and cathedrals.<sup>29</sup>

His criticisms of individual writers are too numerous to mention in detail, but a few may be quoted as representative. Brompton is "no ancient author . . . nor of much credit."<sup>30</sup> As to Henry of Huntingdon, "little credit is to be placed in Huntingdon single," i.e., unsupported.<sup>31</sup> A certain story in Matthew of Westminster he leaves there "to be sought by such as are more credulous than I wish my readers."<sup>32</sup> But on Geoffrey of Monmouth he concentrates his heavy artillery. Geoffrey is "the British author, whom I use only then when others are all silent."<sup>33</sup> Many of Geoffrey's materials are "such like stuff . . . too palpably untrue to be worth rehearsing in the midst of truth."<sup>34</sup> He disposes of Scottish historians by labelling them "no more therefore to be believed for bare assertions, however quaintly drest, than our Geoffrey of Monmouth."<sup>35</sup> And how eloquent is his phrase about "Geoffrey of Monmouth, whose weight we know!"<sup>36</sup>

Here then is the picture of a man whose great ideal of life seemed to be to become a poet, and who yet on one side of his nature seemed to be working his hardest to defeat that aim. It has already been suggested that one reason why Milton gave up writing on the British story and turned to the story of the Creation was that he lost belief in the story of Arthur and other fabulous British characters.<sup>37</sup> The tone of the History of Britain amply confirms this view. But the matter goes deeper than a mere loss of faith in a particular story. It is the development of a character, of a philosophy of life. To the youthful Milton poetry may have been something more or less independent of life and of truth. The poet was perhaps "a star and dwelt apart." But to the middle-aged Milton, certainly, the lure of the world, of actuality, and of truth had become so strong as to shut out this view. It was in the arena of life that he made his appearances from 1640 to 1660. And life was too strong, too brutal, too direct for poetry. Only when life swept on without

<sup>29</sup> P. W., v, 295-296.

<sup>30</sup> P. W., v, 315.

<sup>31</sup> P. W., v, 324.

<sup>32</sup> P. W., v, 306.

<sup>33</sup> P. W., v, 197.

<sup>34</sup> P. W., v, 202.

<sup>35</sup> P. W., v, 243.

<sup>36</sup> P. W., v, 274.

<sup>37</sup> P. F. Jones, "Milton and the Epic Subject from British History," PMLA, XLII (1927), 901 ff.

him was he able to relax and return to his first love to create his splendid poems.

The obvious rejoinder that some of the sonnets are first-rate poetry is of course sound. In those on his blindness and that to his wife the critic in him is, so to speak, on leave of absence. In the "rather wooden translations from the Scriptures," on the other hand, to quote Moody's verdict,<sup>38</sup> there is little of high poetic quality. The sonnets to a "virtuous young lady" and to Lady Margaret Ley are graceful compliments; the pair defending his Tetrachordon are, though written in terrible earnest, hardly better than blurbs; two others have been called "poetical invitations to dinner."<sup>39</sup> Thus the amount of wholly first-rate poetry represented by these years is astonishingly small. This small amount is, of course, priceless; but one may venture the assertion without being too much of a Philistine that it could have been written—and perhaps was—in about a week of "running time." It constitutes hardly more than an episode in the long years from thirty-two to fifty-two, the productive years of the poet's prime.

Milton's mind, in other words, was essentially critical rather than creative. He was by sympathy a rationalist, a scientist, a thinker. He was attracted by satire, an essentially critical art. John Dryden told the anecdotist Aubrey that Milton "pronounced the letter R (littera canina) very hard . . . a certaine signe of a satyricall witt."<sup>40</sup> Again, it is not without significance that Keats should have eventually thrown Milton overboard, and given up his attempt at "Hyperion" as too Miltonic. Keats was simple, sensuous, passionate; Milton was complex, intellectual, critical.

It is astonishing how early the rationalistic spirit comes out in Milton. Mrs. Tillyard's recent edition of Milton's college prolusions affords admirable illustrations. In the very first of these exercises, in the name of Reason, Milton flouts the old myths:

I am . . . attempting to bring them to the test of reason, and thereby to examine whether they can bear the scrutiny of strict truth.<sup>41</sup>

So he goes on to examine the myths in the cold light of investigation, and even at times brings to bear almost the method of Mr. Erskine.

But why they should believe that Phanes, endowed as he was with a wondrous and superhuman beauty, was so much in love with Night, a mere mulatto or silhouette, as even to wish to marry her, seems a problem hopelessly difficult

<sup>38</sup> Poems, ed. Moody, p. 69.

<sup>39</sup> Ibid., p. 70.

<sup>40</sup> John Aubrey, Brief Lives (ed. A. Clark, Oxford, 1898), II, 67.

<sup>41</sup> Tillyard, op. cit., 57.

to solve, unless the phenomenal scarcity of females at that time left him no choice.<sup>42</sup>

And when he felt moved to amend the curriculum of the college, his hope was to introduce, not more poetry, but more science!

But how much better were it, gentlemen, and how much more consonant with your dignity, now to let your eyes wander as it were over all the lands depicted on the map, and to behold the places trodden by the heroes of old, to range over the regions made famous by wars, by triumphs, and even by the tales of poets of renown, now to traverse the stormy Adriatic, now to climb unharmed the slopes of fiery Etna, then to spy out the customs of mankind and those states which are well-ordered, next to seek out and explore the nature of all living creatures, and after that to turn your attention to the secret virtues of stones and herbs. And do not shrink from taking your flight into the skies and gazing upon the manifold shapes of the clouds, the mighty piles of snow, and the source of the dews of morning; then inspect the coffers wherein the hail is stored and examine the arsenals of the thunderbolts. And do not let the intent of Jupiter or of Nature elude you, when a huge and fearful comet threatens to set the heavens aflame, nor let the smallest star escape you of all the myriads which are scattered and strewn between the poles: yes, even follow close upon the sun in all his journeys, and ask account of time itself and demand the reckoning of its eternal passage<sup>43</sup>

To put it differently, the world was much with Milton. Intellectual problems offered a challenge to his mind which he could not escape. I doubt whether he really groaned too heavily under the burden of the twenty years of prose servitude. If he had, he could have escaped from it—if his mind had been willing to let him! But the critical and scholarly bent of his temperament would not be downed while the situation continued as it was.

But—and here may be the answer to a question lurking in our minds all this time—the situation did not continue. Otherwise we might have had no Paradise Lost or Paradise Regained or Samson Agonistes. In fact, the situation changed very definitely and, for Milton, with startling completeness. We have seen that the chief factors influencing him in forsaking poetry for prose were the low estate of contemporary poetry, the stimulation or challenge of controversy, his appointment to public office, and his critical tendency combined with his wide and intense reading. By 1660 or somewhat earlier, all these conditions had been changed or eliminated. Poetry, thanks to Dryden and Waller, had revived; controversy was over and forgotten; his public position was swept away; and the reading which went hand in hand with the critical temper was impossible (except indirectly) on account of his blindness.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., 57.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., 72.

He was thrown back on himself and on his imagination for intellectual food. The powers of the imagination were therefore released, the severe curb of his mind was loosened, and the great poems ensued. The critical and scientific tendency still remained much in evidence; and everyone knows that one stumbling-block for many readers of the poems is the aggressiveness of their theological and philosophical content.<sup>44</sup> But the imaginative element had forged ahead; the simple, sensuous, and passionate had freer rein; the poet was more unhampered. The author of Animadversions on the Remonstrant's Defence gave way to the author of Paradise Lost.

This conception of Milton is strengthened by certain other tendencies which appear in the History of Britain. One feels, for instance, a general weariness and cynicism in Milton's whole attitude towards the times he writes of. They are bad times, written of by bad historians; the course of history is depressing. His astonishing outburst against the past times is almost ridiculous by its very fury:

of the Romans we have cause not to say much worse, than that they beat us into some civility.<sup>45</sup>

In general,

Their actions . . . most commonly wars . . . the rest superstition and monastical affection. . . . Left only to obscure and blockish chronicles . . . volumes of rubbish.<sup>46</sup>

His weariness is accompanied by his customary distrust of liberty carried to a truly Ruskinian scepticism. The chief burden of this theme comes in the digression at the beginning of Book III, a tirade against the mistakes of his own time. Grave flaws of characters, he says, brought those ancient natives to misery and ruin, by liberty, which rightly used, might have made them happy; so brought they these of late, after many labours, much bloodshed, and vast expense, to ridiculous frustration . . . for liberty hath a sharp and double edge, fit only to be handled by just and virtuous men.<sup>47</sup>

The ancient Britons, he continues, "adoring the name of liberty," but given to "licence," and lacking

the wisdom, the virtue, the labour, to use and maintain true liberty, . . . soon remitted their heat. and shrunk more wretchedly under the burden of their own liberty, than before under a foreign yoke.<sup>48</sup>

Of similar significance is Milton's insistence on the value of brevity, <sup>44</sup> Even so, it is illuminating to notice how prosaic, how lacking in romantic imagination, Paradise Regained is.

<sup>45</sup> P. W., v, 198.

<sup>46</sup> P. W., v, 295.

<sup>47</sup> P. W., v, 236, 239.

<sup>48</sup> P. W., v, 241.

not as the source of wit, but as essential to holding the interest of the reader. He announces his objective at the start:

But I intend not with controversies and quotations to delay or interrupt the smooth course of history . . . but shall endeavour that which hitherto hath been needed most, with plain and lightsome brevity, to relate well and orderly things worth the noting, so as may best instruct and benefit them that read.<sup>49</sup>

The stringent condensation which he applies to the material which he takes from Geoffrey of Monmouth and other historians has already been studied in considerable detail in Sir Charles Firth's illuminating essay.<sup>50</sup> Milton blue-pencils mercilessly, cutting down especially genealogies and long speeches, but also cutting out a wealth of vivid details.<sup>51</sup> The history, as Sir Charles Firth has pointed out, gains a great deal in modernness and in precision and in scholarliness in this process of cutting, but the poetic quality suffers.

To recapitulate, then, the writer of the History of Britain is a man whose interests are primarily prosaic—that is, critical, ratiocinative, scholarly; whose chief goal is truth—truth of fact—as little obscured by ornament and idle fancy as possible; and whose attitude towards the world is pessimistic and sceptical. It is that of a keen mind, with a sense of fact and plausibility which (if we desire to flatter ourselves) is strikingly modern. It is one of the miracles of history that such a temperament should have been so reversed by circumstances as to become a great poet. The poetic impulse and ability were always in reserve, but for twenty years they were nearly dormant. A great controversialist and critic were in the ascendant; the poet was submerged. Paradoxical as it may seem, it is to the fall of Cromwell and the blindness of Milton that we must be eternally grateful for Paradise Lost, Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes.

J. MILTON FRENCH

Dartmouth College

<sup>49</sup> P. W., v, 165.

<sup>50</sup> "Milton as an Historian," Proceedings of the British Academy, III (1907-8), 227-257.

<sup>51</sup> E.g., P. W., v, 210, 266, 299.

THE LATIN PASTORALS OF MILTON AND CASTIGLIONE

A COMPARATIVE study seems to show that Castiglione's Latin pastoral elegy, Alcon, is more closely related to Milton's Epitaphium Damonis than to Lycidas, which has often been mentioned in connection with the Italian poem.<sup>1</sup> This paper undertakes only to set forth the parallels between Alcon and the Epitaphium, not to reach any absolute conclusions as to the extent of Milton's dependence.

The possibility of extensive indebtedness on Milton's part may appear, at the outset, remote and uncertain because of the very intimate and biographical nature of the tribute to Diodati. Of the Latin poems the Epitaphium is not only the best but the deepest in feeling, and that would seem to put it outside the province of the source-hunter. As the record of a profound emotional experience the later elegy differs from Lycidas, a greater poem because it is the fruit of Milton's sedulous pre-occupation with classical traditions. But the Epitaphium is in Latin, and as Masson truly remarks,<sup>2</sup> "this, in itself, removes it into the realm of the artificial." Moreover, there is another phase of its artificiality. The invocation in the poem, in fact the title itself, shows that Milton recognized, as Spenser did, that "a poet is responsible to the Muses that his works have artistic value apart from their value as an expression of his own feelings"<sup>3</sup>; and for both men artistic value implied imitation. In short, Milton's Epitaphium, as in less measure Lycidas, amply demonstrates that spontaneous and impassioned feeling gain adequate expression within the limits of pastoral elegy and by a discriminating use of its conventions.<sup>4</sup> Inevitably, then, the Latin elegy, <sup>1</sup> Cf. Symonds, The Renaissance in Italy: the Revival of Learning (New York, 1883), pp. 490-491; Saintsbury, The Earlier Renaissance (London, 1901), p. 34; J. Cartwright, Baldassare Castiglione (London, 1908), I, 144-145; J. H. Hanford, "The Pastoral Elegy and Milton's Lycidas," PMLA, xxv (1910), 432; and A Milton Handbook (New York, 1926), p. 133; G. Norlin, "The Conventions of the Pastoral Elegy," AJP, xxxii (1911), 307; and L. E. Kastner, Poetical Works of William Drummond (London, 1913), II, 363.—Drummond's poem (1638) on the death of Sir Anthony Alexander is a frank adaptation of Alcon, but Kastner does not believe that Lycidas reflects Drummond. Independently both English poets had recourse to the same model.

<sup>2</sup> Poetical Works of John Milton (London, 1903), I, 113.

<sup>3</sup> W. L. Renwick, Edmund Spenser (London, 1925), p. 126.—The author is discussing the sources of the Amoretti.

<sup>4</sup> Professor Hanford, "The Youth of Milton" in Studies in Shakespeare, Milton, and Donne (1925), p. 148, observes that the Latin elegy, even more than Lycidas, adheres to convention.

its title derived from Moschus' Epitaphium Bionis, faces toward classical models, chiefly Virgil's Tenth Eclogue,<sup>5</sup> and echoes from time to time the Aeneid, Ovid, and Horace.

These classical sources predominate in the Epitaphium. Yet as a late neo-Latinist Milton did not neglect his earlier confreres, he who boasted his acquaintance with Manso, friend to the author of Gerusalemme Liberata. And even amid the welter of sixteenth-century Latin hexameters<sup>6</sup> special reasons obtain for his remembering Alcon, in which Castiglione, also following Virgil, mourns the loss of Falcone, companion of his youth. Mantua was the home of both Castiglione and Falcone, youthful scholar, poet, and tutor to Baldassare's younger brother Jeronimo. When Falcone died, July 1505, Castiglione was in Rome. His friend's sudden passing evoked a letter to his mother expressing his sorrow: he and Falcone had been boyhood friends; they were reared together; he had expected to obtain Falcone a post in Rome, a post befitting a man of such rare qualities. In conclusion he begs for details of Falcone's death and asks that Jeronimo collect and save from loss his tutor's writings.<sup>7</sup> "If ever a man had a genius for friendship, it was Castiglione. No one loved his friends more tenderly, or clung to their memories with greater faithfulness."<sup>8</sup> But so filled with business was Castiglione's life that a year passed before he wrote the poetical tribute to his friend. As in Alcon he alludes to the death of his brother Jeronimo, in the summer of 1506, it is concluded that the author wrote the poem during his visit to England.<sup>9</sup>

Curiously similar were the circumstances leading to the writing of Epitaphium Damonis. Returning to England in the summer of 1639, <sup>5</sup> Except for the title and an implied indebtedness at the beginning, Milton's Epitaphium manifests no direct dependence upon Bion's Lament for Adonis, which is not a pastoral, or upon Moschus' Lament for Bion. Hanford, "The Pastoral Elegy," op. cit., p. 416, draws attention to Moody's error in stating that Milton's poem formally imitates Moschus. Kerlin, Theocritus in English Literature (1910), pp. 40-41, affirms that Milton's "immediate model no doubt" was Moschus. And W. MacKellar, Latin Poems of John Milton (1930), p. 61, citing Kerlin, states that the Epitaphium is a return to the manner of Theocritus, Bion, and Moschus." Even to Theocritus Milton owes nothing directly.

<sup>6</sup> Of the many anthologies (cf. Symonds, op. cit., p. 451, and Saintsbury, op. cit., p. 21) the most famous was Carmina Illustrium Poetarum Italorum, Florence, 1719. Those used in the present study are an earlier collection, with same title (Paris, 1576), 3 vols., and A. Pope's, Selecta Poemata Italorum (London, 1740), 2 vols.; Alcon appears in Carmina (Paris), I, 61-64, and in Pope, II, 237-242, as of course elsewhere.

<sup>7</sup> Eleven years later a comedy by Falcone was performed during the festivities at Castiglione's marriage, "as a delicate attention to Castiglione."—C. Hare, Courts and Camps of the Italian Renaissance (N. Y., 1908), p. 113. <sup>8</sup> Cartwright, op. cit., p. 142.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. ibid., pp. 179-186, for an account of the English visit, during which Castiglione, as Duke Guidobaldo's representative, was installed as Knight of the Garter.

Milton learned the particulars of Diodati's death. Then perhaps he recalled Castiglione's Alcon, the intimate story of two friends separated at the last.<sup>10</sup> "Was there anything worth its cost in the sight of buried Rome . . . that for it I could be without you?" exclaims Milton.<sup>11</sup> But Castiglione, eager for his friend's coming, dwells upon the beauty of Rome and the Tiber, which "washes ancient ruins, lofty ornaments." And both poets, long unaware of tragedy, were thwarted in their fond dreams of later companionship. A detailed analysis of their elegies discloses more tangible affinities.

The structure of the two poems—their external form and their inner succession of moods—deserves first consideration; this phase of the comparison necessitates, however, some mention of structural origins, a subject which has never been adequately treated.<sup>12</sup> The framework of the later pastoral elegy was determined by three classical poems: Theocritus' First Idyll and Virgil's Fifth and Tenth Eclogues, which modify the pattern of Theocritus. In the first, two shepherds in sixty-three lines of dialogue, exchange compliments and arrange an elaborate gift for the singer. Then follows the lament proper (of varying length in later elegies), at the end of which, in ten lines, the singer demands his reward and is praised for his skill. Virgil's Fifth copies this formula with a difference. The introductory dialogue is reduced to nineteen lines; Mopsus then sings the lament for Daphnis (Julius Caesar), and after a break of eleven lines of dialogue, Menalcas celebrates his apotheosis, the eclogue being concluded with ten lines as the singers exchange presents. The note of joy, which in a sense completes that of sorrow introduced by Theocritus, becomes a stock feature. In Virgil's Tenth one singer, the poet, in eight lines introduces himself and his theme; he sings the consolation to Gallus, whose mistress has deserted him, and in eight concluding lines he announces that his song has ended. Lycidas is modelled upon this plan, even to the number of separate concluding lines, in which Milton, like Virgil, intimates that he is to sing no more pastorals.

Moreover, Virgil's Tenth provides the nearest approach to the pattern of Alcon and the Epitaphium. In these a separate introduction, replacing the separate conclusion of Virgil, announces the subject of the lament, <sup>10</sup> Masson, Life (London, 1894), I, 830, concludes it was during his second stay in Rome or Florence that Milton heard of Diodati's death; two years later he wrote the Epitaphium, in the summer of 1640.

<sup>11</sup> The text and translation in the Columbia University edition of Milton (New York, 1931), I, appear throughout this study. For assistance in the translations from Alcon the present writer is obliged to Professor H. J. Leon, of the classical department, University of Texas.

<sup>12</sup> Norlin, op. cit., 296–297, devotes a paragraph to the subject.

the setting, and the poet-singer, who then sings the lament proper through to the end of the poem. This preface, twenty-three lines in Castiglione and seventeen in Milton, obviously harks back to Virgil rather than to the longer prefatory dialogue of Theocritus, to which it is sometimes referred. Though scores of pastoral elegies adopted the framework found in Alcon and the Epitaphium, the general movements of the laments proper exhibit a marked similarity which a glance at their outlines will make clear.

The Italian lament (24-154) consists logically of three parts. Part One makes extensive use of the pathetic fallacy: the meadows have lost their splendor and deny their accustomed shade, the sterile fields fail their promised yield, all nature mourns Alcon's loss. The grass which dies springs up again green, the sun sets only to rise again; but once Death has seized upon man, he is ever shrouded in eternal gloom. No more will Alcon be seen in pastoral games ever the victor, no more will his pipe soothe the neighboring hills, nor again will he and his companion endure together the rigors of pastoral life. Part Two of Alcon (83-129) concerns Iollas' absence in Rome. He envies Leucippus, who was with Alcon when he died and who since has passed away to be with him in the Elysian fields. Unaware of his death, Iollas was fashioning idle dreams of Alcon's coming to Rome and of their happiness there. Part Three (130-154) concludes the poem, as Iollas invokes the shade of his friend and declares that he will raise an empty tomb on the banks of the Anio, deck it with flowers, and append an epitaph.

The lament in Milton's poem likewise falls into three parts. Its successive moods are more readily observed because of the refrain, the use of which beginning in Theocritus became general. What may be called Part One (18-111) precedes the account of the Italian journey. First (18-67) the singer mourns the loss of his companion in the fields, his comforter, his joy. In the visits of Mopsus and the various deities (68-92) Milton follows Virgil x.<sup>13</sup> The final passage (93-111) elaborates a contrast between animals and humanity, the significance of which will be discussed. Part Two (112-197) includes, first (112-160) the poet's memories of Damon and his grief in being absent when Damon died; second (161-178) plans for a British epic; and third (180-197) a description of the cups, gifts of Manso. The Epitaphium ends briefly (198-219) with an account of the heavenly joys of Damon, in which obviously the poet is following the ultimate precedent of Virgil in his deification of <sup>13</sup> Professor Mustard in "Later Echoes of the Greek Bucolic Poets," AJP, xxx (1909), 249, believes the invocation "indicates that he has Theocritus in mind, not Virgil." The passage itself produces no evidence; and "Sicelicum carmen" may perhaps be regarded as a conventional literary epithet; cf. Virgil's "Sicelides Musae" (iv, 1).

Caesar (v, 56-80). Milton's notable originality here lies in the characteristic passage (215-219) in which Bacchic orgies "run riot with the thyrsus of Zion."<sup>14</sup>

Two structural differences between Alcon and the Epitaphium at once stand out: Milton's elaboration of his epic plans and the description of the cups.<sup>15</sup> For these structural entities Alcon affords no counterpart. Nor does Castiglione's last movement correspond to Milton's, which tells the celestial joys of Damon. Earlier in the lament, however, there is a passage which strikes the same note as in Castiglione's last lines.

Milton expresses a desire to offer tribute to Diodati (27-30, 33-34):

Quicquid erit, certè, nisi me lupus antè videbit,
Indeplorato non comminuere sepulchro,<sup>16</sup>
Constabitque tuus tibi honos, longùmque vigebit
Inter pastores: . . . . .
Si quid id est, priscamque fidem coluisse, piùmque,
Palladiásque artes, sociùmque habuisse canorum.

(Whate'er shall come, one thing is sure: unless a wolf shall see me first, you, Damon, will not be crushed in an unlamented tomb, but your honors will be firmly fixed, firm set for you, and will long have vigorous life among the shepherds . . . if it counts for aught to have cherished faith like the faith of olden days, to have cherished righteousness, and the arts of Pallas, and to have had as comrade a man of song.)

Two features in these Virgilian lines may be traced in Alcon (139-140):

Iipse meis manibus ripâ hac Aniensis inanem
Constituam tumulum, nostri solatia luctus.<sup>17</sup>

(With my own hands here on the bank of the Anio I shall raise an empty tomb, solace for my grief.) A flower passage follows, concluding (147-148):

<sup>14</sup> The significance of these concluding lines, "the mask of Latin being in itself a sufficient drapery," is discussed by Professor Hanford, "The Youth of Milton," op. cit., p. 153.

<sup>15</sup> For discussion of classical authority in these two features, cf. Hanford, "The Pastoral Elegy," op. cit., pp. 414 and 411 respectively. In the Renaissance pastoral elegy, digressions became an accepted license. Theocritus set the fashion for describing cups and other gifts; there is no evidence of direct indebtedness, one reason being that Milton's cups were probably actual gifts from Manso.

<sup>16</sup> Hanford, ibid., p. 446, notes the similar phrasing in Lyc. 12: "He must not float upon his watery bier unwept." Compare further Alcon 101-102: "Ast ego nec tristes lacrimas in funere fudi, Debita nec misero persolvi justa sodali." The sentiment is fairly commonplace; see MacKellar's notes on the passage.

<sup>17</sup> With this Hanford, ibid., p. 432, compares Lyc. 151 ff., where the singer "to interpose a little ease" fancies that he is decking the tomb. Professor Hanford further mentions the emphasis in Lyc. and Alcon upon the intimacy between singer and his friend. He does not, however, acknowledge any explicit connection between Milton's later elegy and Alcon.

Nos Alcon dilexit multum, & dignus amari
Ipse fuit nobis, & tali dignus honore.

(Alcon deeply loved me, and he was worthy of my love, and worthy of such tribute.) The couplet suggests Milton's "Si quid id est," etc.

Structurally, then, the two elegies, both following Virgil, contain parallels which can hardly be regarded as accidental or conventional.

1. Near the beginning of Milton's elegy, Thyrsis<sup>18</sup> appears as the Nymphs are invoked to tell of his grief (5-8):

Et quibus assiduus exercuit antra querelis,
Fluminaque, fontesque<sup>19</sup> vagos, nemorumque recessus,
Dum sibi praereptum queritur Damona, neque altam
Luctibus exemit noctem, loca sola pererrans.

(The ceaseless plainings wherewith he harried the grots, and the wide-ranging rivers, and the retreats within the woods, while he made lament that Damon had been wrested from him before his time. Nor did he exempt from his griefs the deeps of the night, as he wandered o'er lonely places.)

This not unconventional picture deserves to be compared with Castiglione's description of Iollas' grief, like that of the dove bereft of its mate (15):

Languidulus moestis complet nemora alta querelis.<sup>20</sup>

(Feebly he fills the high groves with mournful complaints.) And later (21-23):

Tantum inter silvas, aut solo in littore secum
Perditus, & serae oblitus decedere nocti,
Rupibus haec frustra & surdis jactabat arenis.

(Only amid the woods or on the solitary shore, alone with his despair and forgetting to yield to the late night, in vain he poured forth these words to the cliffs and sands unhearing.)

The lament of each singer begins in the same strain, with the same interrogations: Epitaphium (19-22), Alcon (27-29):

Hei mihi! quae terris, quae dicam numina coelo,
Postquam te immiti rapuerunt funere Damon;

<sup>18</sup> Shepherd names in Milton as in Castiglione are commonplace and hence have little or no bearing upon sources: ultimately Thyrsis comes from Theocr. I and Damon from Virg. III and VIII, Iollas from Virg. II, and Alcon, suggested by Falcone, from Virg. V.

<sup>19</sup> C. S. Jerram in Lycidas and Epitaphium Damonis (London, 1874) regards the phrase as an obvious metrical imitation of Virg. Aen. III, 91, "liminaque laurusque dei."

<sup>20</sup> Italics mine, as in Milton's passage. Cf. Alcon, 138, "quasque cava haec responsant antra querelas." Verbal parallels between the two poems are few. Though Castiglione's hexameters are always smooth, Milton, better Latinist and poet, would resort to Alcon mainly for plan, ideas, or turns of thought.

Siccine nos linquis, tua sic sine nomine virtus
Ibit, & obscuris numero sociabitur umbris?

(Woe is me! What powers divine shall I name on earth, what in heaven, since they have swept you off, Damon, by a merciless death? Is it thus, thus, that you leave me? Is merit such as yours to pass thus, nameless, and to be joined with a host of obscure shades?)

Quis Deus, aut quis te casus miser abstulit? ergo
Optima quaeque rapit duri inclementia fati?
Ergo bonis tantum est aliquod male numen amicum?

(What god, or what hapless chance has torn you from me? Does, then, the harshness of cruel fate carry away ever the best? Is, then, some divinity unkindly only to the good?)<sup>21</sup>

In their emphasis upon the intimacy of singer and his dead friend, Alcon and Epitaphium conspicuously extend the conventions of the kind. After promising to observe yearly rites, Milton effects a natural transition to the following mood (37-43, 51-52, 55-56):

At mihi quid tandem fiet modò? quis mihi fidus
Haerebit lateri comes, ut tu saepe solebas
Frigoribus duris, & per loca foeta pruinis,
Aut rapido sub sole, siti morientibus herbis?<sup>22</sup>
Sive opus in magnos fuit eminens ire leones
Aut avidos terrere lupos praesepebus altis;
Quis fando sopire diem, cantuque solebit?
. . . . .
Aut aestate, dies medio dum vertitur axe,<sup>23</sup>
Cum Pan aesculeâ somnum capit abditus umbrâ,<sup>24</sup>
. . . . .

<sup>21</sup> For the practice of repeating the dead shepherd's name, as in Lyc. 8-9, cf. Alcon 24-25: "Alcon, deliciae Musarum & Apollinis, Alcon Pars animae, cordis pars Alcon maxima nostri." Hanford, p. 443, quotes Spenser's November 37-38 and Astrophel 7-8. The shepherd's youth is also conventionally emphasized; with Lyc. 8, "dead ere his prime," cf. Alcon 1, "sub flore juventae." Beginning with Moschus, dead shepherds have been termed poets; with Lyc. 34, cf. Alcon 3, "Quem toties Fauni & Dryades sensere canentem," both inspired by Virg. Ec. vi, 27-28; and with Lyc. 42-44, cf. Alcon 73-74, "Non tua vicinos mulcebit fistula montes, Docta nec umbrosae resonabunt carmina valles." With Milton's lines Hanford, p. 423, quotes Virg. Ec. viii, 4.

<sup>22</sup> Italics mine. Cf. Alcon 38, "Prata suum amisere decus, morientibus herbis." Masson cites Virg. Geor. i, 424, "solem ad rapidum"; and MacKellar adds Geor. iv, 427-428, "arebant herbae, et cava flumina siccis faucibus ad limum radii tepefacta coquebant." Hanford, p. 421, notes that the imagery of Milton's entire passage owes something to Virg. Ec. x, 55-68.

<sup>23</sup> Jerram, op. cit., cites Lucan's Phar. iii, 423, "medio cum Phoebus in axe est."

<sup>24</sup> The dread of disturbing Pan, Warton traces to Theocr. i, 15-17; MacKellar cites Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess 1, 1, and Mustard, op. cit., 247, observes its occurrence in Sann. Arc. Ecl. ix, 146-147, and in Balf, Ecl. xix.

Quis mihi blanditiásque tuas, quis tum mihi risus, Cecropiosque sales referet, cultosque lepores?

(But what of me? What loyal comrade will cling to my side, as you were wont oft to do, in the days of unrelenting cold, in places pregnant with frosts, or under the devouring sun, when the plants were dying of thirst, or when there was need to face in hand to hand encounter the monstrous lions, or to frighten the hungry wolves away from the high folds? Who will make it his habit with talking and with song to lay the day to rest? . . . Or, in the summer-time, when the day is revolving in mid-heaven, when Pan, hidden away in the shade of the oak, courts slumber, . . . who will renew for me your blandishments, your laughter, your sallies of Cecropian wit, and your cultured graces?)

Alcon presents a briefer, equally intimate, account (71-72, 78-82):

Non tecum posthac molli resupinus in umbrâ<sup>25</sup>
Effugiam longos aestivo tempore soles;

. . . . .
Nos etenim à teneris simul usque huc viximus annis,
Frigora pertulimusque aestus, noctesque, diesque,
Communique simul sunt pasta armenta labore.
Rura mca haec tecum communia: viximus unâ.

(No more shall I, reclining at ease in the soft shade with thee, escape the hot sun of a long summer's day. For we two have lived together from our tender years until now; we have borne together cold and heat, nights and days, and our herds were pastured together with common labor. These my fields were thine, we lived as one.)<sup>26</sup>

Although these passages are limited by what Professor Hanford calls "the narrow range of pastoral equivalents for friendship," the imagery is enough alike to be interesting: Milton's "frigoribus duri" and Castiglione's "frigora"; summer "dies medio dum vertitur axe" and "longos aestivo tempore soles." Both singers recall the rigors of winter and the quiet, congenial delights in summer shade. That such charming pictures are rare in pastoral elegy makes it more likely that Milton knew the passage in Alcon, as also of course Virgil, the common source.

2. In neither of his pastoral elegies does Milton employ the pathetic fallacy for its own sake. In Lycidas, he dwells upon the beauty of natural objects rather than upon their sentience; in the Epitaphium he gains an effect more like Virgil<sup>27</sup> than like Castiglione. Their combined

<sup>25</sup> Italics mine. Cf. Epit. 148, "Imus? & argutâ paulùm recubamus in umbra."

<sup>26</sup> Hanford, "The Pastoral Elegy," op. cit., p. 432, cites this passage as a source of Lyc. 23-31: "For we were nursed upon the self-same hill, Fed the same flock, by fountain, shade, and rill; together both" etc.

<sup>27</sup> See, for example, Ec. I, 38-39: "Ipsae te, Tityre, pinus, Ipsi te fontes, ipsa haec arbusta vocabant." As Conington in Opera (London, 1881), I, observes, the pines, springs, and orchards called him back in the sense that they depended on his care.

influence upon Milton is perhaps illustrated in the following passages. Thyrsis' grief has caused neglect of his fields and flocks (63-67):

Heu quam culta mihi prius arva procacibus herbis
Involvuntur, & ipsa situ seges alta fatiscit!
Innuba neglecto marcescit & uva racemo,
Nec myrteta juvant; ovium quoque taedet, at illae
Moerunt, inque suum convertunt ora magistrum.<sup>28</sup>

(Ah me! How deeply my tilth-lands, once so well tilled, are clothed now with insolent herbage! The towering grain gapes open with mildew. The grapes, unwedded, are withering, their clusters neglected, and the myrtle-groves pleasure me not. I am weary even of the sheep, and they are turning their eyes in deepest sorrow on their master.)

Compare the conventional insipidity of Alcon (38-42):

Prata suum amisere decus, morientibus herbis
Arida; sunt sicci fontes, & flumina sicca.
Infoecunda carent promissis frugibus arva,
Et mala crescentes rubigo exedit aristas.
Squalor tristis habet pecudes, pecudumque magistros.

(The meadows have lost their splendor, shrivelling with the dying herbage; dried are the springs, the rivers are dry. The sterile fields fail their promised yield, and evil rust devours the growing ears. Squalor possesses the sad herds and squalor their masters.)

While Milton's lines are obviously the more natural and tasteful, they bear an obvious resemblance to Castiglione's. The three aspects of decay—sterile fields, blighted corn, neglected sheep—are described in the same order and with similar details.

3. Before the review of those parts of the two elegies which concern Milton's and Castiglione's travels, it will be convenient at this point to quote several passages, all of which further illustrate what seem to be Milton's liberal adaptations from Castiglione.<sup>29</sup> In the first of these Milton contrasts the free mating of animals with the unique lot of man, who, choosing one congenial soul out of a thousand, is thwarted in his happiness by untimely death. Milton's idea is not far removed from the <sup>28</sup> MacKellar cites Lyc. 125, noting the conventionality of "hungry sheep"; and for line 65—no counterpart in Alcon—he finds a number of precedents.

<sup>29</sup> Commenting upon the Renaissance and Miltonic imitative art, Professor E. K. Rand observes, in "Milton in Rustication," St. in Phil., xix (1922), 119: "He [a poet] must season his verse with the antique, but avoid too obvious reminiscence, sheer steals. . . . And not only words and images and turns of thought must be stolen from antiquity, but the flavor, the atmosphere. Substances inconsistent with one another must be combined harmoniously."

conventional comparison of human mortality with the cycle of life and death in external nature. The relevant passage from the Epitaphium is as follows (100-105):

... vilisque volucrum
 Passer habet semper quicum sit, & omnia circum
 Farra libens volitet, serò sua tecta revisens,
 Quem si fors letho objecit, seu milvus adunco
 Fata tulit rostro, seu stravìt arundine fossor,
 Protinus ille alium socio petit inde volatu.

(The lowly sparrow always has some one with whom to spend his days, gladly, with whom to fly gladly about all the heaps of spelt, visiting again, late, his own shelter: but if chance has done this mate to death—mayhap a kite by its curved beak has brought to it its fate, or perchance a ditcher has laid it low with his shaft—straightway the sparrow, flying from the spot, seeks another to be his comrade.)

In the following simile the fact that Castiglione's idea is the exact opposite of Milton's does not necessarily affect its significance as a possible source of inspiration. Iollas' sorrow is compared to the nightingale's (8-15):

Aut qualis sociâ viduatus compare turtur,
 Quam procul incautam quercu speculatus ab altâ
 Immitis calamo pastor dejecit acuto:
 Non viridi sedit ramo, non gramine laeto,
 Non vitrei dulcem libavit fluminis undam,
 Sed gemitu amissos tantum testatus amores,
 Languidulus moestis complet nemora alta querelis.<sup>30</sup>

(Or like the turtle bereft of his mate which a cruel shepherd has spied incautious and with sharp reed has brought down from lofty oak. Resting neither on the verdant bough nor on the glad turf beneath, nor drinking the sweet water of the glassy stream, with his sighs bearing witness only to lost loves, feebly he fills the high groves with mournful complaints.)

Milton's contrast ends with the bitter reflection (109-111):

Aut si sors dederit tandem non aspera votis,
 Illum inopina dies quâ non speraveris horâ
 Surripit, aeternum linquens in saecula damnum.

(Or, if fortune, no longer harsh, at last vouchsafes one to our prayers, him some day, in an hour wherein one expects it not, steals from us, leaving us loss, everlasting, on into the [endless] ages.)

<sup>30</sup> The passage is derived from Virgil's famous simile in the Georgics, iv, 511-515: "Qualis populea maerens philomela sub umbra Amissos queritur fletus," etc.

Had Milton adopted the conventional, he would have supplemented this passage by contrasting human mortality with the immortality of Nature's cyclic course.<sup>31</sup> In both Lycidas and the Latin elegy, he has avoided direct imitation of this common practice. But the foregoing lines from the Epitaphium provide a near approach, and Lycidas betrays the influence, not of the idea, but of a feature in Castiglione's elaboration of it. The lines from Alcon are conventional except in the description of the sun (57-62):

Adspice, decedens jam Sol declivis Olympo
Occidit,<sup>32</sup> & moriens accendit sidera coelo;
Sed tamen occiduo cum laverit aequore currus,
Idem iterum terras orienti luce reviset.
Ast ubi nigra semel durae nos flumina mortis,
Lavere, etc.<sup>33</sup>

(Lo, the declining sun sloping in the heavens is setting, and dying kindles the stars in the sky; but when he has bathed his wheels in the western wave, yet again the lands with orient light will he revisit. But when once we have bathed in the black waters of cruel death, etc.)

Rejecting this mournful sentiment, Milton may yet have remembered Castiglione's graceful hexameters in the lines introducing the joyful close in Lycidas (168-172):

So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled ore
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky:
So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high.<sup>34</sup>

4. Disregarding usual conventions, Milton and Castiglione genuinely mourn their absence from their dying friends; this in turn leads to an account of Rome. Aside from its two digressions, on poetic aspirations and on the cups, this part of the Epitaphium offers interesting parallels with the earlier poem. Milton's passage begins (113):

<sup>31</sup> For the extensive use of this contrast in poetry from Moschus to modern times, cf. present writer, "Spenser and the Earlier Pastoral Elegy," Texas Studies in English, XIII (1933), 37-41.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. Lyc. 31, "Towards heaven's descent had sloped his westering wheel." Cf. further 190, "And now the sun had stretched out all the hills," with which Hanford, op. cit., p. 423, cites Virg. Ec. I, 83, "Majoresque cadunt altis de montibus umbrae."

<sup>33</sup> Similar passages occur in Catullus V, 4-6 and in Sannazaro, Arc., Ec. XI, 61-63.

<sup>34</sup> In a note, which subsequently came to the present writer's attention, Norlin, op. cit., p. 307, n. 1, quotes Mustard's observation that Castiglione's passage "will remind the English reader of the splendid passage in Lycidas about the Day-star and the ocean bed."

Heu quis me ignotas traxit vagus error in oras.

(Alas! what vagrant wandering drove me to go to stranger shores.)

Castiglione's corresponding line (83):

Heu male me ira Deûm patriis abduxit ab oris!

(Alas! in an evil hour the wrath of the gods parted me from my native shores!)

Momentarily Milton regrets his eagerness to view Rome (115-117):

Ecquid erat tanti Romam vidisse sepultam?<sup>35</sup>
Quamvis illa foret, qualem dum viseret olim,
Tityrus ipse suas & oves & ruia reliquit.

(Was there anything worth its cost in the sight of buried Rome?—[would there have been], even if she were as splendid as in the days when Tityrus went to see her, leaving the while his sheep and his country-side.)

Castiglione, in Rome, eagerly anticipates his friend's coming (122-125):

Hic redolens sacros primaevae gentis honores
Perluit antiquas Tiberis decora alta ruinas.
Hic umbrae nemorum, hic fontes, hic frigida Tempe,<sup>36</sup>
Formosum hic pastor Corydon cantavit Alexin.<sup>37</sup>

(Here the Tiber, replete with hallowed glories of that age-old people, washes ancient ruins, lofty ornaments. Here are woodland shades, here fountains, here a cool vale, here the shepherd Corydon sang his fair Alexis.)

Had he stayed in England, Milton reflects (121-122):

Ah certè extremùm licuisset tangere dextram,
Et bene compositos placidè morientis ocellos.

(Ah! I might at least have been privileged to touch for the last time your hand, and your dear eyes, decently composed as you died in peace.)

Similarly Castiglione (84-86):

Ne manibus premerem morientia lumina amici,
Aut abeuntis adhuc supremum animae halitum in auras
Exciperem ore meo, gelidis atque oscula labris.<sup>38</sup>

<sup>35</sup> Masson, op. cit., II, 90, cites Virg. Ec. I, 26, where Meliboeus asks Tityrus, "Et quae tanta fuit Romam tibi causa videndi?" Obviously Milton and Castiglione recall this eclogue, in which Virgil recounts his visit to Rome in the interests of his property.

<sup>36</sup> Cf. Epil. 71-72: "Hic gelidi fontes, hic illita gramina musco, Hic Zephiri, hic placidas interstrepit arbutus undas." Both poets here follow Virg. Ec. x, 42-43: "Hic gelidi fontes, hic mollia prata, Lycori. Hic nemus." <sup>37</sup> A paraphrase of Virg. Ec. II, 1 and v, 86.

<sup>38</sup> Cf. Spenser's Astrophel 137-138, "Whilst none is nigh, thine eylds up to close, And kisse thy lips like faded leaves of rose."

(That I should not with my hands close the dying eyes of my friend, nor with my lips catch the last breath of his spirit as it was departing into thin air, nor receive the kisses from his cold lips.)

Absent from Diodati and ignorant of his death, Milton dreams of their future companionship (142, 145-146):

Ah quoties dixi, cùm te cinis ater habebat,<sup>39</sup>
 . . . . .
 Et quae tum facili sperabam mente futura
 Arripui voto levis, & praesentia finxi.

(Ah! How many times I said, even when the black ashes possessed you, . . . And what then I, with complaisant mind, hoped would come to pass, I lightly forestalled in my prayers, and I portrayed it as already present.)

Castiglione, too, gives place to actual thoughts of Falcone in the passage beginning (103-4):

Quin etiam, sortis durae ignarusque malorum,
 Vana mihi incassum fingebam somnia demens.

(Yea rather, unaware of his cruel lot and tragic fate, in vain was I fondly contriving idle dreams.)

And the close of his digression Milton denotes by the metaphor (180):

Haec tibi servabam lentâ sub cortice lauri.

(All these [plans and dreams] I was guarding jealously for you, Damon, under the pliant bark of the laurel.)

With similar phrasing Castiglione ends his digression (130):

Haec ego fingebam miser ab spe ductus inani.

(These things I was contriving, wretched man led by vain hope )

Structurally the passages correspond, and there is a slight verbal similarity. The digressions themselves, intimately revealing in both poems, have little in common. As the two friends lie in the murmuring shade, Damon will discourse about his healing herbs and juices, Thyrsis will tell his poetical plans. In the other poem Iollas looks forward to the companionship of Alcon, to those quiet times when "tandem optato laeti sermone fruemur" (112).

A survey of the foregoing parallels between Alcon and the Epitaphium makes it desirable to regain a proper perspective of Milton's elegy. Alcon rises far above the level of contemporary Latin pastorals in graceful Virgilian movement and in emotional sincerity which outshine the banalities of the genre. And these qualities among others appear to have impressed Milton, who in his tribute to Diodati again resorted to the poem. Milton deliberately employed the pastoral as a medium, but he rejected much of its machinery. The comparison of his elegy with Castiglione's evinces not only Milton's superior taste but his method of transforming an original. Whatever its models, the Epitaphium remains a peculiarly intimate revelation of the author, a biographical record of Milton at thirty-two. Particularly does the poem reveal an increasing sense of disillusionment, to which recently Professor Grierson has referred,<sup>40</sup> as the youthful idealist is faced with a sudden reality.

<sup>39</sup> For the clause Jerram cites Virg. Aen. iv, 633, "Namque suam patria antiqua cinis ater habebat."

T. P. HARRISON, JR.

The University of Texas

<sup>40</sup> The Poems of John Milton (London, 1925), p. vi.

GAUDENTIO DI LUCCA: A FORGOTTEN UTOPIA

SOMETHING of a literary sensation in its day (1737), as well as a mystification, Gaudentio di Lucca has fallen into a state of progressive neglect that threatens to become oblivion. Students of utopian schemes of social organization seem to have forgotten its existence. Recent historians have either ignored it entirely or have accorded it only cursory attention. "Interesting from a certain oddity and air of 'key' about it rather than from much merit as literature," is the verdict of Professor Saintsbury;<sup>1</sup> while Professor Elton concedes that its author had some invention and color, and that his "'news from nowhere, 'unlike many fictions of the kind, includes adequate police intelligence.'"<sup>2</sup> Compared with the acclaim which once greeted Gaudentio, this is faint praise indeed. Said Clara Reeve:<sup>3</sup>

The work of a master . . . Such books cannot be too strongly recommended, as under the guise of fiction they warm the heart with the love of virtue, and by that means, excite the reader to the practice of it. . . . Let me beg you will read Gaudentio di Lucca.

Dunlop brackets it with Robinson Crusoe and Gulliver, and declares that "in the class of Voyages Imaginaires no nation of Europe has produced three performances of equal merit."<sup>4</sup> A writer in the Retrospective Review is unrestrained in his admiration. He says:<sup>5</sup>

The work is as valuable for the hints thrown out for the improvement of man in his social character and for the softening of too harsh laws, as it is beautiful as a utopian scheme. . . . As a romance it is also worthy of admiration, the incidents being well contrived and agreeably related. In short, it contains such just principles of benevolence, is adorned with so rich and playful a fancy, and is composed in such clear, simple, and unconstrained style, that it has not only our approbation, but our perfect love.

One may so far concur in these ardent opinions as to say of Gaudentio di Lucca that it has claims upon the attention of the historical critic. Coming at a time when prose fiction was casting about for its appropriate subject-matter and was still in the experimental stages of its art, Gaudentio is almost the only specimen of the novel in English between Crusoe and Gulliver on the one hand, and Pamela on the other. The question of its authorship provoked spirited discussion for a generation

<sup>1</sup> The English Novel, p. 134.

<sup>2</sup> English Literature (1730-1780), I, 231.

<sup>3</sup> The Progress of Romance, through Times, Countries and Manners (New York: Facsimile Text Society, 1930), I, 124.

<sup>4</sup> History of Fiction, ed. Wilson, II, 590.

<sup>5</sup> IV, 330.

or more, and it was long associated with one of the great names in the history of modern thought. Finally, its documentary value for the history of ideas in the eighteenth century constitutes a very legitimate claim to consideration.

For a long time many errors were current regarding the date of its first appearance. Clara Reeve gave the date as 1725.<sup>6</sup>

G. Lanson mentions an edition of 1733;<sup>7</sup> while in a prefatory note to the English edition of 1850 the statement is made that the work was first published in 1803.<sup>8</sup> The correct date is, of course, 1737. The advent of Gaudentio was announced to the world by the following note which appeared in the Gentlemen's Magazine of that year, under the heading, "A Register of Books for April:"<sup>9</sup>

The Memoirs of Sig. Gaudentio di Lucca: Taken from his Examination before the Fathers of the Inquisition at Bologna, discovering an unknown Country in Africa, as ancient, populous and civilized as the Chinese. Faithfully translated from the Italian, by E. T , Gent. Printed for T. Cooper.

The work found favor almost immediately; and coincident with the growth of interest in the utopian romance came a lively curiosity respecting the identity of its author. In solving the problem, long-range guessing, based upon such internal evidence as the book afforded, was the only means at hand. Gradually, however, the prevailing opinion came to be that a work of such wisdom, gentleness, and humanity could have come from only one man—him to whom Pope ascribed "every virtue under heaven"—and thereafter it was, for many readers, taken quite out of the category of mere romance, and given the rating of a philosophical and moral apologue of great beauty and power. The way in which these associations began to take form is clearly shown in the following letter to the Gentlemen's Magazine, written shortly after Gaudentio was published:<sup>10</sup>

Mr. Urban,

The other Day as I was amusing Myself in a Bookseller's Shop, I chanced to take up a small Piece lately publish'd intitled Memoirs of Signior Gaudentio di Lucca, discovering an unknown Country in Africa, as ancient, populous and civiliz'd as the Chinese, etc. I must confess I took it up with the natural Prejudice serious Readers have to the romantick Kind. . . I read on; from a Trifle it became a beautiful Fiction, then a sublime Allegory. . . His new discovered People are such as Nations might be supposed to be, who had retained in their

<sup>6</sup> Progress of Romance, I, 124.

<sup>7</sup> Manuel bibliographique de la littérature moderne, p. 582.

<sup>8</sup> The Adventures of Gaudentio di Lucca (London: Chas Gilpin, 1850).

<sup>9</sup> Loc. cit., VII, 257.

<sup>10</sup> Loc. cit., VII, 317.

Purity (except some few natural Deviations, thro' length of Time) the original Ideas of the Arts, Manners, Religion and Government of the first Men in the Infancy of the World. . . . I should have been very glad to have seen the Author's Name prefix'd to it; however, am of Opinion that it is very nearly related to no less a Hand than that which has so often, under borrowed Names, employ'd itself to amuse and trifle Mankind, in their own Taste, out of their Folly and Vices.

Yours,
C. H

It was commonly, and no doubt rightly, understood that this correspondent's conjectures pointed to Bishop Berkeley. The great cleric's interest in all benevolent and meliorative enterprises was well known. His philanthropic and missionary ventures in America had been a recent topic of public and private discussion. Thwarted in his endeavor to realize his dream of a new golden age in the lands beyond the Atlantic, the argument ran, he had fashioned in his thought the happy land of the Mezzoranians amid the deserts of Africa. Besides the general correspondence between the ideal polity of Mezzorania and the expressed views of Berkeley, there were certain matters of detail that seemed to support the theory of Berkeleian authorship. For example, architecture, especially that of public buildings, which is so conspicuous a feature of Gaudentio, was known to be one of Berkeley's enthusiasms. Again, the life-long war which he had carried on against the deists and the disciples of Hobbes and Mandeville was continued in the novel. Finally, it was asserted that the manner of the author of Gaudentio strongly resembled that of Berkeley. That the philosophical and clerical character did not, in his case, preclude the ability to trifle gracefully, all would agree. In all his writings he had shown a fondness for the Socratic kind of levity, and from his contributions to the Guardian onwards, he had preferred, "under borrowed names—to amuse and trifle mankind out of their folly and vices."<sup>11</sup>

While direct evidence to prove Berkeley's authorship was lacking, no evidence of any kind in support of the contrary was offered, and so the matter ceased to excite interest. Some forty years later, however, upon the appearance of Bishop Stock's Life of Berkeley, the question was again opened; and Dr. Kippis, in connection with his researches for the Biographica Britannica, expressed doubt that the work had been correctly attributed to Berkeley. At this time came the first denial from any authoritative source that he was its author. A contributor to the Gentlemen's Magazine writes in part as follows:<sup>12</sup>

<sup>11</sup> For an elaborate argument in support of Berkeley's authorship see The Retrospective Review, iv. 332 ff.

<sup>12</sup> Loc. cit., I, 125.

Dr. Kippis thinks that Gaudentio di Lucca might come from the pen of "Dr. Berkeley." In answer these are the words of his son the present Dr. George Berkeley: "Gaudentio di Lucca was not written by my father, nor did he see the book, untill I was a well grown lad; and he never read it, but only twirled over some of the leaves."

Five years later this negative assertion was supplemented by the following positive statement from another contributor to the same periodical:<sup>13</sup>

Mr Urban,

Reading in your last Magazine the review of Clara Reeve's book on romances, I find the Adventures of Gaudentio di Lucca and Bp Berkeley's title to it as the author, very properly introduced, and as I do not recollect ever seeing the name of the real author mentioned, it may gratify many of your readers to be informed who was the real author of this book, which hath had the honour of being attributed to the amiable Berkeley. This I can do on very good authority. His name was Barrington (sic), a Catholic priest. . . . Mr. Barrington wrote it for amusement in a fit of the gout . . .

Yours, etc.,
W. H.

Either the "good authority" upon which this statement was made was not fully credited, or the information failed to gain currency; for fifty years later the question was still regarded as unsettled, with the weight of evidence pointing strongly to Berkeley. The correspondent's information was substantially correct, however. Gaudentio di Lucca is the work of Simon Berington,<sup>14</sup> member of a well-known English Catholic family,

<sup>13</sup> Loc cit., iv, 757.

<sup>14</sup> The impression left by Berington upon his age is by no means commensurate with his learning and abilities. The following details as to his life and activities are ascertainable: Simon Berington, son of Mr. John Berington, of Winsley, County Hereford, and Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Wolryche, was born January 16 (o s), 1679. Like several other members of the family, he was educated at the English College at Douay, taking his degree in divinity in 1704. For twelve years following his graduation he was Professor of Poetry and Philosophy in his alma mater. His earliest published work, a laudatory poem "To His Most Excellent Majesty, James III, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of this Faith," etc, describes him as "Priest and Present Professor of Poetry in the English College at Douay." He returned to England in 1716, and began service upon the mission, succeeding his cousin Thomas Berington at St. Thomas's, near Stafford, in 1720. At some undetermined date he assumed charge of the clergy library for Catholics, at Gray's Inn, and died in his chambers there in 1755. Two members of his family, Bishop Charles Berington (1748-88), a cousin and Dr. Joseph Berington (1746-1827), a nephew, were able and influential men, and leaders in the movement toward liberalism which stirred English Catholics during the last quarter of the eighteenth century.

The list of Simon Berington's published writings is a long one, though it contains mostly works of pamphlet dimensions. A considerable number of his unpublished manuscripts and kinsman of the better known Dr. Joseph Berington, author of A Literary History of the Middle Ages. Why the true author never saw fit to acknowledge his work must remain his own secret. He lived eighteen years beyond the date of its first appearance. Possibly he regarded the warmth of the purely romantic element as out of keeping with the gravity of the clerical character—a consideration which might also have strengthened the doubt of Berkeley's authorship.

It is a question whether the dissociation of the great name of Berkeley from Gaudentio does not mark the beginning of the decline from its once high estate. With the great Christian idealist as its supposed sponsor, it attained to a rank and dignity comparable to that of the Republic of Plato, the Utopia of Sir Thomas More, and the New Atlantis of Lord Bacon. But a work emanating from a mere obscure priest could not readily justify such lofty pretensions. Discerning readers, however, must have perceived in Gaudentio elements and purposes wholly foreign to its eminent prototypes. In the long interval separating More and Bacon from Simon Berington voyagers and explorers had awakened a strong popular interest in the far places of the earth—in races and peoples, manners, customs, flora, fauna, in the changes and chances of foreign travel, in all the concrete facts and experiences of life in remote regions. This interest Berington undertook to satisfy. The earlier utopias lacked concreteness. In fact, they can hardly be said to exist in an objective sense, but only as abstractions. Berington's Mezzorania, on the other hand, is as real as Mexico and Peru; and integrated with his philosophy and social theory is a narrative that runs the whole gamut from idyllic romance to luscious intrigue and bloody adventure. Nevertheless, as a social and moral philosopher, Berington can stand upon his own merits, and the early appraisal of his work which saw in it the reflection of a wise, humane, and generous spirit does not have to be seriously discounted.

What, precisely, did this moral and social system include, which was so highly regarded that only the greatest philosopher and the most enlightened humanitarian of the age seemed equal to it? The answer to yet remain in the Chapter archives. His erudition is said to have been most impressive, and the range of his reading astonishingly wide. One of his books, Dissertations on the Mosaical Creation, Deluge, Building of Babel and Confusion of Tongues, is especially interesting in connection with Gaudentio di Lucca, as indicating the origin of the elaborate annotation supplied by "the learned Signor Rhedi." The sources of information concerning Berington are Burke, Landed Gentry of Great Britain, Kirk, Biographies of English Catholics in the Eighteenth Century, Milner, Supplementary Memoirs of English Catholics, and Chas. Butler, An Account of the Life and Writings of the Reverend Alban Butler (London, 1799).

---

this question is embraced in Gaudentio's narrative before the Holy Inquisition at Bologna, which is in outline as follows:

Through the expedients of conventional romance the narrator finds himself in the heart of Central Africa, in a vast and beautiful country, shut in by mountains and deserts, and as completely sundered from the rest of the world as if it were a part of the moon. No stranger has ever set foot upon its soil or even so much as suspected its existence. Yet the splendor of its civilization surpasses anything that Europe or Asia can boast. Majestic cities rise beside its broad rivers, stately temples crown its hills; and a numerous and happy people bear witness to the character of its institutions and its laws. With astonishment Gaudentio learns its history. Three thousand years ago the ancestors of these people were living in a state of primitive innocence and happiness in a section of the world since called Egypt. A fearful calamity befell them when their land was invaded by savage Hyksos, or Shepherds Kings, from the East. Their religion forbidding them to shed human blood, they were defenseless before their ruthless enemies, and had to choose between death and slavery, or else seek refuge in flight. They chose the latter. One patriarch, taking his family of five sons and five daughters, sought refuge in the inhospitable deserts. A kind fate conducted them to the marvelous country which has since been their home, and which they call Mezzorania, in memory of Misraim, the ancient name of Egypt. The land bore no mark of human occupation, and so no conquest was necessary. The whole vast domain seemed to have been divinely appointed as an asylum for these gentle and innocent children of nature. Behind their natural barriers of mountain and desert they have lived for almost three thousand years, knowing neither war nor invasion; expanding in utter purity of race, holding no commerce with the world and hence escaping the contamination of its vices. Their religion, their laws, and all their institutions are the dictates of nature and pure reason. They worship the sun, as the minister of that inscrutable power upon which their lives depend. Their laws are merely the first principles of natural justice. All their civil polity is but the application to a nation—literally one in blood—of the natural ties that unite the family. At the head of all is the Grand Pophar—prince-priest and patriarch by virtue of direct descent through primogeniture from the original founder of the state. He administers for the common good, in all things temporal and spiritual. The whole country is divided into five districts, or nomes, corresponding to the five sons of the original Pophar, with the hierarchy resting upon the principle of eldership from the Grand Pophar down to the head of each household. "In a word the whole country is one great family, governed by the laws of nature. . . . Every individual looks upon himself as a part of that great family. The Grand Pophar is the common father, esteeming all the rest as children and brothers, calling them universally by that name, as they call one another brothers, bartering and exchanging their commodities as one brother would do with another" (p. 183).

Gaudentio was welcomed into the national family, was ultimately married to the Pophar Regent's daughter, and for many years lived a life of radiant happiness in this paradise of utopias. At last, his family having died, he yielded to the desire to end his days in a Christian land, and returned to Italy. Here some unguarded remarks touching his extraordinary experiences aroused the suspicions of the Holy Inquisition, and he was haled before the Reverend Fathers to give an account of himself.

In its general outlines this seems to be merely another utopia, unique in some respects, perhaps, but reproducing all the essential features of the type. On closer examination, however, it is found to be a document of considerable significance for the historian of ideas. The current of history brought to the social theorizer of the eighteenth century something more than the fixed utopian tradition. The two hundred years that separate More and Berington had seen the accumulation of much new knowledge. Europeans had come in contact with strange peoples, living under unfamiliar forms of government and social organization, in all parts of the world. Rumors had long been current, too, of lands beyond the seas where the dream of social brotherhood had been realized, where the primitive innocence of human nature remained uncorrupted, where wealth and poverty were both unknown, where government was administered in the interest of all alike, where laws were simply the first principles of natural justice, and religion the expression of the in-born impulse to worship and revere. The effect of this strain of thought upon the history of ideas in Europe is well known. In the realm of religion and morals it gave rise to deism; in the history of social and political theory it developed into the body of doctrine embraced by the school of Rousseau. The utopian tradition lent itself readily to the dissemination of these ideas. After the age of discovery and exploration had greatly excited popular curiosity regarding the manners and customs of remote peoples, it was easy to turn this interest to the service of propaganda. The strange accounts of actual travelers suggested the form, and the fertile imagination of enthusiasts supplied the matter, for many experiments in ideal statecraft.

It is the utopian tradition thus modified and expanded that animates the social organism of Berington's Mezzorania. To his experiment in social and political architectonics he brought a wide acquaintance with world literature, ancient and modern. His reading had familiarized him with what, at the time, passed for the established historical account of the nations and peoples of antiquity, and the patriarchal simplicity of their civilization. In the lore of ancient Egypt there was the tradition of a gentle, non-military people, living under a paternal government, practising a natural religion of great purity, and attaining a far more humane and enlightened plane of living than any other people in the world at that time. Upon this tradition, as reported by Manetho, Berington engrafted his story of the Mezzoraniens, and thereby gave his social and philosophic ideas "a local habitation and a name." The ideas, however, owe little or nothing to antiquity. In origin they are modern and western.

Berington's utopianism, like so much else in the life of his century, is a product of the combined influence of two forces—rationalism and sentimentalism. The first of these had its origin in the naturalistic impulsion communicated to European thought by such men as Telesius and Bruno, Bacon and Campanella. Nature, according to this view, was simply the inexorable order of things as determined by immutable law. By the study of phenomena man might learn this law, and use the knowledge thus gained to his own infinite profit. But to ignore nature's plain manifestations was by choice to walk in the dark, and to attempt to go in opposition to them was to court utter disaster. It was as important that man find and follow nature's order in one department of life as in another. Government and society come under natural law no less than physics. Utopian thought was strongly influenced by this variety of naturalism throughout the seventeenth century, and most ideal commonwealths of the period were constructed in accordance with it. The eighteenth-century manifestation known as sentimentalism changed this conception completely. Nature, instead of being merely a rationalistic scheme of things—abstract, impersonal, and coldly indifferent to man as an individual—came to be conceived of as a divine order which included not only the ultimate wisdom but the ultimate good—an active, beneficent influence upon the individual life, a sort of guide, counsellor, and friend of man, if he would but hearken to her teachings. It is the lofty, if naïve, idealism engendered by this conception which constitutes the animating principle of Berington's experiment in utopian statecraft. In utter singleness of heart man goes to nature for light and guidance; she gives him a religion of absolute purity, a moral code of elevated simplicity, and a political and social system of excellence superlative.

The Edenic quality imparted to the Mezzoranian civilization as a result of this infusion of sentiment tends to obscure, somewhat, its historical affiliations among utopias. The line of its descent, however, is clear. Divested of its romantic drapery, it is seen to bear a striking resemblance to the more prosaic and rationally conceived commonwealths of the seventeenth century. Among these, its closest affiliates are found in The Royal Commentaries of Peru of Garcilaso de la Vega, The Civitas Solis of Tommaso Campanella, and the Histoire des Sévarambes of Denis Vairasse d'Alais.

That Berington knew the current account of the Incan civilization is certain. In one of the numerous notes of "Signor Rhedi," which constitute a general commentary upon Gaudenzio's narrative, a parallel is drawn between the social usages of the Incas and those of the Mezzoransians. The story of the Incas is one of the earliest sources from which purely rational ideas on society and religion entered the stream of European thought. It is not a utopian romance, but purports to be a faithful account of a highly successful naturalistic system of law, government, and religion in operation among the Indians of Peru at the time of the Spanish conquest. Its author, Garcilaso de la Vega, was himself the offspring of a Spanish soldier and a princess of the Inca line. His Comentarios reales que tratan del origen de los Incas and Historia general del Peru appeared early in the seventeenth century and by 1700 had become well known in Europe.<sup>15</sup>

The similarity in general outline as well as in detail between Mezzorania and the civilization of the Incas is marked. The civil government of both is paternalistic, and the animating spirit of the whole social system in both countries is that of benevolence and altruism. Mezzorania is "a kingdom of brothers and friends, no man having the least suspicion or fear of another" (p. 203); and "all the law of Meum and Tuum is that 'Thou shalt do no wrong to any one'." (p. 173). The Inca carefully instructed his people in "the rules of Friendship and Brotherhood as the Laws of Nature and Reason dictated" (I, xii, 17). Obviously, under such a system political theory is reduced to its lowest terms. No warrant for a fine-spun theory of the state in its relation to the individual is found in natural law. What nature exemplifies and sanctions is a frank subordination to eldership—the obligation of parent to offspring—and the identity of interest between all members of the family-state. In both countries the administration of government is intrusted only to those who have given evidence of moral and intellectual capacity above their fellows. In Peru, "when any one was more gentle, affable, pious, ingenious, and more zealous for the public good than others, he was presently advanced to government" (I, xii, 18). In Mezzorania, "those who give indications of more wisdom and prudence in their conduct than others, are marked out for governors, and gradually raised according to their merit" (p. 187).

The national religion of both the Incas and the Mezzoransians, like their civil polity, is dictated by natural reason.<sup>16</sup> The one understandable cause from which all things proceed is the generative force in nature. The immediate manifestation of this force is in parenthood; the more remote, they conceive to be the sun. Two principles therefore animate their religion: veneration for ancestors and worship of the sun. "Our Father the Sun," ran the Peruvian tradition, "sent a Son and Daughter of his own from Heaven to Earth, to instruct our people . . . that they might conform their lives like men of Reason and Civility" (I, vii, 12). Thus originated the first of the Incas. The Mezzoranzians assign a similar celestial origin for the founder of their race, and find warrant for the worship of the sun in the same course of deistical reasoning. The necessity of a prior First Cause is, however, recognized by both. "Besides the Sun, the Incas. . . proceeded by the mere light of Nature to a knowledge of the True Almighty God . . . which they called by the name of Pachacamac; . . . but because they did not see him, they could not know him; for that reason they erected not temples to him; however they worshiped in their hearts and esteemed him for the unknown God" (II, ii, 29). The Mezzoranzians also have "The Unknown God" whose existence they establish by inference. Besides the sun, to whom only they offer prayers and erect temples, they "acknowledge one supreme God, maker of all things, whom they call El, or the Most High. This they say natural reason teaches them" (p. 59).

<sup>15</sup> References in this article are to the English translation, The Royal Commentaries of Peru. Written originally in Spanish and done into English by Sir Paul Rycaut, Kt. (London, 1688).

<sup>16</sup> The deistical character of the religion of the Incas, as well as the paternalism of their government, is discussed by Geoffrey Atkinson, The Extraordinary Voyage in French Literature, pp. 20 ff.

It might be supposed that, since Gaudentio is an engraftment upon an ancient Egyptian legend, the Mezzoranzian religious system was an extension of the worship of the sun-god Ra. On the contrary, it is essentially the deistical theology promulgated by European rationalism and bears little resemblance to the chaotic pantheism of the ancient Egyptians.

Conspicuous also among the sources that supplied material for Simon Berington's experiment in ideal statecraft is the work of his co-religionist and fellow-dreamer, Tommaso Campanella. It would of course be too much to assert that the story of Gaudentio di Lucca was suggested by the misfortunes of Campanella, though it is perhaps not purely a coincidence that the occasion of Gaudentio's narrative is a situation exactly parallel to that of Campanella during the period of his first imprisonment: his papers and all personal effects having been seized, he is haled before the Inquisition to answer charges of unlawful practices and beliefs. It was not, however, the personal career, but the ideas, of Campanella which mainly influenced Berington. The Civitas Solis is the first of the true utopian romances to show strongly the influence of naturalistic influences in the formation of a civil and religious polity. A follower of Telesius, Campanella repudiated the traditional methods of philosophy, and declared nature to be the sole arbiter of truth. "He who fears contradiction from things of nature," he says, "is conscious of his own falseness." The jargon-logic of the schoolmen he sought to replace with a system of logic based upon natural law. His conception was not, however, the "system of nature" of the eighteenth century revolutionary philosophers. Though a friend of individual liberty, he speaks not so much of natural "rights" as of natural duties, obligations, opportunities. Nevertheless, he found in nature warrant for his dream of universal brotherhood and a universal religion founded upon the natural and obvious teachings of Holy Scriptures.

The direct appeal to nature and reason as the warrant for their utopian theories puts Berington and Campanella in the same category as social philosophers, and suggests that their ideal states would have many characteristics in common. Such is the case. The similarity in spirit of the social, economic, and political life of these two utopias is very marked. Both have successfully grappled with the problem of social unity, and have solved it in the same way—by eliminating from the communal life everything that makes for class distinction. Individual aggrandizement of every kind is frowned upon. The glory of the state is the consuming passion of all the citizenry. That the individual may not be without incentive to exert himself for the common good, a system of public honors—eulogies, banquets, wreaths, and statues—is used with preëminent success in both countries. The education of all children, "without any distinction except personal merit," is the care of the state. Nature rather than books, and objects, instead of words, constitute the staple of education. Public officials are chosen only from those who have distinguished themselves in the pursuit of the "sublime sciences." The honor in which agriculture is held, the scorn of trade and commerce, the uniformity of dress, the serving of the old by the young, the strict regulation of the details of daily life—all these matters are set forth with the utmost emphasis, and often with a striking parallelism in language, as constituting the staple of life in both Mezzorania and the City of the Sun.

The religious systems of the two commonwealths are so much alike as, at first sight, to seem identical. Closer examination, however, reveals very significant differences. The prominence of the sun in each system is perhaps the most arresting feature. Among the Mezzoranians it is the object to which all adoration is paid and all prayers addressed. In Campanella's system, on the other hand, worship is accorded only to God—a metaphysical conception of the Christian deity—and the prominence given the sun and the other heavenly bodies is due in part to Campanella's interest in astrology, but mainly to his passionate belief that theology, like all else in life, must rest upon nature.

A direct borrowing of rather large proportions is seen in Berington's appropriation of Campanella's plan of the solar city, together with the magnificent temple, which is its physical, as well as its spiritual center. The emphasis upon physical order, cleanliness, and sanitation as characteristics of utopian life begins with Sir Thomas More. Campanella is the first to lay out his city according to an elaborate geometrical design, and in this Berington follows him closely. The City of the Sun consists of seven concentric circular walls, the largest being more than seven miles in circumference. Attached to these walls, as if they constituted one continuous range of buildings, are the residential halls and other structures necessary in the life of the city. At the geometrical center of the city stands the temple, a marvel of beauty and splendor. Berington alters these general features of Campanella's solar city only in the direction of further elaboration. His capital city of Phor is a series of concentric circles with the temple as a center. The number of these circular ranges of buildings is not restricted to seven, however, as with Campanella, but is determined by the number of people to be accommodated with residences. His Temple of the Sun is almost an exact reproduction of the great solarian fane conceived by Campanella.

Along with these numerous and striking parallels in the ideal civilizations conceived by Berington and Campanella are differences which leave them widely asunder. In the first place, Campanella, following Plato, rejects the family in his effort after social unity, and insists that all union between the sexes shall regard only the good of the race. Berington follows Sir Thomas More in holding the family to be the most sacred and natural of human institutions and the one cohesive force without which society cannot exist. He succeeds in the difficult task of harmonizing its claims with a system of state-controlled property, without heritage, and a form of communized domestic life. Indeed, with Berington the family is the pattern of the perfect state in miniature, and the state only one great family. Again, the City of the Sun wages offensive and defensive war, even the women being trained for military service. Campanella entertained no illusions that his dream of a world united under one government and one religion could be realized by merely pacific means. The Mezzoraniens, on the other hand, abhor all violence, and refuse to shed blood even as a punishment for crime. Finally, Campanella looked to the future, and envisaged a world made over by the cooperation of man with nature, and the improvement of the race through eugenics, while Berington's "return to nature" followed a romantic path back to the primitive innocence of a traditional golden age in the history of man.

The precise extent of Berington's obligation the Histoire des Séver- ambes,<sup>17</sup> of Denis Vairasse, is not easily determined. Most of the numerous parallels between them are found in either Garcilaso or Campanella, or in both, and might have reached Berginton without the intermediation of Vairasse. But whatever their origin, among the common characteristics are a political system with strongly marked paternalistic features, a rational religion founded upon sun-worship, state socialization of all goods and possessions, a form of communal domestic life, and a system of public honors in recognition of services rendered the state. Some of these are, of course, conventional features of all utopias. What is significant here is their combination into a civil and religious polity which is held to be the direct transcript and legacy of nature to man.

Now and then we find Vairasse and Berington emphasizing details which Garcilaso and Campanella pass over lightly or omit altogether. For example, both say much of the physical perfection of their respective utopians. The Mezzoraniens, according to Berington, "are the handsomest race of people this day in the universe" (p. 132). "The men are universally well-shaped, tall and slender, except through some accidental deformity, which is very rare" (p. 153). Through their temperance, scorn of idleness, and love of athletic exercise "comes that strength of body and mind in their men, and modest blooming beauty of their women; so that among this people nature seems to have kept up its primitive and original perfection" (p. 189). The Severambians are equally favored by nature: "des Hommes et des Femmes d'une taille extraordinaire, mais—d'ailleurs fort bien faits, et de plus, fort doux et fort traitables" (I, 227). We learn further that "ils sont fort robustes et jouissent d'une grande sante pour la plupart, ce qui vient en partie de leur naissance, et de la manière de vivre, et en partie de leur gayeté (II, 10). Thanks to a perfect social system, "ils n'ont ni souci, ni avarice; ils ne manquent jamais de rien, et leur plus grand soin est de jouir avec modération des plaisirs légitimes de la vie" (II, 11).

One of the chief problems of the Mezzoranian government was, as we have seen, to guard themselves against contamination by contact with the world and its vices, and at the same time to avoid the stagnation which comes of complete isolation. The Severambians were confronted with the same dilemma, and met it in the same way. Their law-giver, Sévarias, leur recommanda l'innocence des mœurs, et leur ordonna de n'avoir point de commerce avec les Nations de l'autre Continent, de puer que leurs vices ne corrompissent aussi les Sévarambes. Cependant comme parmy les hommes vicieux on voit souvent briller de grandes vertus, soit dans la Politique, soit dans les Sciences ou dans les Arts; Sévarias trouva qu'il n'étoit pas avantageux, fuyant leur vices, de mépriser leurs vertus, et de négliger les bons exemples, et les belles inventions qu'on peut tirer des Chinois, et des autres peuples, [and so he directed them] voyager dans les autres Pais, pour remarquer tout ce qu'il y avoit de considerable, afinque de toutes ces remarques on en pût tirer ce qu'il y auroit de bon et de propre a l'usage de notre Nation (I, 169).

<sup>17</sup> Histoire des Séverambes, peuples qui habitent une partie du troisieme continent appelé Terre Australe (Paris, 1677-79).—References in this article are to the Amsterdam edition of 1716.

Lest the inhabitants of these happy lands cease to be human in their approach to perfection, they are endowed with certain weaknesses. Of the Mezzorandians, it is said that the love of glory and praise seems to be their greatest passion. Besides:

Their wise governors have such ways of stirring up their emulation by public honours, harangues, and panegyrics . . . that were it not for that fraternal love ingrafted in them from their infancy, they would be in danger of raising their emulation to too great a height" (p. 187).

The Severambians betray the same human frailty:

Ils sont fort amoureux des louanges, et lorsque quelqu' un de leurs Magistrats les loue de s'être bien acquitez de leur devoir, ou d'avoir fait quelque action genereuse, ils en sont plus contens que nous ne le sommes quand on nous fait de riches presens (II, 5-6).

We are told at great length how the authorities in Mezzorandia, through education and supervision, corrected a dangerous propensity to amorosness on the part of its young people. Of the Severambians we hear that les vices où ils sont naturellement les plus inclins, sont l'amour et la vengeance; mais les Loix remédient aux excès du premier, en ordonnant le Mariage à la jeunesse dès qu'elle est capable de cette passion; et pour l'autre, leur éducation la corrige beaucoup (II, 9).

Despite this similarity in external, or mechanical features, the two utopias differ radically in spirit. Vairasse's system brings to a culmination the rationalizing drift of utopian theory which dates from the beginning of the seventeenth century. No touch of poetry or generous idealism animates it. Though its citizens are said to be virtuous and happy, we cannot help feeling that theirs is a mere prudential virtue and a very unspiritual happiness. Of the nobler impulses of human nature Vairasse seems to have had little conception. The loftiest moral precept inculcated is that of temperance. The whole of life is left to the direction of a cold, passionless logic suggestive of Bentham and Mill.

The question which is likely to persist with most readers of Gaudentio di Lucca is, whether it was intended to serve some ulterior purpose, and, if so, what that purpose was? Professor Saintsbury thought he detected a suggestion of "key" about the book, whereas the correspondent of the Gentlemen's Magazine asserted that it was "written for amusement in a fit of the gout." But this correspondent, who gives no authority for his statement, was writing forty-eight years after the first appearance of Gaudentio and thirty years after Simon Berington was laid in his grave. As regards the philosophical and theological ideas advanced by the author, the intention is pretty clear. The strength of his naturalistic arguments is not to be taken as indicating a sympathetic attitude toward the "wretched people who call themselves deists" (p. 260). The episode of the mongrel Englishman who practised the theoretical morality of Hobbes and Mandeville shows his true feelings in this respect.<sup>18</sup> He chose, rather, the familiar strategy of turning the deists' arguments against themselves by setting up the "analogy" between natural and revealed religion.

There is reason for believing, however, that Gaudentio di Lucca was intended to serve a cause much nearer the author's heart than that of controverting the arguments of deism. The whole work is the apotheosis of the patriarchal theory of government, along with the corollary principle of strict primogeniture and the proposition that the state is but the family on a vastly greater scale. This view of the origin of civil government once found general favor, especially among writers within the canonical fold. Thus Chrysostom held that "the descent of all men from Adam signifies their subordination to one sovereign." It was upon this view, of course, that the theory of the divine origin and sanction of monarchical authority rested. In practice it involved the maintenance of the strictest line of primogenitary descent from the earliest historically authentic king, who was supposed to inherit directly through Noah from Adam. "It was assumed," Hallam says,—<sup>19</sup> that a patriarchal authority had been transferred by primogeniture to the heir-general of the human race; so that kingdoms were but enlarged families; and an indefeasible right of monarchy was attached to their natural chief, which, in consequence of the impossibility of discovering him, devolved upon the representative of the first sovereign who could be historically proved to have ruled over any nation.

In England this theory was much in favor among the adherents of the house of Stuart. The argument began to be vigorously asserted early in the reign of James I, and was never abandoned, at least by that section of Jacobite opinion which had its direct affiliations with the church. The nature and scope of the argument thus adduced is strikingly illustrated in the title of a book which appeared in 1604:

<sup>18</sup> See Gaud., pp. 251 ff.

<sup>19</sup> Introduction to the Literature of Europe, III, 158.

The Genealogy of the High and Mighty Monarch, James, By the Grace of God, King of Great Brittain, etc., with his lineal descent from Noah by divers direct lynes to Brutus, first Inhabitant of this Ile of Brittain, and from him to Cadwalader, the last King of the Brittish blood; and from thence, sundry wayes to his Majesty. . . . Where also is handled the worthy descent of his Magesties ancestour, Owen Tudyr, and his affinity with most of the greatest Princes of Christendome. . . . Gathered by George Owen Harry, Parson of Whitcherch in Kemeis.

It will be recalled that the earliest known work of Simon Berington is an encomiastic poem, "To His Most Excellent Majesty, James III, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith," etc. There is no evidence to show that the ardor of this youthful attachment to the house of Stuart cooled with age, though the return of the author to England some years later may have suggested more discretion in its open avowal. Of the twenty-four titles of Berington's surviving work, all suggest the seriousness of his mind and practically all show conclusively that they were dictated by the zeal of the faithful servant of the church. It is difficult to believe that Gaudentio di Lucca is nothing more than the diversion of a period of enforced idleness. More probably, it was intended to serve the cause which was permanently lost, eight years after its first appearance, in the abortive efforts of Charles Edward to regain the throne of his fathers.

LEE MONROE ELLISON

Texas State College for Women

BURNS AND THE SMUGGLER ROSAMOND*

THE good ship Rosamond first appeared in an account of Burns's life in the spring of 1828, when Constable & Co. issued a Life of Robert Burns, by J. G. Lockhart, LL.B., as Volume XXIII of their Miscellany of Original and Selected Publications. Inevitably Lockhart had based his biography upon Dr. Currie's, which since its appearance in 1800 had run through many editions, and had carried Burns's fame to virtually all parts of the English-speaking world. But Lockhart, working under the eye of his distinguished father-in-law,<sup>1</sup> was not content merely to rehash old material. Though modestly stating that his purpose was "no more than to compress, within the limits of a single small volume, the substance of materials already open to all the world,"<sup>2</sup> he admitted that "little touches of novelty"<sup>3</sup> might be discovered in his narrative, particularly in the chapters dealing with Burns's later years. Robert Chambers, whom Lockhart characterized as a "diligent local antiquary of Edinburgh, to whom I owe many obligations,"<sup>4</sup> had passed on to the biographer whatever he had gleaned from conversation with Burns's surviving acquaintances; William M'Diarmid, editor of the Dumfries Courier, had supplied other "particulars";<sup>5</sup> Allan Cunningham, who shared with James Hogg the honor of Lockhart's dedication, was the authority for still more new matter;<sup>6</sup> various unpublished journals and letters were also laid under contribution.<sup>7</sup> The total result was a picture of Burns recognizably like Dr. Currie's, but tricked out with such a wealth of anecdotal novelty that the subscribers to Constable's Miscellany must have been well aware that here in truth was an "original" and not merely a "selected" publication. And in this original publication everything concerning the Rosamond was new.

The merits of Lockhart's biography as a whole I do not propose to discuss. As the publishers of the Bohn reprint said in 1882, it was "a graceful treatment of his subject";<sup>8</sup> perhaps the adjective may be * My thanks are due to Dr. Henry W. Meikle, Librarian of the National Library of Scotland, for courteous assistance in the preparation of this article, and to John Dunlop, Esq., of the Mitchell Library, Glasgow, for a large-scale map of the Firth of Solway, based upon surveys made shortly after the capture of the smuggler.

<sup>1</sup> According to Dr. H. W. Meikle, unpublished letters in the National Library of Scotland make it clear that Scott watched Lockhart's work with interest. See Burns Chronicle for 1934, p. 46.

<sup>2</sup> Op. cit., p. vi f.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., p. vii.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., p. 109, n.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid., p. 184, n.

<sup>6</sup> E.g., ibid., p. 230.

<sup>7</sup> Op. cit., passim.

<sup>8</sup> Op. cit. (New York, 1892), p. v.

allowed to stand unchallenged. The story of the Rosamond, however, I shall examine in some detail, with the hope of throwing a little new light upon the career of a poet whose excise duties once brought him under the fire of a well-armed crew of twenty-four smugglers. But first, a brief account of what one may call the history of the legend.

I begin with Lockhart's original version:

At that period [1792] a great deal of contraband traffic, chiefly from the Isle of Man, was going on along the coasts of Galloway and Ayrshire, and the whole of the revenue officers from Gttna to Dumfries, were placed under the orders of a superintendent residing in Annan, who exerted himself zealously in intercepting the descent of the smuggling vessels. On the 27th of February, a suspicious-looking brig was discovered in the Solway Frith, and Burns was one of the party whom the superintendent conducted to watch her motions. She got into shallow water the day afterwards, and the officers were enabled to discover that her crew were numerous, armed, and not likely to yield without a struggle. Lewars, a brother exciseman, an intimate friend of our poet, was accordingly sent to Dumfries for a guard of dragoons; the superintendent, Mr. Crawford, proceeded himself on a similar errand to Ecclefechan, and Burns was left with some men under his orders, to watch the brig, and prevent landing or escape. From the private journal of one of the excisemen, (now in my hands,) it appears that Burns manifested considerable impatience while thus occupied, being left for many hours in a wet salt-marsh, with a force which he knew to be inadequate for the purpose it was meant to fulfil. One of his comrades hearing him abuse his friend Lewars in particular, for being slow about his journey, the man answered, that he also wished the devil had him for his pains, and that Burns, in the meantime, would do well to indite a song upon the sluggard: Burns said nothing; but after taking a few strides by himself among the reeds and shingle, rejoined his party, and chanted to them the well-known ditty, The Deil's run awa' wi' the Exciseman. Lewars arrived shortly afterwards with his dragoons; and Burns, putting himself at their head, waded, sword in hand, to the brig, and was the first to board her. The crew lost heart, and submitted, though their numbers were greater than those of the assailing force. The vessel was condemned, and, with all her arms and stores, sold by auction next day at Dumfries: upon which occasion, Burns, whose behaviour had been highly commended, thought fit to purchase four carronades, by way of trophy. But his glee went a step farther;—he sent the guns, with a letter, to the French Convention, requesting that body to accept of them as a mark of his admiration and respect. The present, and its accompaniment, were intercepted at the custom-house at Dover; and here, there appears to be little room to doubt, was the principal circumstance that drew on Burns the notice of his jealous superiors.<sup>9</sup>

Thus the tale in its original form—a curious mixture of truth and demonstrable untruth, blended with an indefinite amount of what at present cannot be certainly accepted or rejected.

<sup>9</sup> Op. cit., p. 218 f.

Six years after Lockhart had thus given publicity to the anecdote of Burns and the Rosamond, Allan Cunningham published his life of Burns, and cast the first shadow of doubt on the most picturesque feature of Lockhart's story:

That the smuggler was captured chiefly by the bravery of Burns I have been often told; but I never heard it added that he purchased her guns and sent them to the Directory.<sup>10</sup>

Despite Cunningham's scepticism, the story seems to have been accepted readily enough in all its details. It gave a romantic account of the origin of "The Deil's Awa'"; it explained plausibly—though falsely—Burns's subsequent trouble with the Excise Board; it showed the poet in a dashing rôle in which his admirers were glad to see him. And no one appears to have pressed Lockhart for the documentary evidence underlying his story.

But when Robert Chambers, in 1851-53, published the first life of Burns that made any effective attempt to go behind Currie's returns, he set forth what he knew about Lockhart's possible sources. There were, according to Chambers, who quoted Joseph Train—antiquary, and after 1825 Supervisor of Excise in Castle Douglas—three important documents concerning the Rosamond episode: (1) a journal by Crawford, Excise officer; (2) "an account of the seizure and sale of the vessel by Burns himself"; and (3) an account by John Lewars narrating Burns's purchase of the carronades, and his subsequent sending of them to "the French Convention."<sup>11</sup> Apparently, however, Chambers had actually seen none of these manuscripts. He appears to have taken Train's word for their existence.

This was still the situation in 1896, when William Wallace brought out his thorough-going revision of Chambers. After retelling the story in Lockhart's words, he added a note that "Unfortunately the documents vouched for by [Train] have not been recovered."<sup>12</sup> But it is clear that he gave full credence to Lockhart's story.

Despite this general acceptance of at least the major outlines of Lockhart's picturesque addition to the growing store of Burns anecdotes, one Scottish scholar remained stubbornly unconvinced. In 1877 William Scott Douglas, in his notable Edinburgh edition of Burns's prose and verse, put the matter thus, in a footnote to "The Deil's Awa'":

<sup>10</sup> Allan Cunningham, The Works of Robert Burns; with his life (London, 1834), I, 284.

<sup>11</sup> Robert Chambers, The Life and Works of Robert Burns (N. Y., 1851-53), III, 225.

<sup>12</sup> The Life and Works of Robert Burns, edited by Robert Chambers, revised by William Wallace (4 vols., Edinburgh, 1896), III, 317, n.

Lockhart has furnished an anecdote, by way of explaining the origin of this song, which is romantic enough, if true. . . . We believe, however, that Lockhart's statement . . . is purely fanciful.<sup>13</sup>

Five years later, when Scott Douglas edited Lockhart's life of Burns for the Bohn Library, he was even more outspoken, and virtually laid the entire matter at the door of Joseph Train:

It is to be hoped, he wrote in a vein of irony, that this "private journal" and relative productions in support of so incredible a story are still in existence at Abbotsford.<sup>14</sup>

In the absence of any confirmatory documents, this queer story depends on the ipse dixit of Mr. Train. . . . The man who could, for Sir Walter's delectation, manufacture so plausible a myth about "Mollance Meg" [Meg Merrilies], would have no difficulty in fabricating the story of Burns's "four carronades."<sup>15</sup>

In 1919 Professor Hans Hecht summed up the situation clearly when he wrote, in his admirable biography of Burns:

Die ganze Episode ist dokumentarisch nicht genügend beglaubigt, gehört aber zum eisernen Bestand des Kanons der Burnsanekdoten.<sup>16</sup>

Burns's most recent biographer followed the lead of Scott Douglas. Knowing that Burns's own account of the origin of "The Deil's Awa' " was utterly at variance with Lockhart's, detecting a certain inherent improbability in the story of a brig captured by cavalymen, aware of the fact that both Lockhart and Train were imaginatively inclined, and skeptical of the whole affair because none of the documents seemed to be in existence and because Burns himself had never alluded to it in his extant correspondence, this writer came to the summary conclusion that "The brig Rosamond affair should be absolutely deleted from any account of Burns's life."<sup>17</sup> With this broadside he undertook to blow the ghostly smuggler out of her uneasy berth in the Solway.

Here the matter might have rested had not the present owner of Abbotsford, Sir Walter Maxwell-Scott, Bart., recently transferred to the National Library of Scotland a large body of manuscripts, now designated as the Abbotsford Collection, which for virtually a century had been stored in Sir Walter's library. In the process of cataloguing these papers—unpublished letters, account books concerning Scott's financial troubles, and many miscellaneous documents—the librarian of the National Library, Dr. Henry W. Meikle, discovered three manuscripts dealing with a schooner Rosamond that had been seized as a smuggler

<sup>13</sup> Op. cit., III, 76 f., n.

<sup>14</sup> Op. cit., p. 228, n. (New York, 1892).

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., p. 230, n.

<sup>16</sup> Hans Hecht, Robert Burns (Heidelberg, 1919), p. 274.

<sup>17</sup> F. B. Snyder, The Life of Robert Burns (New York, 1932), p. 397.

in February, 1792. Here was a day-by-day journal of Walter Crawford, Excise officer, containing his version of the affair. Here were two large sheets in Burns's handwriting, setting forth the expenses incurred on behalf of the Crown in repairing, guarding, and laying-up the vessel; and here, attached to a formal notice of her sale, was a clerk's inventory of her sails, spars, rigging, and furnishings, and a brief summary of the amounts realized at the auction. In other words, here were two of the three documents which Joseph Train had cited as authority for the whole story, but which had been hidden from sight till the approach of the Scott Centenary made it seem worth while to examine the miscellanea on Sir Walter's well-stocked shelves.

Thereupon Dr. Meikle, in an article in the Glasgow Herald, described the various papers, reconstructed the history of the legend, tagged Burns's most recent biographer as a "sceptical dogmatist," and concluded that "the Rosamond affair can no longer be 'absolutely deleted from any account of Burns's life'."<sup>18</sup> The result of this genial reproof from Dr. Meikle was a visit to the National Library in Edinburgh, where the documents in question were placed at my disposal, and arrangements made for having them photostated. Thus at long last it becomes possible to tell the story of this much-discussed incident.

The episode took place in the Solway Firth, in the late winter of 1792, not far from the mouth of the river Annan, or Annan Waterfoot. Turn a boot upside down, hold it in front of you, toe to the right, and you have a crude representation of these upper reaches of the Solway. Just above the heel to the left is Dumfries; Sarkfoot, seaport for Gretna, is at the toe twenty miles to the right. Midway between the two—roughly speaking—is Annan Waterfoot, from where the low-lying coast of Cumberland is but two miles to the south, across the narrowest part of the Firth. When the tide is high, the intervening space will be full of water—shallow, but navigable by one who possesses local knowledge. At the ebb, however, long stretches of sand reach outwards from both shores, and leave only a shifting and narrow channel, bordered by patches of quicksand, to separate English soil from Scottish. But it is during the first hours of the flood, when the waters of the Irish Sea crowd themselves back into the narrow estuary, that the Firth is at once most picturesque and most dangerous. Sir Walter himself says in Redgauntlet:

He that dreams on the bed of the Solway may wake in the next world. . . . For the tide advances with such rapidity upon these fatal sands, that well-mounted horsemen lay aside hopes of safety if they see its white surge advancing while they are yet at a distance from the bank.<sup>19</sup>

<sup>18</sup> Glasgow Herald, November 11, 1932. Dr. Meikle's article, somewhat amplified, appears also in the Burns Chronicle for 1934, pp. 43 ff.

There is a certain dramatic exaggeration in this statement of Scott's, for only under exceptional circumstances does the tide come in as a bore. But always the currents are swift and baffling, and what was an open channel one month may be blocked with silt the next. All in all, then, it was an ideal spot for a smuggler's operations, this northeast arm of the Solway. Navigation was hazardous, and His Majesty's cutters were sure to remain well out to sea. England lay close aboard on one hand, and Scotland on the other; it was not probable that both shores would be thoroughly patrolled at the same time. Furthermore, the populace along the coast was friendly to smugglers, and could be counted on for assistance in case of need—a fact which Burns and his companions were to discover.

When the Rosamond undertook to land her contraband cargo,<sup>20</sup> and probably to carry away a shipment of local products that had escaped the Exciseman's prying eyes, the official charged with enforcing Scottish Excise law along the northern coast of the Solway was Collector John Mitchell, head of the Dumfries District. Strictly speaking, he was not concerned with foreign articles that might be smuggled into Scotland; they were the responsibility of the Customs, not the Excise. But actually the two services overlapped, and in times of emergency each assisted the other. Next in rank below Mitchell was Supervisor Alexander Findlater, one of Burns's intimate friends. Reporting to him was a field-force of twelve officers, one of whom was Burns, in charge of the Dumfries Third Division.<sup>21</sup> (Incidentally, this Third Division was one of the best assignments in Mitchell's district. The poet was no longer required to keep a horse and ride his two hundred miles each week; his concern was chiefly with tobacco; only occasionally need he go far from home.) On the thirteenth of January, 1792, a newcomer joined Mitchell's official family: Walter Crawford, or Crawford, as he spelled it in his legible boyish hand on the first page of his Journal. Where he came from there is no evidence. But since he was still a "riding officer," as the heading of his journal proves, he was probably young in the service, and Mitchell sent him to Annan, where he was to find lodgings, and to learn his duties under the tutelage of William Craig, officer in charge of the Annan division.<sup>22</sup> Like all Excisemen, he was to keep a diary, setting down from day to day the time spent on His Majesty's service, and the nature of the work on which he was engaged.

<sup>19</sup> Op. cit. (London: Adams & Charles Black, 1897), p. 25.

<sup>20</sup> Of what sort, the records fail to show.

<sup>21</sup> John Sinton, Burns, Excise Officer and Poet (Kilmarnock, n.d.), p. 47.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid.

It is an interesting document, this rediscovered record of Walter Crawford's excise activity. To read it is to realize that a "riding officer's" position was no sinecure, and that Crawford himself was a young man of considerable initiative and daring. From January 12 to February 29, 1792, we can follow him on his tours of duty. Then his manuscript comes to an abrupt end, torn across, apparently, by someone who discarded everything that followed Crawford's vivid story of the capture of the Rosamond. By way of introduction to this account, I quote certain of his earlier entries:

January 12th Arrived at Dumfries.

13th Waited on the Collector for his directions.

14 Sunday. [Ordinarily a day of rest, when smugglers and their friends could work unmolested.]

17 M10<sup>23</sup> Went with Mr. Craig offr of Annan D. To learn more of the Country—Retd E7

18 E5<sup>24</sup> Rode out to Learn more of hie roads.

On the nineteenth Crawford had a taste of more arduous labor:

Jany 19 M2 out all night by the foote of the river Annan.

Next day he was off on a generously long trip:

20 M4 Having gone out 19 E9 Rode by Ecclefechan and Gratna

On the twenty-first we read:

21 Noon Gone to Dumfries to inform the Supervisor of a Lugger called the Spider being expected to Land the Beginning of next week.

Thus forewarned, Crawford began a week of strenuous patrolling. Typical entries are:

24 M5 Been out all the night at the usuale place of Landing saw nothing 26 M3 went dun the road by Gratna & ret. by the shore—with me two Dragoons.

Next day Crawford learned of the Spider's untimely end:

27 M5 out all night by Annan Wattir fott—Saw nothing—but learned that the Spider Cutter was taken at Sea—By Mr. McConnochie in the Service of the Customs

With the Spider thus safely in the web, Crawford gave up his emergency service as coast guard and resumed his more normal activity. We find him at Langholme consulting with "the Langholme officer which are the most likly roads for intercepting goods going to England," and at Dumfries to "Concert miswers for mutuale assistance" with McCon-nochie of the Customs Service. Before long, however, he was back on the coast, keeping all-night vigils with a military patrol to support him:

<sup>23</sup> Ten o'clock in the morning.

<sup>24</sup> Five o'clock in the evening.

11 M4 Been out on the East Coast with four Dragoons

21 M3 out all night watching about Brewhouses the general place of landing smuggled goods

25 M5 on the Bye roads on the east Shore with four Dragoons—saw nothing.

The following afternoon, however, brought news which sent Crawford post-haste to Dumfries, even though the day was Sunday. Apparently the square topsails of the Rosamond had been seen in the Solway, and the information had reached Crawford:

26 E4 Gone to Dumfries to acquaint the supervisor and officers that a landing was expected that Week—In the mean time having left a person in whom I could thoroughly confide to ride Express to me on the first appearance of a Landing for which he was deligently to watch—

27 E11 My Express arrived informing me that a Landing was making or about to be made, on which I set off with Mr Lewars directly, leaving Messrs. Burns Penn & Ranking to follow as fast as possible—<sup>25</sup>

From this time until the vessel was finally captured Crawford moved with rapidity and decision:

By the 28 M5 arrived at Annan and immediately sett out with the party of Dragoons—Searched Mr McDowalls and most of the Smuglers house between that and the Shore—and about Noon Rode down to the Shore where I was informed that the Vessal could not get off for want of watter—I made an attempt to Board her with the Millitary But when wee offered to appoch her they hailed us that they would fire on us if wee appoched any farther—As my Party had only Pistols and were but few in number and a great number of men appearing to be on Deck I stoped the Soldiery and riding up to the Vessal allone asked liberty to Come on board which after some altercation they granted—I Boarded her & found Twenty four men under arms with fifteen round of Shott each.—I returned to shore, and consulting with the officers and Millitary wee agreed that greater force would be absolutely necessary—In consequence of which Mr Lewais sett off for Dumfries to bring Twenty four more Dragoons while I went to Ecclefechan for the Party there with which I patrolled the roads till the arrival of Mr Lewars with the additional force from Dumfries

On the 29 M9 wee approached the Vessal with the following force, Dragoons from Dumfries Twenty Three Annan thirteen Ecclefechan Eight in all forty four fully accoutered and on horse-back. The vessal having fallen down the Sollway firth abouth a mill from where she was yesterday and being about a mile within sea mark most of which space being covered with watter, and a very heavy Currant running between us and the Vessel we deemed it impossible to get at her either on foot or on horse-back so we agreed to Search the coast for Boats in which to board her—but the Country People guessing our design got the start of us and staved every Boat on the Coast before we Could reach them, the vessel in the mean time keeping up a fire of grape Shott and musquetry—we resolved as last resource to attempt the passage on foote as the quick sands made the ridding on horseback dangerous, or iather impossible—We drew up the Millitary in three divisions determined to approach her & attact her if the stream was foardable—one party fore and [one] aft and the Third on her Broad-side The first party being Commanded by Quarter Master Manly, the second by my self and the Third led by Mr Burns—

<sup>25</sup> Horses had to be hired for four officers, as Burns's accounts make clear. Crawford was probably riding his own.

Our orders to the millitary were to reserve there fire till within eight yards of the vessel then to pour a volly and board her with sword & Pistol—The Vessel kept on firing thou without any damage to us, as from the situation of the ship they could not bring their great Guns to bear on us, we in the mean time wading breast high, and in Justice to the party under my Command I must say with great alacrity; by the time we were within one hundred yards of the Vessel the Crew gave up the cause gott over side towards England which shore was for a long long way dry sand. As I still supposed that these were only Country people they were putting ashore and that the Crew were keeping under Cover to make a more vigorous immediate resistance, we marched up as first concerted—but found the vessel compleately evaucuated both of the Crew and every movable on board except as pr inventory, the Smugglers as their last instance of vengence having poured a six-pounder Carronade through her Broadside—She proved to be the Roseomond of Plymouth Alexander Patty Master and about one hundred tons burthen Schooner r[igged]—

At this point Crawford's journal comes to an abrupt end, and its author is heard of no more. That he proved a competent officer there can be little doubt, for during the seven weeks in which we can follow him, he did his duty admirably. And his story of the Rosamond is complete enough so that the reader has no difficulty in reconstructing the major features of the episode. In her haste to unload her cargo the schooner took the ground probably on February 27, on the Scottish side of the Firth not far from the village of Brewhouses. Next day Crawford boarded her alone, and, learning the size of her crew, promptly sent for reinforcements. By February 29, when he was ready to seize her, she had worked clear of the sand, moved about a mile down the Solway, and again run aground, probably at high tide, and certainly on the English side of the channel. Here her crew abandoned her to the officers of the law, her career as a smuggler came to an end, and Robert Burns took charge of her for the Crown. It is to Burns himself that we turn for the rest of the story.

If Burns left a journal-record of his activity, it does not appear to have survived; but two large pages from his pen show how he was engaged in repairing the vessel, guarding her, and keeping her pumped out till a high spring-tide should float her, and ultimately sailing her to Kelton, just below Dumfries on the Nith, where she was dismantled and laid up.

His first two entries prove that the crew had done a reasonably thorough wrecking-job before seeking safety in England:

To materials for repairs . . . . . [£] 3.8
To two Carpenters empl. 11 days, & four Seamen empl. nine days . . . . [£] 8.18

Appended to this is an explanatory note, for the information of superiors who might question his expenditures:

N B before the Smugglers quitted the vessel, they poured a carronade down through her broadside; besides, the incessant rains brought down such a land flood that strained her in all parts & started many of her timbers, & pooled the sand so much from below her side that it was with the utmost difficulty & all the exertion of every one aboard at the pump, &c, that she was kept from filling at the hatchways—untill a spring-tide should come, which alone could float her.

Apparently the grounded schooner had such a list that she was in danger of being completely inundated by each ordinary flood. Burns and his helpers had to make her as tight as possible, stand by the pump, and hope that the full moon would bring a tide that would lift the Rosamond free from the sand, and not merely swamp her.

Burns's next entry gives a definite clew to the location of the vessel when she was captured:

To a Pilot from Brewhouses to Annan-waterfoot & from thence to Kelton where the vessel was laid up. . . . . [£] 3.3.0

The hamlet of Brewhouses—or Browhouses—was, and is, a village in Gretna Parish, five miles east of the mouth of the river Annan. Not far from here the Rosamond met her fate, caught in the sand as her crew tried in vain to work her down a narrow channel to the open water west of Annan.<sup>26</sup> Next Burns records the expenditure of £17-10 for maintainance for the fishermen, seamen, Carpenters, & sixteen dragoons, before she floated out of the firth; besides always one, & often two, Excise Offrs. aboard.

Why sixteen dragoons had to be "maintained" on board a captured vessel, hard aground, seemed also to require explanation:

N.B. the vessel, to those that knew the ground, was easily approachable on foot every ebb, & we had the best reason to believe that a deforcement of the vessel was intended & & determined on.

<sup>26</sup> Dr. H. W. Meikle points out, in the Burns Chronicle for 1934, p. 43, that the Edinburgh Evening Courant of Thursday, March 8, 1792, says the smuggler was seized at Sarkfoot, a short distance east of Brewhouses.

A subsequent entry shows that Burns paid each of his sea-going dragoons a bonus of a shilling a day, "they having wrought very hard at the pump, &c. 16 for nine days, & 8 for 2 days."

In this notation one finds the clue to the date on which the Rosamond "floated out of the firth." If the dragoons were set to work at the pump on February 29, the day the vessel was captured, and kept busy for nine days, the conclusion seems justified that on March 9 the hoped-for spring tide may have come to lift the schooner from her precarious berth. The Hydrographic Office of the United States Navy, called upon for aid through the courtesy of Captain Guy Davis, U. S. N., Professor of Naval Science and Tactics at Northwestern University, tells me that the moon was full on March 9, 1792, and that about noon on that day a spring tide in the Solway might have reached the height of some twenty-eight feet. Hence one may fairly assume that March 9 brought relief from the danger of "filling at the hatchways," and that Burns paid off his dragoons because his prize was at last afloat, and there was no longer need of their aid on the pump-brakes.

In charge of a pilot, the Rosamond sailed west from Brewhouses to Annan Waterfoot, thence west again to the mouth of the Nith, and up the Nith to Kelton, where she was dismantled, and her equipment stored in a warehouse which Burns rented for two guineas. Even then there was still cause for worry. The schooner's "long boat," "of about four tons burden" according to the inventory, and too large to be warehoused at Kelton, was a prize to be guarded with care. So Burns sent the boat still further up the river to Dumfries, where it would be safe under lock and key. This precaution cost His Majesty 19 shillings—an expense which Burns justified with the note: "there being reason to fear that the Smugglers would attempt to steal her." Next Burns paid a guinea for having his prize appraised; invested one pound two shillings in advertising the sale in Edinburgh, Dumfries, and Whitehaven newspapers; and was out of pocket sixteen shillings petty cash for "expenses at sale."

This sale, a "publick roup" held "in the coffee house at Dumfries," took place at six o'clock in the afternoon of Thursday, April 19, and brought in a total of £166-16-6, of which £68-0-0 is noted as being a "Premium." The inventory prepared for this sale shows that the Rosamond had been admirably equipped and well-found. She carried the relatively new American schooner rig for working her way through narrow thoroughfares, and also crossed square topsails and stu'nails—useful in running with the wind. The clerk who inventoried her for the auction let little escape him: one finds the cook's pot, two lanterns, four spare dead-eyes, and one fish-hook, carefully listed. No hint appears, however, as to what her contraband cargo may have been. It had been safely unloaded, as Crawford made clear, before the law took control. But obviously Captain Alexander Patty of Plymouth had been prepared to give a good account of himself in defence of his lading. The final item in the inventory reads as follows:

Four four pounders Carronade Guns mounted on Carriages with tackle and furniture compleat. Round, Case,<sup>27</sup> doubleheaded & Grape shot, &c &c &c

Had the Rosamond remained on an even keel when she grounded, and Patty been able to bring these guns to bear on Burns's attacking force, the story might have ended differently. But Fate was against this Devonshire mariner, and after burning a quantity of powder without injury to any one, he followed his crew across the sands to England, and to oblivion.

And what, in conclusion, can one say of Lockhart's statement that Burns purchased the four carronades and sent them to France? Evidence on the matter is entirely lacking. All we know is that thirty-three hundred-weight of "guns" were sold at the auction, and brought in £4-2-6; but the summary of the sale gives no clue to the purchaser. It is clear that Lockhart did not follow accurately the record which Crawford had left behind him, and which Joseph Train probably found in the files of the Dumfries Excise office. Perhaps Lockhart invented the story of Burns and the carronades, as artistic embroidery on an otherwise matter-of-fact anecdote. Perhaps a century from now some one will pry further into the store-rooms at Abbotsford and discover the missing document, in Lewars's handwriting. But the story of Burns and the Rosamond is complete without any further additions. For some seven weeks—from February 28 to April 19—Burns had found relief from the routine of his lack-lustre official life at Dumfries, and had played a leading part in what must have seemed to him a glorious adventure. When it was ended, the bills paid, and the last account verified, he went back to Dumfries, where Jean Armour was teaching her sixth child to walk, and where—possibly, at least—pretty Anne Park, "Anna wi' the gowden locks," in the Globe Inn, had just seen her daughter Elizabeth safely through the first year of babyhood. There was Maria Riddell, too, at Woodley Park, outside the town—already growing a little tired of the husband whom she had impetuously married in the West Indies. Is there any wonder that a poet forgot to tell precisely what happened to those four guns?

FRANKLYN BLISS SNYDER

Northwestern University

<sup>27</sup> ? barr.

XXXIV

RITSON'S LIFE OF ROBIN HOOD

JOSEPH RITSON'S antiquarian interest was of early inception. From his school days in Stockton, he had been interested in history, old songs, and ballads.<sup>1</sup> This interest continued throughout his life. It resulted in a series of publications ranging from the history of certain legal offices, through British topography and royal geneology, to old English and Scottish songs and ballads. In all this work he was careful to use the oldest manuscripts and sources he could find: he showed amazing diligence in searching out original documents. His editing was in accord with modern practice: it did not suffer from the misleading procedure of such editors as Percy. He was extremely critical of the treatment of texts by his contemporaries, and justly deserves to be called the watchdog of English scholarship.<sup>2</sup>

The Life of Robin Hood and the Notes and Illustrations, which serve as a preface to his edition of the Robin Hood ballads in 1795,<sup>3</sup> are of particular interest for the light they throw upon his critical faculty. The Life and Notes show us Ritson's method, its excellences and defects, and illustrate the weakness of the man as a critic.

The Life of Robin Hood is a short preface of some eleven pages, to which are subjoined some 105 pages of Notes and Illustrations. In the beginning of the Life, Ritson promises little more than to bring together the "scattered fragments" mentioned by Sir John Hawkins, of which Sir John, in A General History of the Science and Practice of Music (London, 1776), gives only "two or three trite and trivial extracts, with which everyone, at all curious about the subject, was as well acquainted as himself."<sup>4</sup> According to Ritson, Robin Hood was born at Locksley, in Nottinghamshire, about 1160. Of noble extraction, his true name was Robert Fitzooth: he was frequently styled Earl of Huntingdon, a title to which in his later years he actually had some pretension. Having rioted away his patrimony in his youth, he sought asylum in the woods of northern England, where he was soon joined by a number of persons in similar circumstances. His favorites were Little John, William Scadlock (or Scarlet) George a Green, Much, Friar Tuck, and Marian. His <sup>1</sup> Henry Alfred Burd, Joseph Ritson, A Critical Biography. University of Illinois Studies in Language and Literature (Urbana, 1916), II, No. 3, p. 15.

<sup>2</sup> See Burd for a general critical study of Ritson's work as a whole, and Annette B. Hopkins, "Ritson's Life of King Arthur," PMLA, XLIII (March, 1928), 251-287.

<sup>3</sup> Robin Hood: a collection of all the ancient Poems, Songs, and Ballads, now extant, relative to that celebrated English Outlaw: to which are prefixed Historical Anecdotes of his Life, London, 1795, 2 vols.

<sup>4</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, iv.

company consisted of one hundred men, all skilled at fighting and archery. In the woods of Barnsdale and Sherwood, Robin Hood reigned as an independent sovereign, at perpetual war with the king of England and all his subjects, except the poor, the needy, and the oppressed. This band lived on the royal deer and the proceeds of their robberies. The Abbot of St. Mary's in York and the Sheriff of Nottingham were the chief objects of his detestation and attacks. Yet withal Robin Hood was a pious man. In his old age he became ill and applied to his kinswoman, the prioress of Kirkleys nunnery in Yorkshire, for aid. She treacherously let him bleed to death on November 12, 1247, at the age of eighty-seven.

The foregoing is in brief Ritson's account of the life and death of Robin Hood. The Notes and Illustrations, which follow the Life, give his sources. The Notes are full of references to all kinds of books, manuscripts, and authorities. The facts of Robin Hood's birth Ritson obtains from Sloane MS. 715, and he quotes in support of this source: Fuller's Worthies of England, Major's Britanniae Historia, Stow's Annales, Harleian MS. 1233, Fordun's Scotichronicon, Boece's History of Scotland, Lionel Charlton's History of Whitby, and Munday's and Chettle's two plays, The Downfall of Robert, earle of Huntington and The Death of Robert, earle of Huntington. It is illuminating to note the assurance with which Ritson cites these authorities. The Sloane MS. Ritson admits to be of the sixteenth century; few of his other authorities are earlier; yet not for a moment does he hesitate over their verity. He takes whatever will support his theory, and quite guilelessly asks us to believe whomever he chooses. Thus:<sup>5</sup>

A modern writer, (History of Whitby, by Lionel Charlton, York, 1779, 4to) though of no authority in this point, has done well enough to speak of him as living "in the days of abbot Richard and Peter his successor"; that is, between the years 1176 and 1211.

Although Charlton cannot be relied upon as an authority, Ritson nevertheless quotes him in support of his own theory.

If this were the only instance of a failure of critical acumen we might pass over it lightly. Unfortunately such is not the case, for immediately after the foregoing quotation appears this statement:<sup>6</sup>

The author of the two plays upon the story of our hero [Munday's and Chettle's plays, supra], of which a particular account will be hereafter given, makes him contemporary with king Richard, who, as well as his brother prince John, is introduced upon the scene; which is confirmed by another play, quoted in Note (D). . . . We must not therefore regard what is said by such writers as the author of "George a Greene, the pinner of Wakefield," 1599 (see note G) who represents our hero as contemporary with king Edward IV.

<sup>5</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xvi.

<sup>6</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xvi-xvii.

This is quite illogical and is an example of Ritson's lack of critical judgment. Munday's and Chettle's plays and George a Greene were written about the same time. The latter is at least based upon the ballad of Robin Hood and the pinder of Wakefield,<sup>7</sup> yet Ritson ignores it, because it does not fit into his scheme, he gives no other explanation.

The Sloane MS. gives Robin Hood's birthplace as Locksley in Yorkshire, or in Nottinghamshire. Ritson is surprised at the ignorance of the writer, who had only to consult the ballads to find that the birthplace was "Locksly town" in Nottinghamshire. Ritson is indiscriminate in his choice of authorities; here he relies on the ballads for "facts" in support of his thesis. He is frank enough to say that he has investigated several works on village names, and Locksley in Nottinghamshire is not to be found.<sup>8</sup> Although the nonexistence of a place is not conclusively proved by the fact that the name is not to be found, its existence at any time might well be doubted, if no one has ever heard of it.<sup>9</sup>

The claim to nobility put forth by Ritson on behalf of Robin Hood is another extraordinary performance. Despite the fact that almost all the ballads refer to Robin Hood as a yeoman, Ritson is not to be taken in. The ballads are older than some of his authorities, but they do not fit in with his preconceptions. Hence we have another tour de force on his part.<sup>10</sup>

In "an olde and auncient pamphlet," which Grafton the chronicler had seen, it was written that "This man disceded of a noble parentage." The Sloane MS. says "He was of . . . parentage"; and although the material word is illegible, the sense evidently requires noble.

Ritson relies upon Dr. Stukely's pedigree as further proof of Robin Hood's claim to the earldom of Huntingdon, although he has been kind enough to quote Parkin in opposition.<sup>11</sup>

In the list of plays centering about Robin Hood, Ritson deals at some length with two plays by Munday and Chettle. It is from them that he obtains additional authority for the nobility of Robin Hood. Of them he says:<sup>12</sup>

As they seem partly founded on traditions long since forgotten, and refer occasionally to documents not now to be found, at any rate, as they are much

<sup>7</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xxix.

<sup>8</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xv-xvi.

<sup>9</sup> Thomas Wright, Essays on subjects connected with the literature, popular superstitions, and history of England in the Middle Ages (London, 1846), II, 202.

<sup>10</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xviii.

<sup>11</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xxii.

<sup>12</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, li.

older than most of the common ballads upon the subject, and contain some curious and possibly authentic particulars not elsewhere to be met with, the reader will excuse the particularity of the account and length of the extracts.

After long quotations from these plays, Ritson says, concerning The Death of Robert, earle of Huntington:<sup>13</sup>

The next quotation may be of service to Dr. Percy, who has been pleased to question our heros nobility, because "the most ancient poems make no mention of this earldom," and the old legend expressly asserts him "to have been a yeoman." It is very true; and we shall here not only find his title established, but also discover the secret of his not being usually distinguished or designed by it.

Enter Roben Hoode.

King. How now, earle Robert!

Fri. A forfet, a forfet, my liege lord,
My masters lawes are on record,
The court-roll here your grace may see.

King. I pray thee, frier, read them mee.

Fri. One shall suffice, and this is hee.
No man that commeth in this wood,
To feast or dwell with Robin Hood,
Shall call him earle, lord, knight, or squire,
But, Robin Hood, plain Robin Hoode,
That honest YEOMAN, stout and good,
On paine of forfetting a marke . . .

Now, the reason that "the most ancient poems make no mention of this earldom," and the old legend expressly asserts him "to have been a yeoman," appears, plainly enough, to be, that as, pursuant to his own injunction, he was never called, either by his followers, or in the vicinity, by any other name than Robin Hood, so particularly the minstrels, who were always, no doubt, welcome to Sherwood, and liberally entertained by him and his yeomanry, would take special care never to offend against the above law: which puts an end to the dispute. Q.E.D.

The reference to the minstrels and their habits would be almost unbelievable were it not for Ritson's dispute with Percy about the origin of ballads and ballad singers. This astounding bit of evidence would scarcely do for a court of law, but we would not turn for persuasive proof to Sir Edward Coke's Institutes, as Ritson does elsewhere.<sup>14</sup> Ritson's critical acumen gains no additional lustre, in view of this admonition to Percy, when, in a footnote, he intimates that Stukely was to be believed, because he was "a professed antiquary, and a benefited clergyman of the church of England."<sup>15</sup> Percy, being an opponent, is not given benefit of clergy; he is guilty until proven innocent, a most unsatisfactory critical method.

<sup>13</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, lxiv-lxv.

<sup>14</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xvii.

<sup>15</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xxii.

According to Ritson, the true name of Robin Hood was Robert Fitzooth, "which vulgar pronunciation easily corrupted into Robin Hood."<sup>16</sup> This naive conclusion leads to a scornful reference to "A writer in the Gentlemen's Magazine" [lxiii (March, 1793) 226] who:<sup>17</sup> under the signature D. H. pretends that Hood is only a corruption of "o' th' wood, q.d. of Sherwood." This, to be sure, is an absurd conceit; but, if the name were a matter of conjecture, it might be probably enough referred to some particular sort of hood our hero wore by way of distinction or disguise.

While the writer who signed himself D. H. can be casually brushed aside, one writer later than Ritson must be given weight. Child supports the view of D. H. in his English and Scottish Ballads. He refers to Robin de Bois, a mythical figure in France; the correspondence in name suggests that Hood is not patronymic, but occupational:<sup>18</sup>

The natural refuge and stronghold of the outlaw was the woods. Hence he is termed by Latin writers silvaticus, by the Normans forestier. The Anglo-Saxon robber or highwayman is called a wood-rover, wealdgenga, and the Norse word for outlaw is exactly equivalent. It has been often suggested that Robin Hood is a corruption, or dialectic form, of Robin of the wood, and when we remember that wood is pronounced hood in some parts of England (as whoop is pronounced hoop everywhere), and that the outlaw bears in so many languages a name descriptive of his habitation, this notion will not seem an idle fancy.

The surmise of D. H. is no worse than Ritson's; in fact, it is sounder and much more plausible.

We come now to a problem which taxed the ingenuity of Ritson to solve, but with which later writers, such as Child, have not been faced. Ritson made an exhaustive search of all available books and manuscripts for mention of Robin Hood. The earliest reference to the hero he found, with one exception,<sup>19</sup> was in the Vision of Piers the Plowman,

<sup>16</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, iv.

<sup>17</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xix.—Wright follows Ritson partly, when, in dealing with the shifting of the elements in the story of his Saxon mythical figure, he suggests that a simple title, intelligible to all, might be assumed, i e., Robin with the Hood, pointing to a similar name having been derived from apparently similar circumstances in the case of the German spirit Hudekin. But he goes on to say that he is "not opposed to the conjecture which has been made, that the name Robin Hood is but a corruption of Robin of the Wood, because we find analogies in other languages" Wright, op. cit., II, 207.

<sup>18</sup> Francis James Child, English and Scottish Ballads (Boston, 1859), v, xxiv-xxv.—See also article by H. K., "Robin Hood," Notes and Queries, VI (December 25, 1852), 597 f. and Wright, op. cit., II, 207-208.

<sup>19</sup> Ritson found a manuscript among Peck's collection for the history of Premonstra-

now universally accepted as the first. But it does not occur until after the middle of the fourteenth century, over a hundred years after Ritson's date for the death of his hero. The first historian to mention Robin Hood is Fordun in his Scotichronicon, between 1377 and 1384 (and Bower in his continuation of the work, about 1450).<sup>20</sup> Ritson realized that the earlier historians had omitted mention of the outlaw, and that this omission might be used as evidence of the nonexistence of his hero, as in fact it was. He therefore ingeniously affirms:<sup>21</sup>

The principal if not sole reason why our hero is never once mentioned by Matthew Paris, Benedictus abbas, or any other ancient English historian, was most probably his avowed enmity to churchmen, and history, in former times, was written by none but monks. From the same motives that Josephus is pretended to have suppressed all mention of Jesus Christ, they were unwilling to praise the actions which they durst neither misrepresent nor deny. Fordun and Major, however, being foreigners, have not been deterred by this professional spirit from rendering homage to his virtues.

It is this same reason which leads Ritson to the conclusion that an anecdote has been eliminated from all copies of Fordun but one.<sup>22</sup> This unconvincing line of reasoning affronts the intelligence of both Wright and Child. Wright wonders where Ritson learned of the early historians' habit of omitting mention of avowed enemies of churchmen, and why the fact that Fordun and Major were foreigners had any influence on their "professional spirit."<sup>23</sup> Child's argument against Ritson's conclusion is more persuasive: he gives as an illustration the parallel case of the famous outlaw Adam Gordon. Adam Gordon, a follower of Simon de Montfort, lived as an outlaw, and, after an encounter with Prince Edward, was returned to his former position and estates. A story romantic enough, yet Adam Gordon is not the hero of any ballad, although most contemporary historians devote a paragraph to him. Equally significant is the fact that Hereward is celebrated both in a prose romance and in contemporary histories.<sup>24</sup> Ritson was forced to ignore this situation (he had read Matthew Paris, in which Adam Gordon appears) in order to make his point. It is merely another intensian monasteries which he thought was dated July 22, 1304, and from which he concluded that Robin Hood was both mentioned and compared with William Wallace in that year. Child has pointed out that the manuscript is of the eighteenth century and that the date refers to the matter in the poem: the title mentioning Robin Hood is Peck's own contribution. F. J. Child, The English and Scottish Popular Ballads (Boston and New York, 1888), III, 40.

---

<sup>21</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xv.

<sup>20</sup> Child, op. cit. (1859), v, x.

<sup>22</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xlv.

<sup>23</sup> Wright, op. cit., II, 202.

<sup>24</sup> Child, op. cit. (1859), v, xix-xx.

stance of the failure of Ritson to think critically, when to do so might upset his theories.<sup>25</sup>

Ritson proves gullible in at least one instance. In all sincerity he asserts that both Robin Hood and Little John frequently shot arrows a measured mile, "which, it is supposed, no one, either before or since, was ever able to do."<sup>26</sup> As proof he adduces a statement by the same Charlton, whom he elsewhere finds unworthy of credence,<sup>27</sup> that tradition says that Robin Hood and Little John both shot arrows more than a mile from the top of Whitby Abbey. Charlton has the grace to leave the credibility of the story up to his readers.<sup>28</sup> Ritson does not.

One other example of Ritson's lack of judgment will suffice. In Thoresby's Ducatus Leodiensis Ritson found a reference to Robin Hood's gravestone, with an inscription scarcely legible. In the Appendix to Thoresby, he found a note to the effect that among the papers of Dr. Gale, the dean of York, was found an epitaph of Robin Hood, which called him Robert, earl of Huntingdon. Ritson does not tell us how the scarcely legible inscription mentioned by Thoresby is identified as the epitaph among Dr. Gale's papers. Percy had been audacious enough to say at first that "this epitaph is suspicious," although later he modified his expression to "appears to him suspicious."<sup>29</sup> Ritson clears the air once and for all with another astounding Q.E.D.:<sup>30</sup>

As for the present editors part . . . he can perceive nothing in it from whence one should be led to pronounce it spurious, i.e., that it was never inscribed on the gravestone of Robin Hood. That there actually was some inscription upon it in Mr. Thoresby's time, though then scarce legible, is evident from his own words: and it should be remembered, as well that the last century was not the era of imposition, as that Dr. Gale was both too good and too learned a man either to be capable of it himself or to be liable to it from others.

No wonder such a trusting soul lost his money on the Exchange.

The first scholar to criticize Ritson's life of Robin Hood was Wright, who was scarcely more courteous than was Ritson:<sup>31</sup>

The life, by Ritson, prefixed to his edition of the Robin Hood ballads, with the pedantic notes which illustrate it, is the barren production of a poor mind. The "accurate" mister Ritson, who condemned with such asperity the slightest wanderings of the imaginations of others, has therein exhibited some truly <sup>25</sup> Compare Ritson with the more sensible view that the historians were only interested in the activities of the nobility: B. H. Coates, "Note on Robin Hood," Godey's Lady's Book, xxiv (April, 1842), 203 ff.

<sup>27</sup> See supra, p. 523.

<sup>29</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xlvii.

<sup>31</sup> Wright, op. cit., II, 201.

<sup>26</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xxxiii.

<sup>28</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xxxiv.

<sup>30</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xlviii.

pleasant vagaries of his own. He gives us an essay upon the private character of the outlaw!

Child as early as 1857 used these words:<sup>32</sup>

Those who desire a full acquaintance with the fabulous history of Robin Hood, will seek it in the well-known volumes of Ritson, or in those of his recent editor, Gutch, who does not make up by superior discrimination for his inferiority in other respects to that industrious antiquary

John Matthew Gutch, so roughly treated by Child, recanted in part in 1861. Nine years after the publication of Joseph Hunter's Robin Hood, Gutch appeared in print solely because of newly discovered evidence, and took up the story of Hunter's discovery, lamenting the fact that general credit will not be given it.<sup>33</sup> Hustvedt acknowledges the service Ritson performed in collecting materials and giving an account of Robin Hood in the drama. But he is no more complimentary than Wright.<sup>34</sup> Particularly interesting in Robin Hood is Ritson's critical treatment of the legendary material which had accumulated about the figure of the outlaw and his men. The concise Life of Robin Hood, and the stupendous array of "notes and illustration" which accompanied it, show the antiquary at his best and the critic at something less than his best. . . . An uncritical, though otherwise valuable, compilation.

Burd, in his critical biography of Ritson, says as little as possible:<sup>35</sup>

It is a monument of industry, the result of years of investigation and study, and brings to a fitting close the first period of Ritson's editorial activity. The Life of Robin Hood, with which the first volume opens, does not profess to be historically authentic. Although Ritson considered Robin Hood as an historical character, he was unable to ground his biography on unassailable authorities . . . he constructed a history, "which, though it may fail to satisfy, may possibly serve to amuse." . . . The bringing into one view of this vast store of material was a meritorious service.

Burd takes too literally the statement of Ritson that his history may serve to amuse, if it fails to satisfy.<sup>36</sup> Nowhere did Ritson evince the <sup>32</sup> F. J. Child, "Robin Hood," Atlantic Monthly, 1 (December, 1857), 166: reprinted in his English and Scottish Ballads (1859), v, vii ff. See also his comment on Robin Hood and history, supra, p. 527.

<sup>33</sup> J. M. Gutch, "The Ballad Hero, Robin Hood. His Identity Discovered," The Reliquary, 1 (January, 1861), 143.

<sup>34</sup> Sigurd Bernhard Hustvedt, Ballad Criticism in Scandinavia and Great Britain during the Eighteenth Century (New York, 1916), p. 266.

<sup>35</sup> Burd, op. cit., p. 118.

<sup>36</sup> A reviewer in the Spectator, LIX (July 24, 1886), 994, holds a similar view. "Whether the 'Life' is to be taken as a serious production or not is, considering its style and the diffidence of Percy; he was an avowed antiquary, with strong feelings with respect to the duties and liberties of an editor. He is notorious for his vitriolic criticisms and scurrilous attacks. It is inconceivable that a man with such tendencies would devote so much time and care upon a work which he thought of as merely amusing. His character was earnest; one cannot imagine him touching anything lightly. There are many criticisms of other editors and writers which are in poor enough taste in a serious work, and which would be entirely out of place in a work intended to be regarded as entertaining. The language on the note by D. H.,<sup>37</sup> the reference to George a Greene, the pinner of Wakefield, "re-printed, with other trash, in the late edition of Dodsleys Old Plays,"<sup>38</sup> a reference to Percy, who "evidently asserts what he would probably find it difficult to prove",<sup>39</sup> the gratuitous remark about "mister John Pinkerton," of whom he says that "indeed, this worthy gentleman, as Johnson said of Goldsmith, only stumbles upon truth by accident";<sup>40</sup> and the equally gratuitous observation upon Dr. Johnson, "'Robin Hoods fat frier' is frier Tuck; a circumstance of which doctor Johnson, who set about explaining that author [Shakespeare] with a very inadequate stock of information, was perfectly ignorant,"<sup>41</sup> leave little room for doubt that the Life of Robin Hood, together with the Notes and Illustrations, is a serious work. Throughout it all there runs the vein of acrimony that characterized so much of his criticism; little is required to produce a scornful remark. The whole work is best described in Hustvedt's words, "an uncritical, though otherwise valuable, compilation." Ritson erred by starting with a few dates and allusions, which he thought were correct, bolstering up his case by anything which fitted into his scheme, and discarding all that did not serve. That he used the ballads to prove one point did not prevent him from rejecting them, when to do so was more convenient than an explanation. He is not the only one who has attacked the problem of Robin Hood uncritically; but for one of his judgment in other matters, the Life and Notes are merely a monument of industry. The prefatory matter is convincing proof that his scholarship was not well rounded. On the side of accuracy, painstaking labor, and industry, he leaves little to be desired. On the critical side he is distinctly inferior; instead of the zealous guardian of truth, we find him the dupe of playwrights and balladists.

---

peculiar character of the author, more than doubtful. Probably it was intended as a summary of the current beliefs as to Robin Hood, rather than as sober history . . . as Ritson was of a notably cynical and unbelieving turn of mind, and he distinctly recognizes Robin Hood as the "patron saint of archery," and comments on the universality of his presence, it is extremely improbable that he regarded him as a historical personage."

<sup>37</sup> Supra, p. 526.

<sup>38</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xxix.

<sup>39</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xxxii.

<sup>40</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xl.

<sup>41</sup> Ritson, op. cit., I, xcii.

Bishop Thomas Percy, regardless of his failings as an editor, was sounder in his criticism of the story of Robin Hood than Ritson. In the short introduction to the ballad Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne Percy is content to quote Stow's Annals for the "heads" of Robin Hood's story, and makes a suggestion which is more plausible than Ritson's reliance on Stukely's pedigree:<sup>42</sup>

[The common people] not content to celebrate his memory by innumerable songs and stories, have erected him into the dignity of an earl.

Percy doubts the genuineness of the epitaph, because no mention of the earldom is made in the most ancient poems and Robin Hood is always referred to as a yeoman. Percy evidently believes in the existence of the man, but there is a suggestion of skepticism throughout the introduction.

The remarks by D. H. in the Gentleman's Magazine for March, 1793, are more in accord with the latest view of the existence of Robin Hood:<sup>43</sup>

I have long been of opinion, that his names and title were misnomers and imaginary honors; and that as Robin of Ridsdale was the name of a notorious robber in Northumberland, given to one of the Umfranvilles, and to one of the Hilliards in the Lancastrian army, in the reign of Edward IV and from them applied to a rude Roman statue in the Roman station in Risingham in Northumberland, so Robin Wood, Whode, o' th' wood, q.d. of Shirwood . . . was that of a deer-stealer of equal eminence in that track and neighborhood, and that the title of Earl of Huntingdon was a nickname for a great hunter or forest-marauder, who, like the borderers on most of our forests and chaces from that time to the present, thought the king's game public property.

D. H. believes that tradition concerning Robin Hood is earlier than history, which accounts for so many place names. He doubts the genuineness of the gravestone, and is convinced that the story of Robin Hood's being bled to death is nothing but a story. Despite the efforts of Dr. Stukely to prove that Robin Hood was descended from the earls of Huntingdon, "we may venture to pronounce that he was nothing more or less than Robin Wood, or the Forester, a notorious hunter, i.e., deer-stealer."<sup>44</sup>

The first historical studies of the Robin Hood cycle were made in France by Edward Barry<sup>45</sup> and Augustin Thierry.<sup>46</sup> Both Barry and

<sup>42</sup> Thomas Percy, Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (London, 1775), I, 82.

<sup>43</sup> Gentleman's Magazine, LXXIII (March, 1793), 225-226.

<sup>44</sup> D. H., Gentleman's Magazine, LXXIII (March, 1793), 226.

<sup>45</sup> Thèse de Littérature sur les Vicissitudes et les Transformations du Cycle populaire de Robin Hood (Paris, 1832).

<sup>46</sup> Histoire de la Conquête de l'Angleterre par les Normands (Paris, 1825).

Thierry believe Robin Hood to have been one of the outlaws who resisted the first intrusions of the Normans. Thierry bases his theory on Fordun, who said that the famous robber, Robin Hode, lived about 1190. Thierry conceives of Robin Hood as an outlaw-chief, generous and kindly, whose chief victims were the agents of royal authority, governors of towns and counties. Robin Hood and William Long-beard are the last two of a long line of opponents of the Normans. By the end of the twelfth century this opposition had died down.<sup>47</sup>

Wright is unconvinced by Barry's conjectures. From the frequent occurrence of Robin Hood in ballads and in the close connection of Robin Hood with the May games, Wright is disposed to believe him the representative of some northern chieftain, whose actions gained a place in popular myths.<sup>48</sup> The origin of the name Robin Hood is conjectural; the most likely solution is that it is a corruption of Robin of the Wood. Wright points out analogies in other languages. Witikind, the opponent of Charlemagne, who concealed himself in the forests, is none other than witu chint in old High Dutch, and signifies son of the wood, denoting an exile or outlaw. Witikind, although such a person seems to have existed, appears to be the representative of all defenders of his country against invaders. Old Norse skoggangr corresponds to Anglo-Saxon weald-genga.<sup>49</sup> One of the strongest proofs of the mythical character of Robin Hood is the connection of his name with mounds and stones, such as the peasantry attributed to fairies in popular superstition. Wright presents his theory as follows:<sup>50</sup>

The legends of the peasantry are the shadows of a very remote antiquity, and in them we may place our trust with much confidence on a subject like the present. They enable us to place our Robin Hood with tolerable certainty among the personages of the early mythology of the Teutonic peoples

Following in the footsteps of Thierry is G. F.<sup>51</sup> For this writer Fordun's note is particularly important, as it calls Robin Hood one of the "exheredati." G. F. places Robin Hood among the followers of Simon de Montfort. Although the battle of Evesham did not take place until 1265, G. F. thinks that the hostility directed towards the Sheriff of Nottingham was the result of enmity towards the conquerors. Nottingham was an important defensive point, and the royal agent there was the representative of the invaders and the oppressor. From his language <sup>47</sup> Thierry's History of the Conquest of England by the Normans. with its causes from the earliest period, and its consequences to the present time. Trans. by Charles Claude Hamilton (London, 1825), III, 234-287.

<sup>48</sup> Wright, op. cit., II, 203 ff.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., II, 207-208.

<sup>50</sup> Wright, op. cit., II, 211.

<sup>51</sup> London and Westminster Review, XXXIII (1840), 424-491.

we may judge that G. F. was still incensed by the Conquest; he sees Robin Hood as the representative of.<sup>52</sup> the permanent protest of the industrious classes of England against the galling injustice and insulting immorality of that framework of English society, and that fabric of ecclesiastical as well as civil authority, which the iron arm of the Conquest had established.

G. F. makes out a fairly good case for himself, but his judgment is overcome by his anger.<sup>53</sup>

The Rev. Joseph Hunter was the next to attack the problem. Wright's theory is an affront to this red-blooded Englishman, and so it is dismissed<sup>54</sup> to that limbo of vanity, there to live with all those who would make all remote history fable, who would make us believe that everything which is good in England is a mere copy of something originated in countries eastward to our own, and who would deny to the English nation in past ages all skill and all advancement in literature or in the arts of sculpture and architecture.

He dismisses the conjecture that Robin Hood is the creation of a poetic mind. Robin Hood was an outlaw living in the woods, and nothing is attributed to him not belonging to man [including the 1760 yard arrow-shot!]. Moreover, the facts of the Robin Hood cycle are proved in part. The Lytel Geste of Robyn Hood gives his life and deeds. Although the second ballad of the Lytel Geste, Little John and the Sheriff of Nottinghamshire, "is probably wholly fiction,"<sup>55</sup> and the events in the fourth ballad, Robin Hood, the Sheriff of Nottingham, and the Knight, do not "admit of any historic elucidation . . . The whole is probably a poetic fiction,"<sup>56</sup> yet mention of "Edward our comely king" serves to date Robin Hood. The inconsistency is worthy of Ritson. But Hunter has something with which to back up his statements. According to the Lytel Geste, "Edward our comely king" made an expedition into Lancashire, and upon his return to London brought with him Robin Hood to serve him. Edward II did make an expedition into Lancashire in 1323, spending some time at Nottingham. Hunter has found, in the Jornal de la Chambre for 1324, records of payments to a Robyn Hode, a "vadlet" of the king. He says: "I, for my part, believe it is the same person."<sup>57</sup> Bearing out his theory

<sup>52</sup> G. F., op. cit., 483.

<sup>53</sup> See also W. Mountford, "Robin Hood," North American Review, LXXXIV (January, 1857), 26 ff., for a similar attitude toward the Normans.

<sup>54</sup> Joseph Hunter, The Great Hero of the Ancient Minstrelsy of England, "Robin Hood" (London, 1852), p. 3.

<sup>55</sup> Hunter, op. cit., p. 21.

<sup>56</sup> Hunter, op. cit., p. 27.

<sup>57</sup> Hunter, op. cit., p. 36.—Child, op. cit. (1888), III, 55, referring to this passage, says Hunter "could have identified Pigrogromitus and Quinapalus, if he had given his mind to it."

is the dismissal of this Robyn Hode in November, 1324; this period roughly approximates the time the ballads say Robin Hood spent with the king. Child takes issue with Hunter on this point. The Jornal gives as the reason for Robin Hood's dismissal "poar cas qil ne poait pluix travailler" and the ballad says he continued to maintain himself in the forest for twenty-two years. Child insists that a man who could not work at court would find it impossible to support himself in the forests; but Child fails to notice that Hunter contends that the passage concerning the twenty-two years was added by the compiler of the Geste.<sup>58</sup> Child's failure is not as uncritical as Hunter's use of part of a ballad, otherwise a fiction, which has suffered at the hands of a compiler. Hunter makes other assumptions equally illogical. He seeks to identify the prioress who was related to Robin Hood, and selects one Elizabeth de Staynton in preference to Margaret Savile, saying:<sup>59</sup>

That either of them could be guilty of the treachery imputed, cannot be believed, and least of all, not Elizabeth de Staynton, in the face of the touching and plaintive inscription [DOUCE JHU DE NAZARETH FILS DIEU AYEZ MERCI A ELIZABETH STAYNTON] which, at her own suggestion as it may seem, is found upon her tomb

Such a conclusion has a fitting companion in "From this religious family [Staynton] too he might acquire that devotional turn, which the ballad-writers have sought to impress upon us that he possessed."<sup>60</sup> However, Hunter's is an excellent piece of work in many respects. He concludes the alleged epitaph of Robin Hood to be a fabrication, and Stukely's pedigree a sorry performance. He proves that the Barnsdale district was infested with robbers, from court records. He explains Robin Hood as one of the Contrariantes, the supporters of Lancaster in 1322. The whole theory has the semblance of truth, but as Child says, it rests upon the rarity of the name Robin Hood; Child gives six instances of the appearance of the name in the forty years between 28 Edward I and 10 Edward III, from the Record Publications.<sup>61</sup>

Child's analysis of the historical studies first appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, I, 156-166, and was reprinted in his British and Scottish Ballads (1859). He gives the hypotheses of Thierry and Barry, of the contributor to the London and Westminster Review, and of Hunter, and dismisses them all on two grounds: first, that Robin Hood is not mentioned in contemporary histories,<sup>62</sup> second, that there is no political animosity or

<sup>58</sup> Hunter, op. cit., p. 41.

<sup>59</sup> Hunter, op. cit., p. 45.

<sup>60</sup> Hunter, op. cit., p. 46.

<sup>61</sup> See the enthusiastic review of Hunter's Robin Hood in "A Search for Robin Hood," Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, XVIII (August 28, 1852), 136 ff.

<sup>62</sup> Child is right, but ballads are used to celebrate contemporary events. (Thierry, any suggestion of enmity towards the Normans or the king, expressed in the ballads.<sup>63</sup> Child is reluctant to give any opinion, but if forced to make a choice, he would believe Robin Hood the ideal of the outlaw class, a class numerous in all countries in the Middle Ages.<sup>64</sup> Child discusses the theory advanced by Wright and Kuhn,<sup>65</sup> that, because of the connection of Robin Hood with May-day games and the pagan origin of these games, there is some relation between Robin Hood and the Germanic gods, even Wodan. Child successfully refutes Wright and Kuhn, and makes a very penetrating remark about Robin Hood and May:<sup>66</sup>

Why the adventures of Robin Hood should be specially assigned, as they are in the old ballads, to the month of May, remains unexplained. We have no exquisite reason to offer, but we may perhaps find reason good enough in the delicious stanzas with which some of these ballads begin. . . . The poetical character of the season affords all the explanation that is required.

In his edition of 1888, Child has more to say about Robin Hood. "Robin Hood is absolutely a creation of the ballad-muse."<sup>67</sup> The ballad hero is described as yeoman, religious, a respecter of women, a lover of the king, friendly to the poor, courteous and good tempered.<sup>68</sup>

This is what Robin Hood is, and it is equally important to observe what he is not. He has no sort of political character, in the Gest or any other ballad. This takes the ground from under the feet of those who seek to assign him a place in history.

Professor Child has set up a theory which few scholars have attempted to controvert. Messrs. Hales and Furnivall follow him; they do not deny the existence of some such person, because of the local color, but they do not attempt to place Robin Hood definitely. They regard him as the people's hero, the representative of forest life. These editors also feel the spirit of the greenwood in the ballads, which "are inspired by the breath of its breezes. They re-echo with the song of its birds. They rejoice with a great joy in its abundant beauty."<sup>69</sup> Francis Gummere agrees with Professor Child:<sup>70</sup> a petty fugitive of whatever name, poaching on the royal preserves, may well have grown in fame, appropriated the legends of other fugitives, and so become what Professor Child has called him, the ideal outlaw.

---

op. cit., II, 109; Mountford, op. cit., p. 3; Hunter, op. cit., p. 9.) In our own time we have had The Death of Floyd Collins and The Wreck of the Shenandoah.

<sup>63</sup> Child, op. cit. (1859), v, xviii-xx.

<sup>64</sup> Child, op. cit. (1859), v, xxiv.

<sup>65</sup> A. Kuhn, "Wodan," Zeitschrift für deutsches Alterthum, v (1845), 472-494.

<sup>66</sup> Child, op. cit. (1859), v, xxxi.

<sup>67</sup> Child, op. cit. (1888), III, 42.

<sup>68</sup> Ibid., III, 43.

<sup>69</sup> J. W. Hales and F. J. Furnivall, Bishop Percy's Folio Manuscript (London, 1867), I, 11.

<sup>70</sup> Francis B. Gummere, The Popular Ballad (Boston, 1907), p. 272.

Rudolf Kiessmann concludes his study of the Robin Hood ballads:<sup>71</sup>

Robin Hood ist eine durch die Balladendichtung popular gewordene Persönlichkeit, deren historische Grundlage einer oder einige der um die Wende des 13. und 14. Jahrhunderts lebenden outlaws sind, die grollend über die Beschränkung der alten Freiheit in den Wäldern des Landes um Barnesdale herum ein freies Abenteuerleben führten.

One hundred and thirty-five years of criticism and study have elapsed since Ritson's Robin Hood first saw light of day, and in that time much study and ink have been spent on the hero of the greenwood. The personal existence of the Robin Hood of the ballads has been successfully refuted, and upon hypotheses for which Ritson had the material. It is unfortunate that so brilliant an antiquary and scholar made so little critical use of it, and that, as a result, Ritson's work is now but an uncritical retailing of scattered fragments, a monument to antiquarianism. But practically nothing has been added to the references given by Ritson; he was thorough and painstaking in his work.

CARROLL C. MORELAND

Baltimore, Maryland

<sup>71</sup> Rudolf Kiessmann, Untersuchungen über die Motive der Robin-Hood-Balladen, English Monographs, vol. 40 (Halle, 1895), pp. 41-42.

TIECK'S ESSAY ÜBER DAS ERHABENE

IN Box 18 of the "Ludwig Tieck-Nachlass" in the Preussische Staatsbibliothek, Berlin, we find, in Tieck's hand, on six quarto leaves, an unfinished essay entitled Über das Erhabene, dated 1792. It has never been published and is barely touched upon in the voluminous literature on Tieck, although it is not without significance in the long series of critical works for which its author is famed.

Kopke, in his biography of Tieck (1855), does not mention it, nor does he include it in his "Chronologisches Verzeichnis von Tiecks Werken." Adolf Hauften, in an important article on Tieck's unpublished writings (1887),<sup>1</sup> takes no notice of it. The first and, indeed, only one to devote any significant discussion to it was Edgar Regener in a Rostock dissertation of 1903.<sup>2</sup> On pages 20-22 of this work Regener calls attention to it as an early product of Tieck's voracious reading:

Er mag die Bucher einerseits im Dienste des Schulmeisters, andererseits auf Antrieb seines eigenen Bedürfnisses hin verarbeitet haben, indem er aus ihnen die Beispiele zu seiner Studie "Über das Erhabene" nahm. Grosse Flüchtigkeit und keck sich äussernde Oberflächlichkeit zeigen, wie sehr der Aufsatz die Arbeit einer flinken Feder ist. Trotzdem ist er uns für die Entwicklung des Knaben wertvoll. Wenn wir z.B. Sätze darin finden wie: "Ein Dichter kann uns nur gefallen, wenn wir zu seinen Bildern, Charakteren und Seelenerscheinungen Analogien in uns selbst finden, die uns jene wahrscheinlich machen, oder gar die nämlichen Bilder und Ideen," so haben wir in diesen Worten ein Moment, aus dem wir uns sein früh reifes Verständnis und sein ausserordentlich sicheres Gefühl erklären können in der Schätzung von Goethe, Shakespeare, Cervantes, Holberg u.a. und in der heftigen Abneigung gegen Iffland und die Schriftsteller seiner Art. Wenn er auch den Schluss zu dem Ritterroman "Die eiserne Maske" und in dem gleichen Stil den "Bairischen Hiesel" schrieb. Oder wir dürfen die ersten Hinweise auf seine später betätigten Kunstanschauungen darin finden, wenn Tieck sagt: "Es ist unleugbar, dass alle unsere feinsten geistigsten Begriffe, alle unsere Erfahrungen und Analogien sich endlich in ein Labyrinth von Empfindungen verlieren, wo der Beobachter den leitenden Faden verliert." Diese Worte könnten von Maurice Maeterlinck sein; sie könnten in "Le trésor des humbles" stehen. So richtig diese Äusserungen sind, so wenig Zustimmung wird er wohl erhalten haben bei der Behauptung: "Jeder Vorgang wird an das Erhabene streifen, wenn ich mit seiner Vorstellung eine Menge von Gedanken verbinden kann." Durch ein Beispiel will Tieck dies näher beleuchten und meint: ein bettelnder Belisar gibt uns Gedanken, ein bettelnder Blinder nur Rührung. Ich glaube: in der gleichen Weise, wie ich bei Belisar Gedanken haben kann, werden sie sich auch bei dem blinden Bettler einstellen. . .

<sup>1</sup> Zu Ludwig Tiecks Nachlass," Archiv für Literaturgeschichte, xv, 316 ff.

<sup>2</sup> Tieck-Studien. Drei Kapitel zu dem Thema: Der junge Tieck. Berlin-Wilmersdorf (1903).

Die Arbeit ist Bruchstück, sie hört in der Mitte auf. Interessant ist der Aufsatz für uns insofern, als er uns—ich möchte sagen: einen Lesezettel des jungen Dichters gibt. Die Beweise für und gegen das Erhabene nimmt er aus den Werken von Milton, Ariost, Homer, Vergil, Horaz, Shakespeare, Spencer, Blumauer, Uz, Kleist, Hume,<sup>3</sup> Brockes, Haller, Lessing, Äschylos, Sophokles und Euripides. Immerhin für den Neunzehnjährigen ein gutes Zeugnis. Seine literarische Bildung war ziemlich luckenlos.

Although the manuscript reveals the year of composition as 1792, we cannot be certain as to the more exact time. During the summer semester of that year, that is, from Easter until September, Tieck was a student at Halle. In the autumn he changed the scene of his academic activities to Göttingen. It seems likely that he wrote the essay either in Halle or in Göttingen. Probably he meant to read it before some literary society at either place. The expressions "meine Zuhörer" and "meine Vorlesung" would point to this. Perhaps he composed it as an exercise for his professor of classical antiquities at Halle, the famous Friedrich August Wolf, or for Christian Gottlob Heyne, under whom he studied classical philology at Göttingen. This seems plausible when we recall that another of his early critical essays, Die Kupferstiche nach der Shakespeare-Galerie in London (published in Nicolai's Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften in 1795),<sup>4</sup> was also written under professorial guidance—that of Heyne and the Italo-German art historian Johann Dominik Fiorillo.

To complete our list of Tieck's earliest critical works we need to mention only another unpublished essay, found in a rather rough and illegible form in Box 18 of the Berlin "Nachlass" and entitled Soll der Mahler seine Gegenstände lieber aus dem erzählenden oder dramatischen Dichter nehmen?,<sup>5</sup> the essay Shakespeares Behandlung des Wunderbaren,<sup>6</sup> written in Göttingen in 1793, submitted to Göschen in 1794 for Schiller's Thalia but rejected, and finally published in 1796 by Nicolai as a preface to Tieck's prose version of The Tempest; and the long first draft of Das

<sup>3</sup> An error on Regener's part for "Home."

<sup>4</sup> Reprinted in Tieck's Kritische Schriften (Leipzig, 1848), I, 3 ff.

<sup>5</sup> This essay has never been noticed or even mentioned by any writer on Tieck. It covers four quarto sheets and gives preference to the dramatic poets (not surprising in view of Tieck's early interest in histrionics), entirely overlooking nature itself as a possible subject, perhaps because the author had only historical painting in mind. Tieck here opposes both Caylus and Lessing, who, he claims, recommend epics, especially those of Homer. But he adds: "Ich mag es nicht wagen, darüber zu streiten, ob Lessing in seiner Kritik gegen Caylus nicht vielleicht zu weit gegangen sei, denn es ist zu gefährlich, sich mit einem solchen Gegner in einen Zweikampf ein zu lassen." <sup>6</sup> Reprinted Krit. Schr., I, 37 ff.

Buch über Shakespeare, written in Gottingen, probably in 1793–94.<sup>7</sup> It will be noted that of these five works, three deal with Shakespeare. Aside from its importance otherwise, Über das Erhabene, together with the fragment on the use of literature by painters, is therefore significant as Tieck's first attempt in a field of criticism not relating directly to Elizabethan England.

The following reprint, made with the kind permission of the authorities of the Preussische Staatsbibliothek, is an attempt faithfully to reproduce the text of the manuscript.

UBER DAS ERHABENE 1792.

Es ist vielleicht in der Ästhetik nichts schwerer, als aus ihrem unzertrennlichen Zusammenhang irgend eine Wirkung der schonen Künste herauszureißen, diese zu zergliedern, zu zeigen, worin ihr Wesen besteht, und auf welche Art sie auf unsre Seele wirkt. Diese Anatomie der Schönheit wird von Vielen als zwecklos und unnütz verschrien, weil, wie diese Gegner sagen, der Genuß des Schönen selbst dadurch zerstört wird, weil der Untersucher auf Spitzfindigkeiten stößt, die ihn von der Wahrheit abführen, und bei der Schönheit selbst keine Anwendung leiden, weil der Verstand dadurch gewohnt wird zu grubeln, wo das Herz vorher in Genüssen schwelgte. Es ist in unsern Zeiten schon viel für und wider diese Meinung geschrieben, und dies mag mir die Widerlegung dieser Behauptungen ersparen. Es ist unleugbar, das alle, selbst unsre feinsten, geistigsten Begriffe, alle unsre Erfahrungen und Analogien sich endlich in ein Labyrinth von Empfindungen verlieren, wo der Beobachter den leitenden Faden verliert.<sup>8</sup> Wenn aber das γνώθι σαύρον und die Psychologie nicht unwichtig sind (und welchem Menschen sollten sie dies nicht sein), wenn daran liegt, die zarten Schwingungen zu entdecken, in den unsre Empfindungen zittern, die Stufe aufzufinden, wo Idee und Gefühl sich begegnen, und eins werden, der wird dem Gang einer solchen Untersuchung mit Vergnügen folgen. Home und Lessing, die diese Bahn am glücklichsten betreten haben, reissen jeden mit sich fort, und wenn die Gegner dieser Forschungen bedächten, daß hier der Dichter und der Kritiker einerlei Zweck hatten, so wurden sie nicht mehr über die Zwecklosigkeit klagen; denn ob der Dichter die Empfindungen, ihr geistiges Band, ihre Verschmelzung und ihre anscheinenden Widersprüche dem Beschauer darstellt, eben die Gefühle in seiner Seele klingen läßt, und sie ihm auf diese Art erklärt, oder ob der Untersucher uns ihre Bestandtheile auseinandersetzt, und auf ihren Stoff zurückführt, ist im Grunde doch ein unwesentlicher Unterschied.

Man hat mehrere einzelne brauchbare Compendien und Systeme der Aesthetik, aber nur noch wenig gute Auseinandersetzungen einzelner Kräfte der

<sup>7</sup> Das Buch über Shakespeare. Handschriftliche Aufzeichnungen von Ludwig Tieck. Aus seinem Nachlass [i.e., Stadtbibliothek, Berlin] herausgegeben von Henry Ludeke (Halle, 1920), pp. 1–364.

<sup>8</sup> This sentence, with the omission of "selbst," is quoted in Regener, op. cit., p. 21.

Kunst, und dies mag mich entschuldigen, wenn ich vielleicht die Erwartungen meiner Zuhörer tausche, da es hier nach vielem Denken doch so schwer ist, gründlich zu sein, da ich im Grunde nichts vor mir finde, auf dem ich weiter bauen könnte. Man darf daher nichts als abgerissene Gedanken erwarten, und der Spruch mag mich bei einer so schweren Abhandlung entschuldigen: Et voluisse sat est

Ich sagte, daß mir so gut als gar nicht vorgearbeitet sei, und die Sache bedarf fast keines Beweises. Home spricht nur im Allgemeinen übers Erhabene und über dessen Gegentheil, nach Heineke und Schlosser (in ihren Übersetzungen des Longin)<sup>9</sup> ist jedes vollendete Gedicht erhaben und der fragmentarische Longin giebt uns gar nicht ganz genau an, was er sich unter eigentlich Erhaben denke, er begnügt sich, an mehreren Stellen die Erhabenheit auseinanderzusetzen, und in andern Beispielen zu zeigen, wie andre Dichter und Redner gegen die wahre Erhabenheit gesündigt haben. Doch bis jetzt ist sein Werk noch immer das beste, was wir über diesen Gegenstand besitzen, und es sei mir erlaubt, seiner Methode zu folgen, da oft der Leser einen Satz weit leichter versteht, wenn er ihn sogleich auf ein gegebenes Beispiel anwenden kann.

Schon Longin sagt in dem achten Abschnitt seiner Abhandlung,<sup>10</sup> daß die Fähigkeit, erhaben zu denken, mit uns geboren werden mußte, und ich möchte hinzusetzen, auch die Fähigkeit Erhabenheit zu fühlen und zu verstehen. Ein Dichter kann uns nur gefallen, wenn wir zu seinen Bildern, Charakteren und Seelenerscheinungen Analogien in uns selbst finden, die uns jene wahrscheinlich machen, oder gar die nehmlichen Bilder und Ideen.<sup>11</sup> Je häufiger dies der Dichter thun kann, in je mehrere Situationen er den Leser hineinwirft, je mehr anscheinende Widersprüche er ihm auflöst, je mehrere Charaktere, die uns in der alltäglichen Welt aus——<sup>12</sup> fremd und keine Ähnlichkeit mit uns selbst zu haben scheinen, je näher er diese dem Leser bringt und ihm gleichsam ein Serohr in die Hand giebt, durch dessen Hülfe er tausend verborgene Kräfte in der Seele entdeckt, je mehr ist der Dichter Genie. Er muß alle Seelen gleichsam vor uns aufschließen, und uns das ganze verborgene Triebwerk sehen lassen, das dem gewöhnlichen Menschen mit einem undurchdringlichen Schleier bedeckt ist. Dies eben ist die große Alchemie, durch die der wahre Dichter Alles, was er berührt, in Gold verwandelt, wo der gewöhnliche Kopf über Durftigkeit und schon erschöpfte Materien klagt, und dies ist das große Geheimniß, durch das der große Dichter so unaussprechlich auf die Seelen wirkt, er gießt seinen Geist in tausend Kornern, durch Millionen Pulse fliegen seine Gedanken und Gefühle—so hauchte Tyrtäus seine Flammen durch das ganze spartanische Heer, so war es einem griechischen Redner möglich, die Verächtlichkeit des Lebens so anschaulich zu machen, daß er viele seiner Zuhörer zum Selbstmord verleitete; auf diese Art sprachen Sophocles und Euripides so allmächtig von der Bühne herab;—darum kniete ganz Griechenland vor seinen Dichtern nieder. In unserm <sup>9</sup> C. H. Heinecke published his translation of Longinus, with commentary, life and critical essay, in Dresden, 1737–38: J. G. Schlosser his in Leipzig, 1781–82.

<sup>10</sup> Corrected from "in seinem achten Abschnitt."

<sup>11</sup> Quoted by Regener, p. 21.

<sup>12</sup> Several illegible words, crossed out.

schaalen Zeitalter ist die große Kunst zur Ausfüllung eines langweiligen Abends verwiesen, zum bloßen Vergnügen herabgesetzt kann sie kaum noch auf einzelne Herzen wirken, unmannlich tandelt sie um uns her und ist zufrieden, wenn sie uns ein Lacheln abgewinnt. Die Vater des Volks sehn auf allen hohen Enthusiasmus, wie auf eine Unwürdigkeit ihrer Kinder herab, der durch ihre weisen Einrichtungen nicht nur unnutz, sondern sogar schädlich geworden ist; alle Künste sind als unschuldige Spielwerke in ihre Werkstätte zurückgewiesen und der wurde als ein Thor verlacht werden, der ihnen von ihrem vorigen großen Einfluß etwas wiedergeben wollte.—So ist nun auch die hohe Muse bloder und zurückhaltender geworden, sie hat sich zur Unmundigkeit des Zeitalters herabgelassen und gehorcht den Befehlen der Fürsten, wenn sie gleich eine Gottinn ist. Die Erhabenheit der alten Welt kann daher unmöglich uns noch beseelen, wir haben so viele große Ideen, Patriotismus, Freiheit, Aufopferung verlohren, vielleicht auf sehr lange, und die ganz reinen, ganz gelauterten hohen Empfindungen kommen vielleicht nie zu uns zurück, da seit unserer Geburt tausend Armseligkeiten uns begleitet und sich tief in unsre Seele geprägt haben, daher kommt es, daß viele alles Gefühl für's Große und Erhabene verlohren haben, und diese hohe Flamme nur kalt anstauen, da sie keinen ähnlichen Funken in ihrem Busen spüren. Der Feigherzige wird bei des Odysseus Gefahren wenig zittern, und nie den hohen Muth des Leidenden verstehen, der kalte Mensch wird die hohe Liebe als ein unglaubliches, phantastisches Märchen ansehen, weil keine einzige Empfindung ihm je etwas davon erzählte, der in sich selbst Zurückgezogene wird den Patriotismus des Curtius ewig als eine Thorheit betrachten. Auf diese Art lassen sich vielleicht die widersprechenden Meinungen über Meisterstücke vereinigen, wo der eine gerade das vergöttert, wo der andre mit Verachtung auf den Künstler hinabsieht, es ist blos der kleine Unterschied, der eine ist ein trübes Wasser, das keinen Eindruck rein und deutlich annimmt, der andre ein heller See, wo die ganze reizende Landschaft sich mit ihren feinsten Schattirungen bespiegelt. Der Gerührte weint beim Anblick des Unglucks, der andere kann beim Großen seine Thränen nicht zurückhalten, da er beim Ruhrenden kalt vorübergeht. Wenn dieser ganze Satz richtig ist, so möchte vielleicht nächstens dahin kommen, daß sich beim Aeschylos und Shak. alle Augen roth weinten, so wie man neulich an den Thränen über Siegwart und Stella eine schöne Seele erkennen wollte.

Aus diesem folgt, daß Erhabenheit einzig in den Ideen bestehen könne, der Ausdruck kann bloß dazu dienen, um die Worte nicht des Gedankens unwürdig zu machen, eben dies sagt auch Longin; denn obgleich einige seiner Abschnitte auch vom Ausdruck handeln, so sieht man doch aus dem ersten deutlich, daß er der Meinung ist, der Ausdruck könne blos die Erhabenheit der Idee unterstützen.

Longin definirt im siebenten Abschnitt das Erhabene auf folgende Art: Groß ist das, dem wir auf keine Art widerstehen können, was sich tief in unsre Seele prägt und sich nicht wieder auslöschen läßt. Man sieht, es ist mehr eine Beschreibung als eine Definition dieses Wortes.

Um mich deutlicher zu machen, werde ich in meiner Vorlesung die Worte Gedanke<sup>13</sup> und Idee<sup>13</sup> unterscheiden. Idee soll jede Vorstellung bedeuten, und Gedanke seine gewöhnliche Bedeutung behalten.

Nach meinem Urtheil besteht das Wesen des Erhabenen darin, daß ich es sogleich mit Freude bemerke, es nicht ohne Muhe zu meinem Eigenthum mache,<sup>14</sup> und eine Menge Gedanken<sup>13</sup> außer dem Hauptgedanken in ihm entdecke.—Man konnte dieser Definition eben das vorwerfen, was ich an der des Longin getadelt habe, aber ich will mich deutlicher machen. Eine Menge klarer<sup>14</sup> Gefühle<sup>13</sup> ist das Wesen des Schönen, viele dunkle<sup>13</sup> Gefühle<sup>13</sup> der Character des Schrecklichen<sup>13</sup> und Gedanken<sup>13</sup> das Zeichen des Erhabenen.<sup>13</sup>

Die Erhabenheit bemerke ich sogleich; weil ich in ihr einen Widerschein von meinem eignen Selbst wiederfinde, bemerke ich sie mit Freude als ein Gut, was mir eigenthümlich zugehört, ich strebe, sie in mich selbst zu verwandeln, aber diese Verwandlung ist nicht ohne Muhe; ich entdecke hundert neue Gedanken in dem Hauptgedanken, und in diesem Entdecken, in diesem Bestreben besteht der Genuß<sup>13</sup> des Erhabenen.

Man wurde mir sehr Unrecht thun, wenn man hieraus folgern wollte, daß alles<sup>13</sup> Erhabene bloß gedacht<sup>13</sup> und gar nicht empfunden<sup>13</sup> werden konnte, ich behaupte dies bloß von den erhabenen Gedanken<sup>13</sup> nicht von erhabenen Ideen.

Der Genuß der Schönheit wird uns weit leichter, als der Genuß des Erhabenen, mit wenigen Krafften vereinigen wir die Schönheit in uns, das Erhabene<sup>13</sup> (die Definition liegt gleichsam im deutschen Worte selbst) steht über uns; wir bewundern, wünschen und erringen endlich den schönen Preis, statt daß in der Schönheit klare<sup>13</sup> Gefühle<sup>13</sup> um uns her spielen und uns freiwillig entgegen kommen.

Eine der reizendsten Stellen in Kleists Frühling ist folgende:

Wie schimmert der blühende Garten, wie duften die Lauben! Wie gaukelt
In Wolken von Blüthen der fröhliche Zephyr! Er führt sie gen Himmel
Und regnet mit ihnen herab.<sup>15</sup>

Wir nehmen das Gefühl leicht und willig in uns auf; wir sehen den Gegenstand der dichterischen Beschreibung deutlich, wir<sup>16</sup> empfinden mancherlei Gefühle,—wer aber wird dieser Stelle nicht das kleine Epigramm von Logau<sup>13</sup> vorziehen, wo er vom May sagt:

Dieser Monat ist ein Kuß, den der Himmel giebt der Erde, Daß sie izt<sup>17</sup> seine Braut, künftig eine Mutter werde.

Hier ist die Schönheit offenbar der Erhabenheit untergeordnet, und die Er-

<sup>13</sup> This word is underscored.

<sup>14</sup> Here the words "und es mit meinem Blick" are crossed out.

<sup>15</sup> Tieck quotes very freely and inaccurately. Cf. Deutsche Nationallit., 45<sup>2</sup>, p. 173:

... von blühenden Fruchtbäumen schimmert

Der Garten, die kreuzende Gänge mit roter Dunkelheit füllen,

Und Zephyr gaukelt umher, treibt Wolken von Blüten zur Höhe,

Die sich ergießen und regnen.

<sup>16</sup> Here the word "fühlen" is crossed out.

<sup>17</sup> The original has "ietzund." Cf. Friedrichs von Logau sämtliche Sinngedichte herausgeg. von Gustav Eitner, Bibl. des Literar. Vereins in Stuttgart, cxiii (Tübingen, 1872), epigram 2434.

habenheit entsteht nur aus der Menge der Gedanken,<sup>18</sup> die in dem Hauptgedanken liegen.

Die Stelle in Hallers Gedicht über die Ewigkeit:

Als mit dem Unding noch das neue Wesen rang, Und kaum noch reif die Welt sich aus dem Abgrund schwang<sup>18</sup>

oder:

Der Sterne stille Majestät,
Die uns zum Ziel befestigt steht,
Eilt von dir weg wie Gras an schwulen Sommertagen;
Wie Rosen, die am Mittag jung
Und welk sind vor der Dämmerung,
Ist gegen dich der Angelstern und Wagen<sup>19</sup> sind voll der größten Erhabenheit. Auch noch die folgende Stelle Die schnellen Schwingen der Gedanken,
Wogegen Schall und Zeit und Wind,<sup>20</sup>
Und selbst des Lichtes Flügel langsam sind,
Ermüden über dir und hoffen keine Schranken.
Ich haufe ungeheure Zahlen,
Gebirge Millionen auf,
Ich wälze Zeit auf Zeit und Welt auf Welten hin,
Und wenn ich auf der Mark<sup>21</sup> des Endlichen nun bin,
Und von der fürchterlichen Höhe
Mit Schwindeln wieder nach dir sehe,
Ist alle Macht der Zahl, vermehrt mit tausend Mahlen
Noch nicht ein Theil von dir.

Wie ausgewählt ist jedes Wort, um mit jedem Begriff mehrere Gedanken zu vereinigen.

Eben so ein Gedanke eines izeit vergessenen Alten Deutschen Dichters Brockes,<sup>18</sup> der von Gott sagt, er sei ein Zirkel, dessen Mittelpunkt allenthalben, dessen Umkreis nirgends ist.<sup>22</sup> Kann man sich erhabner ausdrücken? Und liegt hier nicht die Erhabenheit darin, daß wir diesen großen Gedanken nie ganz zu Ende denken können, daß sich immer noch neue Begriffe darbieten, wenn man ihn auch hundertmal überlesen hat?

Zu den erhabenen Gedanken gehören auch Gemälde, Bilder und Vergleichen, ich will zu zeigen versuchen, daß die Erhabenheit hier auch bloß in der mehr oder weniger großen Menge der Nebengedanken liege.

<sup>18</sup> Cf. Deutsche Nationallit., 41<sup>2</sup>, p. 110. The authentic text has "rung" and "schwung."

<sup>19</sup> Cf. Deutsche Nationallit., ibid. Quoted, with three serious errors, in J. G. Sulzer's Allgemeine Theorie der schönen Künste, 2. Teil, neue verm. zweite Aufl. (Leipzig, 1792), sub "Erhaben," p. 99.

<sup>20</sup> Accurate text in Deutsche Nationallit. 41<sup>2</sup>, p. 111: "Zeit und Schall und Wind." The first four lines are quoted by Sulzer (ibid., p. 98) with "finden" instead of "hoffen" in line 4.

<sup>21</sup> The original has "wann . . . March."

<sup>22</sup> In Irdisches Vergnügen in Gott. A favorite concept of Brockes, suggested in his shorter poems, too.

Wenn ich in eine schöne<sup>23</sup> Gegend trete, die mit allem Zauber des Reizes geschmückt ist, so werde ich empfinden, Erinnerungen und Traume werden mich umgeben, alles wird mich aus meinen gewöhnlichen Gefühlen heraus reißen,—aber wenn ich auf einer Klippe stehe, die sich weit uübers Meer hinaus buckt, die Unendlichkeit vor mir, unten nur unermeßliche Abgrunde, da wird die Seele sich erhoben fühlen, aus meinen Gefühlen werden sich große erhabene Gedanken entwickeln, ich werde mich selbst in der großen Masse verlihren, und tausend Gedanken von Ewigkeit und Unendlichkeit werden sich tief in mein Inneres graben.

Wenn man folgende beide Stellen vergleicht, wird man diese Anmerkung bestätigt finden, Uz beschreibt einen Frühlingsmorgen:

O welche frische Luft haucht vom bebuschten<sup>23</sup> Hügel!
 Welch angenehmer West durchzieht
 Mit rauschendem, bethautem Flügel
 Das<sup>24</sup> holde Thal, wo Alles grünt und blüht!
 Hier wo die Grazien sich ihre Blumen holen,
 Hier seh' ich, wie der Morgen lacht,
 Der unter duftenden<sup>25</sup> Viole
 Und beim Gesang der Vögel aufgewacht.

Gedanken wurden diese sanften Empfindungen stören,—aber wenn Pindar in der ersten pythischen Ode den Ausbruch des Ätna beschreibt, da wird das Gefühl den Gedanken untergeordnet, in der furchterlichen Beschreibung Sh. von der hohen Klippe zu Dover drängen sich tausend Gedanken herbei:

Wie furchtbar grausig ist's, den Blick so tief
 Hinabzuwerfen! Krähn und Raben, die
 Die mittlere Luft durchfliegen, scheinen
 Kaum wie die Käfer, in des Felsen Mitte
 Hangt einer, welcher Muscheln sammelt; ein Gefährlich Handwerk, er ist kaum so groß
 Als wie sein Kopf, die Fischer am Gestade
 Sind nur wie Mause, jenes große Schiff
 Am Anker ist nicht größer als sein Boot,
 Das Boot wird von dem Auge kaum gesehn.
 Die Woge, die sich murmelnd an den tausend
 Gesteinen bricht, wird nicht so hoch gehört.<sup>25</sup>

<sup>23</sup> The original has "bebuschten." Cf. Samtliche poetische Werke von J. P. Uz, 1. Band (Leipzig, 1768), p. 191. The title of the poem is "Empfindungen an einem Frühlingsmorgen."

<sup>24</sup> The original has "dieß."

<sup>25</sup> The original has "duftenden."

<sup>26</sup> Shakespeare's King Lear, iv, 6:

How fearful
 And dizzy 'tis, to cast one's eyes so low!
 The crows and choughs that wing the midway air
 Show scarce so gross as beetles: half way down
 Hangs one that gathers samphire, dreadful trade!
 Methinks he seems no bigger than his head:

Jeder neue Zug, der das Gemählde vermehrt, bietet neue Gedanken dar, die Vögel in der Luft, unter ihnen der Muschelsammler, nichts ist in der Beschreibung unnötig, und kein Wort ist da, das uns nicht neue Gedanken zuführte; darum ist die Stelle erhaben, und man kann sie unzählige Mal lesen, und immer wieder etwas Neues dabei denken.

Am deutlichsten sieht man den Unterschied des Sanften und Erhabenen, wenn man Leben in ein Gemählde bringt, man denke sich eine Landschaft<sup>27</sup> (in einem Schauspiel oder Epos) wo auf einer umgesturzten Saule ein Bettler sitzt und weint,—vielleicht ein ruhrender, ein ergreifender Anblick, der unser Mitleid erregt, aber man sage aus, daß dieser weinende Bettler Cajus<sup>13</sup> Marius<sup>13</sup> sei, der auf den Trummern von Karthago seine Thranen vergießt, so wird aus diesem Act des Mitleids Erhabenheit werden, bloß weil ich mit dieser Vorstellung eine Menge von Gedanken verbinden,<sup>28</sup> ich kann diesen Begriff hundertmal von neuem denken, ohne diese Gedanken ganz zu erschöpfen. Jeder blinde Greis, der auf einer Laute Gesänge spielt, ist ein schöner<sup>13</sup> Anblick (man sehe oben den Begriff von schon) aber nur der blinde Greis Homer, oder Ossian machen den Anblick erhaben, der bettelnde Belisar giebt uns Gedanken, ein bettelnder Blinder nur Ruhung.<sup>29</sup>

Die Erhabenheit der Bilder besteht ebenfalls nur in Gedanken, der Chor in Sh. Heinrich V sagt:

Denn izt sitzt die Erwartung in der Luft,
Und hält ein Schwert, vom Griff bis an die Spitze
Mit kaiserlichen und mit Königskronen
Bedeckt, für ihn und sein Gefolge.<sup>30</sup>

Daß die Erwartung in der Luft schwebt, das Zweifelhafte der Schlacht, daß die Gefahr vor der Idee der Belohnung verschwindet, diese Gedanken machen das Bild erhaben, nimmt man diese fort, so kann ein Bild noch immer Schönheit behalten, aber die Erhabenheit geht durchaus verloren.

---

The fishermen, that walk upon the beach,
Appear like mice, and yond tall anchoring bark,
Diminish'd to her cock; her cock, a buoy
Almost too small for sight: the murmuring surge,
That on the unnumber'd idle pebbles chafes,
Cannot be heard so high.

Baudissin's translation, first published in 1832 (cf. Shakespeares dramatische Werke übers. v. A. W. v. Schlegel u. Ludwig Tieck, 11. Band [Berlin, 1840], p. 98), is more accurate in form and content.

<sup>27</sup> The words "auf einen" are crossed out here.

<sup>28</sup> Quoted very freely (but in quotation marks!) by Regener, p. 21.

<sup>29</sup> Quoted by Regener, p. 21.

<sup>30</sup> King Henry V, Act II, Prolog:

For now sits Expectation in the air,
And hides a sword from hilts unto the point
With crowns imperial, crowns and coronets,
Promised to Harry and his followers.

Schlegel's translation, first published in 1801 (cf. op. cit., 2. Band [Berlin, 1840], p. 131), is more accurate in form and content

Eben dies findet bei den Vergleichen statt, und wie nothwendig die Gedanken zur Erhabenheit sind, kann man wieder daraus sehen, daß selbst viele Bilder, die an sich nicht erhaben sind, durch die Gegenstände, mit denen sie verglichen werden, erhaben werden, bloß dadurch, daß ich nun eine Menge von Gedanken an dieses Bild knüpfe. Ein Esel, der von Knaben aus dem Kornfelde gejagt wird, ist nichts weniger als eine erhabene Vorstellung, wenn wir aber die bei uns bloß konventionelle Verachtlichkeit des Esels vergessen, und Homer nun den Ajax, der von vielen Feinden verfolgt, langsam und ruhig, ohne seine Schritte dadurch zu beschleunigen, mit einem Waldesel vergleicht, der ein Kornfeld zertritt, und ohne sich nach den Knaben, seinen Verfolgern umzusehn, zurückweicht,—so ist das Bild erhaben.

Dieses Gleichniß Homers ist sehr oft als unedel getadelt worden, und selbst der neuste Herausgeber Virgils<sup>31</sup> zieht sehr oft dessen Vergleichen denen des Homer vor, wenn der lateinische Dichter sie von dem Griechischen entlehnt hat, aber eben in der Erhabenheit unterscheiden sich vorzüglich das große und das kleinere Genie; der wahre Dichter wird selten einen Fehlgriff thun, während der Nachahmer oft ins Burleske fällt, um seinen Vorgänger noch zu übertreffen, ich will nur ein paar Beispiele geben, weil sie ganz gleich den Satz bestätigen, daß ohne Gedanken keine Erhabenheit möglich sei.

Im vierzehnten Buch der Iliade kämpft Ajax mit dem Hektor, eine der größten Situationen im Homer, Ajax wirft den Hektor mit einem sehr großen Stein auf die Brust, den Stein beschreibt Homer näher, sehr groß, und sagt dann vom Ajax:

Schleuderte gleich einem Kräusel ihn, daß er tanzend sich drehte.<sup>32</sup>
στρούμβος war bei den Griechen gewöhnlicher Krausel aus Erz.

Ajax wird um so größer, da er das Fels Stuck nur wie ein Spielwerk so vor sich hin wirft, Virgil will hier den Homer verbessern, verfehlt aber ganz und gar das Tertium, durch das die Erhabenheit entsteht, nämlich das Hinweisen auf die Verachtlichkeit, im 7<sup>ten</sup> Buch der Aeneide beschreibt er die Wuth der Amata;<sup>33</sup> sie wird von einer wilden Begeisterung durch die Stadt gejagt,—und vergleicht diesen Zustand nun sehr weitläufig mit einem Kräusel, den Knaben umherpeitschen,—bei diesem Vergleich haben wir weiter keine Gedanken, als daß sie nur lächerlich erscheint, die wuthende Amata erscheint uns nicht furchtbar, sondern burlesk.

In eben diesem Gesange kömmt Alecto zum Turnus, und haucht ihm einen wüthenden Enthusiasmus ein, in dem er Krieg und Schlachten brennend wünscht, man verlangt kein Bild, oder wenigstens nur solches, das uns diese Wuth recht groß, passend und fürchterlich darstellt; er aber vergleicht sie mit einem Kessel, worin Wasser gekocht wird, das endlich schäumend überläuft. Das Tertium der Vergleichung ist wirklich burlesk, aber um dies noch zu verstärken, mahlt der Dichter auch noch Nebenzüge aus, wie das Wasser rauscht, wie das Holz untergelegt wird.—Auf diese Lächerlichkeit wäre Virgil gewiß nicht gefallen, wenn er nicht zuweilen den Homer ohne Geschmack hätte nachahmen und übertreffen wollen, denn eine ganz ähnliche Stelle findet sich wieder im 21 Buch der Ilias; nur macht der Zusammenhang und die Absicht der Dichter hier einen sehr großen Unterschied.

<sup>31</sup> The reference is either to Eclogae, Georgica et Aeneidos libri XII cum notis novis. . . Chr. Junker, Leipzig, 1787; or to Bucolica et Georgica, Hirtenlieder und wirtschaftliche Gedichte nach Heyne, mit deutschen erklärenden Anmerkungen von Johann G. Brieger, Grottkau, 1790.

<sup>32</sup> Iliad, xiv, 413.

Der zurnende Hephaistos laßt nemlich dort den Fluß Xanthus so aufbrausen und Homer vergleicht sein Schaumen mit einem kochenden Keßel. Dieses kleine Bild vergrößert das Große, es stellt mir auf die sinnlichste Art die Macht des Gottes dar, und so wird Homer in eben den Versen erhaben, in denen Virgil lacherlich ist, bloß dadurch, daß durch die Vergleichung Gedanken in uns erregt werden, und doch lobt der geschmackvolle Herausgeber des Virgil<sup>33</sup> diese letzte Stelle und zieht sie der homerischen vor, weil er die Vergleichung mit der Wuth schicklicher findet. Die genauere Ausmahlung der Nebenzüge, die er auch lobt, kann gewiß nicht dazu dienen, den Virgil in ein schöneres Licht, als Homer zu setzen.

Eben darum, weil Gedanken das Erhabene bilden, kann die Allegorie, bei der Gedanken der Hauptzweck sind, sehr erhaben werden, obgleich noch wenige Dichter mit Gluck in diesem Fach gearbeitet haben. Daß ich nicht allegorische Gedichte meine, wie die Fairy Queen von Spenser, brauche ich wohl nicht zu erinnern, sondern als kleine Theile, als Figuren eines Gedichts, oder als kleine für sich bestehende Gedichte. Die christliche Dogmatik und die Weitschweifigkeit abgerechnet, findet man viele Erhabenheiten in Miltons Allegorie vom Tode und der Sunde; eben so in einer übrigens sehr schlechten Allegorie Ariosts, in der er die schrecklichen Wirkungen der Melancholie beschreibt.—Daß die bekannte Allegorie des Horaz: O navis, referent in mare u.s.w.,<sup>34</sup> nicht wirkt, liegt eben, dunkelt mich, darin, daß sie uns nicht sowohl mehrere, als nur einen Gedanken giebt, der durch das ganze Gedicht herrscht, sie ist also mehr witzig als erhaben, denn dadurch unterscheidet sich der Witz von der Erhabenheit, daß er nur einen Gedanken enthält, den ich sogleich begreife und der mich beim zweiten Denken keine andre Seite entdecken laßt.

Mehrere Travestirer und Liebhaber der Travestien haben sich eingebildet, man könne einen großen Gedanken wie einen Handschuh umkehren und ihn dadurch burlesk machen,—sie haben darin einen Theil ihres Genusses gesucht, allein es gehort nur wenig Überlegung dazu, um einzusehn, daß der Gedanke immer derselbe bleiben muß; und daß Blumauer keine einzige seiner Plituden dem Virgil, sondern allein seinem eignen Genie zu verdanken hat.

Ich habe bis izt gezeigt, daß die Erhabenheit der Gedanken<sup>35</sup> bloß durch die Menge der Gedanken entstehe, es bleibt mir nun noch übrig, den Beweis zu versuchen, daß dies auch bei den übrigen Vorstellungen der Fall sei. Man wird sich nemlich meines festgesetzten Unterschiedes zwischen Gedanken und Idee noch von vorher erinnern.

Here the manuscript proper breaks off. It is followed by a continuation of about seven hundred words of notes, written in an extremely careless, illegible hand. We summarize the contents as far as possible:

<sup>33</sup> Here Tieck probably has Heyne in mind. His edition first appeared in Leipzig in 1767-75.

<sup>34</sup> Odes, No. xiv.

"Der Mensch ist in zwei Zuständen," writes Tieck. He is either "leidenschaftslos" or "in Leidenschaft." Longinus teaches that "Pathos (= Leidenschaft)" can enhance the sublime. "Nur große Leidenschaften sind der Erhabenheit fähig.—Je mehr der Mensch seine thierischen Kräfte in Seelenkräfte verwandelt, je edler wird er selbst—je mehr die thierische Antipathie zur Idee, die thierische Sympathie Liebe wird, je höher steht der Mensch. Leidenschaften haben drei Stufen: Wohlwollen, Zärtlichkeit, Liebe—Haß, Zorn, Wuth—Feigheit, Furcht, Angst—Kummer, Gram, Verzweiflung—Selbstdunkel, Selbstliebe, Stolz. Das bloß Schöne liegt in der Mitte." The poet has the advantage of speech over the artist. Some passions, for instance, envy, greed, avarice, always remain cold. They are suitable for comedy. Passions too much aroused spoil the illusion in a drama, perhaps also in an epic poem.

As Tieck himself indicates, his chief source was Longinus. But he mentions also Henry Home (Elements of Criticism, 1762 ff.), Heinecke, and Schlosser. Among other contemporary works on esthetics, he may have used the essay Vom Erhabenen by Conrad Curtius, the Theorie der schönen Wissenschaften by J. A. Eberhard, the Philosophie der schönen Künste of J. C. König, the Theorie der schönen Wissenschaften by A. H. Schott and the Theorie der schönen Künste of J. Riedel.

Internal evidence makes it fairly certain that he consulted the article "Erhaben" in the famous Allgemeine Theorie der schönen Künste of Johann Georg Sulzer,<sup>35</sup> a work which may almost be called the secular Bible of the German Rationalists. Several ideas of Sulzer are reechoed by Tieck, especially the notions that thinking sublimely must be inborn<sup>36</sup> and that sublimity can reside only in ideas, while the means of expressing it are of secondary importance.<sup>37</sup> More important evidence for Tieck's use of Sulzer is the fact that two passages from Haller's "Unvollkommenes Gedicht über die Ewigkeit," which are inaccurately and partially quoted by Sulzer, appear in corrected and amplified form in Tieck. That the latter was well acquainted with Sulzer's work is proved by a reference in a letter to Wackenroder of June 12, 1792, and by a quotation in his 1793-94 draft of Das Buch über Shakespeare.<sup>38</sup>

Aside from its indication of Tieck's wide early reading and its interest in a purely esthetic question, the importance and significance of Über das Erhabene may be considered from several points of view.

1. At this time, it will be noted, Tieck, like Friedrich Schlegel, still admired antiquity and scorned his own age, particularly on account of its aversion to such lofty ideas as Patriotism, Liberty, and Sacrifice. In this respect he opposes Sulzer, who believed that the moderns were

<sup>35</sup> The first edition of Sulzer, in two volumes, appeared in Leipzig, 1771-74. It is possible that Tieck used the second edition. See note 19 above.

<sup>36</sup> Sulzer, op. cit., 2nd ed., II, 108.

<sup>37</sup> Loc. cit., p. 105.

<sup>38</sup> von der Leyen, Wackenroders Werke und Briefe (Jena, 1910), II, 67; Lüdtke, Das Buch über Shakespeare, p. 138.

more successful than ancients in treating the sublime (2nd ed., II, 104).

2. Tieck had a decided preference for Homer as against Virgil.

3. It will be noted, too, that in spite of the literary references in which Über das Erhabene abounds, Tieck's main thesis, his definition of sublimity and his distinction between beauty, horror and sublimity are, on the whole, original. Yet his concepts are still far from deserving the appellation "Romantic," for he operates exclusively with ideas and thoughts and is just as Rationalistic as in his other early critical works. His attitude is still worlds removed from that of the lines in his essay Die Tone, written in 1798 for the Phantasien über die Kunst under the inspiration of Wackenroder:

Liebe denkt in süßen Tönen,
Denn Gedanken stehn zu fern.
Nur in Tönen mag sie gern
Alles was sie will verschonen.<sup>39</sup>

But the development from the beautiful to the sublime, which he suggests, is a trait of Romanticism, according to Stefansky, Das Wesen der deutschen Romantik, p. 125.

4. In his remarks on landscape, and particularly his fascination for the view from the cliffs of Dover as described in King Lear, we have the typical reaction of Tieck, whose ideal Naturbild was always that of Central Germany, but who was thrilled and awed by thought of the sea.

5. Most interesting are the comparatively favorable remarks on allegory. In the letter to Wackenroder of June 12, 1792, referred to above, he expressed himself as hostile to it. Use of the device scarcely occurs in his works until some four years later, when he made the acquaintance of Jakob Bohme. For a while thereafter, especially while he was writing Genoveva (1799) and Octavian (1800-02), allegory became almost an obsession. At any rate, the passage in Über das Erhabene on this subject suggests the erroneousness of the current notion<sup>40</sup> that Bohme first aroused his taste for allegories.

6. The verse-translation of the two Shakespearean passages—from Henry V and King Lear—are, so far as we know, Tieck's earliest efforts in this field. Schlegel's rendering of Henry V appeared in 1801, Voss's King Lear was done in 1806, and Baudissin's came out in 1832.

7. Finally, it is instructive to note that Tieck quite ignores French criticism and literature.

EDWIN H. ZEYDEL

University of Cincinnati

<sup>39</sup> von der Leyen, op. cit., I, 297.

<sup>40</sup> See E. Edernheimer, J. Bohme und die Romantiker, Heidelberg, 1904; W. Feilchenfeld, Der Einfluss J. Böhm's auf Novalis, Berlin, 1922; and F. Strich, Die Mythologie der deutschen Literatur von Klopstock bis Wagner, 2 vols., Halle, 1910.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF LAMIA

IN an article Poetry of Sensation or of Thought?<sup>1</sup> I attempted to show how Endymion and Hyperion: A Fragment are related to the æsthetic problem that Keats first analyzed in Sleep and Poetry. At that time I suggested that the Odes and Lamia, following as they do the abandoning of Hyperion: A Fragment, are the outpourings of a mind released at last from the self-imposed duty of writing a poetry of humanitarian philosophy and allowed to indulge its creative genius for the poetry of sensation. It was my contention (and still is) that Keats had been trying to force himself, like his own Apollo, to accept "Knowledge enormous" as Beauty—knowledge "of the agony and strife of human hearts"; whereas at least one half of his being was affirming passionately that Feeling, particularly that which passes through the refinery of the creative imagination, is Beauty. It was his acceptance of this side of his nature that produced most of the poems written in the spring of 1819. But during the summer of 1819 Keats plunged once more into the old conflict. It will be the purpose of this paper to show how Lamia and The Fall of Hyperion are related to it.

The poem Lamia must be admitted to have some bearing on the old problem of the relative merits of feeling and knowledge not only because the plot deals with the destruction of a snake-woman, representing sensuous enjoyment, by the cold stare of Apollonius, the philosopher, and the subsequent death of the lamia's lover; but also because Keats, in the famous lines (II, 221-238) beginning, "What wreath for Lamia? What for Lycius?" and containing the question, "Do not all charms fly At the mere touch of cold philosophy?" makes a definite statement against knowledge and in favor of sensuousness. These details in the poem have thrown the critics into a state of admitted bewilderment. Sir Sidney Colvin<sup>2</sup> is puzzled by the "moral" of the poem and cannot determine "the effect intended to be made on our imaginative sympathies." The lines in question, he says:

have not only the fault of breaking the story at a critical point and anticipating its issue, but challenge the mind to untimely questionings and reflections. . . . If she [Lamia] were indeed a thing of bale under a mask of beauty, was not the friend and tutor bound to unmask her, even though the pupil lacked strength to survive the loss of his illusion? Is there not in all this a slackening of imaginative and intellectual grasp?

<sup>1</sup> PMLA, XLV, 1129-38.

<sup>2</sup> John Keats, 3rd edition (1920), pp. 407-409.

Mr. Hugh I'A. Fausset says:<sup>3</sup>

Lamia . . . is seriously compromised in its climax by the artificial conflict of philosophy and love. . . . For although we can accept the withering away of Lamia, . . . Lycius should only have been the more vitally alive for being freed from the poison of his delusion. That he should die of such poison is intelligible, but not [that he should die] of its cure.

Amy Lowell,<sup>4</sup> while sympathizing with Lycius, finds that there is no solution to the moral problem in the poem, for the last lines leave her wondering:

is the death of Lycius due to the fact that he has discovered Lamia's true status, or simply the result of her being torn from him? Keats has no answer to give, the puzzle is as much his as the readers'.

Mr. E. De Selincourt,<sup>5</sup> while not in one sense bewildered, is surely in another sense confused when he attempts to explain the meaning of the poem by insisting that it represents the agony of the struggle in the soul of a man who clings to the false at the same time he desires the true, who aspires after the ideal even whilst he is unable to relax his hold on those very shadows, not realities, which he knows well enough to despise.

There is no evidence in the poem that, after he meets Lamia, Lycius "desires the true" or "aspires after the ideal" or "despises" the shadow. Quite the contrary.

Professor Garrod<sup>6</sup> dismisses the problem as nonexistent by stating that Keats wastes no sympathy on Lamia at all, apparently forgetting the fact that if the poet gives Lamia a wreath of willow and adder's tongue, he also compares her to a rainbow, to the wings of angels, to the haunted air—all, together with "tender-person'd Lamia," things of beauty destroyed by philosophy.

This mélange of uncertainty, misinterpretation, and negation is, I think, wholly unjustifiable, for there exists a definite indication of the exact literal meaning of the poem in Woodhouse's letter to Taylor, written September 20, 1819, describing a meeting with Keats, at which time the poet read Lamia to Woodhouse.<sup>7</sup> Woodhouse's words to Taylor as he describes the ending of the poem are, "The lover is told that she was a 'Lamia' & goes mad for the loss of her, & dies." Since from the context of the letter it is clear that Woodhouse and Keats had discussed the poem at some length, it is fair to assume that Woodhouse's précis

<sup>3</sup> Keats: A Study in Development, pp. 84-85.

<sup>4</sup> John Keats, II, 308-309.

<sup>5</sup> The Poems of John Keats, 5th edition (1926), pp. xli-xlii.

<sup>6</sup> Keats, p. 62.

<sup>7</sup> For full text of this letter, see Lowell, John Keats, II, 320.

represents Keats' own interpretation of the ending. If this is true, it follows that Keats, however regrettable some of his critics may find it, did actually say that the love for Lamia, a snake-woman, was so precious to Lycius that he could not live without her. It should be pointed out here, as Mr. J. M. Murry has already shown,<sup>8</sup> that in adapting the narrative from Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, Keats deliberately manufactured the death of Lycius, thus giving further weight to the contention.

But there is more to the poem than this literal interpretation. What do the lamia and Apollonius stand for? The answer to this question is to be found in the light thrown upon Lamia by certain poems antedating it and by certain letters and poems that in chronology surround it. Mr. Murry has already studied the letters in this connection;<sup>9</sup> but he arrives at the questionable conclusion that Lamia is Fanny Brawne and Apollonius is Charles Brown. He is led to his interpretation by the theory that at this time (summer of 1819) Keats was jealous of Brown, offering as evidence of this jealousy a selected passage from a letter written by Keats to Brown, 23 September, 1819, purporting to read:

If you live at Hampstead next winter—I like Fanny Brawne and I cannot help it. On that account I had better not live there.<sup>10</sup>

But it is obvious from the letter as a whole that the sentence quoted does not in any way mean that Keats is jealous of Brown and that he will for that reason refuse to live at Hampstead. The letter throughout stresses Keats' determination to become more independent, to cease relying on his friends, and to live alone.

I had got in a habit of mind of looking towards you as a help in all difficulties. This very habit would be the parent of idleness and difficulties. You will see it as a duty I owe myself to break the neck of it. I do nothing for my subsistence—make no exertion. At the end of another year you shall applaud me, not for verses, but for conduct. If you live at Hampstead next winter—I like***** and I cannot help it. On that account I had better not live there. While I have some immediate cash, I had better settle myself quietly and fag on as others do.

<sup>8</sup> Keats and Shakespeare, p. 157.

<sup>9</sup> Op. cit., 157-166.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., 159.—The letter is given in full, with asterisks in place of Fanny Brawne's name, in M. B. Forman's The Letters of John Keats, II, 430-432. But there are several problems in this passage. Forman gives as his source for this letter the 1848 ed. of R. M. Milnes' (Lord Houghton's) Life, Letters, and Literary Remains of John Keats. Yet curiously enough that book, in giving this letter, does not include the words, "If you live at Hampstead next winter—I like Fanny Brawne and I cannot help it. On that account I had better not live there?"—the very words that Mr. Murry makes so much of. The words do, however, appear in Lord Houghton's papers, now Lord Crewe's "John Keats' Transcripts and Letters," where this letter is in Charles Brown's transcript. But dots occur instead of the words "Fanny Brawne." I am greatly indebted to Charles Williams, Esq., of the Oxford University Press, London, for helping me straighten out this detail.

Is it not perfectly clear that Keats means here to cut himself off from Brown not because he is jealous, but because he must become independent of Brown's services and Fanny's attraction?

Now if there is no evidence that Keats was jealous of Brown at this time, Mr. Murry's argument that Apollonius is Brown falls to pieces. But it remains clear that Apollonius stands for something in conflict with Lamia, some strong power of which she lives in terror. It is the theory of this paper that their hostility is another version of the struggle that Keats had already portrayed in Sleep and Poetry, Endymion, and Hyperion: A Fragment. In these poems he presented the poet torn between two desires—one to attain the ideal of humanitarian philosophy, "to sooth the cares and lift the thoughts of man," and the other to allow himself to write the poetry of sensuous delight. Sleep and Poetry offers no solution to the problem other than a confession of his preference for the latter course; Endymion attempts a compromise by stating that the two are the same (a position that Keats found impossible to maintain); and Hyperion: A Fragment tries to express an unwilling conviction that Apollo, the new God of Poetry, is rightly a symbol of Knowledge and Humanitarianism. But the poem breaks off because the author cannot believe what he is trying to force himself to say.<sup>11</sup> In Lamia the philosopher and the woman once more represent the conflict. There is no verbal proof that the Apollo of Hyperion: A Fragment and the Apollonius of Lamia are one and the same. In appearance they are poles apart: Apollo young, "morning-bright"; Apollonius, old, "with curl'd gray beard, sharp eyes, and smooth bald crown." But in spirit they are the same inasmuch as both represent a humanitarian ideal. The young god says of himself (III, 113-118):

Knowledge enormous makes a God of me.
Names, deeds, gray legends, dire events, rebellions,
Majesties, sovran voices, agonies,
Creations and destroyings, all at once
Pour into the wide hollows of my brain,
And deify me.

Old Apollonius is one who would embody the same kind of knowledge. He is described as "sage," a "trusty guide," a "good instructor." "Robed in philosophic gown," he may be expected to be one to ponder on the problems of mankind and teach Lycius to do likewise. But under Lamia's spell, Lycius deserts Apollonius and lives alone with his love, calling his tutor a "ghost of folly." It is this desertion of the world of mankind for his own personal delight that is the sin from which Apol-

<sup>11</sup> This whole matter is discussed at length in the article referred to in note 1, supra.

Ionius tries to free Lycius by destroying Lamia, only in so doing he also destroys his pupil. He is the serious, purposive life as opposed to the life of pleasure. He is the opposing force to sensuous indulgence, just as in Sleep and Poetry the "nobler life" of "the agony and strife of human hearts" is the opposing force to the joy in "almond blossoms and sweet cinnamon," and just as in Hyperion: A Fragment the new Apollo, deified by knowledge, is the opposing force to the old gods of pleasure.

These poems all represent a struggle between sensuousness and some sort of more humanitarian interest. In both Sleep and Poetry and Hyperion: A Fragment it is obvious that that interest involves an awareness of the sufferings of mankind and an attempt to ease them; in Lamia the fact that Lycius falls into conflict with Apollonius by absenting himself from human problems would seem to indicate that Keats thought of Apollonius as a humanitarian, too. He seems to stand for a philosophical regimen such as the poet in Sleep and Poetry argued himself into holding essential to the richest poetic fulfillment, but which even then in his heart he admitted to be unsympathetic to his more spontaneous poetic creed.

And what is Lamia? Colvin says she is "a thing of bale under a mask of beauty"; Fausset calls her love in conflict with philosophy; Miss Lowell says she is a dream in conflict with reality; and De Selincourt calls her the false in conflict with the true. All these interpretations are up to a certain point correct, for there can be no doubt that in Lamia there is something hateful to Apollonius. But it should be emphatically pointed out that the corruptive element in her is not recognized until Apollonius discloses it. However baleful she may be, her poison is something that only Apollonius is aware of, and may for that reason not be to Keats as evil as the above critics have stated. Moreover, when at the end, Lamia "with a fearful scream" vanishes from sight, Lycius also dies, finding, as Woodhouse said, that he could not live without her. We may put it this way: Lamia is something that the philosophic mind hates as corruptive, but which to Lycius is a sweet delight. She is the antagonist to Apollonius—the principle of feeling as opposed to thought, of sensuousness as opposed to knowledge. She is the other ideal of poetry that in Sleep and Poetry Keats found so attractive, but which, before he learned to know himself, he sometimes, in a noble mood, thought he ought eventually to grow away from. He was never able, however, to grow completely away from it. Its attraction was too strong, too much an inner part of his nature to allow him to repudiate sensuousness for what he kept telling himself was the more lofty ideal. The poems Sleep and Poetry, Endymion, and Hyperion: A Fragment all demonstrate that inability. Lamia, it is now suggested, continues the theme. But it not merely portrays the preference of Lycius for Lamia, the poetry of sensation, rather than for Apollonius, the poetry of thought; it actually presents Apollonius as a destructive rather than a constructive force, disclosing evil where only delight had been and killing pleasure by "brow-beating her fair form." The poem is an admission of the greater strength of Apollonius, but it is at the same time a bitter lament that such should be the case. Keats recognizes the superiority of a purposive existence; but the irony of the poem lies in the fact that that very purposefulness destroys the only thing which for Lycius makes life worth living and therefore destroys him, too.

Whatever light may be thrown on the meaning of Lamia by reading it with the chronologically earlier Sleep and Poetry and Hyperion: A Fragment in mind, is further increased if we turn to the writings that are immediately in point of time connected with it. In order to follow the argument, it will be necessary to remember that a month and a half intervenes between the time Keats finished Part I of Lamia and the time he turned to Part II, during which interval his mind, as I shall hope to prove, was deeply concerned with the problem discussed above. It will be helpful to put down in order the events of his life during the period under examination.

Keats went to the Isle of Wight, at the end of June, 1819.<sup>12</sup>

On July 12 he writes Reynolds that the first half of Lamia is completed.<sup>13</sup> He is also writing Otho the Great, a pot-boiler suggested by Brown.

In August he goes to Winchester.<sup>14</sup>

August 14 he writes Bailey that Lamia is still half-finished, that he has been writing The Fall of Hyperion, and has completed four acts of Otho.<sup>15</sup>

Otho is finished August 24.<sup>16</sup>

Lamia is finished September 5.<sup>17</sup>

He goes to London September 12.<sup>18</sup>

He returns to Winchester September 15.<sup>19</sup>

Ode to Autumn is composed September 19.<sup>20</sup>

The statement is made on September 21 that Hyperion is abandoned.<sup>21</sup>

During this period there are seven letters to Fanny Brawne.<sup>22</sup> They show a curious—and I think significant—change of attitude toward her, a change that throws important light on Lamia. The first two were <sup>12</sup> M. B. Forman, Letters of John Keats (Oxford, 1931), II, 380.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid., II, 388.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., II, 399.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., II, 399.

<sup>16</sup> Ibid., II, 404.

<sup>17</sup> Ibid., II, 414.

<sup>18</sup> Ibid., II, 416.

<sup>19</sup> Ibid., II, 421.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., II, 418.

<sup>21</sup> Ibid., II, 419.

<sup>22</sup> Ibid., II, 381-384 (July 1); II, 386-387 (July 8); II, 389-391 (July 15); II, 392-394 (July 25); II, 397-399 (Aug. 5); II, 400-403 (Aug. 16); and II, 416-417 (Sept. 13).

written before July 12; that is, during the composition of the first half of Lamia. These two letters show deep affection; the first asks Fanny to admit the cruelty of her enthrallment, but the question is obviously not meant to be taken seriously, for he insists that she write a letter "rich as a draught of poppies to intoxicate me—write the softest words and kiss them that I may at least touch my lips where yours have been."<sup>23</sup> The second confesses:<sup>24</sup>

I never knew before what such a love as you have made me feel was, I did not believe in it, my fancy was afraid of it, lest it should burn me up But if you will love me, though there may be some fire, 'twill not be more than we can bear when moistened and bedewed with Pleasures.

But within a few days, the tone of the letters changes. He writes to her pathetically on July 25, after he has finished Part I of Lamia, of his sense of inferiority, of his enslavement to her:<sup>25</sup>

My dear love, I cannot believe there was ever or ever could be any thing to admire in me especially as far as sight goes—I cannot be admired, I am not a thing to be admired. You are, I love you; all I can bring you is a swooning admiration of your Beauty. I hold that place among Men which snubnos'd brunettes with meeting eyebrows do among women—they are trash to me—unless I should find one among them with a fire in her heart like the one that burns in mine. You absorb me in spite of myself—you alone, for I look not forward with any pleasure to what is call'd being settled in the world; I tremble at domestic cares—yet for you I would meet them, though if it would leave you the happier, I would rather die than do so I have two luxuries to brood over in my walks, your Loveliness and the hour of my death. O that I could have possession of them both in the same minute.

Here is confusion—and here is fear. Why? Because in this same letter of July 25, just before he writes the above words, he says: "Forgive me if I wander a little this evening, for I have been all day employ'd in a very abstract Poem and I am deep in love with you." His love and his poem have upset him. The abstract poem is certainly not Lamia, for he had written on July 12 to Reynolds that the first part of Lamia was done<sup>26</sup> and wrote Bailey on August 14 that Lamia was [still] half-finished.<sup>27</sup> He therefore did not touch Lamia between July 12 and August 24 when he finished Otho.<sup>28</sup> But aside from his work on Otho we know that other work was in hand while Lamia was lying idle, because in the August 14 letter to Bailey he definitely mentions work on Hyperion. It may safely be concluded then that the "abstract poem" mentioned on July 25 is Hyperion, which means the second Hyperion,

<sup>23</sup> Ibid., II, 382.

<sup>26</sup> Ibid., II, 388.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid., II, 386.

<sup>27</sup> Ibid., II, 399.

<sup>25</sup> Ibid., II, 393.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid., II, 404.

the one entitled The Fall of Hyperion. A Vision, a reworking of the earlier narrative.

What is the significance of Keats' statement that he is confused because he has been working on an abstract poem (The Fall of Hyperion) and in love with Fanny? Why does his love for Fanny grow embittered at this point? The answer is to be found in understanding what effect the revision of Hyperion would have upon Keats. It would obviously call to mind the struggle that had so torn him the preceding April. It would revive the old dilemma—the poetry of sensation or the poetry of thought? It is clear from the Fall of Hyperion that Keats still believes he ought to think of the poet as a philosopher and of himself as one not yet elevated to that high rank:

. . . sure a poet is a sage,
A humanist, a physician to all men
That I am none I feel, as vultures feel
They are no birds when eagles are abroad (I, 189–192).

And Moneta characterizes Keats:

Art thou not of the dreamer tribe?
The poet and the dreamer are distinct,
Diverse, sheer opposite, antipodes.
The one pours out a balm upon the world,
The other vexes it (I, 198–202).

If Keats felt thus about himself, we should expect him to try once more to repudiate the dreamer's life and its softness in favor of the more exalted ideal. And that is exactly what is found in the above letter of July 25 and in the letters that follow. These are in complete agreement with what, at the same time, he is writing in The Fall of Hyperion. On August 14 (by now he is in Winchester) he writes Bailey:<sup>29</sup>

I am convinced more and more every day that (excepting the human friend Philosopher) a fine writer is the most genuine Being in the World. Shakespeare and the paradise Lost [sic] every day become greater wonders to me. I look upon fine Phrases like a Lover.

Here the "human friend Philosopher" is the highest achievement, a humanitarian ideal, followed closely by the poet, who surely represents the poetic aspiration of The Fall of Hyperion, for one must not be deceived by the reference to "fine Phrases" into thinking that Keats means merely words. Shakespeare and Milton, as the sonnet on King Lear and the lines written On a Lock of Milton's Hair both prove, embody for Keats Moneta's definition of poetry.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid., II, 400.

Two days later, August 16, he writes the famous "flint-worded letter" to Fanny:<sup>30</sup>

Believe in the first Letters I wrote you: I assure you I felt as I wrote—I could not write so now. The thousand images I have had pass through my brain—my uneasy spirits—my unguess'd fate—all spread as a veil between me and you—Remember I have no idle leisure to brood over you—'tis well perhaps I have not. I could not have endured the throng of Jealousies that used to haunt me before I had plunged so deeply into imaginary interests. I would feign, as my sails are set, sail on without an interruption for a Brace of Months longer—I am in complete cue—in the fever, and shall in these four months do an immense deal—This page as my eye skims over it I see is excessively unloverlike and ungallant—I cannot help it—I am no officer in yawning quarters; no Parson-romeo. My mind is heap'd to the full; stuff'd like a cricket ball—if I strive to fill it more it would burst. I know the generality of women would hate me for this; that I should have so unsoften'd so hard a mind as to forget them; forget the brightest realities for the dull imaginations of my own Brain. But I conjure you to give it a fair thinking; and ask yourself whether 'tis not better to explain my feelings to you, than write artificial Passion—Besides you would see through it. It would be vain to strive to deceive you. 'Tis harsh, harsh, I know—My heart seems made of iron. I could not write a proper answer to an invitation to Idalia. . . . Forgive me this flint-worded Letter, and believe and see that I cannot think of you without some sort of Energy—though mal à propos—Even as I leave off, it seems to me that a few more moments thought of you would uncrystallize and dissolve me. I must not give way to it—but turn to my writing again—if I fail I shall die hard. O my love, your lips are growing sweet again to my fancy—I must forget them. Ever your affectionate Keats.

Here is quite a different Keats from the lover in the first letters written on the Isle of Wight. He is driving himself on to Poetry; he is "in the fever"; he has not time for love. But at the same time he is afraid that love will claim him—"a few more moments thought of you would uncrystallize and dissolve me." The poetic ideal of The Fall of Hyperion, on which he is now at work, is before him and he fights valiantly against love to gain the goal.

On August 24 he writes Taylor that he scorns popularity as a writer, the implication being that he will be somewhat more austere than a popular versifier. "I equally dislike," he writes, "the favour of the public with the love of a woman—they are both cloying treacle to the wings of my independence."<sup>31</sup> Brave words! Fanny and the reading public are left behind. The following day (August 25) he repeats himself, this time to Reynolds; but here, as in the fear of Fanny's hold upon him expressed above, he is forced to confess that he cannot remain true to his ideal.<sup>32</sup>

<sup>30</sup> Ibid., II, 400-403.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., II, 404.

<sup>32</sup> Ibid., II, 407.

I think if I had a free and healthy and lasting organization of heart and lungs as strong as an ox's so as to be able to bear unhurt the shock of extreme thought and sensation without weariness, I could pass my life nearly alone though it should last eighty years. But I feel my body too weak to support me to the height, I am obliged to check myself and strive to be nothing . . . If you should have any reason to regret this state of excitement in me, I will turn the tide of your feelings in the right channel, by mentioning that it is the only state for the best sort of Poetry—that is all I care for, all I live for.

These letters written between the end of Part I of Lamia and the beginning of Part II, and covering the same period as the composition of The Fall of Hyperion, present Keats trying to leave behind him the human pleasures of the world of friends and love for the sake of an ideal of art, an ideal which is itself best expressed in The Fall of Hyperion as a vital, purposive poetry that "labors for mortal good" (I, 159). But even here, where the intention to achieve the ideal is so strong, there appears simultaneously with the forward movement, the tendency to swing back. He must not think of Fanny or he will be "dissolved"; he admits that he is probably not strong enough to hold himself to his purpose. There is in all this fear of retrogression an interesting admission that he is fighting against heavy odds—just as Sleep and Poetry admitted those odds, just as the compromise in Endymion accepted them, and just as the abandoning of the first Hyperion implied them. So heavy were they, indeed, that they were not long, as we shall now see, in turning him back.

On September 5 he writes to Taylor, his publisher, that since finishing Otho, he has finished Lamia.<sup>33</sup> This means that Part II of Lamia was written between August 24, when he says Otho is "just finished" and September 5, a period of twelve days. It is my contention that The Fall of Hyperion was abandoned during the time he wrote Part II of Lamia. The last direct mention we had of Hyperion was on August 14, when he said he was writing on it. And we have seen that the letters of August 16 and 24 indicate his absorption with the theme.<sup>34</sup> But between August 24 when he turned back to Lamia and September 5 when Lamia is finished, there is no mention of Hyperion. On September 5 he does not, in speaking of his work, mention it to Taylor, a fact which may mean that by then he was not willing that his publisher should know about it. Moreover, in this letter he says he is now revising St. Agnes and studying Italian, pursuits that would seem to have been substituted for further attention to Hyperion. A few days after September <sup>34</sup> The fact that Otho was also in hand at this time is unimportant, for Keats always looked upon this as hack work.

<sup>33</sup> Ibid., II, 414.

5 he gets news of his brother George's financial difficulties and goes to London, writing to Fanny from there on Monday, September 13.<sup>35</sup> He returns to Winchester on Wednesday, September 15,<sup>36</sup> and on Sunday, September 19, he composes the Ode to Autumn.<sup>37</sup> In the same letter where he mentions the composition of Autumn he remarks that he has given up Hyperion.

What has happened? He finishes Lamia. He abandons Hyperion. He composes Autumn. Which is to say that in completing Part II of Lamia, where he exposes the destructive power of Apollonius, he repudiates the very ideal that The Fall of Hyperion is trying to express, casts off the poem, and turns again to the sensuous. He says himself:<sup>38</sup>

I have given up Hyperion—there were too many Miltonic inversions in it—Miltonic verse cannot be written but in an artful or rather artist's humour. I wish to give myself up to other sensations.

This means simply that he no longer feels in the mood for philosophical poetry such as that described by Moneta. "Miltonic verse" is philosophical verse, for which he is out of tune. He is no longer feeling in the "artist's humour," meaning the poet described by Moneta; he desires other sensations, such as those Apollonius destroyed.

The tragic ending of Lamia is Keats' final word on the struggle that has figured so prominently in his poems and letters. It is his ultimate judgment on that intellectual and philosophical and humanitarian goal that at times he thought poetry should reach. Before this, each time he tries to state his faith in this purpose, as in the two Hyperions, he finds he does not actually believe in it for himself, even though he must admit the important rôle it plays in his career. Now in Lamia he makes the bitter admission that once Apollonius, the intellectual ideal, gains a foothold in his life, there is no escape from him nor from the destruction that he brings with him. The poet knows that for him cold philosophy unweaves the rainbow.

The only way to escape this disintegration is to repudiate the philosophic ideal altogether. This he found extremely difficult to do, for like Apollonius it kept pushing its way into his life uninvited. But there are moments when, like his own Lysius before Apollonius interfered, he can live with his true poetry unmindful of and unmolested by philosophic import. One of these moments came in May, 1819, when after abandoning Hyperion: A Fragment, he composed the great Odes of the spring of 1819.<sup>39</sup> Another came after the completion of Lamia and

<sup>35</sup> Ibid., II, 416.

<sup>36</sup> Ibid., II, 421.

<sup>37</sup> Ibid., II, 418.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., II, 419.

<sup>39</sup> I need not repeat here the belief that even the Ode on a Grecian Urn is a glorification of sensuous beauty.

the abandoning of The Fall of Hyperion, when he composed the exquisite song of "mellow fruitfulness," the Ode to Autumn. The Ode to Autumn is Keats' return to the sensuous delight of the dreamer. There is here no attempt to be a "physician to all men" in the meaning of The Fall of Hyperion. The High Prophetess of that poem said to John Keats:

None can usurp this height . . .
But those to whom the miseries of the world
Are misery, and will not let them rest.
All else who find a haven in the world
Where they may thoughtless sleep away their days,
If by chance unto this fane they come,
Rot on the pavement where thou rotted'st half (I, 147-153).

But she was wrong as far as Keats was concerned and he at last knew she was wrong. It may be there are those who think such a poem as the Ode to Autumn is justification for agreement with Moneta's dictum that Keats was thoughtlessly sleeping away his days and on the pavement rotting half. There are others who will think that, in spite of Moneta, Keats has here usurped a height attained by few poets in any language, and that here the dreamer in his dream, although unmindful of the "labour for mortal good," nevertheless "pours out a balm upon the world."

JOHN HAWLEY ROBERTS

Williams College

XXXVII

A NOTE ON SOURCE INFLUENCES IN SHELLEY'S CLOUD AND SKYLARK

MRS. Shelley in her preface to her husband's collected poems remarked:

There are others, such as the "Ode to the Sky Lark," and "The Cloud," which, in the opinion of many critics, bear a purer poetical stamp than any other of his productions. They were written as his mind prompted, listening to the carolling of the bird, aloft in the azure sky of Italy; or marking the cloud as it sped across the heavens, while he floated in his boat on the Thames.

The implication here is obviously that the two glorious lyrics were wholly inspired by nature and are quite free from any bookish influence. This implication, in view no doubt of their nearly divine perfection, has been permitted to go unchallenged. Experience has demonstrated, however, that the greatest English literary masterpieces are rarely altogether spontaneously generated. That Shelley's two bright gems, for all their flawlessness, reflect something of a borrowed light shining from familiar sources<sup>1</sup> is thought to be apparent in the following comparisons.

In writing "The Cloud," Shelly seems, whether at the time adrift in his little boat or immured in the more barren seclusion of his study,<sup>2</sup> to have been vividly conscious of the qualities of Robert Herrick's little tour de force, "The Hag," which in consideration of its brevity, it is perhaps permissible to quote:

The Hag is astride,	No Beast, for his food,
This night for to ride;	Dares now range the wood;
The Devill and shee together:	But husht in his laire he lies lurking:
Through thick, and through thin,	While mischeifs, by these,
Now out, and then in,	On Land and on Seas,
Though ne'r so foule be the weather.	At noone of Night are a working.

A Thorn or a Burr	The storme will arise,
She takes for a Spurre:	And trouble the skies;
With a lash of a Bramble she rides now,	This night, and more for the wonder,
Through Brakes and through Bryars,	The ghost from the Tomb
O're Ditches, and Mires,	Affrighted shall come,
She followes the Spirit that guides now.	Cal'd out by the clap of the Thunder. <sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> That Shelley had not read Herrick would, even in the total absence of evidence, be hardly thinkable; and Marvell's poem was regularly prefixed to editions of Paradise Lost after its first appearance there.

It will be observed at once that both poets, despite obvious differences, treat the same general subject in the same general manner: an excursion through the air on the part of a definitely conceived voyager gifted with magic or supernatural powers, to whom comes a kaleidoscopic variety of experience for which the voyager is itself in some mysterious way responsible.

The meter of the two poems, it will also be observed, strikes the same norm—a norm rare, to say the least of it, in English poetry.<sup>4</sup> For if Shelley's first and alternate tetrameter lines, with their internal rime, be taken as the equivalent of one of Herrick's dimeter couplets, then Herrick's six-line stanza becomes the metrical equivalent of each <sup>2</sup> The poem was assigned by Mrs. Shelley to the year 1820, but on the basis of Mrs. Shelley's statement in her preface (quoted above), and of style, William M. Rossetti in his edition of the poems (London, 1870, II, 569) expressed the opinion that it belonged to a date not later than 1818.

<sup>3</sup> After the edition of Herrick's poems by F. W. Moorman (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1915).

<sup>4</sup> I am aware of but few other uses of this meter in English. Shelley's Arethusa, probably written in the same year as The Cloud (1820), has the same meter and the arrangement of lines in The Hag, not that in The Cloud; and Herrick wrote another poem with the title The Hagg in the same meter and obviously under the same inspiration as that quoted. The inspiration for both these products of the greatest of the Sons of Ben doubtless emanated from the following portion of a "Hags' Charm" at the beginning of Ben Jonson's The Masque of Queens (first pointed out to me by Professor John Livingston Lowes):

The owl is abroad, the bat, and the toad,    The dogs they do bay, and the timbrels play,
And so is the cat-a-mountain,                    The spindle is now a turning;
The ant and the mole sit both in a hole,        The moon it is red, and the stars are fled,
And the frog peeps out o' the fountain;        But all the sky is a burning . . .

Here the line arrangement, obviously, is that of The Cloud, and Jonson's verses may also have had their influence upon Shelley, at least to the extent of determining his verse grouping. There are here, indeed, certain verbal parallels to The Cloud not traceable in Herrick. Jonson's "burning" sky can be matched by Shelley's "burning plumes" of the sunrise and "burning zone" about the throne of the sun. Both poets treat moon and stars in a perhaps natural enough juxtaposition, but also with some suggestion of timid subordination of the latter to the former. It is perhaps not without significance that "mountain—fountain," or "mountains—fountains," was a favorite rime of Shelley's, used twice in the plural forms in Arethusa, and that mountains are four times referred to in The Cloud.

One clause of Herrick's The Hagg may, furthermore, have suggested the behavior of Shelley's moon and stars:

While th' Moone in her sphere
Peepes trembling for feare . . .

It may well be that Shelley recollected, consciously or unconsciously, all three of the early poems in this meter and shaped from this latter clause (which doubtless originated in Jonson's frog that "peeps out o' the fountain," and perhaps also his timid stars) his own melodious and suggestive line, "The stars peep behind her and peer." The meter may well have haunted his memory in terms of particularly happy phrases, especially where these entered into the rimes.

quatrain of Shelley's poem. When read aloud, the poems are alike in that peculiar lilting, swaying, floating measure that is so highly appropriate to their aerial journey, their metrical difference consisting merely in Shelley's arrangement of his verses (including his stanzaic grouping) and his greater freedom in departure from a normal arrangement of iambs and anapests, to which Herrick adheres quite faithfully. The metrical norm and the rime scheme of the two poems are, then, the same; and hence come their peculiar suspended, swinging movement and rich, haunting cadences, to be matched in few other English poems. This effect is greatly enhanced by the use in both poems of frequent feminine rimes and firm, full masculine ones. A rather unusual rime, "these—Seas,"<sup>5</sup> occurs in both poems; and Herrick's "wonder—Thunder" is echoed by Shelley's use twice of "under—thunder."

Other echoings of thought and phrase occur.<sup>6</sup> Herrick's Hag "followes the Spirit that guides now," presumably that of the devil who rides with her; Shelley's Cloud carries "Lightning my pilot" and moves wherever "This pilot is guiding me," the pilot himself being lured and his movements determined by "The Spirit he loves." Each voyager, that is to say, has its movements controlled ("guided") by an accompanying "Spirit" outside itself to which it is subject, and whose representative,<sup>7</sup> at any rate, rides with it. Besides the references to "seas" and to "thunder" already pointed out as entering into the rimes of both poems (where they are particularly conspicuous and particularly certain to haunt the memory, or to occur from having already haunted the memory), both poems close with the eventuality of a storm by means of which the eerie voyager is to disturb the serenity of nature. In Herrick the storm, in Shelley the Cloud, is to "arise" for this purpose; and at this point in both poems occurs, in the rimes, with almost the finality of a signature, the striking phrase "ghost from the tomb."

On the whole, since Shelley sets himself somewhat the same general task as Herrick, since in the performing it he adopts Herrick's unusual and especially appropriate metrical and rime schemes, and since he echoes both specific thoughts and specific phrases of Herrick's—the one in a guiding and an accompanying "Spirit," the presence of <sup>5</sup> Shelley also uses "sea" in his rimes, and "Sky," to be put beside Herrick's "skies." Herrick's rime, it will be noted, is "arise—skies," and Shelley (see below) makes rather significant use of the word "arise," though he does not work it into his rimes.

<sup>6</sup> N.B. Note 4 above.

<sup>7</sup> Whether Herrick's "Devill" that rides with his Hag is, like Shelley's "pilot," a mere representative of the "Spirit that guides," or whether it actually is that spirit is not altogether clear, and would have appeared just as ambiguous to Shelley as it does to the present-day reader.

"thunder" and "seas," and a valedictory storm with its "ghost from the tomb," and the other notably in expressions that entered conspicuously into Herrick's rimes—it seems altogether probable that Herrick's poem had not only pleased him in the past, but was haunting his memory whenever and wherever he composed "The Cloud."

Somewhat less certain, perhaps, is another by no means improbable recollection of Shelley's in the process of composing that other superb lyric, his lines "To a Skylark." In his well-known melodious verses "On Paradise Lost," Andrew Marvell thus apostrophized Milton:

That Majesty which through thy Work doth Reign Draws the Devout, deterring the Profane.
And things divine thou treatst of in such state
As them preserves, and Thee inviolate.
At once delight and horror on us seize,
Thou singst with so much gravity and ease;
And above humane flight dost soar aloft,
With Plume so strong, so equal, and so soft.
The Bird nam'd from that Paradise you sing
So never Flaps, but alwaies keeps on Wing.

Where couldst thou Words of such a compass find?
Whence furnish such a vast expense of Mind?
Just Heav'n Thee, like Tiresias, to requite,
Rewards with Prophesie thy loss of Sight.

Well mightst thou scorn thy Readers to allure
With tinkling Rhime, of thy own Sense secure . . .<sup>8</sup>

Again, as in the case of "The Cloud" and "The Hag," the general purpose of this passage and of Shelley's poem—if not this time of both poems as a whole—is the same. Though there are quite obvious differences between the poet Milton and the bird of Shelley's praise, both are treated in the passage and the poem now under consideration as consummate masters of poetic expression, whom each author envies their great gifts. Shelley, no less than Marvell, is apostrophizing his ideal poet, symbolized or typified in the bird. Thus passage and poem have at least a natural rapprochement.

But is it difficult, looking more closely, to find in Marvell's verses the complete outline of Shelley's poem? Milton and the Skylark both sing of "things divine," keeping themselves and their subjects alike "inviolable" and thrilling with "delight" the "Devout" listener. It is even significant that they both sing; Milton, apparently upon the authority of his invocation to the Muse to inspire his "song" and his expressed determination "with no middle flight . . . to soar,"<sup>9</sup> having become for purposes of Marvell's verse himself a bird—and a bird remarkably suggestive of Shelley's! Marvell seems pretty certainly to have had in mind in his simile the popular superstitions regarding the bird of paradise,<sup>10</sup> but surely the essential preëminence of Shelley's skylark is that it "above humane flight dost soar aloft" and that it "never Flags, but alwaies keeps on Wing"—"And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest." And finally each poet breaks into rhetorical questions concerning the source of his ideal's inspiration—questions that he at least partially answers by a reiteration of the ideal being's full isolation from mundanity. The Skylark never felt "Shadow of annoyance"; Milton is isolated by blindness:<sup>11</sup> both are rewarded with powers of prophecy and revelation. What essential thought of Shelley's poem—aside from its golden imagery, diction, and music—is not traceable in Marvell's lines?

<sup>8</sup> After the edition of Marvell's Poems and Letters by H. M. Margoliouth (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1927).

Shelley's stanzas of course close with an Alexandrine, so that such a line as his question, "Or how could thy notes flow in such a crystal stream?," which might otherwise be reasonably equated with Marvell's line, "Where couldst thou Words of such a compass find?," is not in Marvell's pentameter. Yet because of the rapidity everywhere demanded by the ecstatic rush of Shelley's poem, his hexameters are not far from pentameter in effect.<sup>12</sup> They are not the slow, summarizing Alexandrine of Spenser and his followers; their time equivalent is nearer that of such a normal pentameter line as Marvell's.

Verbal echoes are not perhaps so full or so numerous as one might wish, nor by themselves altogether convincing. Marvell refers to the "things divine" of which Milton treats; Shelley's lark pants forth "a flood of rapture so divine." Both Milton and the lark render "delight."<sup>13</sup> The form "singest," which might have been drawn from Marvell's "singst," enters conspicuously into Shelley's rimes,<sup>14</sup> and is there associated with the word "soar,"<sup>15</sup> once in the form "dost soar," which occurs in Marvell with almost the same significant juxtaposition that

<sup>9</sup> P.L., I, 14.

<sup>10</sup> See the subject in the Encyc. Brit. (eleventh ed.) or Margoliouth's note (op. cit.).

<sup>11</sup> Cf. with Marvell's lines P.L., III, 41-55. <sup>12</sup> Indeed, this particular line might conceivably be scanned by itself as pentameter with its first two feet anapests.

<sup>13</sup> Marvell's "delight and horrou on us seize" may possibly have some affinity to Shelley's "Our sincerest laughter/With some pain is fraught;/Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought."

<sup>14</sup> Shelley's rime "springest-wingest-singest" may owe something to Marvell's more common "sing-Wing."

<sup>15</sup> Drawn by Marvell from Milton (see above), with whom it was a favorite word.

Shelley gave it in the line quoted above. Marvell justifies Milton's "scorn" of rime; and Shelley, first implying the wish that we might "scorn/Hate, and pride, and fear," thereafter denominates his lark a "scorner of the ground."<sup>16</sup> Possibly, since we are probably investigating here a feat of memory and not a conscious, intentional use of source, it is not fantastic to suggest that the sounds of Marvell's phrase "tinkling Rhime" may lie at the bottom of Shelley's happy euphony of "twinkling grass."

More convincing than verbal parallels, however, is the general similarity of thought. Each poet is addressing in the guise of a bird that soars unrestrainedly toward heaven an ideal singer endowed with the precious gifts of perfect expression and of prophecy—a seer, a vates, who has found and can gloriously convey the deeper meaning of life. Each poet's admiration eventually bursts forth in rhetorical questions concerning the source of such inspiration—questions that have in each instance a simple, plaintive earnestness rare in the use of apostrophe in English, the apostrophe in English poetry usually ringing with something of bombastic inflation. Each poet was sincerely face to face with his ideal, and even though their ideals were not identical, Shelley may well have recalled Marvell's supreme admiration in phrasing his own.<sup>17</sup>

IRVING T. RICHARDS

Cambridge, Massachusetts

<sup>16</sup> In his annotation of Paradise Lost (see The Complete Works of John Keats, ed. by H. Buxton Forman [Glasgow, 1901], III, 264–265) Keats singled out for comment the phrase descriptive of how the birds after creation "With clang despis'd the ground" (VII, 422). This phrase may also have been specially noted by Shelley.

<sup>17</sup> That Shelley was deep in Paradise Lost, and therefore in all probability in contact with Marvell's poem, both before and after he wrote his lyric in the spring of 1820 is attested by his reading from the epic to Mrs. Shelley on the evening of August 4, 1819 (Edward Dowden, The Life of Percy Bysshe Shelley [London, 1887], II, 272), and by his instruction of Prince Alexander Mavrocordato in it at Pisa during the winter of 1820–1821 (ibid., p. 362).

A "LOST" POEM BY ARTHUR HALLAM

THE centenary of the death of Arthur Hallam, noted in England by a leading article in The Times Literary Supplement (September 14, 1933) and in America by an exhibition of Hallam's works in the Yale University Library (January, 1934), served as a reminder not so much of what we know of the youth who was so important an influence on Tennyson as of what we do not know fully, a partial ignorance which results from the difficulty with which the study of Hallam is attended. The "lost" poem here reprinted after more than a century is lost only in the sense in which nearly half the printed poems of Hallam are unknown because they are missing from the editions commonly available. When Hallam died in 1833 in his twenty-third year, he left behind him one small and now very scarce volume, privately printed in 1830, and other poems and essays, some of which were collected by his father, Henry Hallam the historian, and privately issued as the Remains of 1834. Most of this material, also edited by Henry Hallam, was privately printed in 1853, and this volume is the basis of such subsequent collections of Arthur Hallam's work as have appeared.<sup>1</sup>

The "Stanzas" here given first appeared in The Englishman's Magazine for August, 1831 (p. 615) immediately preceding Hallam's celebrated anonymous review, "On Some of the Characteristics of Modern Poetry, and on the Lyrical Poems of Alfred Tennyson." Although Henry Hallam reprinted a part of the review in the Remains of 1834, he ignored the "Stanzas," and they have been unobserved ever since.<sup>2</sup>

In the same issue of The Englishman's Magazine appeared Tennyson's sonnet, "Check every outflash," and by way of preface the reader may be reminded of the connection of Hallam and Tennyson with the short-lived periodical. It was first published in April, 1831 and continued with little success for four issues. It then came into the possession of Edward Moxon, who asked Hallam, probably early in July, to persuade Tennyson to contribute to the first, or August, number under the new management. Moxon held out as inducement that Tennyson's contribution would appear along with work by Wordsworth, Southey, and

<sup>1</sup> For a list of the printed sources of Hallam's writings, see "Arthur Hallam's Centenary: A Bibliographical Note," by T. H. Vail Motter, The Yale University Library Gazette, VIII (1934), 104-109. The LTLS leader was by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch.

<sup>2</sup> Curiously enough Arthur Hallam's Cambridge friend, W. H. Brookfield who ought to have known better, also ignored the "Stanzas" when he wrote in a letter of August 17, 1834, that the Remains "comprise all that has been separately printed before." (Cf. Mrs. Brookfield and Her Circle [New York, 1905], pp. 15-16.)

Charles Lamb. Hallam accordingly urged Tennyson, writing him from Hastings on July 15, 1831, to send "The Sisters," or "Rosalind," or the "Southern Mariana."

Tennyson was characteristically dilatory and Hallam felt himself forced to take the initiative. He therefore wrote again to his friend at Somersby on July 26:

I have been expecting for some days an answer to my letter about Moxon. . . . You perhaps will be angry when I tell you that I sent your sonnet about the "Sombre Valley" to Moxon, who is charmed with it, and has printed it off. I confess this is a breach of trust on my part, but I hope for your forgiveness. . . .<sup>3</sup>

Thus occurred the publication of Tennyson's sonnet to his fiancée, Emily Sellwood side by side with Hallam's poem to Emily Tennyson who, though not yet his fiancée, was nevertheless his intended bride. But it may be observed, as for Moxon's promises, that instead of the fellow-contributors hoped for, one finds in the pages of the seven numbers of The Englishman's Magazine poems by Thomas Hood, Leigh Hunt, Charles Lamb, the Hon. Mrs. Norton, John Clare—and Hallam. Tennyson was doubtless content to be found in the company of Arthur Hallam, for was he not to write in after years of his friend,

I vex my heart with fancies dim:
He still outstript me in the race;
It was but unity of place
That made me dream I rank'd with him.

STANZAS

By A. H. Hallam

I see her now, an elfin shape,
That makes the air seem full of light,
And brings in thoughts of pleasant might
About fair serpent forms, that leap
Among the flowers in warm Brazil,
And how at every move we feel
There is new beauty, and a birth
Of something glorious to the earth.

Her face is almost given to smiles,
Almost given up to happy laughter,
But look ye near, and mark the whites
An under-glance out-stealing after;
The sweetest glance I ever saw;

<sup>3</sup> Alfred Lord Tennyson; A Memoir, by his son (London, 1897), I, 80-81.

Yet terrible for the inward law
 Which it reveals, the maiden power,
 The thoughts that breathe a pure heart-air,
 Nor ever shall in any hour
 Forth to the garish day-light fare.

Her voice, whose flowing tones I deem
 A language for her sympathies,
 A symbol for her mysteries,
 Which words could never be or seem,
 That voice is sounding now in gladness,
 And if a rarer accent say
 An earnest and a gentle sadness
 Freshens the spirit of life alway,
 That deepens still the simple charm,
 And blesses all who hear from harm.

I may not hear; no influence
 Is breathed from her to bless my sense;
 I sit and think of her alone.
 Yet, by the sacred stars I swear,
 I would not one so very fair
 And gentle, on this eve, should own
 A single pining thought of me.
 Oh be she joyous—and the full
 Orb of her soul, so perfect free,
 All glory in the world shall dull!
 So be it; I will think of her
 As going forth a conquerer,
 And of her voice, her smile, her motion,
 As something for a bard's devotion.
 No sigh, no treacherous tear shall say
 I grieve that I am far away,
 And others see her glad to-day!

When Hallam's poem is read with Tennyson's sonnet it will appear that they strikingly illustrate the likenesses and dissimilarities of the work of their authors at the time of their publication. Motivated alike romantically by a lyrical impulse toward the beloved, Tennyson's poem soon loses itself in liquid, tinkling sound, Hallam's in mystical-metaphysical revery which transmutes the vision of Emily Tennyson into a spirit of poetry or of beauty which binds its worshipper by a kind of moral suasion. For parallel themes in Tennyson one is reminded of "The Poet," "The Poet's Mind," and "The Mystic," of the volume of 1830; but while Hallam's lines do not show the solemn didacticism or the priggishness of the first two, they fall far short of the occasional glimpses of magnificence in the third. The mood of the "Stanzas," while less melancholy and morbid than Tennyson's "gloomèd fancy" of the same period (the characteristic is of course always somewhere present in Tennyson) nevertheless reflects the deep moral earnestness with which not only Hallam, but all the chief Cambridge Apostles were (shall I say?) afflicted.<sup>4</sup>

As Hallam's poem suggests, his volatile spirit habitually alternated between gaiety and sobriety. The happy mood in which the poem was composed, and the sombre mood which followed its publication and, perhaps, its cool reception by Emily Tennyson, are fully illustrated in the extracts which follow from three letters from Hallam to his beloved. The letters are part of a collection in the possession of the Wellesley College Library, and are here published for the first time by permission of the President of Wellesley College. It will be recalled that Hallam was at Hastings early in July, 1831, at the time that he was attempting to secure a contribution from Tennyson for the Englishman's Magazine. He had just received a letter from Emily describing a visit she had made to Dalby, near Somersby. Knowing no one in the neighborhood of Hastings, Hallam filled his loneliness with a vision of Emily whereby the "Stanzas" were born. Under date of July 12 he writes her:<sup>5</sup>

My dearest Emily,

Your letter, like all other things that are your's, is delicious. Why was I not with you in the gardens of Dalby! Henceforward however they are a part of me; I have no notion how they really appear, but you have told me something of their inhabitants, and that is sufficient for imagination to work with. From the single image of you, standing there among the flowers, and listening to the "clear carol" and the "solemn cawing," the whole scene has shaped itself out, with a wonderful propriety and grace, just as Alfred's Mariana grew up, by assimilative force, out of the plaintive hint left two centuries ago by Shakespeare for the few who might have ears to hear, and a heart to meditate. I am glad, very glad that the tone of your letter is more cheerful than usual. And yet I cannot forbear to scold you for saying "if I cannot write to cheer, it is better not to write at all." This you tell me I "must allow." Indeed, and indeed, Emily, I will allow no such thing. Is it to your gaiety, think you, and your festive smiles, and your playful humour that I have pledged my whole being? Oh no—these <sup>4</sup> At some future time I hope to expand this statement. I believe that some of Tennyson's biographers unduly stress Hallam's individual contribution to the strain in Tennyson which laid him open to the sobriquet, "schoolmistress Alfred," and that Hallam merely reflected perhaps more acutely than the others a spirit common to the Cambridge group.

<sup>5</sup> So far as I know, none of Emily's letters to Arthur survive. Like Tennyson's letters to him they were doubtless destroyed by Henry Hallam.

are not my Emily; very dear are they to me, because they are parts of her, but there was something dearer yet, something more intimately herself, the musical sorrow, like the spirit of the nightingale's song, the dreamy desire of Beauty, only perfected through suffering; the—but why try I to explain the inexplicable—I love yourself; "Emily, the whole of Emily, and nothing but Emily!" I have no higher object on earth than to comfort you; do not depress me to an inferior aim; make not a holiday thing of me, fit to share your amusement, but unworthy of your grief! . . .<sup>6</sup> But if I run on thus in prose & rhyme, I shall have you fancy I wish you unhappy, that I may have the luxury of sympathising with you, and supporting you. I remember indeed, when a child I used to entrap flies into water for the pleasure of taking them out again—a process, seldom so satisfactorily completed, but two or three of them perished by the way. Nevertheless, Emily, you need not fear; only just try me: get splendidly well, and cheerful, and you shall see how happy it will make me. Only remember how I love you at all times, in all moods, whatever pleases, whatever pains you; remember that I too have trodden the deep places of existence and in those "valleys of the shadow of death" have learned some lessons that may do good to the soul of my beloved; remember that the bliss, for which we hope as Christians, takes its perennial complexion from sorrows upon earth, and they who have shared the one in love will surely be one for ever. . . .

From the next letter in the Wellesley collection, dated August 5, it appears that Emily had meanwhile written, as she often did, in very low spirits, and Arthur replied, as he had frequently to do to a large circle of friends who turned to him in trouble, as a comforter:

. . . But if you must needs remain at Somersby [he writes], for my sake, dearest, as well as for your own, and that of the many beings whose hearts have learned to vibrate with yours . . . for all our sakes be not overcome by despondency; let not your feelings, fine and pure in their nature, injure and enfeeble themselves by too much indulgence; give them freedom by restraint, animation by partial extinction: converse more, read more, think more upon subjects unconnected with yourself, or tending to raise you into communion with noble and healthful thought. I am not saying this as a cold and commonplace observer, who finds it easy and thinks it fine to affect a sobriety that costs him nothing. I speak from long and severe experience of those melancholy sentiments you express. I have felt "the burthen of the mystery, the weight of all this unintelligible world"; and while the similar tone of our souls in this respect affords me a precious certainty of intimate union, I cannot think without dread that you are exposed to the dangers through which I have passed, not unharmed alas! nor unhumiliated. . . .

This letter was sent, and time passed, and the Englishman's Magazine appeared, and letters praising Hallam's review of Tennyson poured in. But no letter came from Emily. This very frequently happened; and if the letter which follows seems in spots a little disturbed, there seems to have been ample excuse. It is dated from Hastings on August 28, just before Arthur was to leave town.

<sup>6</sup> Here follow the five stanzas beginning, "When two complaining spirits mingle," printed in the Remains of 1834 (and all subsequent editions) as "A Lover's Reproof."

I have been living all this week in hope, my dearest Emily, that I might have a letter from you this morning. That hope is now fled to disport itself in the summerwinds [sic] of this beautiful weather, and has left me to console myself as I best may. There is but one way of consolation; since I cannot set out on my journey, strengthened and inspirited by kind words from you, I will at least secure to myself a certain prospect of finding such words at some point of that journey, to reward me for past anxieties, and to supply my thoughts with their natural food for a week or two further. . . .<sup>7</sup> I really think I have earned by frequent writing on my own part a right to be preserved from anxiety by frequent hearing from Somersby—for do not imagine, beloved Emily, I can ever be unconcerned, when I do not hear, even though I should have no reasonable ground of apprehension. But you may be ill; you may be unhappy; accidents may have happened; some arrow of God's Providence may have pierced the shielding cloud, which I trust is raised about you by the prayers of those who love you. Will you laugh at me, if I advance another plea—that of vanity? Suppose for a moment two very improbable suppositions, that my sister had written a book, and that you had written remarks on it. Should I, do you think, have let you wait until you had received expressions from all your friends of pleasure and interest in your performance, before I put in my own word of approbation? In spite of all I can tell you to the contrary I see you have too low an opinion of your power over me. Pray believe the difference is enormous between an object which your eyes have smiled on, and one yet unfavoured. . . .<sup>8</sup> These lines are from one of those three Canzons of Petrarch which the enthusiastic Italians, to mark their preference of them to the rest, have designated as the Three Graces. It will be a very pretty Italian lesson for you to try to make them out, to assist you in which I will add a very unworthy translation.

“Never could I imagine, or relate
The changes that within my heart are wrought
By those delicious eyes: all other joys
This life can yield are far less dear to me,
All other beauties are behind this one.
Tranquil repose, without the least annoy,
Like that, which is eternal in the heavens,
Issues alone from their enamoured smile.
Oh that I might behold more sure and close
How Love their motion rules delightfully,
One single day, in which th’eternal wheel
Should pause, and I, careless of others then
And of myself, might gaze and gaze and gaze,
Nor often wink the eyes that looked on thine!”

<sup>7</sup> Here follow mailing directions.

<sup>8</sup> Here follow some lines of Italian.

Whatever Petrarch meant, I do not apply this to make you vain. I do not love your eyes merely because they are in themselves beautiful, but because they are transparent to an inner Beauty, from which my spirit has drawn life, because they are the "throne of light," on which that soul is elevated with whom mine desires to be mingled so long as each has being. I did not intend to get into these heroics, or mystics rather, when I began my letter: suppose I let myself down gently by a little talk about the moon! . . .

Three minor details in Hallam's poem remain to be noticed. The "elfin shape" of the first line, momentarily identified with Emily Tennyson before becoming transmuted into a spirit, finds a curious echo many years later in a description of Emily, then Mrs. Richard Jesse, when Mrs. W. H. Brookfield wrote, "Emily was dressed oddly and had hair in long ringlets down her back, which looked singular and elf-like."<sup>9</sup>

The word elfin had previously been used by Hallam in a Spenserian sense in a poem, "Stanzas to One Early Loved, Now in India," which he had printed (pp. 77-85) in his private volume of 1830.<sup>10</sup> The lines from the fifteenth and sixteenth stanzas of the poem written in 1829, are:

. . . Beauty in this earth
Holds elfin sway, and nought but lover's toil
Wins her enduring smile to clear our mortal coil.

To Her I dedicate for storm, or shine,
The inward of my life. Great queen of fairy,
Thou nobler Gloriana, I am thine: . . .

In two points occur close similarities in subject-matter, though characteristic differences in treatment, when Hallam's lines are compared with lines from two of Tennyson's sonnets of 1830. Hallam's "fair serpent forms, that leap Among the flowers in warm Brazil," etc., recall Tennyson's romantic use of tropical place-names in "Mine be the strength of spirit":

Even as the warm gulf-stream of Florida
Floats far away into the Northern seas
The lavish growth of southern Mexico.

<sup>9</sup> From a letter to her husband, October 7 [1842]. Charles and Frances Brookfield, Mrs. Brookfield and Her Circle (New York, 1905), p. 118.

<sup>10</sup> The poem was not reprinted. The one early loved was a friend met in Italy in the winter of 1827-28. Hallam writes of her to Emily Tennyson in a letter dated October 1, 1831, printed privately by Clement Shorter in London in 1916 under the title, The Love Story of "In Memoriam": Letters from Arthur Hallam to Emily Tennyson. There are two letters in this collection.

And finally, there is Tennyson's serpent in "Could I outwear my present state of woe":

Could I outwear my present state of woe
With one brief winter, and indue i' the spring
Hues of fresh youth, and mightily outgrow
The wan dark coil of faded suffering—
Forth in the pride of beauty issuing
A sheeny snake, the light of vernal bowers,
Moving his crest to all sweet plots of flowers
And watered valleys where the young birds sing; . . .<sup>11</sup>

The comparison is not intended as a piece of source-hunting, or to suggest the dependence of Hallam upon Tennyson's ideas. It will merely strengthen, on the other hand, our sense of the close community of spirit and thought which bound the two in deathless friendship.

T. H. VAIL MOTTER

Wellesley College

<sup>11</sup> In the Spring of 1828 Tennyson moved from Rose Crescent to King's Parade, No. 57 Corpus Buildings, and bought a pet snake. He is described as "watching its sinuosities upon the carpet" through clouds of tobacco. (Cf. Harold Nicolson, Tennyson [London, 1925], p. 63.)

XXXIX

MARGARET FULLER AND RALPH WALDO EMERSON

YESTERDAY Margaret Fuller returned home after making us a visit of three weeks," Emerson noted in his Journal on August 12, 1836. To this brief statement of fact he added these few words of characterization: "A very accomplished and very intelligent person."<sup>1</sup> She had sought for two years to make Emerson's acquaintance. On October 6, 1834, she had written that the Rev. Frederick Henry Hedge spoke with due admiration of the Rev. W. Emerson, that only clergyman of all possible clergymen, who eludes my acquaintance. Mais n'importe. I keep his image bright before my mind.<sup>2</sup>

Sometime later she had sent a translation of Goethe's Tasso to Hedge with the suggestion that he transmit it to Emerson for his perusal and criticism.<sup>3</sup> At another time she complained that Emerson had preached in her home church when she was out of town.<sup>4</sup> Late in 1835, probably through the good offices of Harriet Martineau, they were introduced.<sup>5</sup> But it was not until she had maneuvered tactfully by an exchange of letters with Mrs. Emerson<sup>6</sup> and had gained the help of mutual friends that she attained the honor of intimacy with the mind she most respected in America.

Miss Fuller was twenty-six years of age when she entered the Emerson home. In all essentials, as Emerson stated, she was at this time completely formed intellectually.

Each of the main problems of human life had been closely scanned and interrogated by her, and some of them had been much earlier solved.<sup>7</sup>

Her experience and her self-training fitted her to meet Emerson as an intellectual equal.

She came not, therefore, to sit as a student at the feet of Emerson. Wide knowledge she had already attained, and her eager reading never ceased; always she attempted the new, the abstruse, and the difficult.

<sup>1</sup> Edward Waldo Emerson and Waldo Emerson Forbes (eds.), Journals of Ralph Waldo Emerson (Boston and New York, 1908-1914), iv, 79-80.

<sup>2</sup> MS. Works of S. M. F. Ossoli, 5 vols., i, 17, preserved in the Harvard College Library. —Permission to quote from these MS. volumes has been given graciously by Mrs. Gertrude Fuller Nichols.

<sup>3</sup> Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Margaret Fuller Ossoli (Boston, 1884), p. 64.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid., p. 53.

<sup>5</sup> Ralph Waldo Emerson, William Henry Channing, and James Freeman Clarke, Memoirs of Margaret Fuller Ossoli (Boston, 1852), i, 201.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid., i, 201.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid., i, 291.

Frequently she meditated on the shortcomings which prevented her attainment of absolute genius. "Who," she once asked archly of Emerson, "would be a goody that could be a genius?"<sup>8</sup>

She came to Emerson for a solution of her personal problems, particularly how she, a woman fettered by the conventionalities, might make her life rich, full, and meaningful. From Harriet Martineau she had sought assistance, but their plans for an educational tour through Europe had been frustrated by her father's death. Her queries remained unanswered. Unwilling to remain in a prison either of her own or society's making, she sought another who might direct her future footsteps into proper paths. A romantic notion, perhaps, it arose from a fundamental psychological need. As early as 1833 she had written to James Freeman Clark:

How often have I thought, if I could see Goethe, and tell him my state of mind, he would support and guide me! He would be able to understand.<sup>9</sup>

Two years later she wrote again:

I sigh for an intellectual guide. Nothing but the sense of what God has done for me, in bringing me nearer to Himself, saves me from despair. . . . I had hoped some friend would do—what none has ever yet done—comprehend me wholly, mentally and morally, and enable me better to comprehend myself. I have had some hope that Miss Martineau might be this friend, but cannot yet tell. She has what I want—vigorous reasoning powers, invention, clear views of her objects—and she has been trained to the best means of execution. Add to this, that there are no strong intellectual sympathies between us, such as would blind her to my defects.<sup>10</sup>

Having failed to acquire self-comprehension from Miss Martineau, Margaret turned the more eagerly toward Emerson in the hope that she might attain the orientation this fearless theological rebel demonstrated. His calm enunciation of principles, his steady view of life, his insistence upon individual self-sufficiency, his personal integrity, and, above all, his luminous seminal thought—these qualities which she had found in his sermons led her to believe that he alone was her fit counsellor. It was for this reason that she had sharpened every weapon in her armory to assail the doors of his house and mind for admittance.

In one of her frank letters she explained why she had sought him out: "It is partly because yours is an image in my oratory . . . and I must pray."<sup>11</sup> Emerson was a saint, or a priest in a confessional, to whom she might go to gain release for emotional pressure. She had learned from

<sup>8</sup> Journals, iv, 333 (October 20, 1837).

<sup>9</sup> Memoirs, i, 112.

<sup>10</sup> Ibid., i, 153.

<sup>11</sup> Higginson, p. 90.

Bacon that "no receipt openeth the heart but a true friend, to whom you may impart griefs, joys, fears, hopes, suspicions, counsels, and whatsoever lieth upon the heart to oppress it, in a kind of civil shrift or confession." But the person to whom she could unburden herself could be no mere friend. She had a dozen preachers and lawyers among her close acquaintances, men whose daily task demanded the giving of such counsel as she wanted. She required a spiritual adviser with the authority of an archbishop of Canterbury, of a Pope. Emerson alone in New England fulfilled her high requirements.

It was with a sense of triumph that Margaret Fuller entered the Emerson home in July, 1836, as the guest of Mrs. Emerson. She had connived successfully to come near her saint; now, she felt, the mental illumination that she so greatly craved would be hers. But she reckoned not the nature of her host.

She and Mr. Emerson met like Pyramus and Thisbe, a blank wall between.<sup>12</sup>

At thirty-three Emerson was almost completely formed: he too had scanned all life and had settled its main problems. He had sent his first book, Nature, to the printer a few days before her arrival. The main structure of his philosophy had been built; the years might add new parts, but the original design would not be altered. With firmness and kindness he enunciated his principles and avowed his purposes. He recognized his shortcomings, too. One of these was his coldness, his "porcupine impossibility of contact," his unwillingness to open the doors to the inner recesses of his heart and mind.

Of this first visit Emerson has left a record:

I still remember [he wrote in 1851] the first half-hour of Margaret's conversation. She was then twenty-six years old. She had a face and frame that would indicate fulness and tenacity of life. She was rather under the middle height, her complexion was fair, with strong fair hair. She was then, as always, carefully and becomingly dressed, and of lady-like self-possession. For the rest, her appearance had nothing prepossessing. Her extreme plainness—a trick of incessantly opening and shutting her eyelids—the nasal tone of her voice—all repelled; and I said to myself, we shall never get far.<sup>13</sup>

Margaret usually evoked unpleasant feelings in her new acquaintances, but this repugnance was soon lost.

Margaret's conversation scintillated like the heavens on a summer evening. Stars of thought twinkled, and an occasional, unexpected streak of lightning zigzagged through the air. All knowledge had been her province, and she hesitated not to discuss matters either very abstruse or very personal. She had a trick of electrifying a discussion. By plays of wit and fancy she could accelerate the rhythm of talk or turn to humorous use a serious proposal. She mimicked the idiosyncrasies of their mutual friends. Emerson objected to the way she made the twigs crackle under the pot: she made him laugh more than he liked. For, says Emerson,

<sup>12</sup> Mrs. Caroline H. Dall, Margaret and Her Friends (Boston, 1895), p. 13.

<sup>13</sup> Memoirs, I, 202.

Margaret, who had stuffed me out as a philosopher, in her own fancy, was too intent on establishing a good footing between us to omit any art of winning. She studied my tastes, piqued and amused me, challenged frankness by frankness, and did not conceal the good opinion she brought with her, nor her wish to please.<sup>14</sup>

Apollonious the scholar looked into the eyes of Lamia and at once called her a serpent-woman. Emerson thought he had done the same; he had found her out; her little game would not succeed. She was, he must have thought, no better than the other visitors who sought acquaintance with him. Every person of moment then, as now, was fair game for the souvenir hunter or the campaigner seeking support for a new reform. But Margaret fitted none of these categories fully, although she was—according to her biographers—snake-like, was anxious to know the great, and was a reformer. She had, as has been said, a personal problem to which only Emerson could give a solution. He might graciously dismiss her, but, until he gave the “open sesame” by which she might know herself, she would cling to him.

The topics of conversation during these days of the first visit can be imagined. Emerson’s gardening, the chores of the house, the neighboring woods and their inhabitants offered easy topics to these lovers of nature. A discussion of the many reforms and reformers gave Margaret an opportunity to speak of her desire for the improvement of the status of women in society. To this generalization he doubtless objected in equally general terms:

It is folly to imagine that there can be anything very bad in the position of woman compared with that of man.<sup>15</sup>

Goethe was spoken of early, for here were two of the limited number of Goethe readers in America. Emerson recalled that Margaret had sent him a translation of Tasso and thanked her. They discussed and argued, for Emerson refused to grant Goethe the highest literary honors. Goethe lacked dependence upon soul; he was devoted “to truth for the sake of culture" and not "to pure truth."<sup>16</sup> She retorted vainly that Goethe was the great liberating personality of the nineteenth century, the only writer who freed his readers from the tyranny of the narrow ideas of the time. They spoke also of that great host of oversea writers who were now first attracting attention in America. There was Carlyle, who had beckoned both to a study of German literature. Emerson told of his visit to the lonely Scotch cottage and filled avid ears with personalia about Thomas and Jane Carlyle. He smilingly recounted his unsatisfactory meeting with Wordsworth, now first fully appreciated in America. Last, but not least in importance, might have been the topic of religion, an ever recurrent theme of discourse in the educated homes of New England. "The unhappy plight in which the Unitarian church then found itself"<sup>17</sup> became in this year the initial problem of the Transcendental Club.

<sup>14</sup> Ibid., I, 202–203.

<sup>15</sup> Journals, IV, 405.

These were hours and days filled with vivacious talk, but probably, to Margaret, not soul-satisfying talk. Emerson was, on his side, too anxious to be gracious; he doubtless talked more than he liked and little to Margaret's purpose. On her side, Margaret tried to please too much by ingratiating and witty remarks. The first visit was not an entire failure, but it was not the great success Margaret had expected.

The one tangible result of the visit was Emerson's introduction of Margaret to Amos Bronson Alcott, who was then conducting a school on new principles in Boston. On Emerson's recommendation she was engaged to teach Latin and French and to report stenographically the conversations between Alcott and the pupils. The winter, therefore, found Margaret in Boston where she might be near her new friends.

Upon her return home Margaret wrote a letter of appreciation to the Emersons and solicited a regular correspondence. What could not be won vis-à-vis might be attainable by letter. She adopted immediately a friendly and familiar tone. In September, shortly after she had entered upon her work in Alcott's school, she proposed that Emerson drive her to Groton for a Sunday visit. That she was uncertain of Emerson's kindly disposition towards her can be gleaned from the half-mocking postscript to her letter:

You must not make a joke of my anxiety about next Sunday, but must take it seriously as I am feeling. It is a great gain to be able to address yourself directly, instead of intriguing as I did last year.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>16</sup> Emerson's Works (Centenary edition), iv, 260-270.

<sup>17</sup> Lindsay Swift, Brook Farm (New York, 1900), pp. 7-8.

<sup>18</sup> MS. letter, dated Boston, September 21, 1836, preserved in the Boston Public Library.

During the winter of 1836-1837 Emerson lectured in Boston, and Margaret took every opportunity to see and hear him. A note in her December Journal indicates with what eagerness she compared all other men with Emerson. She had passed the evening with Dr. Channing.

He was more eloquent on the subject of faith and hope, than I have ever heard him in the pulpit. I could not but contrast his tone with that of Mr. E. on the same subjects of conversation I had with him a few weeks ago. Oh man of expediency: how poor and faded are thy once fair words, beside those of a man of principle!<sup>19</sup>

Miss Fuller's frail health was severely taxed by her work with Alcott. When an opportunity came in the spring to transfer to the Greene Street School at Providence, she withdrew, April, 1837, from Boston to Groton for a period of rest. To Emerson she wrote, in a letter accompanying one of many packages of books that passed between them, I look to Concord as my Lethe and Eunoë. After this purgatory of distracting petty tasks, I am sure you will purify and strengthen me to enter the Paradise of thought once more.<sup>20</sup>

This letter doubtless evoked or confirmed a second invitation to visit at Concord late that month, for on May 4 Emerson recorded in his Journal that Margaret had left for home.<sup>21</sup> To a friend she wrote during the visit: "The excitement of conversation prevents my sleeping."<sup>22</sup> Their rich and full talk again centered about German, for Emerson noted somewhat cynically:

Among the many things that make her visit valuable and memorable, this is not the least, that she gave me five or six lessons in German pronunciation, never by my offer and rather against my will each time, so that now, spite of myself, I shall always have to thank her for a great convenience—which she foresaw.<sup>23</sup>

Having failed to win the hoped-for illumination through ordinary friendly interchange of ideas, she applied herself to secure her ends by teaching a bit of needed knowledge. It was with a shrewd calculation of human nature that she thus sought to penetrate the reserves of her "priest." On Sunday she drove with Emerson to Watertown,<sup>24</sup> where he doubtless went to preach. She omitted no art of pleasing, and lost no opportunity. But at the end of her visit she was as far from her goal as she had been before she had met Emerson. For, a few days after her <sup>19</sup> MS. Works of S. M. F. Ossoli, I, 403-405; the date of the entry is December 5, 1836.

<sup>20</sup> Higginson, pp. 63-69, letter of April 11, 1837.

<sup>21</sup> Journals, IV, 225.

<sup>22</sup> Arthur B. Fuller (ed.), Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1874), p. 351.

<sup>23</sup> Journals, IV, 225 (May 4, 1837).

<sup>24</sup> Woman, p. 351.

return home, she again addressed to him a breezy letter; on this he made the notation, "What shocking familiarity."<sup>25</sup>

The persistency with which Margaret continued her efforts to enlist the sympathy and understanding of Emerson can best be understood in the light of a letter sent about this time to James Freeman Clarke.

You question me [she began] as to the nature of the benefits conferred upon me by Mr. E's preaching. I answer, that his influence has been more beneficial to me than that of any American, and that from him I first learned what is meant by an inward life. . . . That the "mind is its own place," was a dead phrase to me, till he cast light upon my mind. Several of his sermons stand apart in memory, like landmarks in my spiritual history. It would take a volume to tell what this one influence did for me.<sup>26</sup>

Margaret's fertile mind nourished the seeds of Emersonian thought; the prejudices of home and environment, the thoughts gleaned from books, and her own ideas were rudely jostled by Emerson's sermons and lectures. Her worries about practical affairs, her desire to be of concrete service to her fellow citizens, were brought into sharp conflict with Emerson's optimistic and seemingly successful philosophy of individualism: "Trust thyself: every heart vibrates to that iron string", trust God, nor be afraid. The conflict was that which results from the meeting of ideal and real, theoretical and practical thinkers. Margaret looked upon society as the source of evil; Emerson looked upon the individual as the creator or destroyer of his own happiness. Which attitude was the correct one, she wondered. All about her were the many practical reformers, the socialists, the watercureists, the graham-bread-eaters, the abolitionists; they seemed to be doing a good work. And here was the wisest American of the era taking the position that such reforms were foolish. His challenge to religion, too, sent her back to her own mind. Not books, not received opinion, not custom, but the truth to one's highest self he demanded. In that very demand he announced by implication the impossibility of one person's controlling another. But Margaret did not understand that this statement applied to her; as a self-appointed disciple she wanted the master to lay down for her concrete principles of thought and action.

During the year 1837—the exact date cannot be learned—Miss Fuller was admitted to the Transcendental Club, a group of New Englanders that met at the convenience of Dr. F. H. Hedge to discuss matters of religion, reform, and philosophy. Called together first on September 8, <sup>25</sup> MS. letter, dated Groton, May 30, 1837, preserved in the Boston Public Library. Emerson regularly endorsed every letter he received.

<sup>26</sup> Memoirs, I, 194-195.

1836, this group had neither a constitution nor a definite name. Like-minded folk were invited to attend, and no restrictions were placed upon the free flow of conversation. "Revelation, Inspiration, Providence, Law, Truth, and other generalities were treated openly and candidly."<sup>27</sup> Its membership included Emerson, Alcott, the Ripleys, Parker, Hedge, and others. Later members included Thoreau, Miss Sophia Peabody who married Hawthorne, Hawthorne, and Miss Fuller. This group sought through talk a solution for the world's ills. Unconscious of the part they were playing in furthering New England culture, they wasted no time in recording their transactions. From their discussions, however, arose in 1840 the twin children of transcendentalism: The Dial, a magazine for the recording and propagation of their ideas, and Brook Farm, an experiment in Utopian and communistic living. In these meetings Miss Fuller took her place on an equality with the other members, and she demonstrated that the mind of at least one woman in nineteenth-century America did not yield in firmness of opinion or in richness of knowledge to the Harvard graduates about her.

In June, 1837, Margaret took up her teaching duties at Providence. Not yet fully recovered in health, she thought longingly of her stay at Concord.

Concord, dear Concord, haven of repose, where headache, vertigo, other sins that flesh is heir to, cannot long continue.<sup>28</sup>

Who but Emerson, she thought, should give the address upon the occasion of the dedication of the new school? It was her suggestion, doubtless, that led to his engagement. On June 10 Emerson spoke to the students and patrons on "Culture." Margaret, eager disciple that she was, looked about and discovered that the "good word" had fallen on barren ground; she wrote, therefore, to Alcott that, since she had been "much cheered and instructed," she hoped to be the means of fertilizing the thought there sown.<sup>29</sup> She would be the Emersonian vicar at Providence, teaching to the devotees of Animal Magnetism the master's message.

Transplanted, Margaret was not transformed. She still asked: Who and what am I? She appealed again to Emerson to explain how she might best go about the tantalizing job of orienting herself. Like a rubber ball cast to earth, she rebounded after rebuffs or denials. In a letter so carefully phrased that he copied it into his Journal and used part of it later in "Self-Reliance," he wrote:

Power and aim seldom meet in one soul. The wit of our time is sick for an object. Genius is homesick. I cannot but think that our age is somewhat distinguished hereby, for you cannot talk with any intelligent company without finding expressions of regret and impatience that attack the whole structure of our worship, education, and social manners. We all undoubtedly expect that time will bring amelioration, but whilst the grass grows the noble seed starves, we die of numb palsy.

<sup>27</sup> Brook Farm, p. 9.

<sup>28</sup> Higginson, p. 80.

<sup>29</sup> MS letter, dated June 27, 1837, preserved in the Boston Public Library.

But ethics stand when wit falls. Fall back on simplest sentiment, be heroic, deal justly, walk humbly, and you do something and do invest the capital of your being in a bank that cannot break, and that will surely yield ample rents.<sup>30</sup>

To Margaret, who could characterize herself as the possessor of "a great share of Typhon to the Osiris, wild rush and leap, blind force for the sake of force,"<sup>31</sup> this letter with its generalities must have seemed poor advice indeed. How could she who arose in the morning in jubilant spirits and went to bed with a nervous prostration, the spasms of which totally incapacitated her—how could this passionate intellect be calmed with oracular words like "walk humbly" and "fall back on simplest sentiment"? It could not be done that way.

For nearly a month she sulked or smiled at the advice given her, and then frankly wrote to Emerson that she had not written with customary promptness because she had not desired to write. She thrust directly at him with her explanation:

I have been in an irreligious state of mind, a little misanthropic, and skeptical about the existence of any real communication between friends. I bear constantly in heart that text of yours—"Oh my friends, there are no friends," but to me it is a paralyzing conviction. Surely we are very unlike Gods in "their seats of eternal tranquillity" that we need illusions so much to keep us in action.<sup>32</sup>

Then, as if to dull her weapon, and with the intention of trying again after a year's failure, she added that she desired to see her "dear no friends, Mr. and Mrs. Emerson," and would be glad, since they had invited her, to make another visit to their home.<sup>33</sup>

With the exception of occasional visits to Boston, Margaret spent the entire time between September, 1837, and December, 1838, in her Providence school. New friends she made, of course; she wrote to Jane Tuckerman of a "gentleman not young, but noble in form and mind, and more rich in intellect than any person I have known since Mr. Emerson."<sup>34</sup> Her thoughts, it is evident, turned frequently to Emerson; all men were to be judged by comparison with him. Letters passed

<sup>30</sup> Journals, iv, 256-257.

<sup>31</sup> Memoirs, i, 237.

<sup>32</sup> MS. letter, dated Providence, August 14, 1837, preserved in the Boston Public Library.

<sup>33</sup> Ibid.

<sup>34</sup> MS. Works of S. M. F. Ossoli, i, 89; the letter is dated September 21, 1838.

frequently between them. Their reading, their friends, their duties, their new gleanings in nature were discussed. Emerson during this period had sent two new challenges to American thinkers, "The American Scholar" and "The Divinity School Address." He was busy lecturing, and these two new declarations of independence were part of a full year's work. The furore the latter aroused was less important to Margaret than the problem which still worried her. She wrote with urgency: "I must see you, and still more hear you." She demanded that he lecture in Boston when she could be present, or that he send her his lectures on "Holiness" and "Heroism." It was in this letter that she wrote: "Yours is an image in my oratory . . . and I must pray."<sup>35</sup>

During the last days of December, 1838, Margaret left her school for ever and went to Groton to rest. She again plunged into her studies. A collection of copies and prints of great works of art having been given to the Boston Athenæum, she immersed herself in the study of the history and interpretation of the fine arts, a subject she had become interested in much earlier through her reading of Goethe. To be nearer her friends, she took a place in Jamaica Plains, near Boston. From this suburban point of vantage she could sally out daily to meet her friends or to read in the library. The immense activity of her earlier years continued. She planned great literary works. She read widely, wrote much, and visited frequently. No form of expression—book, art, sermon, or lecture—escaped her attention. Nor did she let her friends escape the impact of her enthusiasm.

I pleased myself [Emerson noted] in seeing the pictures brought in her portfolio by Margaret Fuller.<sup>36</sup>

It was a season of great interest in art, and Margaret and Emerson spent many occasional hours in the study of the works of the great Italian artists. Naturally Margaret led in the discussions.

I remember [Emerson wrote] that in the first times I chanced to see pictures with her, I listened reverently to her opinions.<sup>37</sup>

Later he realized that she offered interpretations which the pictures did not justify.

Her taste in works of art, though honest, was not on universal, but on idiosyncratic grounds. . . . Her fancy and imagination were easily stimulated to

<sup>35</sup> Higginson, pp. 89-91.

<sup>36</sup> Journals, iv, 465 (June 8, 1838). Emerson at this time was attempting to determine his own critical standards in the judgment of works of art. Margaret's excessively romantic interpretations taught him the need for "perfect equilibrium of mind."

<sup>37</sup> Memoirs, I, 267-268.

genial activity, and she erroneously thanked the artist for the pleasing emotions and thoughts that rose in her mind.<sup>38</sup>

Her opinions, Emerson confessed, were worth hearing for their original and interesting quality, if not for their accuracy.<sup>39</sup>

The year 1839 seems to have been a happy one in Margaret's life. Her Goethe studies bore fruit in a volume of translation, Eckermann's Conversations with Goethe. She wrote many essays and sketches which did service later in The Dial and the Tribune. She had made definite progress toward that high goal in authorship she had set for herself. She began in November her Conversations with such success that they were repeated annually for five years. Not unimportant was the solid foundation of her friendship with Emerson. He could note in his Journal late at night the visit of Alcott and Margaret.

Very friendly influences these, each and both. Cold as I am, they are almost dear. [But he distrusted his jubilation and added] What is good to make me happy is not however good to make me write. Life too near paralyzes art.<sup>40</sup>

Three weeks later he lamented his "porcupine impossibility of contact with men."<sup>41</sup> He was as close to Margaret as he could be to any person. Although the rapport was not so complete as Margaret could wish, Emerson's earlier feeling of distance and restraint had largely passed. Margaret was less bumptious, for she withheld a letter and a poem she had written because she was afraid they "might destroy relations."<sup>42</sup> There were communal tasks to be performed, and on Margaret alone could Emerson depend for assistance. It was to her that he turned in these last days of 1839 when the long-projected magazine was to be launched.

The Dial was not the offspring of a moment's thought. Such a periodical had been conceived—as many earlier American magazines like the Monthly Anthology and the Port Folio had been planned—as a coöperative organ for the dissemination of the ideas of a like-minded group. As early as 1833 the Reverend Frederick Henry Hedge had sought by correspondence to organize a magazine. Margaret had then offered to contribute, provided that Hedge would give her a subject.

<sup>38</sup> Ibid., I, 268.

<sup>39</sup> Ibid., I, 268.

<sup>40</sup> Journals, v, 292 (October 21, 1839).

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., v, 325.

<sup>42</sup> Memoirs, I, 230. Cf. MS. letter to Caroline Sturgis, dated November 25, 1839, preserved in the Boston Public Library, in which Margaret sent a poem and some leaves from her Journal: "I hesitated about sending you any papers now because you are busy writing, but then I reflected that you would not wish your mind strained up to your subject all day, but might like some grove of private life into which you might step aside to refresh yourself from the broad highway of philosophy."

Two years later she again offered to aid. In 1836 at the bi-centennial celebration of Harvard College, Hedge drew Emerson, George Ripley, and George Putnam into a conference to discuss the narrowing tendencies of the Unitarian church. Out of this discussion grew the Transcendental Club. Early in 1839 Brownson's Boston Quarterly Review so aroused the members that they felt they too might put to use much vacant talent and publish to the world the ideas which circulated in their association. John A. Heraud's British New Monthly Magazine became the immediate model. At a club meeting, September 18, Margaret "gave her views of the proposed Dial."<sup>43</sup> On October 20 Alcott and Margaret drove to Concord to confer all day with Emerson on the feasibility of the project. On January 1, 1840, she wrote to her friends to announce the new quarterly journal. Emerson, she was careful to say, would contribute to each issue. She begged for materials of so excellent a character that the first number might justify its publication. It is a commentary on man's ambitions that Hedge, who for seven years had nursed the idea of a magazine, was one of the tardiest contributors. The date for publication was to be April, 1840, but the poor response delayed the first number until July.<sup>44</sup>

During these six months Margaret corresponded with every possible contributor, accepted or rejected copy, revised or offered suggestions, even to Emerson, and in general carried out with fortitude the almost thankless task of organizing the editorial department of the paper. To Emerson, who acted as consulting editor, Margaret went frequently with her troubles and plans.

They examined every detail with some care until the first issue was ready to go to press. Then Margaret went away and trusted—as amateurs do to their sorrow—to the accuracy of the printer. Numerous small errors in type font, arrangement, and word drew a quick apology from Margaret to Emerson.<sup>45</sup> Her meekness in this respect was compensated by her frankness in editing the master's copy. "I think," she wrote Emerson in regard to proofs for the second issue, "when you look again you will think you have not said what you meant to say."<sup>46</sup> She supported her statement with a list of specific corrections. In some ways Margaret, although she attempted to interpret and popularize his ideas, was Emerson's harshest critic. She knew his personal weaknesses and his lack of continuity in writing. No worshipper ever sought more earnestly to give life to the clay feet of his God than did Margaret. She attempted

<sup>43</sup> Higginson, p. 147.

<sup>45</sup> Ibid., pp. 155-156.

<sup>44</sup> Ibid., pp. 130 ff.

<sup>46</sup> Ibid., 157.

to teach this sage [that] all he wants to make him the full-fledged angel [is] to make him forego these tedious, tedious attempts to learn the universe by thought alone.<sup>47</sup>

As literary editor of Horace Greeley's Tribune she took delight in praising "the sage of Concord"<sup>48</sup> while yet appraising his work disinterestedly.<sup>49</sup> No American critic has distributed more justly both praise and blame to Emerson's writings.

To The Dial Margaret and Emerson contributed, during her editorship, a large portion of the material. The sixth number contained, of a total of one hundred thirty-six pages, eighty-five from Margaret's pen. Much of this material was old or hastily written. Emerson, for his part, complained of the extreme fatigue he suffered from filling gaps at the last moment.<sup>50</sup>

It is not our purpose here to appraise The Dial or Margaret's part in it except so far as it shows how she and Emerson were drawn together into more simple and direct relations. The frequent letters between them and their hurried visits indicate that they attained an informality that stopped short of confidences. Emerson carried family messages for her, and he was trusted to look in upon Richard Fuller at Harvard on every visit to Cambridge. She petulantly chided her family for failing to make use of Emerson in the office of postman.<sup>51</sup>

When the burden of conducting the magazine was handed over to Emerson in March, 1842, he realized to the full Margaret's devotion to the paper. He came to realize, too, the utter justness and impartiality with which she had conducted it; and by letter she let him know his own shortcomings as an editor by referring to her experiences.<sup>52</sup> As

<sup>47</sup> James Elliot Cabot, A Memoir of Ralph Waldo Emerson (Boston, 1887), I, 276. Cf. MS. letter dated Groton, January 7, 1839, preserved in the Boston Public Library, in which she rebuked Emerson in humorous terms for adjourning a lecture because he had lost a night's rest as a result of a slight indisposition: "Imagine my indignation: lost a night's rest! as if an intellectual person ever had a night's rest." See, also, in the same place an undated letter in which she comments upon a criticism offered upon his Essays. "There is something obviously wrong in this attempt to measure one another, or one another's act."—Cf. also Memoirs, I, 240–241, in a letter to Emerson, dated December, 1842, anent her unwillingness to send Dante's Vita Nuova in the original Italian to him: "It has never seemed to me you entered enough into the genius of the Italian to apprehend the mind, which has seemed so great to me, and a star unlike, if not higher than all others in our sky."

<sup>48</sup> Margaret Fuller Ossoli, Art Literature, and the Drama (Boston, 1874), p. 304.

<sup>49</sup> Ibid., pp. 195–196.

<sup>50</sup> Higginson, p. 165.

<sup>51</sup> MS. Works of S. M. F. Ossoli, II, 257, 551, 643, 657, and 663–665. For example, "During the two months that Mr. E. will lecture here I can always send by him" (pp. 663–665).

<sup>52</sup> Higginson, pp. 166–167.

guide, counsellor, and friend she sought to serve the best interests of Emerson, as well as of The Dial and herself. Emerson's loyalty to The Dial, if we judge by his letters to Carlyle, "seemed inseparably connected with his loyalty to her."<sup>53</sup>

These busy days did not bring to an end her questions about herself. Early in 1840 she sent him a little parable and added:

Why do I write thus to one who must ever regard the deepest tones of my nature as those of childish fancy or worldly discontent?<sup>54</sup>

She continued to press her questions and in October drew from him a long letter in which he attempted to explain their relation:

Concord, October 24th, 1840

I have your frank and noble and affecting letter—and yet I think I could wish it unwritten. I ought never to have suffered you to lead me into any conversation or writing on our relation—a topic from which with all persons my Genius ever sternly warns me away. I was content and happy to meet on a human footing a woman of sense and sentiment, with whom one could exchange reasonable words, and go away assured that wherever she went was light and force and honor. That is to me a solid good: it gives value to thought and the day; it redeems society from that foggy and misty aspect it wears so often, seen from our retirement; it is the foundation of everlasting friendship.

. . . But tell me that I am cold or unkind, and, in my most flowing state I become a cake of ice; I can feel the crystals shoot and the drops solidify. It may do for others, but it is not for me to bring the relation to speech. Instantly I find myself a solitary, unrelated person, destitute not only of all social faculty but of all private substance. I see precisely the double of my state in my little Waldo, when, in the midst of his dialogue with his hobby-horse, in the full tide of his eloquence, I should ask him if he loves me—he is mute and stupid. . . . I take it for granted that everybody will show me kindness and wit, and am happy in the observation of all the abundant particulars of the show to feel the slightest obligation resting on me to do anything or say anything for the company. I talk to my hobby, and will join you in harnessing and driving him; but ask me what I think of you and me, and I am put to confusion. . . . There is a difference in our constitution. We use a different rhetoric. It seems as if we had been born and bred in different nations. You say you understand me wholly. You cannot communicate yourself to me. I hear the words sometimes, but remain a stranger to your state of mind. Yet we are all the time a little nearer. I honor you for a brave and beneficent woman, and mark with gladness your steadfast good-will to me. I see not how we can bear each other anything else than good-will, though we had sworn to the contrary. And now, what will you? The stars in Orion do not quarrel this night, but shine in peace in the old society.

<sup>53</sup> Ibid., p. 171.

<sup>54</sup> Memoirs, I, 291. The letter is dated February 23, 1840.

Are we not much better than they? Let us live as we always have done, only ever better, I hope, and richer. Speak to me of everything but myself, and I will endeavor to make an intelligible reply. . . .

Yours affectionately

R. W. Emerson<sup>55</sup>

A year later Emerson was again disturbed. On one of her frequent visits Margaret went into the library to secure a book. Instead of reading she wrote the following letter:

October 1841

Dear Waldo,

I know you do not regard our foolish critiques, except in the true way to see whether you have yet got the best form of expression. What do we know of when you should stop writing or how you should live? In these pages I seem to hear the music rising I so long have wished to hear and am made sensible to the truth of the passage in one of your letters, "Life, like the nimble Tartar &c."

I like to be in your library when you are out of it. It seems a sacred place. I came here to find a book, that I might feel more life and be worthy to sleep, but there is so much here I do not need a book. When I come to yourself, I cannot receive you, and you cannot give yourself: it does not profit. But when I cannot find you the beauty and permanence of your life come to me.

"The (Poesie) has ascended from the depths of a nature, and only by a similar depth, shall she be apprehended!"—I want to say while I am feeling it, what I have often (not always) great pleasure in feeling—how long it must be before I am able to meet you.—I see you—and fancied it nearer than it was, you were right in knowing the contrary.

How much, much more I would fain say and cannot. I am too powerfully drawn while with you, and cannot advance a step, but when away I have learned something. Not yet to be patient and faithful and holy, however, but only have taken off the shoes, to tread the holy ground. I shall often depart through the ranges of manifold being, but as often return to where I am tonight.

Margaret F.

Oct. 1841

Letter written at Concord from room to room.<sup>56</sup>

Emerson noted in his Journal on October 12 with a tinge of despair: I would that I could, I know afar off I cannot, give the lights and shades, the hopes and outlooks that come to me in these strange, cold-warm, attractive-

<sup>55</sup> Cabot, I, 367-369.

<sup>56</sup> The letter is preserved in the Boston Public Library. The endorsement, as usual, is in Emerson's hand.

repelling conversations with Margaret, whom I always admire, most revere when I nearest see, and sometimes love—yet whom I freeze, and who freezes me to silence, when we seem to come nearest.<sup>57</sup>

Ten days later he recorded the opinion that she was “a being of unsettled rank in the universe.”<sup>58</sup> She seemed to have become a kind of sphinx, a living riddle. When he was surest of a solution, he was furthest away from the truth. She disturbed his equanimity as no one else had done, except possibly Aunt Mary Moody Emerson. Was he thinking of Margaret when he wrote: “Better be a nettle in the side of your friend than his echo”?<sup>59</sup>

Meantime there had been, as there would be hereafter, many good letters between them. Emerson, indeed, wrote that he “wishes letters every day from Margaret Fuller.”<sup>60</sup> He tells her of his experiences as a gardener, his hoeing of corn and potatoes,<sup>61</sup> of his impending trip to Waterville, Maine, to deliver a lecture (“For which of my sins?” he asked jocosely),<sup>62</sup> of his pleasure in again being at the ocean,<sup>63</sup> and of his joy in her praise.<sup>64</sup> More interesting to her must have been his suggestion that they coöperate in founding a school (really a college on the plan recently adopted by Rollins College) in which instruction would be given by lecturers only. Ripley, Hedge, Parker, and Alcott could assist them.<sup>65</sup> When one recalls that Emerson wished for a professorship of rhetoric, it can be understood with what eagerness he awaited Margaret’s reply. He too could confide in her, for, as she wrote him, she knew how to keep confidences.<sup>66</sup>

Late in 1840 the Reverend George Ripley withdrew from his pastorate and organized the Brook Farm Community in an attempt “to bring cultivated, thoughtful people together, and make a society that deserved the name.”<sup>67</sup> Margaret and Emerson, as well as the other members of the Transcendental Club, were invited to join. Neither joined although each wished the colony well, and each visited it and spoke to the assembled members. Some of the meetings of Margaret and Emerson took place there, as Hawthorne recorded in his notebooks.<sup>68</sup>

<sup>57</sup> Journals, vi, 87.

<sup>58</sup> Ibid., vi, 97.

<sup>59</sup> Emerson’s Works (Centenary edition), II, 208, in “Friendship.”

<sup>60</sup> Cabot, II, 67.

<sup>61</sup> Ibid., II, 65.

<sup>62</sup> Ibid., II, 67.

<sup>63</sup> Ibid., II, 82–83.

<sup>64</sup> Ibid., II, 95–97.

<sup>65</sup> Ibid., II, 27–28.

<sup>66</sup> MS. letter, dated Feb.? July? 5, 1840, preserved in the Boston Public Library. This letter is of interest because it reveals the fact that another young lady sought out Emerson for counsel in a private matter somewhat similar in nature to Margaret’s problem.—Cf. Memoirs, I, 214: “She never confounded relations, but kept a hundred fine threads in her hand, without crossing or entangling any.”

<sup>67</sup> Brook Farm, p. 9.

<sup>68</sup> Hawthorne’s Works (Riverside edition), IX, 252, 308.

Margaret's mental growth, as Emerson perceived, was visible.<sup>69</sup> The Conversations required a popular treatment of scholarly information and a ready command of her material. Her reserves needed to be stronger than her marshalled, prepared papers. She was at her best when a learned opponent called her forth. The vinous quality of her talk led her friends to urge her to publish in carefully organized form these brilliant ex tempore expressions. Her first task, after having been relieved from the onerous duties of The Dial, was to prepare these books. First came the translation of the correspondence of Fraulein Gunderode and Bettine von Arnim, another branch of the Goethe tree she was growing. This book was published in 1842. She set to work on her Woman in the Nineteenth Century, the basis of which had appeared in The Dial as "The Great Lawsuit." In 1843 she made her pilgrimage to the West, the record of which is to be found in her third book, Summer on the Lakes. In 1844 Woman came from the presses. With four books to her credit, she was at thirty-four one of America's leading writers.

Margaret's new ardency in propagating feminist notions did not please Emerson. After a meeting with her, he wrote in his Journal:

The conversation turned upon the state and duties of Woman. As always, it was historically considered, and had a certain falseness so. For me, to-day, Woman is not a degraded person with duties forgotten, but a docile daughter of God with her face heavenward endeavoring to hear the divine word and to convey it to me.<sup>70</sup>

Earlier he had written:

Woman should not be expected to write, or fight, or build, or compose scores: she does all by inspiring man to do all.<sup>71</sup>

As generalizations, Margaret doubtless remarked, these statements were very attractive, but the individual woman could not be content to suffer, as she herself had suffered, to see her own property managed by a man simply because she was a woman; to suffer regret because she could not attend college; and to suffer the odium of gossip because she had acquired an education equal to a man's. There were practicable solutions possible, and these solutions she would demand. Against her ideas Emerson naturally opposed all his belief in the uselessness of method. They differed, but they did not quarrel. Her thinking had carried her beyond Emerson. Hers was a creative mind; she could no longer tarry within Emersonian limits.

<sup>69</sup> Cf. Ibid., ix, 334: Mr. Emerson "spoke of Margaret Fuller, who, he says, has risen perceptibly into a higher state since their last meeting." Cf. also Memoirs, i, 215, where Emerson wrote: "The day was never long enough to exhaust her opulent memory; and I, who knew her intimately for ten years . . . never saw her without surprise at her new powers."

<sup>70</sup> Journals, vi, 369 (March, 1843).

<sup>71</sup> Ibid., vi, 134 (November, 1841).

After the room-to-room correspondence Margaret seems not to have harassed Emerson for further explanations. Her visit to Concord in August, 1842, several months after the death of little Waldo, is happily to be reconstructed from one of the few extant portions of her diaries. It is evident that they met as friendly contemporaries and not as master and follower. She had come to write, and Emerson promptly put her to work. On the day following her arrival she walked with Emerson to Walden Pond. Their new "relations" can be understood from her notation:

I feel more at home with him constantly, but we do not act powerfully on one another. He is much a better companion than formerly, for once he would talk obstinately through the walk, but now we can be silent and see things together.<sup>72</sup>

On an evening they walked to the river.

We had an excellent talk: we agreed that my God was love, his truth.<sup>73</sup>

On another day she wrote:

Waldo and I have good meetings, though we stop at all our old places. But my expectations are moderate now; it is his beautiful presence that I prize, far more than our intercourse.<sup>74</sup>

"My expectations are moderate now!" In that phrase Margaret explained to herself the new basis of their association. It was no longer to be a pursuit after a phantom. The old demand was no longer to be made; she was content with the realization that friendship with Emerson had to exist on his principles and not on hers. In the chatty letters that passed between them while she was at home, in New York City, and in Europe there was a continuous flow of friendly personal items. They had demonstrated to each other—Emerson reluctantly and with embarrassment—that they cared for, indeed loved, each other in their own way. With that knowledge Margaret had to be satisfied, and she thus versified her thought:

TO R. W. EMERSON. JULY 1844

Slight is the token, yet it should bring Thoughts of trust unbroken, hopes of Eternal Spring
Of Love no word be spoken, it is too cold to sing.
    May the coming day,
    To my now clearer way,

<sup>72</sup> MS. Works of S. M. F. Ossoli, III, 165.

<sup>73</sup> Ibid., III, 169.

<sup>74</sup> Ibid., III, 175-177.

Bring a ministry
 More worthy thee;
 Bring to thee
 Truer thoughts of me.
 Gifts to the Giver
 Rain-drops to the parent river:
 From absence they borrow
 The tearful, pearly joy of sorrow <sup>76</sup>

Of Margaret's year and a half as a critic on the Tribune we need remark no more than that only Poe in these years equalled her as a critic. Her just appraisal of Emerson as a poet and prose writer has already been alluded to. Of her years in Europe, her marriage, and her service to the Italian revolutionary cause as a nurse we need only say that these incidents fulfilled the expectations one might have of the high-spirited and noble young woman. Her tragic death by shipwreck within a few rods of the American coast closed at the age of forty the career of America's most brilliant woman of the era. It is not to Emerson's memoir of Margaret that we need to turn for his characterization of their relations, fine as that account is. This one sad sentence, written when he first learned of her death, contains in its first clause the simplest statement of his loss: "I have lost in her my audience, and I hurry now to my work admonished that I have a few days left."<sup>76</sup>

HARRY R. WARFEL

Bucknell University

<sup>76</sup> Ibid, I, 459.

<sup>78</sup> Denton J. Snider, A Biography of Ralph Waldo Emerson (St. Louis, 1921), p. 333.

GRUNDTVIG'S INDEX B OF ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH BALLADS

WHILE Francis James Child was preparing the manuscript for the publication of The English and Scottish Popular Ballads, Svend Grundtvig sent to him, in the form of enclosures with letters dated August 25, 1877 and January 29, 1880, a numbered list of English and Scottish ballads arranged in the order which Grundtvig, at Child's earlier request, meant to propose as a proper sequence for publication. This list is printed in full in my Ballad Books and Ballad Men under the designation of the "Grundtvig-Child Index." This index was prepared by Grundtvig mainly from two other manuscript indexes which he had drawn up many years before for convenient reference in his work with the Danish ballads. The first of the two, named Index A by Grundtvig himself, contained what he regarded at the time as a standard list of English and Scottish ballads. The second, named by him Index B, comprised ballads which he regarded for various reasons as questionable. Index A began in 1850; Index B appears to belong to approximately the same period.<sup>1</sup> Between twenty and thirty years afterward, when Grundtvig prepared for Child's guidance the Grundtvig-Child Index, he admitted into it many ballads from Index B. In the interval he had obviously changed his mind or resolved his doubts as to the merits of a group of ballads originally regarded by him as distinctly secondary in value. It is to be observed, however, that, in his classifications for Child in the Grundtvig-Child Index, Grundtvig admits no ballad from Index B into his First Class, in his opinion the most ancient poems; on the other hand, he places a large number of pieces from Index B in his Fourth Class, "consisting of imitations of the old ballad style." Whether, then, we take into account Grundtvig's earlier or his later judgment, Index B represents a secondary order of merit. Careful attention should be paid, meanwhile, to the variety of reasons which led Grundtvig, according to his own introductory note, to the formation of Index B. This index was to him in effect a sort of ballad purgatory, from which in the course of time he released such of the numbers as appeared to him worthy of liberation.

In the preparation of the Grundtvig-Child Index, Grundtvig incorporated from Index B all but seven of the sixty-one numbers. These fifty-four originally secondary ballads were thus recommended to Child as candidates for admittance into his definitive collection. Child finally accepted all but eight of the fifty-four. Besides, he admitted two numbers listed in Index B which Grundtvig had not seen fit to recommend, namely Young Peggy and The West Country Damsel's Complaint. Child never saw Index B except in so far as numbers from it were included in the Grundtvig-Child Index. In making his final roster of three hundred and five ballads, Child, although influenced considerably by Grundtvig's nominations, rested in the long run on an exhaustive study of the documentary backgrounds of the texts and on a critical tact acquired through long familiarity with popular literature. It is not to be wondered at that the two men occasionally differed; rather is it remarkable that they agreed so well. Of the two hundred and sixty-nine nominations in the Grundtvig-Child Index, Child rejected less than twenty. Only some fifty, therefore, of Child's total tally of three hundred and five, did not appear on Grundtvig's list of recommendations. Although Child eventually, through the acquisition of texts drawn from manuscripts and early printed books unknown to Grundtvig, came to be much better equipped for the determination of the traditional authenticity of the English and Scottish ballads than his Danish correspondent (who relied mainly on the ordinary printed collections) could possibly be, nevertheless Child always placed a high value on Grundtvig's expert opinion. A study of the full list of sources available to Grundtvig as compared with the older, largely manuscript sources for the same ballads as given in Child's definitive edition will help us to understand Grundtvig's fluctuations of judgment and to appreciate Child's final decisions, whether in the end he rejected a given ballad and its versions or accepted them. Index B, therefore, incorporated to so great an extent into the Grundtvig-Child Index, is a document of some importance in the history of the formation of the Child canon. It is printed here from a photostatic reproduction of the original manuscript text, as preserved in the Danish Folklore Collection of the Royal Library at Copenhagen (DFS 69A). Nothing has been omitted except some numerals attached, apparently in a hand other than Grundtvig's, to four of the serial numbers; these attached numerals turn out to be in each case Child's number for the corresponding ballad in the E.S.P.B. In a few cases I have corrected what seemed to me to be obvious errors in paging; in other instances I have suggested a correction in brackets. Some added explanatory matter appears in brackets.

<sup>1</sup> See Ballad Books and Ballad Men, pp. 300-301.

The bracketed entries in the two columns at the right will show which numbers—not which versions—were incorporated into the Grundtvig-Child Index; and which numbers and versions were eventually admitted into The English and Scottish Popular Ballads. Where the source assigned is the same for Child's earlier collection, employed by Grundtvig, and for Child's final collection, the agreement is likewise noted in the column at the right. Unless otherwise indicated, the bracketed entries are mine.

The detailed history of the relation between Grundtvig's indexes and the Child canon may be studied by means of the Grundtvig-Child Correspondence and the Grundtvig-Child Index as printed in my Ballad Books and Ballad Men. With the exception of about a dozen numbers, Grundtvig's basic list, Index A, which Child apparently never saw, may be reconstructed through Grundtvig's bracketed references in the Grundtvig-Child Index. Index A, unpublished so far as I know, is preserved in the Danish Folklore Collection as Grundtvig left it (DFS 69A).

The following is a list of the more important collections actually used or referred to by Grundtvig, not readily identified from the text:

- Anon, A Collection of Old Ballads, 3 vols. London I, II, 1723, III, 1725.
 Aytoun, W. E., The Ballads of Scotland, 2d ed., 2 vols. Edin. and L., 1859.
 Bell, Robert, Ancient Poems, Ballads, and Songs of the Peasantry of England. London, 1857.
 Buchan, Peter, Ancient Ballads and Songs of the North of Scotland, 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1828 (Grundtvig's Buchan); Gleanings of Scotch, English, and Irish Scarce Old Ballads. Peterhead, 1825.
 Child, F. J., English and Scottish Ballads, 2d ed. (London issue of 1861), 8 vols. (Grundtvig's Child).
 Cromek, R. H. (Burns), Select Scottish Songs, 2 vols. London, 1810.
 Dixon, J. H., Scottish Traditional Versions of Ancient Ballads (Percy Society, Vol. xvii). London, 1845.
 Evans, Thomas, Old Ballads, new edition by R. H. Evans, 4 vols. London, 1810.
 Gutch, J. M., A Lytill Geste of Robin Hode, 2 vols. London, 1847.
 Herd, David, Ancient and Modern Scottish Songs, 2d ed., 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1776.
 Johnson, James, The Scots Musical Museum, 3d ed., 4 vols. Edin. and L., 1853.
 Maidment, James, A North Country Garland. Edinburgh, 1824.
 Percy, Thomas, Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, 6th ed., 4 vols. London, 1823 (Grundtvig's Percy); Bishop Percy's Folio Manuscript, ed. Hales and Furnivall, 4 vols. London, 1867-68 (Grundtvig's Percy MSS.).
 Pinkerton, John, Select Scottish Ballads, 2 vols. London, 1783.
 Ritson, Joseph, Ancient Songs. London, 1792. 2d ed., 2 vols. London, 1829.
 ———, Pieces of Ancient Popular Poetry. London, 1791.
 ———, Robin Hood, new edition. London, 1820.
 ———, Scottish Songs, 2 vols. London, 1794.
 ———, A Select Collection of English Songs, 2d ed. by Thomas Park, 3 vols. London, 1813.
 Scott, Walter, Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, 5th ed., 3 vols. Edinburgh, 1812.
 Sharpe, C. K., A Ballad Book. Edinburgh, 1823.
 Smith, R. A., The Scottish Minstrel, 6 vols. n.d.
 Thomson, W., Orpheus Caledonius, 2 vols. London, 1733.

INDEX B

From my Index A of English and Scottish Ballads the following have been excluded out of different reasons, partly because they were of too local a character, as the Border Ballads, partly as decidedly political pieces; some also, while they seemed to be of too recent a date or were of a doubtful antiquity.

[Marginal note:] N.B. Besides all the ballads contained in Ritson's Robin Hood (reprinted in Evans' Collection [1810], Vol. II), Gutch's Robin Hood, Child, Vol. v, Bell, p. 59 [The Bold Pedlar and Robin Hood]

1. Dick o' the Cow [G.-C. Index 212] [E S.P.B. 185]
 (Motherwell, Introd., No. 41)
 Scott, I, 209
 Aytoun, I, 167
 Child, VI, 67 [185 b]
2. Jock o' the Side [213] [187]
 (Motherwell, Introd., Nos 42, 64)
 A. John a Side. Percy MSS., II, 203 [187 A]
 a. Scott, I, 226
 Aytoun, I, 264
 Child, VI, 80 [187 Ba]
 b. (Archie of Ca'field)
 Scott, I, 274
 Child, VI, 88 [188 Bb]
 c. (Billie Archie)
 Motherwell, 335 [188 D]
 Child, VI, 94 [188 D]
 d. (The three Brothers)
 Buchan, I, 111 [188 C]
3. Hobbie Noble [214] [189]
 (Motherwell, Introd., No. 43)
 Scott, I, 243
 Aytoun, I, 271
 Child, VI, 97 [189 a]
4. Hughie Græme [210] [191]
 (Motherwell, Introd., No. 51)
 a. Ritson's Anc. Songs, Cl. v, No. 1
 (Mine afskrr. [My copies], II, 2)
 Evans, I, No. 87
 Child, VI, 247 [191 Ad]
 Aytoun, II, 128
 b. Johnson's Museum, [No.] 303
 (Mine melodier [My melodies], 22
 Child, VI, 51 [191 B]
 c. Scott, III, 232 [191 C]
 Child, VI, 55 [191 C]
 d. Dixon, Scott. Ball., No. 15 [191 E]

- |   | [G.-C. Index] | [E.S.P.B.] |
|---|---------------|------------|
| 5. Lord Ewrie(Motherwell, Introd., No. 58)Scott, I, 131 Spurious[Grundtvig brackets the whole of No. 5]  |               |            |
| 6. The Lochmaben Harper(Motherwell, Introd., No. 59)   | [207]         | [192]      |
| a. Scott, I, 136  |               | [192 Ac]   |
| Child, VI, 7  |               | [192 Ac]   |
| b. Johnson's Museum , VI, . . . [No. 579]  |               | [192 Ab]   |
| Child, VI, 3  |               | [192 Ab]   |
| Aytoun, I, 121  |               |            |
| c. Dixon, Scott. Ball. , No. 4 <sup>to</sup> [IV]  |               | [192 E]    |
| 7. Jamie Telfer of the fair Dodhead(Motherwell, Introd., No. 60)   | [216]         | [190]      |
| Scott, I, 144   |               | [190]      |
| Aytoun, I, 211  |               |            |
| Child, VI, 105  |               | [190]      |
| 8. Kimmont Willie(Motherwell, Introd., No. 61)   | [209]         | [186]      |
| Scott, I, 178   |               | [186]      |
| Aytoun, I, 95   |               |            |
| Child, VI, 58   |               | [186]      |
| 9. Bartram's Dirge(Motherwell, Introd., No. 63)Scott, I, 269Cf. Motherwell, Introd., p. I [50] Spurious[Grundtvig brackets the whole of No. 9] |               |            |
| 10. The Lads of Wamphray(Motherwell, Introd., No. 68)  | [220]         | [184]      |
| Scott, I, 310   |               |            |
| Child, VI, 168  |               |            |
| 11. The Battle of Philiphaugh (1680)(Motherwell, Introd., No. 69)  | [177]         | [202]      |
| Scott, II, 15   |               | [202]      |
| Aytoun, II, 279   |               |            |
| Child, VII, 131   |               | [202]      |
| 12. The Battle of Peniland Hills(Motherwell, Introd., No. 71)  | [226]         |            |
| Scott, II, 51   |               |            |
| Child, VII, 240   |               |            |
| 13. The Battle of Loudon Hill(Motherwell, Introd., No. 72)   | [227]         | [205]      |
| Scott, II, 58   |               | [205]      |
| Aytoun, II, 325   |               |            |
| Child, VII, 144   |               | [205]      |

- |  |                   |                |
|--|-------------------|----------------|
| 14. The Battle of Bothwell Bridge               | [G.-C. Index 228] | [E.S.P.B. 206] |
| (Motherwell, Introd., No. 73)                          |                   |                |
| Scott, II, 48  |                   | [206]          |
| Aytoun, II, 328  |                   |                |
| Child, VII, 148  |                   | [206]          |
| 15. Græme and Bewick                            | [258]             | [211]          |
| (Motherwell, Introd., No. 79)                          |                   |                |
| Scott, II, 288   |                   |                |
| Aytoun, II, 212  |                   |                |
| Child, III, 77   |                   |                |
| 16. The Trumpeter of Fyvie                      | [261]             | [233]          |
| (Motherwell, Introd., No. 107)                         |                   |                |
| a. Jamieson, I, 126                                    |                   | [233 A]        |
| Child, II, 201   |                   | [233 A]        |
| b. Motherwell, 239                                     |                   | [233 Cb]       |
| Child, II, 190   |                   | [233 Cb]       |
| ( Andrew Lammie )                               |                   |                |
| c. Jamieson's Appendix, IV                             |                   | [233 B]        |
| Aytoun, II, 302  |                   |                |
| Motherwell, Musick, XXVIII                             |                   |                |
| 17. The Death of Queen Jane                     | [221]             | [170]          |
| (Motherwell, Introd., No. 110)                         |                   |                |
| a. Jamieson, I, 182                                    |                   | [170 Ca]       |
| b. Kinloch, 116 (with the air)                         |                   | [170 B]        |
| Child, VII, 74   |                   | [170 B]        |
| c. London Collection [Old Ballads] of 1723             |                   |                |
| (?—[One word which I cannot read] <sup>4</sup> )       |                   |                |
| d. Bell, p. 113  |                   | [170 D]        |
| Child, VII, 77   |                   | [170 D]        |
| 18. The Bonny House of Airly                    | [219]             | [199]          |
| (Motherwell, Introd., No. 118)                         |                   |                |
| a. Finlay, II, 22[25]                                  |                   | [199 Ab]       |
| Child, VI, 183   |                   | [199 Ab]       |
| b. Sharpe, p. 59                                       |                   | [199 Aa]       |
| Child, VI, 186   |                   | [199 Aa]       |
| c. Kinloch, 100 (with the air)                         |                   | [199 D]        |
| Aytoun, II, 270  |                   |                |
| 19. Lord Derwentwater                           | [179]             | [208]          |
| (Motherwell, Introd., No. 162)                         |                   |                |
| a. Motherwell, 349                                     |                   | [208 A]        |
| Child, VII, 164  |                   | [208 A]        |
| b. Gentleman's Mag. , 1825 [Part First], p. 489 |                   | [208 I]        |
| c. Notes and Queries [First Series], XII, 492   |                   | [208 B]        |
| Motherwell, Musick, IV                                 |                   |                |

* The obscure word may be "hist.," querying the historicity of the ballad. Cf. the introduction to this number in the Old Ballads.

20. The Laird of Muirhead (a fragment) [G.-C. Index 168] [E.S.P.B.]
H. Weber, Floddon Field, p. 294
21. The Battle of Flodden Field [171] [168]
a. Ritson's Anc. Songs
Weber, Floddon Field, p. 289
Child, vii, 71
b. Evans, iii, No. 12
22. Chevy Chase [130] [162]
([Grundtvig's] Engelske og skotske Folkeviser, No. 13)
a. Hearne [Guilielmi Neubrigensis Historia]
Percy, i, 116
Herd, i, 54
Child, vii, 29
b. Old Ballads, 1723
Percy, ii, 57 [59]
Park's edition of Ritson's Engl. Songs, ii, 359
Child, vii, 43
Melody from Engl. Songs, my 'Studier,' No. 5
23. Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne [137] [118]
a. Percy, i, 197
Child, v, 159
b. Ritson's Robin Hood, p. 83
24. Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough & Will. Cloudesly [136] [116]
(Dansk ved Steen Blicher [Danish version by Steen Blicher])
A. Percy MSS., iii, 76 [116 f]
Percy, i, 270
Ritson's Pieces of Anc. Poetry
Gutch's Robin Hood
Child, v, 124
B. Percy MSS., iii, 102 [116 App.]
25. The Rising in the North [223] [175]
Percy, ii, 80
Child, vii, 82
Percy MSS., [ii, 210] [175]
26. Northumberland Betrayed [224] [176]
Percy MSS., [ii, 217] [176]
Percy, ii, 90
Child, vii, 92
27. Rookhope Ride [215] [179]
Scott, i, 256
[Richardson], Borderer's Table Book, vii, 245
Child, vi, 121
28. Robin Hood and the Old Man [150] [140]
Robin Hood and the Widow's Three Sons [151, 152] [140]

- a. Jamieson, II, 49 [G.-C. Index] [E.S.P.B. 140 A] Child, v, 257 [140 A]
- b. Ritson's Robin Hood, p. 210
 Child, v, 261
- c. Ritson's Robin Hood, p. 000
 Child, v, 267
29. Robin Hood and the Monk [132] [119]
 ([Grundtvig's] Eng. og sk. Folkev., 24)
 Hartshorne's Anc. Metr. Tales, p. 179
 Jamieson, II, 54
 Child, v, 1
30. Bonnie George Campbell [244] [210]
 (Eng. og sk. F., 42)
 Finlay's Preface [p. xxxiii] [210 B]
 Motherwell, 44
 Aytoun, II, 42
 Child, III, 92
31. Robin, Lend to me thine Bow
 Ritson's Anc. Songs, Cl. IV, No. 11
 (My melodies, No. 8)
 [As if by afterthought, with the idea of removing this piece from the list, Grundtvig brackets the numeral 31 ]
32. The marriage of Sir Gawaine [25] [31]
 Percy MSS., I, 103 [31]
 Percy, IV, 249 (Cf. III, 272) [31]
 Madden, Sir Gawayne, p. 298 [31]
 Child, I, 28
33. King Arthur's Death [269]
 Percy MSS., I, 501
 Percy, III, 288
 Child, I, 40
34. The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington [254] [105]
 Percy, IV, 33
 Park's edit. of [Ritson's] Engl. Songs, II, 272
 Child, IV, 158
35. Lady Isabella's Tragedy [253]
 Percy, IV, 55
 Child, III, 366
 Child, III, 360
 Cf. Index A, 141 [Lady Isabel, E.S.P.B., No. 261]
 Tysk: Cf. Erlach, IV, 596; Kretschmer, No. 49
36. Young Peggy [298]
 Kinloch, 153 (Suspicious) [298]
37. Lord Henry and Fair Eleanor
 Kinloch, 219 (Suspicious)

38. Lady Mary Ann [G.-C. Index] [E.S.P.B.]
Motherwell, 86 (Suspicious)
39. Carol for St. Stephen's Day [ 52] [ 22]
Ritson's Anc. Songs, Class II, No. xi
(My collection, I, 1)
Sandys' Christmas Carols, p. 4
Child, I, 315
[Marginal note] D.g.F. [Grundtvig's Danmarks gamle
Folkeviser], 96 [Jesusbarnet, Stefan og Herodes]
40. The Battle of Corichie [246]
Evans' Old Ballads, III, 132
Finlay, I, 147
Child, VII, 210
41. The West Country Damsel's Complaint [292]
Collier's Roxburghe Ballads, p. 202
Child, II, 384
(Cf. my Index A, 133 [Clerk Tamas, No. 260])
42. Bessie Bell and Mary Gray [264] [201]
a. Lyle, Anc. Ball. and Songs, p. 160 [201 b] Child, III, 126 [201 b]
b. Cunningham, Songs of Scotl, III, 60
c. Chambers, Scott. Ball, p. 146
Aytoun, II, 372
Cf. Halliwell's Nursery Rhymes
Tea Table Miscellany, I, 70
43. The Hawthorn-Tree [189]
Ritson's Anc. Songs, Park's edit. [? 2d ed., 1829],
II, 46[44]
Evans' Old Ballads (1810), I, 342
Child, I, 315[311]
[Marginal note] Cf. D. g F, 66 [Jomfruen i Linden]
44. Glenlogie [118] [238]
(Motherwell, Intro., No. 128)
a. Scottish Minstrel [Smith's, IV, 78] [238 Ia] Child, IV, 80 [238 Ia]
b. Sharpe [Ballad Book, p. 37] [238 B]
Chambers [Scottish Ballads, p. 305]
Aytoun, II, 99
c. Buchan, I, 188 (Jean o' Bethelnie's Love) [238 Ea]
45. John o' Hazelgreen [251] [293]
a. Kinloch, p. 206 [293 B]
b. Buchan, II, 253 [293 Da]
Child, IV, 83 [293 Da]
c. Chambers [Scottish Ballads], p. 315 [293 Db]

46. The fause Lover [G.-C. Index 121] [E.S.P.B. 218]
 Buchan, I, 268 [218 A]
 Child, IV, 89 [218 A]
47. King John and the Abbot [240] [45]
 Percy's Reliques, III, 146
 Child, VIII, 3
 Percy MSS., I, 508 [45 A]
48. The Duke of Gordon's Daughters [172] [237]
 (Motherwell, Introd., No. 54)
 Ritson's Scott. Songs
 Aytoun, II, 288
 Child, IV, 102
 Cf. Index [A] 183 [Richie Story, E.S.P.B., No. 232]
49. The Battle of Harlaw [169] [163]
 Aytoun, I, 75
 Child, VII, 317
 Cf. Motherwell, Introd., No. 2
 Aytoun, I, p. 64 etc.
 Child, VII, 180
50. John Selon [248] [198]
 (Motherwell, Introd., No. 140)
 a. Buchan's Gleanings . . . [p. 161] [198 A]
 b. Maidment's [North Countrie] Gar- land, p. 15 [198 A]
 Child, VII, 230 [198 A]
 c. Buchan, II, 136 [198 B]
 Aytoun, I, 139
51. The Death of Parcy Reed [217] [193]
Borderer's Table Book, VII, 364 [193 B]
 Child, VI, 139 [193 B]
52. Willie Macintosh and the Burning of Auchindown [218] [183]
 a. Finlay, II, 97 [183 B]
 Child, VI, 159 [183 B]
 b. [A. Laing], The Thistle of Scotland, p. 106 [183 Aa]
 Child, VI, 161 [183 Aa]
 c. Whitelaw [The Book of Scottish Ballads], p. 248 [183 Ab]
53. Gilderoy [G.-C. Index 247]
Wit and Mirth . . Pills to Purge Melancholy . .
Old Ballads, 1723 .
Orpheus Caledonius . .
 [The Scots] Musical Museum . .
 Ritson's Scott. Songs, II, 24
 Percy, II, 132
 Herd . . .
 Pinkerton . . .
 Chambers [Scottish Songs, I, 80]

- Aytoun, II, 149
 Child, VI, 196
54. The Murder of the King of Scots (Darnley) [G.-C. Index 222] [E.S.P.B. 174]
 Percy, III, 25
 Percy MSS., II, 260 [174]
 Child, VII, 78
55. Sir John Suckling's Campaign [267]
Musarum Deliciae
 Percy, III, 159
 Child, VII, 128
56. Rob Roy [250] [225]
 Burns' Sel. Scott Songs, ed. by Cromek, II, 199 [225 G]
 Child, VI, 257 [225 G]
 Maidment's [North Countrie] Garland, p. 44
 Child, VI, 258
Thistle of Scotland, p. 93 [225 K]
 Chambers . . . [Scottish Ballads, p. 155]
 Child, VI, 202
 Aytoun, II, 380
57. Get up and Bar the Door [185] [275]
 Herd, II, 159 [275 Aa]
 Johnson's [Scots Musical] Museum [275 C]
 Ritson's Scott Songs . . .
 Child, VIII, 125
58. Sir Andrew Barton [203] [167]
 (Historical from the time of King Henry VIII)
 Percy MSS., III, 399 [167 A]
Frygtelig forbedret hos [Fearfully improved in]
 Percy [III, 6]
 (Child, VII, 55)
 Ritson's Anc. Songs, II, 204
Old Ballads, 1723, I, 159
 Moore, Pictor. Ball., p. 256
 [Halliwell], Early Naval Ball. (Percy Society's Publ., Vol. II), 4
 Child, VII, 201
59. King Edward the Fourth and the Tanner of Tamworth [180] [273]
 Child, VIII, 21 etc.
60. Sir John Buller of Bewsey Hall, murdered by his brother-in-law, Lord Stanley, 1462 [170] [165]
 Percy MSS., III, 205 [165]
61. The Battle of Alford [249]
 Child, VII, 238

S. B. HUSTVEDT

University of California at Los Angeles

XLI

R. M. RILKE UND CHRISTIAN MORGENSTERN

DER letzte Spross einer alten Familie wird nach schmerzlichen Erfahrungen in seiner Jugend sich seines Dichtertums bewusst. Seine frühe Lyrik wächst aus der präziösen Formkultur der Neuromantik hervor, sie gewinnt unter nordischem Einfluss Farbe und Kraft, um dann in der Berührung mit Russland und der deutschen Mystik ihre tieferen religiösen Quellen zu entdecken. Durch die persönliche Bekanntschaft mit einem hervorragenden Geist seiner Zeit wird aus dem mystischen Gottsucher und Gotterahner schliesslich ein Gottfinder, der in Werken von ganz seltener Zartheit und Tiefe und in virtuoser Beherrschung der Form uns zukunftsweisend die letzten Fragen der Menschheit erfühlen lässt.

Wir sprechen von R. M. Rilke—und zugleich von Christian Morgenstern; denn die Charakterisierung gilt ebenso für den einen wie den anderen Dichter, so merkwürdig ähnlich erscheinen auf den ersten Blick Wesen und Weg, Welt und Werk dieser beiden Lyriker. Nimmt man dazu die Gleichzeitigkeit ihres Wirkens, bis in einzelne Entwicklungsstufen hinein, so kann man sich dem Reiz einer Gegenüberstellung kaum entziehen. Morgenstern war vier Jahre älter als Rilke, aber ihre Erstlingswerke erschienen nur ein paar Monate von einander getrennt 1894 und 1895. Rilke wollte freilich später nichts mehr wissen von seinen Primanerversuchen, in denen noch kein eigener Ton erklingt. Diese etwas farblosen, treuherzigen, verträumten Liedchen stehen in grellem Gegensatz zu Morgensterns kühnem, humoristisch phantastischem Zyklus: In Phantas Schloss, der in seinem dithyrambischen Schwung die Erweckung durch Nietzsche nicht verleugnen kann, nannte sich doch der Verfasser selbst eine Lerche Zarathustras. Das schönste Echo, das dieser Jubelgesang aus der jungen Dichterwelt hervorlockte, kam von Rilke, der in einem Morgenstern übersandten Gedicht sein Miterleben und seinen Dank ausdrückte.<sup>1</sup> Im folgenden Jahr bat Rilke Morgenstern um Beiträge für seine Zeitschrift Wegwarten; tatsächlich erschienen in der dritten Nummer drei Morgensternsche Gedichte.<sup>2</sup> Von den späteren gegenseitigen Beziehungen der beiden haben wir kein Zeugnis, ausser einem schönen, liebevollen Brief Rilkes, der in der Schönen Literatur abgedruckt wurde;<sup>3</sup> von andern Briefen, die gewechselt wurden, ist offenbar nichts erhalten geblieben.

Die Jahre 1897, 1898, 1899 und 1902 bringen von jedem der zwei

<sup>1</sup> Michael Bauer, Morgensterns Leben und Werk (München, 1933), S. 81.

<sup>2</sup> "Eine einsame Rose," "Kriegerspruch," "Dank."

<sup>3</sup> 25. Jahrgang, No. 3.

Lyriker je einen Gedichtband.<sup>4</sup> Darin bilden sie sich zu Virtuosen der lyrischen Form im Sinn der Neuromantik aus,<sup>5</sup> wobei freilich Rilke allmählich Morgenstern noch übertrifft an raffinierter Formkunst und betorend süßer Musik der Verse. Wie nahe sich übrigens Morgensterns lyrische Form zuweilen mit der Rilkes berührt, hat schon Hans Naumann gezeigt.<sup>6</sup> Sogar die für Rilke so charakteristische Reimung unbedeutender Bindewörter, wie "und" und "nur" kommt bei Morgenstern vor.<sup>7</sup> Um die Mitte des ersten Jahrzehnts wird dann jeder der beiden Dichter, in seiner Art, weiten Kreisen bekannt durch ein Werkchen, das auch heute noch sein beliebtestes, obgleich durchaus nicht sein bedeutendstes dichterisches Erzeugnis geblieben ist. Gemeint sind Morgensterns Galgenlieder (1905) und Rilkes Weise von Liebe und Tod (1906). Die Wendung von der dekadenten Formkultur der Neuromantik zum religiös mystischen Lebensgefühl geht bei Rilke auf seine zwei Russlandreisen zurück und kommt dann im Stundenbuch zum Ausdruck, das 1904 abgeschlossen, aber erst 1906 veröffentlicht wurde. Eben damals kam auch Morgensterns religiös mystisches Erlebnis zum Durchbruch und fand seinen Niederschlag vor allem in seinem Tagebuch eines Mystikers.<sup>8</sup> Es könnte gezeigt werden, wie verwandt das Lebensgefühl dieses Tagebuchs und der gleichzeitig entstandenen Aufzeichnungen des Malte Laurids Brigge ist. In der Folgezeit freilich gehen die dichterischen Wege Rilkes und Morgensterns auseinander. Morgensterns Lyrik gewinnt an Lebensnähe durch seine Liebe zu Margarete Gosebruch und an Tiefe durch die Lebensbegegnung mit Rudolf Steiner.<sup>9</sup> Findet er, seiner denkerischen Veranlagung entsprechend, in seinem Streben nach Klärung seines Weltbildes einen Philosophen als Lebensführer, so erblickt Rilke, seiner mehr gefühlsmässig schöpferischen Veranlagung zufolge, in dem Bildhauer Rodin sein Ideal.

Es ist ein merkwürdiger Zufall, dass nach sieben Jahren, im Frühjahr 1913, sich beide Dichter in das mildere Klima der adriatischen Küste zurückzogen, um dort neben ihrer körperlichen Erholung der Einsamkeit und geistigen Sammlung zu leben. Morgenstern wohnte in einer Villa in Portoroso, Rilke im Schloss Duino, beide verbrachten Wochen innerer Beglückung und Vertiefung nach Jahren des Ringens. Morgen-

<sup>4</sup> 1897: Rilke, Traumgekrönt; Morgenstern, Auf vielen Wegen; 1898: Rilke, Advent; Morgenstern, Ich und die Welt; 1899: Rilke, Mir zur Feier; Morgenstern, Ein Sommer; 1902: Rilke, Das Buch der Bilder; Morgenstern, Und aber rundet sich der Kranz.

<sup>5</sup> Vgl. Victor Klemperer, "Christian Morgenstern und der Symbolismus," Zeitschr. f. Deutschkunde, 1928. S. 39. <sup>6</sup> Die deutsche Dichtung der Gegenwart (Stuttgart, 1927), S. 325.

<sup>7</sup> Einkehr (München, 1922), S. 24, Ich und Du (München, 1929), S. 68.

<sup>8</sup> Stufen (München, 1922), S. 222–262.

<sup>9</sup> Vgl. die Gedichtbände: Einkehr, Ich und Du, Mensch Wanderer, Wir fanden einen Pfad.

sterns irdisches Wirken neigte sich dem Ende zu, er war damals schwer lungenkrank und starb ein Jahr darauf; bei Rilke folgten die zwölf Jahre des Schweigens und der Vorbereitung auf sein letztes Werk, Die Duineser Elegien, in denen er Morgensternschen Ideen naherückte. Die Gleichzeitigkeit ihres Wirkens erstreckt sich schliesslich noch über ihren Tod hinaus. Im dritten Jahrzehnt dieses Jahrhunderts hat nämlich die Wertschätzung beider Dichter eine bedeutende Steigerung erfahren, sodass sich die Auflagen ihrer Werke in diesem Zeitraum verdoppelten. Und zwar sind es gerade die von tiefgründig religiösem Gefühl getragenen Dichtungen, Rilkes Stundenbuch und seine Geschichten vom lieben Gott, Morgensterns Stufen und Wir fanden einen Pfad, nach denen die Menschen am meisten griffen und von denen sie am meisten ergriffen wurden.<sup>10</sup> In den letzten Jahren haben sich bekanntlich die Veröffentlichungen über Rilke und Morgenstern gehäuft.<sup>11</sup>

Wenn wir nun unsern Blick von dem gleichzeitigen Wirken der beiden Dichter weg auf die Bildungsmächte richten, mit denen sie sich im Lauf ihrer dichterischen Entwicklung auseinandersetzen, so erkennen wir, dass über die humanistische Schulbildung hinaus ihnen drei Bildungswelten gemeinsam waren: Skandinavien, Russland und die deutsche Mystik. Rilke reiste nach Skandinavien zu kurzem Besuch und zur Erholung, Morgenstern zu anderthalbjähriger ernster Arbeit. Rilke hatte kurz zuvor Jens Peter Jakobsens Dichtungen kennen gelernt und der Dane war ihm, wie Rilke selber gesteht, "der Liebste, Nächste und Gebendste" geworden, "der seitdem in allen seinen Werken wirksam" war. Rilkes Erlebnisfähigkeit feinsten Farbennüancen und zartester Veränderungen in der ausseren Natur wurde durch den danischen Dichter geweckt,<sup>12</sup> in Skandinavien gesteigert und während des Aufenthalts in der norddeutschen Malerkolonie Worpsswede zu höchster Vollendung gebracht.<sup>13</sup> Bei Morgenstern war es die nordische Landschaft selbst, ein unvergleichlicher Frühling und Sommer, die das Malerblut seines Vaters und Grossvaters in ihm aufleben liessen und seiner Lyrik ein sinnfroheres und farbiges Gepräge gaben.<sup>14</sup> Morgenstern reiste nach Norwegen, um sich in die Gedanken- und Gefühlswelt Ibsens einzuleben, dessen Versdramen und Gedichte er für den Fischerschen Verlag in deutscher Sprache nachschaffen sollte. Ibsens Werke kannte er von der Gymnasialzeit her und hatte immer schon ein zwiespältiges Gefühl

<sup>10</sup> Stundenbuch: 75. Tausend, Geschichten: 42. Tausend, Stufen: 56. Tausend, Wir fanden einen Pfad: 43. Tausend.

<sup>11</sup> Vgl. Anm. 1.

<sup>12</sup> R. H. Heygrodt, Die Lyrik R. M. Rilkes (Freiburg, 1921), S. 38.

<sup>13</sup> Gert Buchheit, R. M. Rilke (Zürich, 1928), S. 73.

<sup>14</sup> M. Bauer, a.a.O., S. 130.

ihnen gegenüber. Es ist das verstandesmässig Gewaltsame, welches vorzeitig in das unbewusste Ausreifenlassen hineingreift, was Morgenstern an Ibsen abstösst.<sup>15</sup> Gerade das ist es auch, wogegen Rilke sich sträubt und was er an jener Stelle in Malte ausdrückt, wo er sich an Ibsen wendet, ohne seinen Namen zu nennen:<sup>16</sup> "Da gingst du an die beispiellose Gewalttat deines Werks, das immer ungeduldiger, immer verzweifelter unter dem Sichtbaren nach den Äquivalenten suchte für das innen Gesehene." Nach den Anspielungen auf Ibsensche Dramen zu schliessen, die sich in Malte finden, hat Rilke die Werke des norwegischen Dichters gut gekannt. Sie haben aber doch keinen so grossen Einfluss ausgeübt, wie auf Morgenstern, für den sie sieben Jahre lang eine Bildungsmacht waren.

Mächtiger als Skandinavien wirkte auf den jungen Rilke Russland. Weniger die Prophetengestalt Tolstois, um derentwillen er hinüberging, als die russische Landschaft und das russische Volk bewegten ihn. "Als ich zuerst nach Moskau kam, war mir alles bekannt und altvertraut," berichtet er.<sup>17</sup> "Zu Ostern war's. Da ruhrte es mich an, wie meine Ostern, mein Frühling, meine Glocken. Es war die Stadt meiner ältesten und tiefsten Erinnerungen, es war ein fortwährendes Wiedersehen und Winken: es war Heimat." Morgenstern fühlte sich nicht so urverwandt mit der russischen Volksseele, die er im Moskauer Künstlertheater bei einer Gastreise in Berlin kennen lernte. "Man spürte, da war etwas, was man selbst nicht hatte . . . ein Hauch slawischer Seele, slawischen Geistes. Und damit eines Seelischen, Geistigen, das der Zukunft naher steht als wir. . . Nicht Amerika—Russland ist das Land der unbegrenzten Möglichkeiten."<sup>18</sup> Das erinnert dann wieder an Rilkes Schilderung der Russen als "Menschen voll Ferne, Ungewissheit und Hoffnung, Werdende."<sup>17</sup>

Rilke hatte sein Russlanderlebnis als Vierundzwanzigjähriger, für Morgenstern wurde dieses Land erst in reiferen Jahren zum Erlebnis. So ist wohl zu erklären, dass Rilke im russischen Volk mehr die negativen Vorzüge sah: ihre Dunkelheit, ihre Einsamkeit, ihre Demut, während der gereifere Morgenstern mehr das Positive, Verbindende herausfühlte: die unausgesprochene, uneingestandene aber selbstverständliche Liebe zu einander, zu ihren Dichtern, die innere Religiosität als Unterton ihres ganzen nationalen Lebens.<sup>19</sup> Tolstoi als religiöse Persönlichkeit war für den jungen Rilke epochemachend, Morgenstern fühlte sich starker zu Dostojewski hingezogen. Nach Jahren innerer Zweifel und Ratlosigkeit, <sup>15</sup> Vgl. Zitate bei Bauer, ibid., S. 120.

<sup>16</sup> H. Berendt, Mitteilungen der Bonner lit. Gesellschaft, 1911, S. 86.

<sup>17</sup> Ellen Key, Seelen und Werke (Berlin, 1911), S. 159.

<sup>18</sup> M. Bauer, a.a.O., S. 245.

<sup>19</sup> M. Bauer, ibid.

gegen die er sich mit dem grotesken Humor der Galgenlieder zu wehren suchte, war Morgenstern 1906 an einen Wendepunkt gekommen, wo ihm die Erkenntnis von der schrankenlosen Einheit aller Menschen als Teile und Bewusstseinsstufen Gottes aufging. Das bringt ihn Dostojewski besonders nahe, über dessen Gestalten Morgenstern sagt: in ihnen "brennt die Flamme Gottes selbst, die Flamme des um sich selbst ringenden Gottes, dessen Leib das unendliche All der Gestirne und dessen Geist der Geist ihrer Lebendigen ist."<sup>20</sup>

Bei Rilke hat sich das Russlanderlebnis in seinen Werken deutlicher kristallisiert, es hat seinen Niederschlag im Stundenbuch gefunden und in den Geschichten vom lieben Gott, denn bei ihm bedeutete es Anstoss und Anlass zu seiner religiösen Wende; bei Morgenstern war der religiöse Durchbruch von anderer Seite erfolgt, und Russland brachte nur Bestätigung und Vertiefung. Der Anlass zur mystischen Einkehr kam bei ihm aus der Welt der deutschen Mystik. Damit sind wir bei der dritten gemeinsamen Bildungswelt der beiden Lyriker angekommen, die sich besonders an die Namen Meister Eckehart, Angelus Silesius und Novalis knüpft. Es handelt sich weniger um eine neue Offenbarung durch die deutschen Mystiker, als um eine innere Wesensverwandtschaft mit ihnen, die sich auf ähnliche Erlebnisse gründet und so in ähnlichen Ahnungen und Erkenntnissen gipfelt. Über Rilkes Verwandtschaft mit den alt-deutschen Mystikern, wie sie sich besonders im Stundenbuch wieder spiegelt, liegt eine Untersuchung von Franz Koch<sup>21</sup> vor. Über "Morgenstern im Rahmen der mittelalterlichen deutschen Mystik" spricht Herbert Giffel ausführlich.<sup>22</sup> Gasser zeigt in einem längeren Abschnitt<sup>23</sup> das Gemeinsame bei Rilke und Novalis, während Morgensterns Wesensverwandtschaft mit Novalis von mir in einem früheren Artikel dargestellt wurde.<sup>24</sup> Der letzte geschlossene Bildungskreis, der Rilkes Entwicklung mitgeformt hat, ist bekanntlich das moderne Frankreich mit Rodin und den Symbolisten. Morgenstern hat ihn nicht bewusst miterlebt. Dass er sich aber, trotz absichtlicher Ablehnung der französischen Symbolisten auch dieser Kulturströmung nicht entziehen konnte, hat Victor Klemperer zu zeigen versucht.<sup>25</sup>

Treten wir nun schliesslich in die Gefühls- und Gedankenwelt der beiden Dichter selbst ein, so können wir in dem engen Rahmen dieser Darstellung unsern Blick nur auf ein paar hervorragende gemeinsame Züge richten. Man hat Rilke einen "Virtuosen der Einsamkeit" ge-

<sup>20</sup> Stufen, S. 336.

<sup>21</sup> Witiko, 1929, S. 83.

<sup>22</sup> Christian Morgenstern als Mystiker (Bern, 1931), S. 75.

<sup>23</sup> Grundzüge der Lebensanschauung R. M. Rilkes, Sprache und Dichtung, Bd. 36.

<sup>24</sup> "Novalis und Christian Morgenstern," The Germanic Review, vi, 373-388.

<sup>25</sup> Vgl. Anm. 5.

nannt.<sup>26</sup> Den angeborenen Hang zur Einsamkeit, die auferzwungene Einsamkeit der Kindheit, die selbstgeniesserische Einsamkeit des neuromantischen Ästheten, die inbrünstig ersehnte Einsamkeit des Mystikers und die tiefernste, mit aller Macht errungene Einsamkeit des reifen Dichters, der sich mit seiner Schöpferkraft der Menschheit verantwortlich fühlt, all das finden wir bei Rilke. Wohl kein anderer Dichter hat die unbegriffene Einsamkeit des Kindes, das ausgeschlossen von der Welt der Erwachsenen in einem Zauberkreis voll Geheimnis und Schauer lebt, ergreifender dargestellt, als Rilke in seinem Malte. Er hat ja auch seine eigenen Kinderjahre als Martyrium empfunden, obwohl wir jetzt wissen, dass er keine übermassig schwere Kindheit durchmachen musste.<sup>27</sup> Ganz anders erlebte Morgenstern seine Kindheit "in einsam frohen Spielen,"<sup>28</sup> in denen man schon seine spätere Liebe zur Einsamkeit vorausahnen kann. Wie anders muss Morgensterns Stimmungshintergrund gewesen sein, wenn er als Siebenunddreissigjähriger noch sagen konnte, dass er immer noch im und vom Sonnenschein seiner Kindheit lebe.<sup>29</sup> Aus diesem Gefühl heraus konnte er auch seine reizenden Kinderlieder dichten und seine grotesken Galgenlieder "dem Kind im Manne" widmen. Das hindert aber nicht, dass er daneben eine tiefernste Seite hat und der Wille zur Einsamkeit bei ihm stark ausgeprägt ist. Er kennt den Schmerz der gänzlichen seelischen Verlassenheit, in der er um ein verstehendes Herz fleht,<sup>30</sup> er weiss aber auch, dass der Weg zur Tiefe nur durch die Einsamkeit geht,<sup>31</sup> dass bürgerliche Zudringlichkeit ihm "den Ernst zum Leben und die Kraft zum Werk" lahmte.<sup>32</sup> Er wünscht sich eine Hütte und ein Stück Wald, um sich ganz in sein Ewiges versenken zu können.<sup>33</sup> Je tiefer er in die unsichtbare Welt eindringt, desto mehr wird er der sichtbaren entfremdet. So sieht er voraus: "Thr alle werdet mich verlassen, alle. Fremd werd ich euch werden, wie ein Frevler—mehr noch wie ein Tor, wie ein kranker Vogel, den man stumm bedauert, geduldig hinnimmt."<sup>34</sup>

In dem Masse aber, in dem die beiden Dichter in ihre Einsamkeit hineinwachsen, nehmen sie zugleich zu an verstehender Liebe zu ihrer Umwelt, der stummen und lebendigen Kreatur. Pongs hat darauf hingewiesen, wie Liebe und Einsamkeit die Grundspannungen in Rilkes Wesen waren, wie Rilkes Liebe sich wandelte von dem noch schwebenden Umkreisen Gottes im Stundenbuch zu der liebenden gänzlichen Hingabe an die Dinge, in denen er Gott am nächsten zu kommen hoffte, und schliesslich zu der reinen metaphysischen Liebe, die nicht mehr besitzen

<sup>26</sup> G. Buchheit, a.a.O., S. 18.

<sup>27</sup> Vgl. Carl Sieber, René Rilke (Leipzig, 1932).

<sup>28</sup> M. Bauer, a.a.O., S. 10.

<sup>29</sup> Stufen, S. 10.

<sup>30</sup> Mensch Wanderer (München, 1928), S. 20.

<sup>31</sup> Ibid., S. 44.

<sup>32</sup> Ibid., S. 175.

<sup>33</sup> Ibid., S. 164.

<sup>34</sup> Epigramme (München, 1922), S. 112.

will, die keine Gegenliebe erwartet, die die geistige Freiheit des andern umso mehr achtet, je mehr sie ihn liebt, sodass die grossere Liebe noch einen Zuwachs an Einsamkeit bringt.<sup>35</sup> Eine ganz ähnliche Grundstimmung der überpersonlichen Menschenliebe finden wir auch bei Morgenstern. Schon in einem Spruch des Vierundzwanzigjährigen heisst es: "Und eine Gottesliebe flammt in mir empor zur ganzen Welt."<sup>36</sup> Ein Echo auf jene hohepriesterliche Liebe, mit der Rilke sich den Dingen hingibt, um sie Gott entgegenzuformen, klingt in Morgensterns Worten, wenn er sagt: "Es gibt noch eine grössere Liebe, als die nach dem Besitz des geliebten Gegenstands sich sehnende: die die geliebte Seele erlosen wollende. Und diese Liebe ist so göttlich schön, dass es nichts Schöneres auf Erden gibt."<sup>37</sup> Die Notwendigkeit der geistigen Freiheit in der Liebe hat Morgenstern selbst erfahren und so ausgedrückt: "Ich bin ein Mensch von rechter Vogelart und lass nicht gern die Hände um mich legen," "denn alle Liebe will besitzen und ich will nicht besessen sein."<sup>38</sup> Und wenn wir Morgensterns Gedicht "Jünglings Absage" lesen, müssen wir unwillkürlich an den Schluss des Malte denken, mit der Geschichte vom verlorenen Sohn, der, wie Rilke es deutet, sein Vaterhaus verliess, weil er zu viel geliebt wurde:

Oh, liebt mich nicht, ihr Guten und Gerechten, oh lasst mich nicht so herb und qualvoll leiden, von eurem Wege muss mein Weg sich scheiden . . .<sup>39</sup>

Die Liebe aber, die auf keine Gegenliebe rechnet, hat Morgenstern im Bilde Solvejgs dargestellt:

Du weisst ja nicht, was Liebe alles vermag!
—Traun! Doch nur, die von Gegenliebe weiss, nicht Liebe, deren Gegenliebe—schläft.

O dass Ihr solches nie zusammentrafft!
Doch wahre Liebe trägt selbst diesen Schlag und wartet, wartet selbst in Nacht und Eis.<sup>40</sup>

Der Glaube an das Göttliche im Menschen und seine Liebe zum Menschen sind schon von früh auf in Morgenstern verwurzelt. Nach seinem mystischen Erlebnis ums Jahr 1906 kann er in den Menschen nichts anderes mehr sehen, als Gott selbst in seinen tausendfältigen Bewusstseinsstufen. Von da aus fand er dann auch den inneren Zugang zum Johannesevangelium, an dem Punkt, wo es heisst: "Ich und der Vater sind eins." In den letzten Jahren rückte unter dem Einfluss der Anthroposophie die Christusgestalt immer mehr in den Mittelpunkt von

<sup>35</sup> Hermann Pongs, "R. M. Rilke," Euphorion (1931), S. 35.

<sup>36</sup> Mensch Wanderer, S. 31.

<sup>37</sup> Stufen, S. 133.

<sup>38</sup> Zitiert bei Giffel, a.a.O., S. 102.

<sup>39</sup> Auf vielen Wegen (München, 1921).

<sup>40</sup> Mensch Wanderer, S. 210.

Morgensterns religiöser und dichterischer Weltanschauung, sodass er in ihr die höchste Ausstrahlung der von früh an erstrebten priesterlichen Liebe zur Menschheit erlebt und so zum Ausdruck bringt:

Ich habe den MENSCHEN gesehen in seiner tiefsten Gestalt, ich kenne die Welt bis auf den Grundgehalt.

Ich weiss, dass Liebe, Liebe ihr tiefster Sinn, und dass ich da, um immer mehr zu lieben, bin.

Ich breite die Arme aus, wie ER getan, ich möchte die ganze Welt, wie ER, umfahn.<sup>41</sup>

Dieses Bekenntnis steht in scheinbar schroffem Gegensatz zu Rilke, der Christus in diesem Zusammenhang überhaupt nicht nennt, und doch ist Rilkes Lebenshaltung und besonders seine Stellung zum Tod eine charakteristisch christliche. Seine bejahende Stellung zum Tod als dem innersten Sinn unsres Lebens kommt wohl am eindringlichsten im letzten Teil des Stundenbuchs und am Anfang des Malte zum Ausdruck. Hier finden wir das Ethos vom eigenen Tod, dem grossen Tod, der organisch in uns wächst und reift als unsre wahre Lebensfrucht, im Gegensatz zum kleinen, unreifen Tod, dem undifferenzierten Massensterben. Die Rilkesche Verkündigung vom eignen Tod, der uns von innen her formt, klingt auch in den Worten Morgensterns an: "Mein Tod ist meine Wahrheit, dein Tod die Deinige. Wenn ich als Individuum sterbe, bejahe ich mich als Welt."<sup>42</sup> "Es gibt keinen grösseren Stilisator in der Natur als den Tod . . . Je mehr uns der Tod in Händen hat, desto grössere Kunstwerke werden wir."<sup>43</sup> Sogar die Rilkesche Vorstellung des Todes als der reifen Lebensfrucht, die nicht vorzeitig abgebrochen werden darf, erscheint in dem Morgensternschen Gedicht: "Versuchung," in dem er den Selbstmordgedanken von sich weist:

Mein Tagwerk ist noch nicht vollbracht.
Wer an der Schale sich vergreift,
Bevor sie ihren Kern gereift,— er schläft zu früh ein—und erwacht—zu spät.<sup>44</sup>

Mit dem Problem des Todes ist das der Verwandlung eng verknüpft. Es bildet einen der Kernpunkte von Rilkes Alterswerk. Hier wird der Mensch als spirituelles Wesen erfasst, das im Weltall den Auftrag hat, die Erde mit Geist zu durchdringen, das Stoffliche zu vergeistigen, das Sichtbare unsichtbar zu machen. So heisst es in der siebten Duineser Elegie:

<sup>41</sup> Wir fanden einen Pfad (München, 1922), S. 50.

<sup>42</sup> Stufen, S. 222.

<sup>43</sup> Ibid., S. 267.

<sup>44</sup> Einkehr, S. 22.

Erde, ist es nicht dies, was du willst: unsichtbar in uns erstehn?—Ist es dein Traum nicht, einmal unsichtbar zu sein?—Erde! Unsichtbar!
 Was, wenn Verwandlung nicht, ist dein dringender Auftrag?
 Erde, du liebe, ich will

Für den Dichter Rilke bedeutet dies aber, sich so in die Gestalten der Aussenwelt zu versenken, das man ihr innerstes Wesen erfühlen, es in seinem Geiste spiegeln und aussprechen kann. Das menschliche Wort wird dann das magische Organ der Verwandlung, es erhebt sich zur göttlichen Schöpferkraft des Logos. Auch Morgenstern ahnt schon früh den heiligen Auftrag des Menschen, die Dinge durch sein Geisteswort zu erlösen:

Es gibt ein ganzes Heer von Dingen, die alle singen wollen, singen.
 Was Wunder, wenn solch heiliger Sache ich mich, als Mensch, zum Anwalt mache.<sup>45</sup>

Auch er ist überzeugt, dass das Ziel der Erde in der Vergeistigung des Erdenstoffes liegt:

Lächelt nicht, wenn Paulus spricht von dem Schrei der Creatur
 Selbst die harte Felsenflur
 Wird einst wiederum zu—Licht.<sup>46</sup>

Licht ist für Morgenstern aber die höchste stoffliche Offenbarung des Geistigen, und so druckt er in der Lichtwerdung, der Sonnenwerdung das letzte Erdenziel aus.<sup>47</sup>

Eine tiefsinnige, organische Verbindung finden die beiden Rilke-schen Gedanken von der dem Tode entgegenreifenden Lebensfrucht und von der fortschreitenden Vergeistigung des Stofflichen durch den Menschen bei Morgenstern in der früh geahnten und ihm später zur Gewissheit erhobenen Erkenntnis der wiederholten Erdenleben.<sup>48</sup> Unter diesem Gesichtspunkt wird dann auch der ratselhafte "Missklang des Kinder-todes,"<sup>49</sup> den Rilke in der vierten Duineser Elegie berührt, gelöst. Wenn, wie Morgenstern es sieht, das kleine Kind als seelisch geistiges Wesen keine Neugeburt, sondern eine Wiedergeburt ist, braucht man von einem unschuldigen Opfer oder sinnlosen Tod nicht mehr zu sprechen, sondern kann eine von tiefstem Sinn durchwaltete Schicksalsentwicklung ahnen.<sup>50</sup>

ERICH HOFACKER

Washington University

<sup>45</sup> Epigramme, S. 99.

<sup>46</sup> Mensch Wanderer, S. 238.

<sup>47</sup> Wir fanden einen Pfad, S. 58.

<sup>48</sup> Vgl. Stufen, S. 246, 272, 273, 278, Epigramme, S. 119.

<sup>49</sup> H. Pongs, a.a.O., S. 62.

<sup>50</sup> Stufen, S. 281–82.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE ÆSTHETICS OF LITERARY PORTRAITURE

DESPITE the myriad studies of literature in print, a comprehensive æsthetics of literary portraiture remains still unavailable. In the following mere introduction to the subject I propose to state a principle whereby to explain the beauty of fictional personages; to devote attention chiefly to a discussion of the ontology of such personages, giving a thumbnail historical sketch of this ontology; and to conclude with a cursory glimpse into the functions of such portraiture.<sup>1</sup>

Literary artists and critics alike have convincingly testified to the use of living models<sup>2</sup> and to the measurement of beauty in character by the semblance of viability achieved.<sup>3</sup> They assume thereby that there is something of beauty in all such lives as are worthy to serve as models for literary portraits. And beyond this they have lent their commitments to the upbuilding of a widespread conviction that there are always some few people whose actual lives and careers may properly be characterized as beautiful. Thus Plato and many of his contemporaries found the life of Socrates a constant source of æsthetic pleasure.<sup>4</sup> That the lives of Cellini, Goethe, Lincoln, and many men of similar eminence have provided æsthetic experiences for their fellow-men is attested in scores of documents.

This granted, it is apparent that we must at the outset investigate the nature of such actual people. Even a cursory study of the lives above cited clearly shows that a person so characterized is not necessarily beautiful in external appearance, nor necessarily good. He is

<sup>1</sup> Other major divisions of the subject, such as the Ecology of Fictive Beings, Methods of Auctorial Portraiture, Varieties of Beauty in Literary Portraits, and Aesthetic Judgments of the Beauty of Dramatis Personae, will necessarily be excluded from present consideration.

<sup>2</sup> For representative evidence see Aristotle, Poetics, tr. S. H. Butcher (London: Macmillan & Co., 1907), p. 11, Boileau, The Art of Poetry, in The Poetical Treatises of Horace, Vida, and Boileau, by A. S. Cook (Boston: Ginn & Co., 1892), p. 192, Gustav Gruener, "The Genesis of the Characters in Lessing's 'Nathan der Weise'," PMLA, vii, 2 (1892), 77, and W. S. Maugham, "How I Write Short Stories," S.R.L. (July 28, 1934).

<sup>3</sup> For two notable items from a mass of evidence consult Henry James, The Real Thing and Other Tales (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1922), and E. H. Wright, "Reality and Inconsistency in Shakespeare's Characters," in Shakesperian Studies (New York: Columbia University Press, 1916), p. 372.

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Gilbert Murray, Ancient Greek Literature (New York: Appleton & Co., 1927), pp. 170-177.

rather a person who is genuinely what he is, who does naturally and spontaneously what he does, as if born to the rôle, so that this rôle and the major aspects of his viable being seem inseparably and exclusively one.<sup>5</sup> Thus he appears veritably to bring this rôle to life. The well-known maxims that "the style is the man," "character is destiny," and the like add their weight in behalf of this interpretation.<sup>6</sup> We are led to believe, therefore, that it is precisely the same total mergence of a rôle with an individual being which constitutes the beauty of character in literary portraits. Such portraits represent always the fusion of human destinies with fictive individuals in such a manner that the meaning or significance of these individuals seems to come alive and to become an attentionable part of perceived reality.

This fusion is, then, the basic principle upon which any explanation of that beauty must depend. This basic theory is formulated by W. T. Stace in the proposition that beauty is the fusion of an intellectual content, consisting of empirical non-perceptual concepts, with a perceptual field, in such manner that the intellectual content and the perceptual field are indistinguishable from one another; and in such manner as to constitute the revelation of an aspect of reality.<sup>7</sup>

Stated in terms specifically relevant to our subject: the æsthetic pleasures of literary portraits derive fundamentally from the revelation of non-perceptual concepts concerning human destiny through the mediation of fictional individuals.

The nature of the fictional embodiments here referred to is a matter of common knowledge, but the non-perceptual concepts are entities less generally recognized. We are all familiar with various kinds of mental constructs. The most common are those mental abstractions which have tangible correlates in concrete objects, such as: negro, barn, running, envy, oblique. In contrast, many so-called "free" concepts have no phenomenal correlates, but represent instead those generalized conclusions that are drawn "from areas of human experience so large they cannot be grasped together in any single act of perception."<sup>8</sup> Examples of such non-perceptual concepts are: redemption is possible through persistent aspiration;<sup>9</sup> jealousy defeats its own ends; adverse environs <sup>5</sup> For a discussion of the views expressed in this and the foregoing sentence see W. T. Stace, The Meaning of Beauty (London: Richards & Toulmin, 1929), pp. 238 and 239.

<sup>6</sup> Consult, on this matter, A. C. Bradley, Shakesperian Tragedy (London: Macmillan & Co., 1922), p. 13; A. B. Faust, "The Problematic Hero in German Fiction," PMLA, xvi, 1, n.s. ix, 1 (1901), 92-98, and William Troy, "Stephen Dedalus and James Joyce," Nation (Feb. 14, 1934), p. 188.

<sup>7</sup> W. T. Stace, op. cit., p. 43.

<sup>8</sup> W. T. Stace, op. cit., p. 49.

<sup>9</sup> Cf. Robert Browning, "Paracelsus," Browning's Complete Works (Boston: Houghton

tend to thwart the development of potential character qualities. They are too wide in their implications ever to be seen in any immediately perceptible field of individual being.<sup>10</sup>

The break between such homeless abstractions and the realized significance of individual existence it is art's function to repair through its rhythmical disposal of selected data of individual experience, a process whereby it achieves a fusion of meanings with fictive beings.<sup>11</sup> By this process the literary artist telescopes the data of human experience so that the significance-bearing items are brought into juxtaposition and the resultant integration, a meaningful life, becomes an immediately perceived reality.

We are now prepared to investigate the ontology, or theory of being, of literary personages. Of primary importance is the fact that these personages have always only a fictional existence. It is only in a fictional world that the manipulation of the data of experience by which characters are created is possible. Further, the fictional nature of these beings precludes practical reactions to them and thus renders them amenable to æsthetic apprehension alone.<sup>12</sup> "A cup or beaker," says Max Eastman, "if it is to be artistic, must not only satisfy our eye and hand and lip, but must stop us from drinking."<sup>13</sup>

The major properties of being in dramatis personæ are, then, non-perceptual concepts concerning life and perceptual fictive individuals. The first of these brings to the fusion the intangible phases of being, while the second supplies the illusion of a veritable embodiment. The non-perceptual concepts can have being only in the sense that in art they become living truths, of intrinsic worth, verifiable in experience or plausibly capable of becoming so. The fictive individuals provide their own evidence of being through their semblance to organic life.

The correlates of these two elements are character and personality. Character corresponds to the meanings or concepts; personality, to the Mifflin, 1895), pp. 12-48, and the reference to Goethe's Conversations with Eckermann, in W. H. Van Der Smitten, Goethe's Faust (New York: Dutton & Co., 1926), Preface, p. xv.

<sup>10</sup> Actual people who have beautiful characters and some few similar phenomena would be exceptions.

<sup>11</sup> Compare this with the analysis of Proust's method by William Troy in his Proust in Retrospect, Symposium II, 3 (July, 1931), 387-389, and with Justin O'Brien's similar analysis in Some Recent Proustiana, ibid., pp. 392-395.

<sup>12</sup> Cf. D. H. Parker, The Principles of Æsthetics (Boston: Silver, Burdett & Co., 1920), pp. 68-69.

<sup>13</sup> Quoted in a review of Mr. Eastman's Art and the Life of Action, with Other Essays (New York: Knopf, 1934), by H. S. Canby, S.R.L. (Nov. 3, 1934), p. 255.

fully realized individualities. In the qualitative sense character in a literary personage is that phase of its being whereby its meaning, purpose, career, rôle, or destiny appears to be given direction and bounds by the pursuit of some intellectual ideal. The sense history of the term supports this view, as does also the nature of the literary form to which it has given its name.<sup>14</sup> Thus interpreted, the character of a person is that part of him—even to the whole being in some instances—which is “moulded in a pattern, firm, consistent, dependable.”<sup>15</sup> It is defined by Münsterberg as “the power to keep the selected motive dominant throughout life,”<sup>16</sup> and by Dr. Roback as “an enduring psycho-physical disposition to inhibit instinctive impulses in accordance with a regulative principle.”<sup>17</sup> This regulative principle is apparently identical with the intellectual ideal above mentioned,<sup>18</sup> and the inhibitions cited are those operative against any impulses whose indulgence might thwart the realization of the ideal. The formation of character of this sort comes by the maintenance of integrity in the midst of the social milieu, quite as Goethe says,

Es bildet ein Talent sich in der Stille:
Ein Charakter im Strome der Welt <sup>19</sup>

Personality is quite distinct. It is the living whole of a being, uncanalized by any intellectual ideal. Its determination lies in the equitable activity of all the faculties, so its indulgence of instinctive impulses is imperative. Its lone restriction is to be itself, to keep such bounds only as are prescribed by the coherence of all its achievements and potentialities—a coherence roughly comparable to that of an art work and in marked contrast to the rigidity of pattern in a character.<sup>20</sup> Thus, while keeping to its course, as does a river within its banks, personality still remains ever open to growth and change, limited only by the bounds of whatever psycho-somatic individuality gives it embodiment.

With the above definitions in mind we should be able to avoid mis-

<sup>14</sup> For a varied selection of witnesses to this fact see Gwendolen Murphy, A Cabinet of Characters (London: Oxford University Press, 1925), Introduction, pp. v–viii; E. C. Baldwin, “The ‘Character’ in Restoration Comedy,” PMLA, xxx, 1, n.s. xxiii, 1 (1915), 64–78; D. L. Clark, Rhetoric and Poetry in the Renaissance (Columbia University Press: 1922), pp. 80–82; and A. A. Jack, Essays on the Novel (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1897), p. 224.

<sup>15</sup> Herbert Read, “Personality in Literature,” Symposium, II, 3 (July, 1931), 299.

<sup>16</sup> Quoted by Herbert Read, op. cit., p. 299.

<sup>17</sup> Also quoted by Mr. Read, op. cit., p. 299.

<sup>18</sup> Compare this principle with Browning’s regulative ideas, for a discussion of which see my study, The Aesthetics of Robert Browning (Ann Arbor: George Wahr, 1924), p. 56.

<sup>19</sup> Another quotation by Mr. Read, op. cit., p. 300.

<sup>20</sup> Ibid., pp. 295, 296 and 304–305.

taking as personality the mere surface sheen or texture of individual being. Obviously character and personality have each their own characteristic surface manifestations. For such peripheral radiations to constitute a personality would require that in themselves alone they exhibit a coherent individuality of such scope and complexity as to seem always incalculable and beyond the reach of the inevitable.<sup>21</sup> For them to constitute evidences of character would require of them the demarcation of a circumscribed rôle, of a destiny necessarily rooted in personality<sup>22</sup> but impersonalized to some degree by its intellectual ideal. The differentiation here set up is, of necessity, only relative, for both character and personality are present to some degree in all people and so inevitably, too, in all literary personages of any notable beauty. The dominance of one or the other gives the clue to the nature and kind of being in these personages and is a conditioning influence in the degree and quality of their beauty.

The kinds and relationships of being manifested by the dramatis personæ of literature are of infinite variety. Attempts to classify them have proven obstructive of æsthetic pleasure at times, and have occasionally had a reprehensible influence upon artistic practices;<sup>23</sup> but in the main they have been helpful to criticism and æsthetic judgment. Often, too, they have contributed to the enlargement and enrichment of the æsthetic faculties and thus shared indirectly in the building of an increased readiness and scope of appreciation.<sup>24</sup> We can here attempt only to range the previously differentiated classes and relationships in a relatively consistent system such as will make clear the common bases of division, the criteria of distinctions within the major categories, and the accepted terminology throughout. It is only a panoramic glimpse of the whole province which I shall endeavor to present.

The classes of literary figures are primarily differentiated by the various kinds of fictive being made manifest in them. Upon this basis of division there are distinguishable six kinds of dramatis personæ, marked respectively by their grade or order, unity, completeness, duration, state, and mode of manifestation of being. The three fundamental

<sup>21</sup> Cf. Calvin Thomas, "Literature and Personality," PMLA, XII, 3, n.s. v, 3 (1897), pp. 308-309.

<sup>22</sup> This description of character is from W. D. Howells, Heroines of Fiction (New York: Harper & Bros., 1901), p. 65.

<sup>23</sup> Note, for example, the influence of Aristotle upon the Renaissance dramatists, as pointed out in D. L. Clark, op. cit., pp. 71-72.

<sup>24</sup> The widespread contributions of Aristotle and Horace in the development of characterization are especially notable in this connection. Cf. D. L. Clark, op. cit., pp. 80-82.

categories of ontology—quality, unity, and existence—include these six classes.

1. According to their grade or order of being, fictional persons are of three kinds: superhuman, non-human, and human. Owing to man's persistent anthropomorphism, however, this classification appears somewhat spurious, for in the Gods we can find only such meanings as human psychic experience enables us to visualize.<sup>25</sup> The Olympian figures of the Greek drama, the heavenly protagonists in the works of Dante and Milton, Goethe's Mephistopheles, Anatole France's Satanic Majesty and rebel angels—all the literary personages of the superhuman order are in their essential natures human, and transcend the mortals for the most part only in the superhuman degree to which they possess the human quality.<sup>26</sup> But to further distinguish such personages and to enfranchise the deities from man's bodily limitations, we have almost invariably ascribed to them somatic forms which differ in conspicuous but slight particulars from the human body. Whatever beauty such figures have must lie, then, in the fusion of meanings of superhuman degree with perceptual fields adequate to embody these meanings and still sufficiently manlike to afford them recognizable individual life.

The same appears to be largely true also of the non-human figures in literary portraiture, except that here there is usually a desire to show inferiority rather than transcendence. Consequently the somatic forms given these figures are frequently pervaded by animal features. The concepts (or meanings), too, seem rather prevaillingly those of the brute nature vestigial in humanity. Where this is not true, or only partly true, as in Shakespeare's Caliban and Ariel, Ibsen's Boyg, Hauptmann's Rautendelein, and in the celebrated ghosts of literature, the non-human figures invariably take on superhuman features to some degree. In either case they are always mainly human in essential significance.

Both superhuman and non-human figures of beauty are extremely rare in literary portraiture. This is necessarily the case: for if the deities and earth-spirits be represented by the fusion of human forms and meanings, then the beauty of character appears to lie in the humanity made manifest; and if superhuman or non-human forms be employed conviction that significant individual existence has been realized is almost impossible.<sup>27</sup> Prometheus, Ariel, Caliban, and Rautendelein unmistakably come alive with beauty, but figures their like are so extraordinarily few as to confirm rather than refute the validity of our pronouncement. It is with fictive human personages, therefore, that our study is mainly concerned.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>25</sup> On the portrayal of superhuman figures in literature see A. C. Bradley, op. cit., pp. 29-30 and 172-174; L. P. Smith, On Reading Shakespeare (New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co., 1933), pp. 98-99; William Hazlitt, Characters of Shakespeare's Plays, Collected Works (New York: McClure, Phillips & Co., 1902), I, 172 (a quotation from Schlegel's Lectures on the Drama); and Henry Fielding, The History of Tom Jones (New York: Harper & Bros., 1836), I, 330.

<sup>26</sup> The human being, we are told, "Repeats God's process in man's due degree," Cf. Robert Browning, op. cit., p. 421.

2. On the basis of their unity of being, fictional persons are classifiable as consistent and inconsistent. Between these two extremes all possible gradations of unity and variety are possible. Few such persons remain always wholly "in character," and some "consistent inconsistency"<sup>29</sup> seems required even of the most radically non-classical figures. Those of relatively high consistency tend to become type characters; those of high inconsistency, to approach complete personalities.<sup>30</sup> The requirements of consistency and decorum, asserted and reasserted from Aristotle to Fielding, were unquestionably responsible for that foreshortening of the dramatis personæ into types which was almost without exception in the practice of the ancient writers and hardly less general in the portraiture of the neo-classicists.<sup>31</sup> The occasional Tom Jones who escaped the devitalizing influence of a narrow consistency is evidence of a liberalizing inconsistency which ever and again crept into the practice of the dogmatists themselves.<sup>32</sup> But even so, Fielding has his Blifil and his Squire Alworthy. Meanwhile those who, from the Renaissance on, remained unaware of or indifferent to the doctrinaire viewpoint were demonstrating beyond refutation that character creations capture the beauty of individual lives in proportion only as they manifest the inconsistency of these lives within the wide limits of integrated beings.<sup>33</sup>

A group of literary personages in which the portrayal of dual or multiple personality is attempted forces upon us a third class in the province under discussion. However, since it is generally agreed that unity of being is one of the a priori conditions of individual life, the ever-recurrent attempts, both in theory and artifact, to demonstrate its multiplicity must necessarily to some degree constitute a negation of all being. In spite of this, or perhaps because of it, the attempts

<sup>27</sup> Cf. William Hazlitt, op. cit., p. 172, and L. P. Smith, op. cit., pp. 98-100.

<sup>28</sup> "Man, therefore, is the highest subject." Such is the dictum of Henry Fielding, op. cit., I, 331.

<sup>29</sup> Aristotle's phrase. Cf. Poetics, op. cit., p. 55.

<sup>30</sup> In addition to Aristotle, in the above reference, consult the views of Horace, Vida, and Boileau, in Cook, op. cit., pp. 7-23, 107-108, 144, 191-192; and Clark, op. cit., pp. 79-80.

<sup>31</sup> Cf. E. H. Wright, op. cit., pp. 378, 380, and 383.

<sup>32</sup> Cf. Henry Fielding, op. cit., I, 334.

<sup>33</sup> Cf. E. H. Wright, op. cit., pp. 378-383, and W. D. Howells, op. cit., pp. 80 and 176.

mentioned have remained perennially alluring, even though the dramatis personæ of this class have almost invariably been wanting in beauty. The failure to achieve beauty in portraits of multiple personalities seems inescapable. The meanings in such figures, for one thing, seem still too uncertain to be effectively fused. But granted that these meanings might, under the ægis of contemporary psychology,<sup>34</sup> be sufficiently clarified to become fusible, the major difficulty still remains. The artist has still the task of exhibiting in a coherent individual two or more rôles of such conflicting natures that they palpably separate the individual into a like number of autonomous personalities. If to this end a single fictive person be employed, the duality or multiplicity remains unrealized; whereas, if more than one are used, there results a plurality of perceptual fields and the conditions of beauty in the portraiture seem inescapably violated.<sup>35</sup> Stevenson's Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde have, unmistakably, a realized duality; but unfortunately for the realization of beauty in character, this duality persists in the realm of somatic forms as well as in that of character meanings. There appear always to be two men, two perceptual fields. The same is true of the protagonists in Eugene O'Neill's The Great God Brown, though here there is not that sharp distinctness which strikes one in Stevenson's work.<sup>36</sup>

3. On the basis of their completeness of being, fictional persons are classifiable into three major kinds; namely, symbols, types, and complete individualities. The various minor classes distinguishable on the same basis, such as allegorical, stock, and lay figures, puppets and marionettes, are usually but modifications or divergent aspects of one or another of the major kinds. Although literary personages of importance elude complete inclusion in any one of these categories, yet scarcely any figure in all literature fails to show some scantiness or fullness of being such as to range it predominantly in one of the groups specified.

Symbolic personages, unlike mathematical symbols, are conditioned by a necessary resemblance to the things symbolized. When this likeness extends throughout their nature and acts they become allegorical. So far as they have beauty, such figures manifest the fusion of concepts or meanings not inherently their own, yet recognizably like their own, with perceptual individuals amenable to the admission of such extrinsic significance. Thus Faust becomes a symbol of all modern occidental humanity,<sup>37</sup> while Christian, of Pilgrim's Progress, is throughout an allegorical figure, representative of a salvational destiny in Christendom.

<sup>34</sup> Clifford Kirkpatrick, "Concepts of the Newer Psychology," in Man and His World, ed. J. H. S. Bossard (New York: Harper & Bros., 1932), pp. 367-383.

<sup>35</sup> Consider in this connection also the transmuting figures in Strindberg's A Dream Play, tr. E. Bjorkman, in Plays, First Series (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1912) and in Virginia Woolf's Orlando (New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co., 1928).

<sup>36</sup> For an analysis of the dual personality in Franz Werfel's Spiegelmensch see William Rose, Men, Myths, and Movements in German Literature (London: Allen & Unwin, 1931), pp. 221-222.

The type personage is one whose direction and bounds are prescribed by an intellectual ideal in the form of a human trait or quality. This ideal, in contrast to the meaning of a symbolic figure, is inherently the person's own. Only such figures may properly be said to have character.<sup>38</sup> The thing typified in them may be any conceptual rôle which human intellection has generalized and given recognized demarcations. Whether the rôle be distinguished by sensations, emotions, imaginings, thoughts, or acts matters not, provided only that its directions and bounds have been intellectually conceived and have recognizably set the limits of the character. Type figures are seldom beautiful, for the rigidity of meanings in them is imperatively so pronounced that complete fusion with fictive beings is always to some degree thwarted and the concepts remain more or less lifeless abstractions.<sup>39</sup> This is not to deny that such personages have intellectual values; however, it is highly doubtful if any other beauty such works might have could ever fully compensate for the want of it in their fictional characters.<sup>40</sup>

The highest degrees of beauty in character are to be found in literary personages of complete fullness of being. Such personages most come alive and have significance of corresponding scope and vitality.<sup>41</sup> They at once have and are personalities. In them panoramic truths concerning man's purpose and destiny find perfect fusion with fictional lives. Yet they remain always difficult to interpret fully, for they transcend all set definitions and ideals. Beyond all the commonly accepted meanings and the myriad individual interpretations men have found for Hamlet, there abides always something still left over to discover in the melancholy Prince.<sup>42</sup> Such is the case, too, with Faust, Peer Gynt, Don Quixote, and many another figure of like proportions. Personages of this sort grow as we take on increased ability to understand them. Their fullness consists always partly of suggested potentialities unrealized in

<sup>37</sup> Consult the various references to Faustian and Western Culture in Oswald Spengler, The Decline of the West, tr. C. F. Atkinson, 2 vols. (New York: Knopf & Co., 1926, 1928). For the page references see the index to vol. II.

<sup>38</sup> On this somewhat loose identification of type with character see E. C. Baldwin, op. cit., p. 64.

<sup>39</sup> This is obviously less true of universal types, such as Odysseus, for instance, than of narrowly typical ones, such as people the works of Ben Jonson and the Restoration dramas.

<sup>40</sup> Cf. L. P. Smith, op. cit., pp. 100-102.

<sup>41</sup> Ibid., pp. 101-104.

<sup>42</sup> Ibid., p. 97, A. C. Bradley, op. cit., pp. 93-94, E. H. Wright, op. cit., p. 382.

their fictive lifetimes.<sup>43</sup> It is because they thus come alive with inexhaustible meanings that we of the modern world find in them our highest æsthetic pleasures.

4. Within the province of dramatis personæ distinguished by their duration of being, there is no set number of distinct classes, but only a graded series between clearly defined extremes. The terminal types of this series are persons that have single moments of being and those that have full life-cycles. Wherever durational significance is given to the span of life allowed such persons, here the metaphysical entity, time, appears to condition human existence. In this there may be the implication that life is a matter of moments,<sup>44</sup> or, at the opposite extreme, moments may be so subordinated that the continuity and wholeness of life are postulated as of supreme importance.<sup>45</sup> In this matter the unity of time intrudes, too, and the æsthetic effect varies accordingly as the duration of being presented is one of contiguous or one of divided moments of existence.<sup>46</sup> Contrarily, and transcending time, even multiple life-cycles may be presented within the coherence of a single individual thereby to suggest the many strange meanings fore and aft from our little lifetimes, or those still stranger ones which seem enfranchised from time by means of foresight and remembrance.<sup>47</sup>

A matter of high importance to which we can here give but passing notice is the potent influence which the duration of being in fictional personages has upon the choice of genres. Other factors sometimes have paramount sway in the selection of literary forms, but the time span presented still always conditions the magnitude and so has always a significant part in determining the preferred genre.<sup>48</sup>

5. According to their state of being, the characters of literature are either static or dynamic. The dynamic ones may have either developmental or degenerative motility. The usual objective of static character presentation is to make manifest the meanings of existence in its matured and immutable aspects.<sup>49</sup> There is here no indication of how a person-

<sup>43</sup> Cf. E. H. Wright, op. cit., p. 384, and L. P. Smith, op. cit., pp. 97, 101, and 103.

<sup>44</sup> Cf. McBurney Mitchell, "Goethe's Theory of the Novelle," PMLA, xxx, 2, n.s. xxiii, 2 (1915), pp. 227-229.

<sup>45</sup> Cf. Gustav Gruener, op. cit., pp. 75-82; A. C. Bradley, op. cit., p. 71; and William Rose, op. cit., pp. 227-228.

<sup>46</sup> Cf. D. L. Clark, op. cit., p. 79, and A. S. Cook, op. cit., p. 187.

<sup>47</sup> On these matters see the works of August Strindberg, Virginia Woolf, Eugene O'Neill, and Franz Werfel referred to on page 622 above. Marcel Proust's À la Recherche du Temps Perdu and James Joyce's Ulysses should also be consulted.

<sup>48</sup> Cf. McBurney Mitchell, op. cit., pp. 215-236.

<sup>49</sup> Cf. Katherine Merrill: Characterization in the Beginning of Thackeray's Pendennis, PMLA, xv, 2, n.s. viii, 2 (1900), 246-247, and W. D. Howells, op. cit., p. 105.

age's character or personality came to be what it is, nor of how it might presumably become something different. In dynamic figures, on the contrary, the meanings fused with the fictive individuals involve pre-eminently just such questions.<sup>50</sup> Here the agencies whereby character and personality are formed, modified or destroyed become dominant considerations. In the nature and behavior of those agencies to which he ascribes the formation and change of character in his dramatis personæ the literary artist most reveals his own Weltanschauung, for in just these agencies we discover the artist's conception of the controlling forces of the universe.<sup>51</sup>

6. Finally, we have still to consider those classes of fictional persons that are distinguished in accordance with the mode of manifestation of being. The two clearly differentiated classes of this province, subjective and objective, are acceptably defined for our common understanding.<sup>52</sup> We need pause here, then, only to explain the operation of the principle of beauty in personages of these two types and to indicate certain significant problems which arise in that connection.

A fictional person whose being has chiefly a subjective mode of manifestation is obviously one in whom the concept or meaning has reference primarily to the inner life. Our recently enlarged understanding of the psychic processes, especially in the subconscious realm, has correspondingly increased the range of concepts fused with the fictive individuals of contemporary literature.<sup>53</sup> But to expect the dramatis personæ who bear evidence of this widened understanding to show at once also more realistic, abundant, and beautiful personalities would be to forget the basic difficulties involved in effectively presenting concepts concerning the subjective life. Where the manifest being of fictional persons is evidenced chiefly by subjective data there appears no perceptual field that comes alive as a fictive individual reality. Browning to the contrary notwithstanding,<sup>54</sup> there must be incorporated in the portraiture sufficient objective data, such as life regularly shows in association with the given subjective ones, if the persons presented are to have convincing fictive existence. Until that is done the concepts of the newer psychology,<sup>55</sup> or of any other intellectual explorations, find no adequate perceptual fields with which to fuse and so remain but

<sup>50</sup> Cf. L. P. Smith, op. cit. pp. 96-97, and A. C. Bradley, op. cit., pp. 359-362.

<sup>51</sup> Cf. George H. Opdyke, Art and Nature Appreciation (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1932), pp. 507-516; Henry Fielding, op. cit., I, 334; William Hazlitt, op. cit., p. 192; William Troy, op. cit., pp. 385-387; and Justin O'Brien, op. cit., pp. 393-395.

<sup>52</sup> Cf. Robert Browning, "Essay on Shelley," op. cit., pp. 1008-1014.

<sup>53</sup> There is notable confirmation of this point in the works of Proust and Joyce referred to in Note 47.

<sup>54</sup> Cf. Robert Browning, op. cit., pp. 12, 49, and 74.

<sup>55</sup> Cf. Clifford Kirkpatrick, op. cit., pp. 373-382.

mental abstractions hung upon puppets or shadows. Browning's Paracelsus, Strafford, and Sordello are but three among many literary personages whose want of life and beauty rests primarily upon too exclusive a use of subjective data in their portraiture.

Despite all the requisite concessions to inner perception and to other relevant factors, it remains incontrovertible that a considerable majority of mankind apprehend perceptual realities more fully and understandingly when these manifest themselves in sensuous form, or with the illusion of such form.<sup>56</sup> It follows that fictional persons whose being has chiefly an objective mode of manifestation seem best to achieve that illusion of meaningful life which is imperative for beauty in character.<sup>57</sup> The increased viability of the dramatis personæ in German literature after the vogue of expressionism died down is but one of many witnesses to the indispensability of the objective mode for a lifelike manifestation of being in literary portraiture.<sup>58</sup>

Throughout history the theory of being of literary personages has undergone changes of profound import. Owing to the limitations imposed we shall find it most profitable to survey these mutations with reference only to the three outstanding modes of literary portraiture: the classical, the romantic, and the vitalistic modes. Roughly speaking, the three may be said to have held sway in chronological sequence, in the order named; but all three have been to some degree current in all ages.<sup>59</sup>

The classicists have regularly subordinated their characters to plot action. Typification has been their traditional method of character presentation; hence their literary personages have always been type figures whose prime requirement was that they be consistent.<sup>60</sup> Among the ancient Greeks these figures were usually ideal character types whose meanings had relevance to significant human experience everywhere and always.<sup>61</sup> In the latter part of the ancient classical period some of this amplitude was already lost,<sup>62</sup> and this narrowing process

<sup>56</sup> Browning himself concedes much in this direction. Cf., for example, the Essay on Shelley, op. cit., p. 1009.

<sup>57</sup> In addition to Browning's study of the objective and subjective in the "Essay on Shelley" see also A. A. Jack, op. cit., pp. 226-229.

<sup>58</sup> Cf. William Rose, op. cit., pp. 237-241.

<sup>59</sup> Cf. E. H. Wright, op. cit., p. 380, and L. P. Smith, op. cit., pp. 91-95 and 103-104.

<sup>60</sup> Cf. Aristotle, op. cit., pp. 27, 29, and 53-57, D. L. Clark, op. cit., pp. 18, 21, 79, and 80.

<sup>61</sup> Cf. Aristotle, op. cit., pp. 35, 57, and 107, and L. P. Smith, op. cit., pp. 91-92 and 100-101.

<sup>62</sup> Cf. W. W. Comfort The Character Types in the Old French, Chansons de Geste, PMLA, xxi, 2, n.s. xiv, 2 (1906), 279-434; also A. S. Cook, op. cit., pp. 9, 11, 13, 22, and 25.

continued until in Renaissance and Neo-classical times the type figures often represented only standardized professional rôles or mere conventional traits of character. Some of the dramatis personæ in the works of Ben Jonson and Molière show this typicality in its extreme form. Many of the character creations of Goldsmith and Sheridan have it to a high degree. Patriarch Goeze in Lessing's Nathan der Weise is so narrowly typical that he seems to some a mere caricature.<sup>63</sup> Likewise Henry Fielding's Blifil and Squire Alworthy, to whom we have previously referred, are to some degree dehumanized by their restriction to trait representation.<sup>64</sup>

The increasing narrowness of typification just described is by no means the exclusive, nor even the dominant, trend throughout the period above specified. Already in Jonson's time Shakespeare and other contemporaries were creating characters who outran typification and had relatively little consistency. Throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries there was ebb and flow in the degree to which this mode of presentation was employed, but the general tendency was toward less narrowness and singleness of traits in the literary portraits. This trend persisted so that by the late nineteenth century there again appeared numerous fictive personages who were types only in the sense that they represented humanity itself, in blocks of experience that are ever-recurrent and of abiding significance.<sup>65</sup> Narrow typification persisted, to be sure, but came to be less and less the dominant practice of the major artists.<sup>66</sup>

From first impressions one is tempted to say that the classical mode of treatment gave us characters; the romantic one, personalities. Deeper study and reflection reveals this statement to be but a misleading part-truth, for the personages of romantic literature are still far from fully rounded individuals. They are, instead, figures whose direction and bounds are prescribed chiefly by emotional and imaginative objectives rather than by intellectual ideals.<sup>67</sup> I must forego the development of this thesis, but may cite Goethe's Werther as the sort of portraiture upon which I should build a case.<sup>68</sup> Individuals limited to one or a few affective attributes are here the rule, and in them we see personality

<sup>63</sup> Gustav Gruener, op. cit., p. 78.

<sup>64</sup> Cf. Henry Fielding, op. cit., I, 334.

<sup>65</sup> Peer Gynt is but one of many notable examples.

<sup>66</sup> Figures done during the naturalistic interlude are exceptions. On narrow types in contemporary literature see Edith Wharton, "Tendencies in Modern Fiction," S.R.L., x, 28 (Jan 27, 1934).

<sup>67</sup> Cf. L. P. Smith, op. cit., pp. 100 (footnote) and 103-104.

<sup>68</sup> Says Ramon Fernandez, "man dehumanizes himself by excess of affectivity at least as much as by excess of rationality. . . ." Quoted by Herbert Read, op. cit., p. 307.

still under restrictions, for here it must sacrifice the common ideals of mankind upon the altar of affective uniqueness.<sup>69</sup> Shakespeare's women are, as Hazlitt pointed out,<sup>70</sup> charming abstractions of the affections, but that they have three-dimensional personalities comparable to those of his major masculine figures no one would seriously maintain.

Figures done in the romantic mode are perennial, but tend to become the prevailing type only in periods when emotional and imaginative faculties are in the ascendant.<sup>71</sup> Vast lures to men's bodies or to their spirits, or to both, may inaugurate such periods. Sometimes they appear as reactions to eras dominated by intellectual aims and pursuits. One dare hardly generalize concerning the sequence. The Odyssey followed the Iliad; Shakespeare interspersed romantic creations among works of other tone colors; Goethe's Werther preceded his more classical productions. The Renaissance was partly a reaction to Scholasticism, but likewise the Romantic Era was partly a reaction to the Age of Enlightenment. And if a gallery of romantic figures in contemporary writing appear to be the product of a reaction to naturalism, one has only to remember the dramatis personæ drawn by the symbolists and the expressionists to correct any impulsive formulation of hard and fast conclusions. It seems safe to infer that personages done in this mode become prevalent during the terminal epochs of pervasive cultural changes; but we cannot be sure, for we know comparatively little as yet of the ecology of these elusive figures.

Although vitalistic may be in some respects a misleading term, it appears to be especially happy for the designation of the third mode of character presentation. If we dissociate from it the narrower of its various Bergsonian connotations,<sup>72</sup> its comprehensiveness, whereby to include all the elusive contingencies of life, makes it particularly apt; for by vitalistic portraiture we mean the presentation of fully rounded personalities, of personages bounded only by the coherence of their whole psycho-somatic beings. Hamlet, Faust, Peer Gynt, and dramatis personæ of like dimensions must have been conceived along these lines. There have been no periods when this mode of treatment was unmistakably dominant, but whenever the full abundance of life has been the unimpeded prime objective with which literary artists have infused their character creations, then the vitalistic mode has been operative

<sup>69</sup> Cf. Justin O'Brien, op. cit., pp. 394-395, and W. D. Howells, op. cit., pp. 114, 162, and 190.

<sup>70</sup> William Hazlitt, "On the Character of Milton's Eve," op. cit., p. 105.

<sup>71</sup> Cf. P. E. Wheelwright's review of Faulkner's Sanctuary, Symposium, II, 2 (Apr., 1931), 276-281.

<sup>72</sup> For a brief summary of Bergson's views see Will Durant, The Story of Philosophy (New York: Garden City Publishing Co., 1926), pp. 497-507.

and fictional beings of the fulness and stature here described have made their appearance.<sup>73</sup>

Literary portraiture, which has so extensively occupied the creative and appreciative energies of mankind in all ages, must have functions of high import. There are, in generalized terms, two of these functions: to provide objects for æsthetic pleasures and to furnish subjects for æsthetic judgment.<sup>74</sup> A thorough analysis of the many other ends such portrait work may serve will discover, I believe, that all of them are subordinate to one or the other of these two.

Men take pleasure in the beauty of literary personages because they find that in these portraits their intellectual discoveries concerning human purposes, rôles, and destinies have become living truths, realized or undergoing realization in viable fictive individuals.<sup>75</sup> In that beauty they see these truths verified. In the representations of beings like themselves they find reparation of the break between truths about life and the living process itself; hence in these fictional beings they themselves have vicarious experience of the living of significant and therefore beautiful lives.<sup>76</sup>

In addition to providing objects for æsthetic pleasures the dramatis personæ of literary art also furnish us subjects for æsthetic judgments. The former are values of immediate apprehension; the latter, of mediate acquisition—the first-fruits of reflection.<sup>77</sup> Though practical reality is denied such judgments—or rather because of this—they are among the most valuable and highly prized of all human judgments, for in their appraisals of the beauty of truth come to life in fictional individuals they themselves share the interpretive beauties of the things they appraise. Because they are judgments of beauty they themselves become beautiful meanings. Thus they serve doubly to enlarge the understanding and to enhance the practice of living; yet without becoming themselves involved in the interests, prejudices, and vicissitudes of phenomenal experience. Only those capable of æsthetic judgments concerning fictive human destiny can justly dispose of the biases, distractions, clutter, and emptiness of actual existence and so find possible an intellectual faith in the beauty of life.

CHRISTIAN N. WENGER

University of Michigan

<sup>73</sup> Cf. E. H. Wright, op. cit., pp. 382–384; L. P. Smith, op. cit., 101–103; and K. Merrill, op. cit., pp. 251–252.

<sup>74</sup> Cf. W. T. Stace, op. cit., pp. 205–226.

<sup>75</sup> Cf. Robert Browning, "Paracelsus," op. cit., p. 47.

<sup>76</sup> For relevant comment on this point by Aristotle and Sir Philip Sidney see D. L. Clark, op. cit., pp. 109 and 148.

<sup>77</sup> Cf. A. C. Bradley, op. cit., pp. 172–174 and 282–284.

REGULATIONS OF THE ASSOCIATION

ADOPTED BY THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL

28 DECEMBER 1930

Arrearages in Membership Dues:

If members are in arrears for dues for the preceding calendar year their copies of PMLA will not be mailed to them until these dues have been paid. Members whose dues continue unpaid for two years shall be dropped from the printed List of Members.

Papers for the Program of the Annual Meeting:

Members of the Association may offer papers to be read either at the General Sessions, at the Departmental Sections, or at meetings of the Discussion Groups. The titles of papers proposed for General Sessions or for the Departmental Sections should, in all cases, be accompanied by synopses (not to exceed 60 words) to be printed in the program.

Papers for the General Sessions should be submitted to the Secretary of the Association for consideration by the Program Committee; papers for the Departmental Sections may be sent to the Secretary or directly to the officers of the Sections as announced in the June PMLA. The titles of papers for the Discussion Groups should be submitted to officers of the Group concerned.

The latest date at which proposals for the program can be received is October 31, but notice well in advance of this date is highly desirable as programs are often made up before that date.

Manuscripts Submitted for Publication in PMLA:

Members have the privilege of submitting papers for publication in PMLA, whether these have been previously presented at the Annual Meeting or not. Manuscripts should be addressed to the Editor of PMLA, to be referred to the Editorial Committee. No paper shall be accepted for publication which has not been approved by the Editorial Committee.

Contributors shall be allowed seventy-five cents per galley for author's corrections, but charges in excess of this allowance shall be paid by the contributor.

Fifty reprints with covers (or twenty-five in the case of communications in the "Comment and Criticism" Department) will be supplied to contributors gratis. A larger number will be furnished if desired, provided that notice is given by the time corrected page proof is returned. The cost of these extra reprints will be determined on the basis of the actual charges made by the printers.

PMLA

PUBLICATIONS OF
THE MODERN LANGUAGE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA
Issued Quarterly

VOLUME L

SEPTEMBER, 1935

NUMBER 3

XLIII

THE DATE OF THE FLOURISHING OF THE "WAKEFIELD MASTER"

THE date of the writing of the Secunda Pastorum and, ipso facto, of the flourishing of the "Wakefield Master," has been variously given from "the fourteenth century or even earlier"<sup>1</sup> to "the reign of Henry VI or Edward IV"<sup>2</sup> the more usual dates centering about Wat Tyler's Rebellion, 1381,<sup>3</sup> or the first decade of the fifteenth century.<sup>4</sup> The basis of these widely differing datings has been found in the implications of various social allusions in the plays, and one of these allusions, that to horned head-dress, has been used very diversely. This fact, coupled with the fact that Professor Oscar Cargill has claimed that "there seem to be no allusions in the (Wakefield) cycle which may positively refer to any events after 1355,"<sup>5</sup> led me to undertake the present study. As a result I am here proposing a date definitely later than the ones commonly chosen and advocated.<sup>6</sup> Let us turn first to the evidence offered by the costume passages in the plays.

<sup>1</sup> Katharine Lee Bates, The English Religious Drama, p. 49

<sup>2</sup> Alexander Douce, in his statement prepared for the sale of the manuscript in 1814. See Surtees Society, III (1836), vii-viii.

<sup>3</sup> Thomas Raine, the first editor, would date 1388. (Surtees Soc., III, viii, note); Charles Mills Gayley would date from "the decade on either side of Wat Tyler's Rebellion," 1381, to the "period of Praemunire, 1392," (really 1393), (Plays of Our Forefathers, pp. 134-135); Ernest Hemingway also prefers this dating, (English Nativity Plays, p. xlii).

<sup>4</sup> So Alfred Pollard (BETS, ES, LXXI, xxvi-xxvii); Charles Davidson, speaking of the poet says, "I judge him a late contributor to a cycle long established," (Studies in the English Mystery Plays, p. 155); Alexander Hohlfeld puts the plays at "the end of the fourteenth or beginning of the fifteenth century," (Altenglischen Kollektivmysterien, p. 310); Frances Foster says the language "fits neatly . . . in the first decade of the fifteenth century," (PMLA, XLIII, 135).

<sup>5</sup> PMLA, XLI, 812, n. 2. Mrs. McIntosh follows Cargill loosely, placing the plays vaguely from "1349-1400," (Hesperia, XI, 160).

<sup>6</sup> The manuscript itself is variously dated as c. 1450, by Louis Wann (PMLA, XLIII, Mrs. Millicent Carey McIntosh, in her study of our poet, the fullest study yet made, finds evidence of his workmanship in thirteen plays in the Towneley manuscript and of these five are in his favorite stanza throughout and thus, presumably, all his.<sup>7</sup> In these five there are two allusions which must claim our attention.<sup>8</sup> In Play III, the Noah Cum Filiis, occur the following words placed in the mouth of Noah Uxor. "Take the ther a langett/To tye vp thi hose!" (224-225) The word "langett" means originally, according to N.E.D., "the tongue of a balance" and is first noted by that authority in this or any sense in 1413.<sup>9</sup> In the derived sense of a "thong with which to tie the hose" the word is not noted before its occurrence in our text. This evidence of date is slight, but it is enforced by the fact that another word seems to have been used for this adjunct of dress in the fourteenth century. In the Eulogium, quoted by Camden in the second edition of his Remaines, (London, 1614), and dated by Planché in the reign of Richard II,<sup>10</sup> we read: "their hose are of two colors or pide with more, which with latchets which they called Harlots they tied to their Paltocks without breeches."<sup>11</sup> The implication is to place the allusion in the fifteenth century.

The other allusion is in play XVI, the Magnus Herodes, where one of the mothers, on the occasion of the Massacre of the Innocents, strikes one of Herod's knights with the words: "haue at thy tabard,/harlot and holard." (357-358). It is to be presumed that our poet here refers to the heraldic tabard as the knights involved are Herod's personal knights sent out under the admonition to go "in armoure full bright" (l. 280). If this assumption be correct, the reference places the writing well into the fifteenth century. At least, our first knowledge of an armorial tabard dates from the brass of John Wantele of Amberley, Sussex, 1424.<sup>12</sup> I am

---

141); vaguely about the middle of the fifteenth century by Pollard, (EETS, ES, LXXX, xxvii and xi, note), c. 1450 by NED; and "towards the end of the same (fifteenth) century" by Gayley, (Rep. Eng. Comedies, I, xxiii)

<sup>7</sup> "The Wakefield Group in the Townley Cycle," Hesperia, XI, 243-244. Cf. also Gayley, Rep. Eng. Com., I, xxvii

<sup>8</sup> "Stafford blew" as the name of a cloth (Play III, 200), and "colknysfs," apparently "cabbage knives," (Play XII, l. 57), are given by the NED as occurring only in our plays

<sup>9</sup> "Pledours in worldly courtes hauen Tonges lyke to the langet of the balance" (Pilg Sowle, I, xiv (1859), 11)

<sup>10</sup> James R. Planché, Dictionary (London 1879), p. 217 Dorothy Hughes, Illustrations of Chaucer's England, p. 164, dates the Eulogium as "c. 1362"

<sup>11</sup> William Camden, Remaines, 2d edition, pp. 232-233. The section on "Apparel" appears first in this edition.

<sup>12</sup> On this all authorities are agreed Cf. Herbert Norris, Costume and Fashion (London 1927), p. 323; C. J. Foulkes, Curator of the Tower Armouries, Medieval England, p. 186, Mr. Russell, in the letter quoted, and others. Mr. Will Stephenson, in his exhaustive listings of the brasses of the West and East Ridings, gives no example with a tabard, though he warned against making too easily this assumption, however, by Mr. Archibald G. B. Russell, Lancaster Herald, who, in a kind reply to a letter of enquiry, says: "It seems possible that a knight might have worn some garment of the nature of a plain tabard at a date appreciably earlier than that at which armorial tabards came into vogue."<sup>13</sup> In reply I can but say that the evidence seems to me against such possibility. Chaucer, writing at roughly the time when most scholars would have our poet flourish, that is, about 1387, does not place the tabard upon his Knight but upon his Plowman.<sup>14</sup> Upon his Knight he places a "gipoun"<sup>15</sup> a garment much like a tabard and one worn, like it, over the body armour.<sup>16</sup> Chaucer tells us of this "gipoun" only that it was "Al bismotered" but some thirty years later, c 1420-1422,<sup>17</sup> the poet John Lydgate, in his Siege of Thebes, wrote:

And Tydeus, abouen his Haberion
A Gypoun hadde, hidous, sharpe and hoor,
Wroght of the bristels of a wylde boor (pt. ii, 1544-46)

Here we have, clearly, a "plain" not an "armorial" garment, yet the word which comes to the poet is "jupon" not "tabard." Add to this the fact that no evidence of a plain tabard as a knight's garment has come down to us in effigy, portraiture or descriptive word, and I think we have ample justification for questioning such a garment. The choice of word made by Lydgate in 1420-22, however, makes it seem unnecessary really to settle the matter as his choice makes it seem unlikely that our poet, unless he were writing near this time or later would have chosen the word tabard.<sup>18</sup> gives one case, that of Sir John Manlevelere of Allerton Manleverer, West Riding, c. 1400, with a jupon (Yorkshire Archeological Journal, xv, 1 ff., xii, 195 ff.; xv, 3) Herbert Druitt, Costume on Brasses (London 1906), p. 166, says the tabard as a knightly garment won its way slowly, only two cases during the Complete Plate Period, ending early Henry VI, being known to him. He says further that Haines cites the brass of Sir Ralph Shelton, 1424, Great Snoring, Norfolk, as wearing a tabard, but at present only the head survives (ibid., p. 167).

<sup>13</sup> Letter dated from the College of Arms, London, 30 March, 1933.

<sup>14</sup> Prologue, 541.

<sup>15</sup> Ibid., 76.

<sup>16</sup> A stone effigy of Henry IV on Battlefield Church, Shrewsbury, c. 1408, shows that monarch wearing a jupon, as does the brass of Thomas de Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, 1406, St. Mary's, Warwick, and that of Sir William Bagot, 1407, Baginton, Warwickshire (Druitt, op. cit., pp. 157, n. 1, 162). The jupon, worn originally with mail, was more shaped to the body than the tabard, but the two were very alike, as any one will see who compares the jupon of the Black Prince in Westminster Abbey with the tabard worn by Henry VI. They are reproduced by Planché, Dictionary, 317 and 499. As late as 1415 the stone effigy of Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, Wingfield, Suffolk, shows the jupon (Druitt, p. 168, n. 2).

<sup>17</sup> Date accepted from the Enc. Brit., 14th ed.

<sup>18</sup> Mr. Louis B. Wright, of the Huntington Library, suggests that the expression "haue

Of the plays in which our poet had only a part hand but one need detain us, the Judicium (Play xxx).<sup>19</sup> In this play he introduces a new character, Tutivillus, who describes himself as chief tax gatherer and court recorder for the Devil, and it is through him that our poet finds opportunity for much satire upon contemporary manners. It is in this strain that the poet gives to Tutivillus the following portrait of a contemporary countryside "vamp":

so Ioly
Ilka las in a lande
like a lady nerehande,
So fresh and so plesande,
makys men to foly.

If she be neuer so fowll a dowde, with hir kelles<sup>20</sup> and hir pyntes,
The shrew hir self can shrowde, both hir chekys and hir chynnes;
she can make it full prowde,
with iapes and with gynnes,
hir hede as hy as a clowde,
bot no shame of hir synnes

Thai fele;
When she is thus paynt,
she makys it so quaynte,
She lookys like a saynt,
And wars then the deyle.

she is hornyd like a kowe,
a new fon syn,<sup>21</sup>
The culer<sup>22</sup> hyngys so side now, furrid with a cat skyn,
All thise ar for you,
thai ar commen of youre kyn.
(255-271)

Lively as this picture is, there is little in it to cause comment before the last three lines. There we find plenty to detain us. For our country lass, in emulation of ladies of fashion, has assumed a form of "piked" head-dress of such a sort as to lead our poet to say of her that she is "hornyd at thy tabard" may be a conventional one and thus have nothing to do with the actual garments worn by the knight. The whole habit of our poet is so visually concrete, however, that this possibility, though it must be granted, does not seem to me likely. Note that the Prima Mulier strikes at a knight's "hood" and his "nose," (ll 337, 339) and that the Tertia Mulier strikes at another's "groyn" (snout, nose. l. 382).

<sup>19</sup> Professor Cargill, in his latest pronouncement, would ascribe all the plays, apparently, to the Wakefield Master. His words are: "We inevitably return to Davidson's conclusion that the Towneley cycle is the work of one man" (Drama and Liturgy, pp. 118-119). I think no one except Mr. Cargill believes thus; certainly Davidson did not. I quote from his comments upon the Conspiracio, Play xx: "This play . . . is a pieced play, containing within the compass of a single play work of the earliest and of the latest period, as well as something of that author whose plays mark the beginnings of English comedy" (C. H. Davidson, Studies in the English Mystery Plays, p. 153).

<sup>20</sup> Cauls, reticulated bags for confining the hair.

<sup>21</sup> The words "a new" are now first recovered. I wish here to express my thanks and appreciation to Captain R. B. Haselden, Curator of Manuscripts at the Huntington Library, for reading this and the next line for me and for his unfailing helpfulness whenever I have approached him with a problem. The first line was legible only with the violet ray.

<sup>22</sup> Previously transcribed "cuker" though clearly "culer."

like a kowe." And as these are the words over which so much difference of opinion has arisen, they must receive careful consideration. Frederic J. Furnivall, in a note correcting a placing of the advent of the horned head-dress by Alfred Pollard in the reign of Richard II, said: "Horns were in fashion in the 13th, 14th and 15th centuries,"<sup>23</sup> and Oscar Cargill, obviously basing his remark upon this assertion, said: "Raine dates the composition of the plays in 1388 because there is a passage in the Judicium describing a female as 'hornyd as a kowe'. But the piked head-dress referred to was in fashion in the 13th, 14th and 15th centuries."<sup>24</sup> The difficulty with these assertions is, as Planché had already pointed out, that they obscure the important distinction between horns as "bosses" and horns as "piked."<sup>25</sup> By twisting the braided hair about the ears or in coils upon the head and by the use of cauls women from the end of the thirteenth century had been able so to place their wimples upon their heads as to make them protrude in knobs or bosses, and these protrusions were loosely called "horns." Obviously such obtrusions, however, would not make an observer think of a cow.<sup>26</sup> And even if they should, the restoration of the rest of the line by Captain Haselden, Curator of Manuscripts at the Huntington Library, makes such an interpretation impossible. For no poet, with the vivid sense of fact shown everywhere by our poet, would say of a head-dress at least seventy-five years old when he wrote, that it was a new found sin. Certainly the implication of Furnivall and assertion of Cargill must be given up.

The all-important question becomes, then, when did the horned head-dress become "piked" so as to suggest the horns of a cow? The answer to this question which was accepted by Mr. Pollard, Mr. Gayley, and others was derived from the statements of two distinguished scholars who wrote early in the seventeenth century. John Stowe, writing in 1604, said that in the days of Richard II "noble women used high attire piked like horns"<sup>27</sup> and William Camden, in the second edition of his Remaines, 1614, said that "Queen Anne, wife of King Richard the Second . . . brought in high head attire piked like horns."<sup>28</sup> Accepting these statements, Mr. Pollard, when told by Sir E. M. Thompson of examples of the horned head-dress in two manuscripts in the British Museum which

<sup>23</sup> EETS, ES, LXXI, xxvi, n. 1.

<sup>24</sup> PMLA, XLII, 812, n. 2.

<sup>25</sup> Dictionary, pp. 270-271.

<sup>26</sup> I have yet to find a mediæval representation of a cow with other than long horns and in the West Riding, where the Craven breed was probably dominant, such long horns would almost necessarily have been in the poet's mind.

<sup>27</sup> John Stowe, A Summarie of the Chronicles of Englande (London, 1604), p. 132. The passage appears first in this edition.

<sup>28</sup> William Camden, Remaines, (London, 1614), p. 234. Note that this is the second edition of Camden.

dated "as late as 1420" accepted that date as a final one before which our poet must have written.<sup>29</sup> What the authority used by Stowe was we do not know and whether Camden had any authority other than that of Stowe himself we do not know. But already, almost twenty years before Pollard wrote, Planché, in a paper presented before the British Archeological Association, had challenged the statements of these early scholars, saying that "nothing like the horned head-dress of the fifteenth century has been discovered in the paintings or sculptures of any preceding period in England or upon the continent," and in his dictionary he wrote that "The reign of Henry V (1413-22) is remarkable for the first appearance of what may be truly called a horned head-dress."<sup>30</sup> With this judgment all modern students of costume are in substantial agreement so far as I have been able to observe,<sup>31</sup> they all looking upon the year 1420, as approximately the year when the truly horned head-dress began, rather than the year of its swan song.

Faced with such conflicting testimony I appealed to the judgment of Mr. A. F. Kendrick, who, as Keeper in the Victoria and Albert Museum spent the years 1897-1924 in an intensive study of textiles and costume, feeling that he was perhaps best fitted to pass judgment between the old and the modern scholars. In his kind reply he said that, in his judgment, "the phrase 'hornyd like a kowe' can only have been invented in the time of Henry V or very soon after."<sup>32</sup> If the head-dress was worn in

<sup>29</sup> EETS, ES, LXXI, xxvi

<sup>30</sup> See British Archeological Society Transactions, v and Dictionary, p. 271. Horned head-dress resembling horns must not be confused with pins so placed as to call for the oft-quoted remark of the Knight de la Tour-Landry who, writing in France in 1472, said of a head-dress that "quill est hault loéé sur longues espingles d'argent plus dun douz sur le teste comme vn gibet." (MS. Royal 19, C. vii, 40r.) For the transcription of this passage and for other favors I wish to thank cordially Professor L. M. Blandin of Paris and London. Likewise we must not be misled by the fifteenth-century English transcription of de la Tour-Landry when it reads "and hadde highe hornes" for the original "et estoient grans cornes" (EETS, OS, xxx, 62.) The Englishman is converting the description into terms of his own time, for, as Professor Blandin wrote me, "grans" means "large, without doubt, as you can see by the context." That context reads "il dist que les femmes qui estoient ainsi cornues et branchues ressemblent les limas cornus et les licornes" (Fol. 33r.)

<sup>31</sup> The actual history of the horned head-dress has been obscured by the loose use of the term by scholars. Norris says it appeared in the reign of Henry IV but also that it did not appear for sixty years after the arrival of Queen Anne. Clearly he uses the term in different senses in the two passages (op. cit., II, 439 and 253). Herbert Pratt, describing the brass of Lady Halle, c. 1420, speaks of her cauls as "curving upwards and outwards and terminating above the head in a pair of horns" (Costume on Brass, (London, 1906), p. 258), whereas Mrs. Ashdown says of the same brass "We may trace the horned head-dress from this inception." (op. cit., p. 150). We could illustrate at length.

<sup>32</sup> I owe thanks to Mr. Leslie Bliss, Librarian at the Huntington Library, for putting me in touch with Mr. Kendrick. The latter's letter is dated from the Burlington Arts Club, 26 March, 1933.

the reign of Richard II, then, all evidence of such use must be considered as lost. Not only that, but the acceptance of the statements of Stowe and Camden compels us to assume that all records of such head-dress are lost for the first fifteen years of the new century. This can hardly be possible. I think, therefore, that we may assume with very little hesitation that Stowe made a mistake in which Camden followed him,<sup>83</sup> and that this famous form of head-dress did not appear until well into the reign of Henry V—that is, somewhere between the years 1415 and 1420.<sup>84</sup> The next line seems to carry confirmation of this proposed date. This line has always in the past been made to read: "The culer hangys so side now, furrid with a cat skin"<sup>85</sup> Naturally the word "culer" gave trouble as there offered for it no etymological explanation and the word was not otherwise known. Fairholt said of it merely, "Part of a woman's head-dress."<sup>86</sup> Planché, after referring to Fairholt, says; "I am inclined to think it was a kind of cloak."<sup>87</sup> Pollard, who saw in the word a miswriting of the word "coker," defines it as "a kind of half boot or gaiter,"<sup>88</sup> and Halliwell, guessing, apparently, from the implication of the context regardless of etymology, defines it shrewdly as "part of a woman's horned head-dress, generally fringed with fur."<sup>89</sup> All these and other guesses may now be forgotten in the light of the true reading now first given, "the culer hangys so side now," and this true reading shifts the attention at once from the ghost word "culer" to the word "side." For this word means "extended in any direction" and is thus ambiguous. Our lass's collar may have been very broad or very long and the difference chances to be material as we shall soon see. It could hardly have been very tall as such a collar could hardly be said to hang. It is intelligible, however, to speak of a broad collar as hanging and, as the tall collar of the time of Richard II gave way to a broad collar in the reign apparently, of Henry V<sup>90</sup> the temptation is strong to accept the word <sup>83</sup> Apparently accepted by Agnes Strickland, in her Lives of the Queens of England, (London, 1911), p. 422. At least she interprets the embarrassment of the Queen's ladies in waiting when pitched from their charette in 1393 as due to the destruction of their horned hats. I feel confident that Maidstone's line "Femina feminea sua dum sic femina nudat," De Concordia, Canden Soc., (1838), p. 40, refers to the ladies' legs.

<sup>84</sup> Horned head-dress of any sort must have been rather unusual in the West Riding as only one of the brasses in the Riding, that of Agnes wife of John Langton, St. Peters, Leeds, shows such attire and her hat is called "small" by Mr. Stephenson as he describes it (Yorks. Arch. Journal, xv, 23.)

<sup>85</sup> So Surveyors Society and EETS. Upon these all other transcriptions have been based.

<sup>86</sup> Frederic William Fairholt, Costume in England, 3d ed. (Revised by E. A. Dillon) (London, 1885), II, (Glossary), 141.

<sup>87</sup> Dictionary, p. 157.

<sup>88</sup> EETS, ES, LXVI, 399 (Glossary).

<sup>89</sup> James O. Halliwell, Dictionary of Archaic and Provincial Words, sub "culer."

<sup>90</sup> Norris, op cit, p. 370, dates the collar "before the end of the reign of Henry IV";

"side" as meaning broad and thus to refer the words of our poet to conditions existing from about 1415 to 1420.

Obvious and easy as such conclusion is, however, the identification is by no means certain, for, numerous as examples of such collar accompanied by horned head-dress are—and manuscripts swarm with them—I have been unable to find any worn with the wimple or by other than women of social position. Our lass is a country woman and wears a wimple so adjusted with pins<sup>41</sup> as to make her, we are told, look "like a saynt." It is interesting to discover, then, that a long collar, one hanging down the back, seems to have been worn by the lower classes in the reign of Henry VI. Such a collar seemed to be worn by a figure reproduced by Mrs. Ashdown from Royal MS. 15 E, iv<sup>42</sup> but the reproduction was uncertain. Captain Haselden therefore wrote to the British Museum about the matter and Mr. Eric G. Millar, Deputy Keeper of Manuscripts there, replied saying that the collar actually extended "down the back about midway from the neck to the waist," and that "in a similar figure of a lady on fol. 20b the collar undoubtedly reaches down to the waist."<sup>43</sup> As this manuscript dates from 1470-1480 it offers no evidence of the collar at an earlier time. Fortunately there is literary evidence of such a collar, however, in the reign of Henry VI. It is found in the well-known Middle English version of the Book de la Tour-Landry, written in a "good formal hand of the reign of Henry VI," according to Thomas Wright, its editor for the Early English Text Society,<sup>44</sup> and dated by William Henry Schofield as "1422-61."<sup>45</sup> The passage to which I refer runs as follows: "Seruying women of lowe astate . . . thei furre her colers that hangin doune into the middil of the backe."<sup>46</sup> As the Old French original, written in 1372, reads "cest a dire

---

Frederic Hottenroth, La Costume (Paris, n.d.), II, 74, and also Trachten der Völker Alter und neuer Zeit (Stuttgart, 1883), II, 137, suggests the date 1420. The collar is found upon two Yorkshire brasses, one upon that of Agnes, wife of Sir Thomas St Quintin, c. 1420, in Harpham Church and the other upon that of Beatrice, wife of Sir John Routh, c. 1410, at Routh. As Agnes Routh shows a high waist line the date 1410 is probably early. (See Yorks. Arch. Journal, XII, 211 and 223.)

<sup>41</sup> Pins played an exceedingly important part in the dress of ladies in the middle ages. Illustrative is the record of a purchase made of Johan de Breconnier, epinglier de Paris, by the Duchess of Orléans at the turn of the century, c. 1400. Her order was for several thousand long and short pins, and five hundred "de la façon d'Angleterre." (E. D. Longman and S. Loch, Pins and Pincushions (1911), p. 16)

<sup>42</sup> Ashdown, op cit, opposite p. 190.

<sup>43</sup> Letter dated from the Museum 15 April, 1933. I wish here to thank Mr. Millar for his courtesy.

<sup>44</sup> EETS, OS, XXXIII, xiv (MS. Harley 1746).

<sup>45</sup> William H. Schofield, History of English Literature from the Norman Conquest to Chaucer, p. 464

<sup>46</sup> EETS, OS, XXXIII, 31.

quelles fourrent leurs dos & leurs talons autant penne comme drap,"<sup>47</sup> it is evident that the translator, following the custom so prevalent in the Middle Ages,<sup>48</sup> substituted details of dress of his own day, thus authenticating for us the long collar at a time when it might be new—note the poet said "so side now"—at the same time as some form of the horned hat. It should be observed, too, that the collar is worn by the same class as that to which our lass belongs, and further that, like hers, it was lined with fur.<sup>49</sup>

I have not myself been able to find any instance of a horned hat worn with the wimple, but Mr. Norris writes that such a combination was part of the head-dress of matrons of the middle class "during the greater part of the reign of Henry VI."<sup>50</sup> The form of hat to which he refers was one where the veil was draped over small cauls extending above the head to points, the veil itself being flat upon the top of the head and concealing by its white folds the high color common to the cauls. This hat Norris says arose in the reign of Henry V and it could certainly give rise to the expression "hornyd like a kowe." Of course our lass was not a matron, but the middle and lower classes still wore the wimple in the reign of Henry VI and our lass might well adopt the costume of a matron in an attempt to disguise her wiles, as the poet indicates, in decorousness. The famous reference to horned head-dress, then, seems to refer, in its context, to a period not earlier than the late years of the reign of Henry V; it may describe a combination of hat and collar to be found first in the reign of his successor, Henry VI.

Of more real value to us than tabard or collar or head-dress, however, is the gown which our poet puts upon contemporary man. In line 552 he makes that emissary of Satan, Tutivillus, addressing the assembled sinners, cry derisively: "Gay gyrdlys, iaggid hode, prankyd gownes, whedir?" And again, in lines 287–288, he makes him say, this time addressing the audience directly:

Yit a poynte of the new gett to tell will I not blyn,
Of prankyd gownes & shulders vp set, mos and flokkys<sup>51</sup> sewyd wyth in.

<sup>47</sup> Royal MS. 19 C VII, fol. 18v. For transcription I am indebted to Professor Brandin.

<sup>48</sup> See Harvey Eagleson, PMLA, XLVII, 339 ff.

<sup>49</sup> The use of expensive fur by the lower classes was legislated against, III Edward IV, (1463), (See Planché, History, p. 132). Note our lass uses "cat skin!" For long collars on peasants see Dorothy Hartley, Medieval Costume and Life, p. 112, plate F, (B.M.MS. Addl. 20698; c 1475) and Joseph Strutt, Complete View of the Dress and Habits of the People of England (1796–99), plate cxvii.

<sup>50</sup> Norris, op cit., II, 439–440. The hat is illustrated in plate 614A.

<sup>51</sup> A material consisting of coarse tufts and refuse of wool and cotton NED. Padding of clothing was legislated against in III Edward IV. (Planché, History, p. 132). See Edward Parsons, History of Leeds (London, 1834), II, 188; Geo. Clinch, The Antiquary's Book, English Costume, pp. 61–62; Victoria County History of Yorkshire, II, 411.

It will be noticed that in both quotations he calls the gown "prankyde," that is, "pleated." When the practice of pleating gowns first began in England I find it hard to determine; it may be that its inception is reflected by Occleve in his de Regimine Principum (1412) when he makes one of the characters say:

(I) not so wide gowne hute as is thyne,
 So small y-pynched, (pleated), so fresh and guy (Roxburghe Club edition, p. 14).

Here we seem to have the early gown undergoing pleating without losing its early flowing characteristics. However that may be, it is not without significance that both Occleve here and Chaucer in his description of the wimple worn by his Prioress, use the word "(y)-pynched" for "pleated," whereas our poet uses the word "prankyde," a word not known to the NED until its appearance in the Promptorium Parvulorum (1440) where we find: "Prankyde, as cloþys: plicatus-a-um."<sup>52</sup> The name, if not the thing, then, seems to belong definitely to the fifteenth century.

Even more clear as late is the description of the shoulders of the gown as "vp set, mos and flokkys sewyd wythin." Though a political satire called On The Times, written, apparently about 1388,<sup>53</sup> says of the then gown, "Brodder than ever God made humeris sunt arte tomentes" the satire goes on to add, "Wyde colers and hye, ei glallis sunt colla parata."<sup>54</sup> These last words can but describe the high-necked gown worn almost universally during the decade on either side of 1400, a gown, however, to which our poet could not possibly have referred as having "shulders vp sett," for its shoulders were exactly the opposite of that. They were very sloping, as sloping as possible. Upon such shoulders Tutivillus could not have gone on to assure us: "Bot on such pilus<sup>55</sup> I me set and clap thaym cheke and chyn, no nay" (290-291). He sat, rather, upon the shoulder of the gown as transformed by a later fad for padding as a result of which the shoulders became flat and the sleeves were raised where they were attached to the body of the garment. And, unless the authorities are in error, this fad arose so much later than the years we have been suggesting that it was truly, as the poet says, of the "new gett." For all the authorities I have been able to consult derive the fad from Burgundy "toward the middle of the fifteenth century."<sup>56</sup>

<sup>52</sup> EETS, ES, cii, 344. The date 1440 appears in the compiler's preface. Camden was in error, of course, when he translated Chaucer's "palyngge" in the Parson's Tale, as "pleated" (Remaines, 1614 ed., p. 233).

<sup>53</sup> Cf. John Edwin Wells, A Manual of the Writings etc., p. 238.

<sup>54</sup> Camden Society, xiv, 275 (Political Poems, edited by Thomas Wright.)

<sup>55</sup> Hair. Hair was used for padding garments.

<sup>56</sup> So Hottenroth, op. cit., German edition, II, 137, French edition II, 73; Norris, op. cit., II,

The pleated gown with shouldeis "vp set, moss and flokkys sewyd within," then, more than confirms the presumptive dating of the other references we have studied. Indeed, it seems to make a date earlier than 1430 seem very unlikely.

One more allusion and we are done. In this same play, in a passage dealing with the Seven Deadly Sins, our poet thus describes male Pride.

Thise laddys thai leuen/ as lordys rial, At ce to be even/ picturde in pall As kyngys, May he dug hym a doket, <sup>57</sup> A kodpese <sup>53</sup> like a pokett, hym thynke it no hoket his tayll <sup>59</sup> when he Wryngys his luddokkys <sup>60</sup> thai lowke/ like walk-mylne cloggys, <sup>61</sup>	his hede is like a stowke, hurlyd as hoggys, <sup>62</sup> A well blawen bowke, <sup>63</sup> / thuse fryggys as fioggys, <sup>64</sup> Thus Ielian Iowke, dryfys/ he no doggys To felter, Bot with youre yolow lokkys, <sup>65</sup> for all youre many morkys, ye shall clym on hell crokkys <sup>66</sup> With a halpeny heltere. (307-322)
---	--

This is the most diverting picture given us by our poet. It is capital caricature. And it is for our purposes so valuable that the dating of the plays might almost be left to it alone. Scantiness of attire characterized Chaucer's day as well as other periods in mediæval times, yet our Pride presents a very different appearance from his counterpart in the last quarter of the fourteenth century. In the first place, his hair is short—it stands up like a shock of wheat and is bristled as a hog's—whereas the dandy in Chaucer's time wore his hair long, his "lokkes crulle<sup>67</sup> as they were leyd in presse."<sup>68</sup> The fad for short hair began, we are told, late in

358 See Ashdown, op. cit., fig. 199 Viollet le Duc, Dictionnaire Raisonné du Mobilier Français (Paris, 1873), III, fig. 29 See Dorothy Hartley, op. cit., p. 134, for peasants with pleated gowns and broad shoulders, temple Edward IV, in whose reign the fad seems to have reached its height (MS Harley, 4379)

<sup>67</sup> Meaning uncertain.

<sup>58</sup> The first instance in NED.

<sup>59</sup> "Tayle, or tayne of a cloth sciama-tis" (Prompt. Parv., p. 488) "hoket" means "obstacle"

<sup>60</sup> Buttocks

<sup>61</sup> Fulling mill lumps

<sup>62</sup> Like a shock of wheat, bristled as hogs On "stowke" see Edward Peacock, Myrc's Duties of a Parish Priest, EETS, OS, LXXI, 79.

<sup>63</sup> Well blown belly.

<sup>64</sup> Pollard glosses "animals? beings?" as flogs (EETS, ES, LXXI, glossary.) It is interesting to compare with the picture of Pride and the details regarding the padded shoulders the following passage from a satire on priests written "not later than 1467":

Make shorter your taylis and broader your crowns,
Leve your stuffed dowblettes and your playtid gowns.

(Percy Society, xxvii, 57)

<sup>65</sup> This word fits the picture beautifully as it is defined in the Prompt. Parv., 1440, "loke of hey or oder lyke" (op. cit., p. 268).

<sup>66</sup> Hooks.

<sup>67</sup> Curly.

<sup>68</sup> Prologue, l. 81. Chaucer is describing the Squire.

the reign of Henry IV,<sup>69</sup> and persisted until the days of Edward IV;<sup>70</sup> indeed, brasses in Yorkshire show the cropped tonsure as late as 1494.<sup>71</sup> Where in this long history of the close-cut hair our Pride belongs must be determined by reference to other details of the picture, though Mr. Kendrick, in the letter to which I have previously referred, says: "The hair 'bristled as a hog's' would be most appropriate when the hair was shortest, . . . That was about 1430-40."

In the second place, the codpiece is a distinguishing mark in Pride's attire. When this strange piece of costume came to England I have been unable to determine. Most authorities date its inception anywhere after about the middle of the fifteenth century.<sup>72</sup> Mr. Francis M. Kelly, however, cites an example from a Vatican copy of the Romance of the Rose, which he dates 1371,<sup>73</sup> and Mr. T. G. Mann, late of the Wallace Collection, refers to one in Foxton's Cosmography, 1408.<sup>74</sup> The name "cod-piece," however, does not appear, according to our present knowledge, before its appearance in our play<sup>75</sup> and the advent into England of the thing itself must have been later than Chaucer's Parson's Tale, or he would not have given to that worthy the following words: "Allas! somme of hem shewen the boce of hir shape and the horrible swollen membres, that semeth lik the maladie of hirnias, in the wrappying of hir hoses."<sup>76</sup> The codpiece displaced this mode entirely.

There remains the distended belly which makes the man remind our poet of a frog. Here at last is a detail about which I can find no disagreement. The information is put succinctly by Marjorie and C. H. B. Quennell in their History of Every Day Things in England: "Men at this

<sup>69</sup> Cf. Planché, Dictionary, p. 242; Ashdown, op. cit., p. 140, and Norris, op. cit., II, 432. A very early dated case of the short hair is in the cut of Occleve presenting his poems to Prince Hal, 1412 (reproduced in colors by Henry Shaw, Dresses and Decorations of the Middle Ages, II (unpaginated), and in Chamber's Encyclopedia of English Literature, I, 78.)

<sup>70</sup> "No self respecting man, except those of the lower and peasant class, wore long hair until the reign of Edward IV." See Norris, op. cit., II, 433.

<sup>71</sup> The brass of Brian Rouclyff in Conisborough Church, West Riding. (Yorks. Arch. Journal, xv, facing p. 10). Cf. "Figure of a knight," c.1480, in Howden Church (ibid., XI, 170) and man in armour, Helmsley Church, West Riding, c.1460-1465 (ibid., xv, 282).

<sup>72</sup> So NED, giving thus the consensus of opinion.

<sup>73</sup> In Dorothy Hartley, op. cit., p. 36 and n. 1.

<sup>74</sup> Data given by Mr. Eric G. Millar in the letter already referred to, 15 April, 1933. Mr. Mann also refers to Victor Gay, says Mr. Millar, who, in his Glossaire Archeologique du Moyen Age et de la Renaissance, illustrated the cod-piece from Bon Berger, 1379. The name used, is "brayette." The Foxton reference is to MS. R. 15. 21, Trinity Coll., Cam.

<sup>75</sup> It is worth noting that, though the Prompt. Parv. gives "codde, of a mannys priuete," (p. 89), it does not give "codde piece." This is as late as 1440.

<sup>76</sup> Parson's Tale, ll. 421 ff Chaucer, like our poet, is discussing the Seven Deadly Sins. Italics mine.

time (middle of the fifteenth century), exaggerated their figures as much as their clothes and many not only tightened their waists but they wore their tunics stiffened out in globular shape over the chest."<sup>77</sup> The fad followed in the wake of padding and, in conjunction with a marked return of the very abbreviated dress—a return which Norris dates in the very middle of the century<sup>78</sup>—seems to have been introduced latest of all the fashions we have studied. Truly our male Pride, with his short hair, his codpiece, and his padded-out torso, was dressed cap à pie in the very latest of fashions at the time our poet wrote. And that time seems actually to have been as late as 1440.

Thus we reach the end of our review of the allusions to costume in the work of the Wakefield Master. I must grant at once that I have neglected many allusions which would be proper were our poet writing in the reign of Richard II or Henry IV. Had there been time to give and study these I suspect that many would now find themselves in some confusion. One immediate explanation of such seeming conflict offers, of course, in the suggestion that passages containing the late references have been "brought down to date" in accord with the mediæval practice which we ourselves illustrated in the case of the Middle English version of Geoffrey de La Tour-Landry. In reply to this possibility may I say that there is absolutely no evidence of such process in the extant manuscript. The style is such as to preclude imitation by any other man, and no one, I believe, has ever questioned the authenticity of the passages in which the late references occur.<sup>79</sup> Thus, if the passages are the result of any "bringing up to date" the revisions must have been made by the poet himself.<sup>80</sup> Such an interpretation would, no doubt, shift some the precise time of his flourishing, but would not affect materially the dates we have been considering.

Revision, however, is not necessary to interpret the facts, as another and sufficient explanation offers. It will be easily seen that our poet has his eyes, usually, upon the people of his day as they come and go in Wakefield and the West Riding of Yorkshire, where metropolitan fashions would be slow in rising and where, as in country districts always,

<sup>77</sup> Page 151. For pictorial examples see Planché, Dict., p. 311, and Ashdown, op. cit., p. 180.

<sup>78</sup> Op. cit., II, 357–358.

<sup>79</sup> The passages are not affected by Mr. Frank Cady's theory of an editor in couplets and quatrains. JEGP, x, 572 and xi, 244.)

<sup>80</sup> There is some bibliographical evidence favoring an authorial addition of the passage about the Sins. Stanzas 40–46 inclusive could be omitted entirely and they begin almost as if in response to popular demand:

yit of the synnes seuen som thyng special now nately to neven that renys ouer all. (305–306)

fashions would persist long.<sup>81</sup> We should not be surprised, then, to find the horned hat a "new fon syn" a matter of years after its advent in London or even York, and the same thing would be true of all the other allusions to early forms of dress. But when Tutivillus tells us about the gown with its shoulders "vp sett" and of the man with short hair, a codpiece and a well-blown belly, he is talking of the Seven Deadly Sins, as I have said, and the poet has his eyes upon centers of fashion, more particularly, I suppose, upon York, commonly called the "second capital of England" and the center of the cloth industry of the island. Here new styles would appear quickly and thus a very natural explanation offers of the time spread in the costume allusions of our plays.

By either interpretation, the costume allusions with unexpected definiteness, indicate that our poet was not writing before the second quarter of the fifteenth century instead of during the first decade of that century or earlier, thus restoring the long-neglected date proposed by Douce.<sup>82</sup> Yet our knowledge of mediæval costume is such that I should be the last to rest the date of ours or any manuscript upon costume references alone. Of vital moment, then, is a consideration of such other evidence of date as we can recover from the sparse records which the lapse of time has vouchsafed to us.

Before we present this evidence it will be well for us to remind ourselves that, except for a "tradition" favoring "Widkirk" as the place for the plays—a tradition to which I suppose no one now subscribes—all the evidence we have supports the conviction that the plays of the Towneley manuscript were presented by guilds in Wakefield.<sup>83</sup> In the first place, (a) the dialect is that of the West Riding of Yorkshire,<sup>84</sup> and there is reference in the plays (b) not only to Horbury, a village some three miles southwest of Wakefield,<sup>85</sup> but also to (c) "Watling strete," the name by which a Roman road passing about five miles east of town was known as late as the time of Henry VIII.<sup>86</sup> In the second place, there are references in the plays and the manuscript which indicate not <sup>81</sup> Pollard, looking upon the advent of the horned headdress as dating 1388, advances the date of the poet to the "early years of the fifteenth century" (op. cit., xxvii). I am asking a slightly greater lateness in Yorkshire practice after 1420.

<sup>82</sup> See page 631 and note 2 above.

<sup>83</sup> Cf. Surtees Society, III, viii-x; Matthew Peacock, Anglia, neue folge XII, 516-519 (repeated in Yorks. Arch. Journal, xv, 94 ff. and LTLS, March 5, 1925); W. W. Skeat, Athenæum, Dec. 2, 1892. Woodkirk was about four miles north of Wakefield; all the allusions in the plays are to places south or east of the town, unless to the town itself.

<sup>84</sup> Cf. Surt. Soc., III, xi-xii.

<sup>85</sup> Play XIII, l. 455.

<sup>86</sup> Play XXX, l. 126. Leland describes the Road in detail. Cf. Yorks. Arch. and Top. Journal, x, 243.

only the vicinity of Wakefield as the place of production but the town itself. Thus (a) Cain, in the Mactacio Abel (Play II), says, "bery (bury) me in gudeboure, at the quarell hede." (367) This is an almost certain reference to Goodybower Close near the Green in Wakefield and to the "quarell," Yorkshire for "quarry," which was located near it.<sup>87</sup> Again, (b) in the Processus Talentorum (Play XXIV), the dialogue refers four times to "this towne," the speaker in every case addressing the audience directly in monologue.<sup>88</sup> To interpret these words as alluding to Jerusalem, the place of the dramatic action, would be to do utmost violence to mediæval dramatic practice. That the poet committed no such violation is clear in all the passages for which let the last stand as evidence. In it the Third Torturer says:

I am the most shiew in all myn kyn,
That is from this towne vnto lyn. (154-155)

Lynn was the great eastern seaport on the Ouse and came naturally to the poet as a measure of distance. No one in the audience could possibly have understood him to mean "from Jerusalem unto Lynn." Again, (c) —and this is evidence which has not, to my knowledge, been indicated before—in the Prima Pastorum (Play XII), the Second Shepherd says, on the approach of the Third Shepherd:

here comys slaw-pase (Slow-pace) ffro the mylñ whele (125-126).

We seem here to have reference to the soke mill of the Manor, located "just above the bridge" over the Calder, the mill where all the grain of "Wakefield, Sandal and the Tp. of Bosett" must be ground.<sup>89</sup> Finally, (d) the scribe himself assigned Play I and Play III to Wakefield in his captions to those plays.

We know further that by the middle of the fifteenth century some one in Wakefield had gained sufficient reputation, presumably as an actor, to be employed by the great city of York. The entry in the York Memorandum Book reads as follows: "(1446) j ludento de Wakefeld vjd."<sup>90</sup> Finally, the Burgess rolls for the years 1554 and 1556 give indubitable evidence that, in the sixteenth century at least, plays were being given in Wakefield under the sponsorship of the guilds of the "Merry" town.<sup>91</sup>

<sup>87</sup> Cf. Peacock, Anglia, n. f. XII, 517.

<sup>88</sup> Cf. ll. 75, 76; 110; 154-155.

<sup>89</sup> Alfred S. Ellis, Yorks, Arch. and Tp. Journal, VIII, 493, n. 6.

<sup>90</sup> Quoted from Lucy Toulmin Smith, York Mystery Plays, xxxviii.

<sup>91</sup> This evidence, first given by Mr. Peacock with errors in dating and transcription (Yorks, Arch. Journal, xv and LTLS, June 7, 1928), and later given by Mr. J. W. Walker, who discovered it, I shall give in toto because of its very great interest and of the fact that

The sponsorship of plays by guilds, thus made certain in the middle of the sixteenth century, seems likewise to have been true at Wakefield at the time when our plays were set down in the Towneley manuscript. At least Mr. W. W. Greg, after a careful weighing of the evidence available to him, wrote: "I think the proper inference is that the manuscript, like the York plays, is a 'register' made from originals in the hands of the different guilds."<sup>92</sup> That it is a "register" and not the work of a redactor working in couplets, quatrains or what not, is clear, not only from the evidence studied by Mr. Greg, but from other evidence not available it is at present so comparatively inaccessible. I quote it from the Yorkshire Archeological Society, Record Series, LXXIV, pp. 20-22.

---

PAYNES LAYD BY THE BURGESS QWEST AS FOLLOYT, IN ANNO 1554

1. Itm a payn̄ is layd yt gyles Dolleffe shall brenge In or Causse to be broght ye regenall (original) of Corpus Xti play before ys & wytsonday In pane . . .

2. Itm a payn̄ ys layde yt ye mesters of ye Corpus Xti playe shall Come & mayke thayre a Count (account) before ye gentyllmen & burgessus of ye toun before this & may day next. In payn of everye oñ not so doynge 20s.

PAYNES LAYDE BY THE BURGESS ENQUESTE AT THE COURTE KEPTE AT WAKEFELDE NEATE

AFTER THE FEASTE OF SAYNTE MICHAELL THARCHAUNGELL IN THIRDE AND FOUTHE

YEARE OF THE REIGNES OF OUR SOVERAIGNE LORDE AND LADYE KINGE

PHILYPPE AND QUENE MARYE, 1556

1. Itm a payne is sett that everye crafte and occupacion doo bringe furthe theire pagy aunts of Corpus Christi daye as hathe bene heretofore used and to gyve furthe the speches of the same in after hollydayes in payne of everye one not so doynge to forfeit xls.

2. Itm a payne is sett that everye player be redy in his pagaunt at settled tyme before 5 of ye clocke in ye mornynge in payne of every one not so doynge to forfeit vjs viiid.

3. Itm a payne is sett yt ye players playe where settled and no where els in payne of no so doynge to forfeit xxs.

4. Itm a payne is sett yt no man goe armed to disturb ye playe or hinder ye proccession in payne of everye one so doynge vjs viiid.

5. Itm a payne is sett yt everye man shall leave hys weapons att hys home or at hys ynne in payne not so doynge vjs viiid.

6. Ye summe of ye expens of ye Cherche mester for ye Corpus Christi playe xvijs. xd

a. Item payd to ye preste xijd.

b. Item payd to ye mynstrells xxd.

c. Item payd to ye mynstrells of Corpus Christi playe iiis. ivd.

d. Item payde for ye Corpus Christi playe & wrytyng of ye spechys for yt iijs. viiid.

e. Item payd for ye Baner for ye mynstrells vjs. viiid.

f. Item payd for ye ryngyng ye same day vjd.

g. Item payd for garlonds on Corpus Christi day xijd.

<sup>92</sup> The Library, 3d ser., v, 293. Mr. E. K. Chambers also considers the manuscript a register (Mediaeval Stage, II, 143). The position of Charles Davidson that the present form of the plays shows the hand of a compiler (Studies in the English Mystery Plays, 129-130) and that of F. W. Cady that it shows the hands of two redactors, one working in couplets and the other in quatrains (JEGP x, 572 ff.), have already been replied to by Miss Grace Frank (Mod. Phil., xv, 181 ff.) The present study but renders doubly certain the position of those who see in the plays a register.

to him. I refer to evidence in the manuscript itself. No one, I am sure, can work long from the manuscript without feeling that the scribe, at least while transcribing the early plays, was following independent source manuscripts with great fidelity. There is concrete evidence of this, I think, in the error he made while transcribing the Noah cum Filiis. In transcribing that play he wrote on folio C I<sup>r</sup> the text belonging on folio C I<sup>v</sup>, placing on the latter the omitted text with rubrics calling attention to his error. As both these pages now begin with the words "Bot now syn" the mistake could most easily have been made had the corresponding pages of his source also begun with these words. Such explanation, however, would indicate a fidelity to source so great as to affect even the number of lines with which he ruled his page, and the assumption of such fidelity to source best explains other peculiarities in the MS.

For example, in the first thirteen plays he used an exceedingly varied space for the insertion of his initial capitals and those capitals themselves vary exceedingly in size and form. Those to plays I and II, for example, are small and radically unlike any others in the manuscript; that to Play VIII, a play derived from York, is tall and also unique; those to the two Shepherd plays, Plays XII and XIII, again differ from all others, though they are themselves of the same character. Furthermore, the initial letters of the first thirteen plays vary from 1½ inches to over 4 inches in height and none of them more than faintly presages the form of capital the scribe suddenly assumes with Play XIV and continues to use, with very slight modification, throughout the rest of the plays. If these variations, as we have seen reason to believe, are due to scribal fidelity in transcription, the conclusion is inevitable that he was working from separate manuscripts done by different scribes, a conclusion supported further by the fact which we have already pointed out—the fact that though the capitals of the Shepherd plays differ from all others, they are themselves of the same character.

Further evidence tending to show that the manuscript is a register lies in the variation in the writing of the stage directions which are sometimes written in the margin and sometimes within the text. This variation in practice might not be considered significant, but for the fact that in four of the plays where they are in red and within the text<sup>93</sup> space for them had to be left as the scribe wrote the body of the play. In such cases scribal whim offers a not too convincing explanation.

Moreover, as the last comment implies, though most of the stage directions are in black ink and thus presumably written at the time of transcribing the text, others—eighteen, to be exact—are in red ink, done thus presumably as the scribe rubricated his text. This variation might also be ascribed to whom were it not for the fact that, except for one direction in the margin of Play xxvii—a direction which may well have been added during proof-reading of the transcription—and the directions in the very composite Play xii, all stage directions in red, marginal or otherwise, are in plays derived from York.

<sup>93</sup> Plays VIII, XVIII, XX, and XXVI. Of these the first two and the last are derived from York. There may be significance in the fact that, according to Miss Smith, original stage directions in the manuscript of the York "register" are in red (York Mystery Plays, xvii).

Additional evidence that the manuscript is a register lies in the fact that, although couplets in all but two of the plays, whether original or editorial, are, with negligible exceptions,<sup>94</sup> written in single lines unless there is change of speaker after the first rhyme, in those two plays they are not so written. In Play x the scribe writes all the couplets in two lines each and all but the first three and the last—all on folio 28b, to be exact—in two columns, a format found nowhere else in the manuscript. And in Play xxxi, after writing the first thirty-one couplets in two lines each, presumably thus following his source, he reverted to his usual one line practice as he began writing on folio 130a. If this variation in writing seems to offer doubtful evidence its force is at once strengthened when we recall that this play, Locusus, should follow Play xix, the Johannes Baptista, and not Play xxx, the Judicium, as in the manuscript. Apparently the scribe could not lay hands upon it at the proper time for its correct placing in the manuscript. Finally we have the error in the naming of Play xxviii. Although the scribe had called Play xxvi Resurreccio Domini, he repeated that title for Play xxviii and failed to correct the ascription. This again is not necessarily significant; scribes have done stranger things. But the manuscript, despite its evidence of carelessness at times, shows clearly that the scribe proof-read his text to source at the time of its rubrication. Many times he cancels an error in red,<sup>95</sup> and he also enters in red occasional omissions.<sup>96</sup> Other evidence could be given. Had he not been working from a source manuscript reading Resurreccio Domini, therefore, he would probably have caught the error even though he made it in rubricating the text.<sup>97</sup> The words are now

<sup>94</sup> The exceptions are confined to Play i where six couplets not involving change of speaker are each written in two lines and Play ii where the couplets are written indifferently in one line with internal rhyme or in two lines ligatured. An apparent exception in Play xx and another in Play xxxii are easily explicable in rather clear scribal error in transcription.

<sup>95</sup> So on folios 14b, 22a, 29a, 45b, 54a, 65b, 78a, etc.

<sup>96</sup> So on folio 22a he adds "Moyses, Moyses", on folio 70a he adds "Petrus"; etc.

<sup>97</sup> The scribe seems to have made an error also in the heading of Play iii, where a whole line, done in red, has been erased and a black line drawn through the space. There is no way of telling whether he made the erasure or not. It is so complete that nothing can be rescued, even with the violet ray. The loss may be great, as Play iii is assigned by the scribe to Wakefield. The erasure is on folio 7a.

crossed out in black ink and the words Thomas of India, indicating more exactly the part of the Resurrection treated by the play, have been added in the same ink and in a different hand.

That our manuscript is a register of plays derived from independent manuscripts seems, then, worthy of faith. That these independent manuscripts were the property of various guilds seems also very hard to deny. At least our copy of several of the plays shows them assigned to various guilds by annotation. Thus, near the title to Play I, some reader has written the word "Barkers," that is, Tanners, and this in a hand which Captain Haselden says may be essentially co. temporary with the manuscript itself. In like manner, near the title to Play II another early reader has written "Glover pag . . .," the completion of the word having been clipped away by the binder. Near the title of Play VIII, in like manner, are the words "listers Pagona" and part way down the page, in another hand, the words "lyster play," that is, dyer's play. As this play is almost verbatim like the York Play III it is worth noting that the latter play is assigned to the "Hoscers," that is, the hosiery. Thus the annotators did not have in mind the play as given in York. Again, under the title to Play XXVII we find the words "tysher Pagent," and finally, about midway down the margin of the first page of Play XXXII—the play added early in the sixteenth century, according to scholars—we find again the words "Lysters Pag . . .," under which is further text now illegible. Apparently, by the time this play was entered, the Dyers had ceased to sponsor Play VIII.<sup>98</sup>

The implication of all this cannot be gainsaid; the plays concerned were recognized by readers as belonging to certain guilds. And if this be true of the few plays, it was almost certainly true of them all. Our manuscript would seem to be, then, as Mr. Greg suggests, a register of guild plays. Inasmuch as we know that Wakefield later supported a guild cycle and that our plays were certainly some of them, and probably all of them, guild plays—and inasmuch as some of our plays are assigned by the scribe to Wakefield and others contain local allusions bearing out the same ascription—the conclusion seems as certain as any conclusion based in part upon circumstantial evidence can be, that the Towneley manuscript contains a cycle of plays produced by guilds in Wakefield.

Not only that, but, as Mr. Pollard says, the plays assigned by the scribe to Wakefield and those assigned by various readers to guilds as producers, cannot "furnish in any way a group by themselves,"<sup>99</sup> and, of the two plays assigned by the scribe to Wakefield, the first, the Creation Play, belongs to what Mr. Pollard calls the "first stage" in the growth of the cycle, and the second, the Noah cum Filiis, belongs by common consent to the late work of the Wakefield Master. The conclusion is inevitable, I think, that the cycle as we now have it—except for minor editing, if any—<sup>100</sup>must have been in much its present form when the Master completed his work upon its plays. We are entirely justified in asking the question, therefore: When was Wakefield and its vicinity able to sponsor our elaborate cycle of mystery plays?

<sup>98</sup> The presence of this last entry was not noted by Professor Louis Wann in his study of the manuscript in PMLA, XLIII, 145.

<sup>99</sup> EETS, ES, LXXI, xxviii.

In seeking an answer to this question let us ask it first of the earlier years proposed by Professor Gayley, the years centering about the Wat Tyler Rebellion, 1381. Fortunately our answer for these years can be very concrete. It is customary to say about the Towneley Cycle that "it contains thirty-two plays"; it would be more accurate were we to say that "the Towneley manuscript at present contains thirty-two plays, some of them incomplete." For the manuscript as we have it lacks all of Sig. A,<sup>101</sup> the four middle leaves of Sig. B, the two middle leaves of Sig. D and Sig. K, all of Sig. S except the first leaf, and all of Sig. T except the last three leaves. In other words, the original manuscript of 160 leaves has lost 28 of those leaves so that it now contains but 132. If from the missing 28 we subtract all of Sig. A as containing probably no plays, there remain 20 undoubtedly containing text. The present manuscript, if we omit Play XII as repeated in Play XIII, contains 11,680 lines. If we add to these the probable number of lost lines, taking the present average per page as a basis of computation, we shall find that the original cycle probably extended to about 13,476 lines. The extant York Cycle of 48 plays contains but 13,211 lines. True, three plays are missing from the York manuscript, but the lines thus lost are offset by the fact that Miss Smith, whose line numberings I have used, prints as two lines all long twelve- and sixteen-syllable lines, thus almost doubling the number of lines in one-fourth of the plays.<sup>102</sup> Thus the York Cycle, commonly called our longest, may well have been really shorter than the Towneley Cycle.

Not only was the Towneley Cycle thus long, but the existing plays alone, again omitting the doubling involved in the two Shepherd plays, involve the casting of no less than 224 rôles.<sup>103</sup> Of course many of these are simple, and the conditions of presentation may have permitted one actor to share in more than one rôle.<sup>104</sup> Yet, however we may reconstruct the conditions, the number of skilled actors required, even by mediæval village standards, must have been considerable if the plays were given with any adequacy. And the nature of the dramatic action, particularly in the Master's work, suggests strikingly such adequacy.

<sup>100</sup> Cf. Frank Cady, JEGP, x, 572 ff. and Grace Frank, Mod. Phil., for January, 1918.

<sup>101</sup> Though the Surtees Society editor postulated the loss of four leaves after Play I (page 7), the Early English Text Society editor postulated the loss of twelve (page vii, n. 1) and this error persists even in the work of Professor Wann (PMLA, XLIII, 139). My attention was called to the actual nature of the loss by Captain Haselden.

<sup>102</sup> Op. cit., p. 8, n. 1 and p. 68, n. 1.

Could Wakefield in the neighborhood of 1381 sponsor so long a cycle involving so many character rôles? We may find the answer to this question, I think, in the poll-tax records of 1379, records which, fortunately for us, have survived the ravages of time.<sup>105</sup> Turning to them I think we must be astonished to find that the village had a tax-paying population of only 201 men and women over the age of sixteen. As 114 of these were married the total adult population of the place was 315. Beverley, with its cycle of similar length and its 38 crafts listed as sponsoring plays in 1390,<sup>106</sup> shows in the capitation tax of 1377 a population of 2663 over the age of fourteen,<sup>107</sup> and Newcastle-on-Tyne, with a cycle which Professor Holthausen numbers as possibly twenty-three plays in the fifteenth century,<sup>108</sup> shows in the same tax a population of 2647.<sup>109</sup> Coventry, famous for its cycle of ten plays,<sup>110</sup> at the same time had a population of upwards of 7000.<sup>111</sup> These figures do not make it seem

<sup>103</sup> The average number of actors is seven. In the York cycle the average is 7.7. Nine of the Towneley plays call for ten or more actors with speaking parts and Play xx, the Conspiracio, calls for fifteen.

<sup>104</sup> At York a law against doubling by an actor seems to have been passed in 1476 (Smith, op. cit., xxxvii). In Coventry in 1443 members of certain crafts were forbidden to play in any pageant except their own without the consent of the Mayor (Chambers, Mediæval Stage, II, 360).

<sup>105</sup> The tax record for Wakefield is printed in Yorks. Arch. and Tp. Journal, VI, pp. 150-152. Further reference to the record will not be given. Mr. J. W. Walker, in Chapter VI of his forthcoming History of Wakefield (Wakefield—The West Yorkshire Printing Co. Limited), says, "Wakefield had a population of 567 souls." In reaching this total, however, he "included the whole of the old parish of Wakefield and of Sandal, including Walton," he writes me. He adds further "I quite agree with you that of Wakefield town the population is not 567 but 315." (Letter dated Feb. 5, 1934.)

<sup>106</sup> Cf. Chambers, op. cit., II, 340-341. The assumption which he and others seem to make that the number of plays corresponded with the number of guilds listed has no proof, so far as I know. See Selden Society, XIV, 33-34.

<sup>107</sup> On the smaller returns in 1379 see Eleanor Lloyd, Yorks. Arch. Journal, XX, 319. See also Arthur Leach, Beverley Town Documents, Seld. Soc., XIV, xviii.

<sup>108</sup> Quoted from Chambers, op. cit., II, 424.

<sup>109</sup> Archæologia, VII, 340; quoted from George Poulson, Beverlac (London, 1829), 2 vols. in 1, p. 135 and n. 2.

<sup>110</sup> Cf. Hardin Craig, EETS, ES, LXXXVII, xiii.

<sup>111</sup> L. F. Salzman, English Life in the Middle Ages, p. 78. J. W. Ashley, Introduction to English Economic History (1893), II, 11, gives the figure as 9000.

likely that Wakefield, with its meagre population of 315 souls, could have supported our cycle of over thirty-two plays.

Let us grant, however, that the whole population was "drama-minded," we must also grant that more than enthusiasm would be required for the presentation of our plays. For we cannot overlook the matter of expense. The York Memorandum Book,<sup>112</sup> and the Coventry Lcet Book,<sup>113</sup> fairly bristle with petitions for relief from the expense involved in maintaining plays, and it is a matter of common knowledge that more than one craft frequently combined in the giving of single plays because of the expense. What the actual cost of producing a play was varied greatly, of course, with conditions. Entries for the payment of actors are common. Music was usually provided. Refreshments were commonly served to players and minstrels. At Coventry, for example, the Smiths, in 1490, paid ij s. ij d. for "brede, ale" and other refreshments at the first rehearsal of their play and ij s. iiij d. at the second.<sup>114</sup> They also had expense for new costumes and for music, so that the total cost of their play, as added up by Professor Chambers, was 3l 7 s. 5½ d.<sup>115</sup> The wealthy Mercers at York, on February 27, 1154, entered into an agreement for the production of their "Domysday" at an annual fee of 10l.<sup>116</sup> On the other hand, many plays cost much less. Thus at York, in 1422, we find the Millers paying x s. and the Hayresters v s., by agreement, to the Saucemakers and Tilemakers towards their play, and ten years later the Saucemakers withdrew from active production for a fee of vs.<sup>117</sup> It is just possible, therefore, that the cost of the play did not much exceed xx s. The same may be said of the Crucifixion Play, for, in the same year, 1422, the Painters and Stainers agreed to pay v s. each to the Pinner and Latoners as their share in the play.<sup>118</sup> It is hardly likely that the average for a cycle would be thus low, but even if that were possible the Towneley Cycle would have cost some 35l each year.<sup>119</sup> Were the citizens sufficiently prosperous to meet such expense?

Again the poll-tax records supply an answer. Turning to them we find but 51 of the 201 taxpayers assessed more than the minimum tax of iiij d. exacted of all "not notorious mendicants"<sup>120</sup> and of these only six paid over xij d. The highest tax paid was xl d. paid by a franklyn and two merchants. This was the usual tax for franklyns and shows the merchants to have been prospering. On the other hand the hostclers—of whom, by the way, there were but four—<sup>121</sup> instead of the usual ij s.

<sup>112</sup> Edited by Maude Sellars, Surtees Soc., cxx and cxxv.

<sup>113</sup> Data conveniently summarized by Hardin Craig, op. cit., App. II. <sup>114</sup> Idem, p. 33.

<sup>115</sup> Op. cit., II, 359.

<sup>116</sup> Surtees Soc., cxxix, 58-59.

<sup>117</sup> Idem, cxxv, xlvii-xlviii and 171-173.

<sup>118</sup> Idem, cxxv, xlvii and 102-104.

<sup>119</sup> On original number of plays see three paragraphs below.

<sup>120</sup> Yorks Arch. and Tp. Journal VII, 187.

paid, three of them but xij d. and the fourth but vj d. Robertus friston, farmer de pa:sonage, instead of the usual ij s. paid but xij d.<sup>122</sup> The total tax of the village was but ivl xv s. viiij d., less than the probable cost of outfitting a single play such as the Towneley Noah cum Filiis. At least at Hull, the "New shype," built in 1421, for the Noah play there, cost vj viij s.<sup>123</sup> The possibility that a community so poor as these tax returns indicate could finance our cycle seems to me negligible.

Nor is the picture much improved if we assume that the whole countryside helped; for, even when we enlarge our horizon to include the whole wapentake of Aggebrigg<sup>124</sup> with its 37 vills or parishes aside from Wakefield, we find that but 26 in these vills all told paid over the minimum tax for trades and professions. Thus the whole wapentake, including Wakefield, shows but forty-six tax-payers assessed over vj d. Certainly this does not suggest a prosperous community. Even with the aid of the three farmers and the five franklyns in the wapentake, the district could hardly have financed year by year an all-day drama such as ours, and this is true whether we look upon the plays as sponsored by the community or by guilds.

That they were sponsored by guilds at the time of the writing of our manuscript we have seen abundant reason to believe. If so sponsored, however, they would make additional demands upon the producers. Obviously there must be a sufficient number of trades and crafts to sponsor them. We have said that the present manuscript contains parts or all of thirty-two plays. The losses in the early signatures<sup>125</sup> do not involve losses of whole plays, but the losses in Signatures S and T certainly do. For at present we jump directly from the Ascencio to the Judicium, whereas between these two plays the Ludus Coventriae has two plays, the Chester Cycle three, and the York Cycle four. Professor Chambers thinks that "probably two plays, at least, are lost"<sup>126</sup> and Mr. Peacock thinks that four are missing.<sup>127</sup> As the present average of leaves per play is about four we may feel confident, I think, that the twelve lost leaves contained at least three plays. This would give us a cycle of approximately thirty-five plays. Remembering that two and three and sometimes more crafts were wont to share the cost of single plays, if we advocate the giving of our cycle by the Guilds of Wakefield in 1379, we must certainly agree with Miss Maude Sellers, editor of the York Memo-

---

Journal, xv, 101) Note the allusions to inns in the Burgess records of Wakefield which we quoted, note 91 above.

<sup>122</sup> For a digest of the tax returns see George T. Clark, "The West Riding Poll Tax and Lay Subsidy Rolls, 2nd. Richard II," Yorks. Arch. and Tp. Journal, vii, 187-193.

<sup>123</sup> Chambers, op. cit., II, 371.

<sup>124</sup> The "ridings" were divided into "wapentakes" in Yorkshire

<sup>125</sup> Mr. Peacock thinks the entry given in note 91, sub-head 12 above, shows that Banns were to be rewritten. Possibly the lost Sig. A contained such Banns. (LTLS, June 7, 1928).

randum Book and of the Victoria County History of Yorkshire, when she says: "There seem to be good grounds for thinking that the Towneley Mystery plays were acted at Wakefield; if so, the guilds there must have been both numerous and influential."<sup>128</sup>

From what we have just learned of Wakefield I am sure no reader expects to find such to have been actually the case there at the time we are considering. What we do find is a list of forty-nine tradesmen and artisans representing but fifteen trades and occupations.<sup>129</sup> Even if we included the whole wapentake of Aggebrigg we should find but 167 artisans and tradesmen to care for the 224 and more rôles in the plays and a total of but twenty-four trades and occupations to sponsor the approximately thirty-five plays.<sup>130</sup> Moreover, of these twenty-four there were only six followed by more than ten persons.<sup>131</sup> Such a group might sponsor in a small way a small cycle but never could have handled ours as we have it. Thus Professor Gayley's suggestion that the Secunda Pastorum might have been written "in the decade before or after Wat Tyler's Rebellion" must certainly be given up.

The question now becomes, How soon after 1379 had Wakefield grown sufficiently to be able to sponsor the plays? Unfortunately historical evidence whereby we may presume to continue to trace intimately the growth of the town for the next century or more is lacking. We do know, however, that Mr. Edward Parsons was able to say of it that in 1553 it was "unquestionably the largest, the most populous and the most flourishing town in the district."<sup>132</sup> This knowledge does not help us much, of course, yet I feel confident that the growth after 1379 was not so immediate nor so fast as to make it possible for the town to support our cycle by the time of Præmunire, 1393, the later date suggested by Professor Gayley. Sufficient evidence to prove this can be gleaned, I think, from a comparison of the poll-tax records of 1379 with the second aulneger's account for Wakefield, 1395-96,<sup>133</sup> particularly so as the tai-<sup>129</sup> I have included two men bearing craft names because they paid the usual trade tax; I have also considered as two the crafts whose names might be but chance variants. Thus the numbers I have used represent the maximum possible.

<sup>128</sup> Vict. Hist. Co. Yks, III, 445.

<sup>130</sup> The indications of crafts upon the manuscript is, of course, much later than 1379, yet it is interesting to note that the tax rolls show but three Barkers (Play I), one Glover (Play II), and no Listers (Play VIII), or Fishers (Play XXVII) in the whole wapentake. The words Lister and Fisher appear once each as surnames but with a tax of but iiij d. each, the tax taken from those not in trades or occupations.

<sup>131</sup> These six were the tailors, smiths, spicers, suters (bootmakers), websters, and wrights.

<sup>132</sup> History of Leeds, I, 303.

<sup>133</sup> The first and third accounts do not segregate the returns from Wakefield, but the third shows three names missing from those assigned to Wakefield in the second. See Exch. K. R. Accts., bundle no. 345, 1st account no. 15; 2nd., no. 17; 3d., no. 18; reprinted in Yorks. Arch. Soc., Record Series, LXIV, 39 ff., 95 ff., and 98 ff.

lors alone outnumbered the weavers in the tax returns of 1379 and as twenty-four of the forty-nine artisans and tradesmen listed were engaged in some branch of the cloth industry. Turning to the records, then, we find that in 1379 there were five "websters" in Wakefield, two of them women, and that in 1395-96<sup>134</sup> there were seven, one of them a woman.<sup>135</sup> Urge any incompleteness in these records which you will, you cannot infer from them a town of any size. The whole period suggested by Professor Gayley, c.1375-1400, must, I feel sure, be given up.<sup>136</sup>

What, then, of Mr. Pollard's dating in the reign of Henry IV, 1400-1415? Unfortunately, there are no aulneger's accounts for these years to help us,<sup>137</sup> but we are not thereby left without a basis for judgment. In the first place, Mr. Pollard's arguments are, upon scrutiny, far from convincing.<sup>138</sup> For example, though there is in the plays "rather learned talk about music," involving terms new in the fourteenth century,<sup>139</sup> I see no reason for assuming, with Mr. Pollard, that such allusions date from early in the history of the use of the new terms. They would appear more likely at a later time when the knowledge of them might be supposed to be more disseminated among the poet's audience in western Yorkshire.<sup>140</sup> Likewise I do not see why the gift of a tennis ball to the <sup>134</sup> Herbert Heaton, in his The Yorkshire Woollen and Worsted Industries, pp. 69-72, dates the three aulneger's accounts each one year late. He also gives in error the total cloths reported from Wakefield in the second report as 173½. The report shows: Emma Earl, 48, Roger Presaw, 26; John Kent, 24; Richard Burbrigg, 30; William Bate, 16; Thomas Kendalle, 30, Henry Draper, 29; Total, 203 (Exch. K. R. Accounts, bundle no. 345, Package no. 17).

<sup>135</sup> Yorks. Arch. and Tp. Journal., vi, 150 ff. The number of weavers seems to be a better index to the size of the town than the number of cloths taxed. In the first account, 1394-95, the total of cloths listed from Wakefield, Leeds, and Doncaster was 87; in the second, 1395-96, the number from Wakefield alone was 203, in the third, 1396-97, for those named in the previous account, there was the following astonishing falling off in the number of cloths taxed: Emma Earl, 48 to 8; Roger Presaw, 26 to 10; John Kent, 24 to 6; and Thomas Kendalle, 30 to 2 (ibid.). The names of Burbrigg, Bate, and Draper do not appear; this may not be of significance if the list of the previous year listed under the names Wakefield and Leeds "The whole district containing Bradford, Halifax, and Huddersfield; in fact, the whole of the county today engaged in the manufacture of woollen cloth" as Mr. Heaton thinks (op. cit., p. 71). Mr. J. W. Walker gives evidence in rebuttal of this view in Chapter XXI of his forthcoming History of Wakefield.

<sup>136</sup> It may be added that Professor Gayley's use of the Tyler Rebellion as a means of dating falls in view of the fact that this Rebellion did not affect the district about Wakefield. See Vict. Hist. Co. Yorks., iii, 442.

<sup>137</sup> The next account is dated 1468. Mr. Heaton suggests that the aulnege was "farmed out" during the interim (op. cit., p. 72).

<sup>138</sup> For Mr. Pollard's arguments used see EETS, ES, lxxi, xxvi-xxvii and notes to these.

<sup>139</sup> See Hope Traver, "The Relations of the Musical Terms in the Woodkirk Shepherd Plays to the Date of Their Composition," MLN, xx, 1 ff.

<sup>140</sup> Probably the proximity of Nostel Priory accelerated the spread of the knowledge of music about Wakefield, but hardly at the rate called for by Mr. Pollard's theory.

Christ child in both Shepherd plays implies a writing in the fourteenth or early fifteenth century because the game was then new. It seems to me that a shepherd in the fields about Wakefield would be much more likely to think of such a gift—and have a tennis ball upon his person to be used as such a gift—when the game was much further on the way to its hey-day in the sixteenth century than Mr. Pollard's argument assumes.<sup>141</sup> Equally undecisive seems to me his argument based upon the "complaints" of the shepherds in the Prima and the Secunda Pastorum, complaints involving cold and frost, storm and flood, sheep rot, taxation, oppression by the "higher ups", and hard times in general. As the verification of such conditions in western Yorkshire at a given period is no longer possible, the postulation of them by Mr. Pollard depends, of course, upon his knowledge of conditions in England at large. Yet all the conditions listed above are postulated for England at large by contemporary chronicles as marking certain years in the single reign of Henry VI.<sup>142</sup> They can thus have no probative value for the earlier reign of Henry IV.

Mr. Pollard's final argument is that "In a writer so full of allusions, the absence of any reference to fighting tends . . . to show that the plays were not written during the war with France" and thus are suited "to the reign of Henry IV."<sup>143</sup> There was, of course, no war with France during this monarch's reign, but would it not be passing strange that an author writing in western Yorkshire at the time, if given to allusions as our author most certainly was, should have nothing to say of the incarceration of Richard II in Pomfret Castle and his death there in 1400, and that he should in no way have reflected the uprising of Glendower, Mortimer, and Northumberland in 1404-5 with the subsequent beheading of Richard le Scroop, Archbishop of York, beloved of the people of Yorkshire as no other bishop of his time?<sup>144</sup> And these events were fol-

<sup>141</sup> Here again the influence of Nostel was probably felt. Mr. Robert W. Henderson, Librarian of the Raquet and Tennis Club of New York City, in a kind reply to a letter wrote me that priests, in the Middle Ages, "were undoubtedly tennis players" (letter dated August 31, 1933). The game, however, a different game from our "lawn tennis," of course—bore at first the name luens pilae, (Ency. Brit., sub "lawn tennis") and in extant monuments is called tennis first by Cower c 1400 (NED).

<sup>142</sup> In the single year 1427-28 are references to sheep rot, to floods, and to taxation, during the years 1433-35 there were heavy frosts, dearth of corn, and hard times in general (Cf. An English Chronicle etc., Camden Soc., O.S., LXIV (1856), 55 and 62; Collections of a London Citizen, the so-called "Gregory's Chronicle," Camden Soc., N.S., XVII (1876), 162 and 187; A Short English Chronicle, Camden Soc., N.S., XXVIII (1880), 62. Cf. also Fabyan's Chronicle [London 1533], cxc, verso.)

<sup>143</sup> We are told that 20,000 Yorkshire-men had flocked to his standard (see Thomas Baines, Yorkshire, Past and Present, II, 547-548), and that a royal edict became necessary to stop the flow of Yorkshire pilgrims to his shrine. (See William Stubbs, Constitutional lowed in 1408 by the defeat of Northumberland at Bramham Moor in the West Riding, and the beheading of the Abbot of Hales at York.<sup>144</sup> Surely the absence of any allusion to these stirring local events argues strongly against the date proposed.

Not only are Mr. Pollard's arguments thus unconvincing, but, in the second place, the actual history of the period as reflected in our knowledge of the parish church further negates the reign of Henry IV as a time when the village could have supported the cycle as we now have it. That church had remained untouched since its consecration on August 10, 1329, but shortly after the turn of the century the project of building for it a bell tower was undertaken. For this purpose the parishioners were assessed "according to the rateable value of the houses" and the proper officers were instructed to collect the tax.<sup>145</sup> That the village was not yet able to finance so important an undertaking, however, may be inferred from the fact that Henry Bowet, Archbishop of York, upon petition, issued a mandate June 14, 1409, "enjoyning and commanding the rebels without delay to contribute towards the work" under pain of excommunication. Clearly there were many who, as the petition set forth, "wrongfully refused to contribute according to the assessment made to the manifest prejudice and hurt of the bell tower." Despite the Bishop's threat of excommunication, however, the tower seems to have been at least unpaid for, and so unconsecrated, in 1420, for in a will dated in that year "Joan, relict of John de Thorp, mercer of Wakefield" left "13s. 4d. to the new fabric of the bell tower." This history of the church tower, then, though it shows by the mere fact of its undertaking that the village was growing, does not give us reason to believe that it was yet able to handle our cycle. Particularly does this seem true when we recall that the cycle was probably complete as to number of plays before the borrowings from York and that the Master did his work after those borrowings as is shown by the fact that he made additions to the York-derived play of the Judicium. I am confident, therefore, that we must decline to accept the proposed later dating of Mr. Pollard just as we have already declined to accept the earlier datings of Professor Gayley.<sup>146</sup>

<sup>144</sup> For a detailed account see Alex. D. H. Leaderman, Yorks, Arch. Journal, xii, 183-199.

<sup>145</sup> The history of the church is taken from galley proofs of Chapter IV of the forthcoming History of Wakefield, by Mr. J. W. Walker, OBE, FSA, Hon. Secy. of the Yorkshire Archeological Society. I wish here to thank Mr. Walker, not only for sending me galley sheets but also for other courtesies which made demands upon his time when he was very busy superintending his book through the press.

<sup>146</sup> For bibliographical evidence that the borrowings from York were later than 1415 see page 659 below. The facts we have presented seem to refute definitely the thesis of Miss Marie C. Lyle that the Wakefield and York cycles were originally the same. ("The original Identity of the York and Towneley Cycles," in Research Publications of the Uni-

That Wakefield was growing during the reign of Henry IV, however, there can be no doubt. Indeed, the fact that the bell tower was built "about ten feet to the west of the church" shows, of itself, that the builders foresaw the need for an enlarged church in the not too distant future. The improvement came, finally, with the removal of the west wall and the extension of the nave to meet the tower, thus giving the added seating capacity which a growing town would need. The enlargement did not come, however, if I read the record aright, until the early years of the reign of Henry VI, when we have other evidence that Wakefield had become a prospering community. This other evidence is as follows. In the poll-tax records of 1379 we find the following entries:<sup>147</sup>

Johannes Syndale & Idonea	vxor ejus	iiij d.
Thomas Webster & Johanna	vxor ejus	vj d.
Thomas Banaster, serviens ejus		iiij d.

Forty-seven years later the following information was found in a will by the antiquarian Dodsworth:<sup>148</sup>

Finis 6 H 6 (1427-28)

XXX, 13. Between John Banestre compl<sup>t</sup> & Idonia late wife of Jo. Snyttall & Richard Snyttall, son of said Idonia, deforc<sup>t</sup>, of 2 mess, 100 acres of Land, 20 acres of meadow & xiii shillings Rent with the appurtenances in Wakefeld, Sandall, Stanley, Horbury, Osset & Allertorp, the right of John.

If this John Banastre was the son of Thomas Banaster, servant of Thomas Webster,<sup>149</sup> as seems likely, we must grant that the father had prospered and, if so, his prosperity must be looked upon as indicating the growing prosperity of his neighbors and friends in Wakefield. Finally, by the middle of the century, "in spite of the War of the Roses," as Mr. Walker puts it, the town must have become really prosperous, for at that time the chancel of the church was entirely torn down and enlarged,<sup>150</sup> the walls of the nave were pushed out to the previous line of the transepts, a north and south porch were added, and the building was otherwise changed so that it took on the form which persisted "until the additions of the twentieth century."

The logic of all these facts points clearly, I think, to the years 1422-60, that is, the years of Henry VI, as the years when the Wakefield 132-134 and W. W. Greg, The Library, 3d ser., v, 294 ) There also seems no reason for accepting longer Mr. Greg's statement that the borrowing from York was "presumably . . . about the middle of the second half of the fourteenth century" (ibid., 293).

<sup>147</sup> Yorks. Arch. and Tp. Journall, vi, 150.

<sup>148</sup> Yorkshire Notes, Harley MS. 803, Plut. LXX, quoted from Yorks. Arch. and Tp. Journal, vi, 428.

<sup>149</sup> Cf. the poll-tax records of 1379.

<sup>150</sup> This work was still in progress in 1458 as shown by the will of Thomas Haukyn, wool Master did his work, and if we narrow these years I think we must choose the later rather than the earlier ones as marking the period of the height of his powers. He must almost certainly have finished his work, however, before the War of the Roses made Wakefield and its vicinity a field of battle as it did in 1460.

The case is not all in, however, as we have another check on the testimony of the costume references. I refer to the results of bibliographical study. W. W. Greg, speaking of the plays in the Passion Group at York, says that they form the last layer in the York Cycle and "can hardly be earlier than 1400."<sup>151</sup> This is interesting, but Miss Lyle goes further when she calls attention to the fact that this group of plays probably underwent revision after 1415. She points out that Burton, in his famous "list" of the York plays, 1415, omits all reference to characters and events in the Passion Group so far as they were derived from the Gospel of Nicodemus.<sup>152</sup> Furthermore, she finds the Harrowing of Hell in the "Register"<sup>153</sup> so different from his description of it that she does not hesitate to say, "Obviously this description refers to another play."<sup>152</sup> Yet it is just this late version of the York play which was borrowed by Wakefield. Moreover, the Towneley Ascencio, also borrowed from York, includes the part of the Centurian, a part in the present York play in the "Register" but a part not mentioned by Burton in his description of the play.<sup>154</sup> Of course Burton may have failed of a full description, but this possibility becomes very slight indeed when we recall that in every case where his description of a play differs from the plays as we have them in the "Register," the characters and situations he omits derive from the Gospel. Almost certainly, then, the Gospel influence came into the York plays after 1415 when Burton made his descriptive "list" of the plays.<sup>155</sup> The necessary corollary to this conclusion is that the

<sup>151</sup> The Library, 3d ser., v, 291.

<sup>152</sup> The original Identity etc., Chap. II.

<sup>153</sup> Edited by Lucy Toulmin Smith, The York Mystery Plays (Oxon., 1885). She reprints Burton's "list," xix-xxvii.

<sup>154</sup> Miss Lyle, forced to see the import of these facts, negating as they do her thesis that the York and Towneley plays were originally the same, resorts to some queer logic in rebuttal. She writes: "The discrepancy in the two cycles of the division into separate plays, however, makes it seem probable that the separation took place before 1415. There is reason to believe that Burton's list represents the true situation as it existed in 1415 only in regard to the separation of plays and their assignment to crafts, but that in many cases the description given the characters and chief events refers to a situation existing at an earlier period" (op. cit., p. 31, n. 6). Her position regarding the separation of the cycles is sufficiently refuted by this study. Her final assertion will not bear the test of logic. It but represents a "reason to believe" which she must have or give up her thesis.

<sup>155</sup> I am aware that Miss Grace Clark thinks the influence of the Gospel of Nicodemus was felt upon the York plays between 1400 and 1415 (PMLA, XLIII, 154 ff.). Her judgment, however, is based on very doubtful evidence. Of the five plays concerned she herself admits that one, Play XXXIX, is ambiguous in its lack of evidence, and that two others, Towneley borrowings of these York plays were made later than 1415, the date of Burton's entries in the York Menorandum Book, and such conclusion clears up as by magic the question before us. It shows that by the time of Henry V, 1413-22, there was in Wakefield a well-developed cycle of plays, that, probably late in his reign, the guilds or masters or town authorities borrowed from York the plays of the Passion Group showing the influence of the Gospel of Matthew, probably new in the York plays after 1415; and, finally, that in the reign of Henry VI, 1422-60, the Wakefield Master appeared, wrote the additions to the Judicium which we found so important for their costume references, probably experimented with the Master's Bible, interpreted passages in many other plays, rewrote entirely, in his favorite stanza, four plays, and finally produced the masterpiece of all extant mediæval dramatic writing, the Secunda Pastorum.<sup>156</sup>

Thus, by evidence which totally disregards matters of costume, we have twice arrived at the same dates as those indicated to us by the costume allusions. The "langett," the "tabard," the horned head-dress, the "prankyng gownes" with "shulders vp set, mos and flukys seruyd wyth in," the coppiece and the puffed out froglike torso tell the same story as does historical investigation and bibliographical study. The combined evidence, I believe, must be looked upon as definitive. I see no escape from the conclusion, therefore, that the Wakefield Master did his work upon our cycle entirely within the reign of Henry VI—more specifically, within the second quarter of the fifteenth century.

MENDAL G. FRAMPTON

Pennicott College

Burton's evidence rests, then, upon the evidence contained in Plays XXXVI and XXXVII. In the first of these she thinks the "showing of the good and evil spirits" in clerdy in the "Register" is alluded to by Burton in his words "boni et mali spiritus habetis cum vestris," and in the second she feels that Burton is not wholly clear about the infant play. In both cases, however, her judgment is based upon a personal interpretation of the very evidence which Miss Lyle interprets to an opposite conclusion. She may be right as to Play XXXVI with Burton's reference to "veralls," but her contention that Burton's "(vi) boni et vi mali" in the Harrowing of Hell refers to "seven spirits of the dead and five devils" scarce carries conviction. Particularly is this so when we discover that such interpretation violates Burton's otherwise unbroken practice of listing characters by name when they are given names in the corresponding play in the "Register," and that, when he does use the terms "good and evil spirits" elsewhere, in describing Play XXXVI, the ascription is correct. At most, then, Miss Clark seems to have shown but the possibility that the influence of the Gospel of Nicodemus began to be felt before Burton made his list in 1415. Even were we to accept her argument, however, I believe my case would stand.

<sup>156</sup> This resumé is based upon his work in the nine-line stanza. It is the judgment of the writer that there is almost certain evidence of his hand in plays in other verse forms. The temptation is strong to suggest that it was the Master who received a fee for playing at York in 1446.

NATHANIEL WOOD'S CONFLICT OF CONSCIENCE

THE Conflict of Conscience, a morality play by Nathaniel Wood,<sup>1</sup> was printed in London, 1581, in a Philobibler quarto. This is the only known edition of the work, it appeared, however, in two issues. The first of these gives the name of "Francis Spiera" on the title-page and in the Prologue, and at the end of the piece the Nuntius announces that Philologus, the character representing the Italian, Francesco Spiera, had committed suicide. The second issue does not mention the name of the historical prototype of the chief character in the drama, and in it the Nuntius announces that Philologus had been reconverted to Protestantism before his death.<sup>2</sup>

So far as records go, The Conflict of Conscience was never acted. The arrangement of the characters on the title-page so that six actors could give a presentation of the piece "in private houses, or otherwise" seems to indicate that the author intended his work to be acted. As this arrangement is an accurate one, it needs must have been made by the author, or at least by someone very well acquainted with the play. In Act iv, scene i, the character Avarice is carefully made to leave the stage in order that he may later take the part of Sensual Suggestion.<sup>3</sup> Furthermore, there are specific stage directions in at least four instances.<sup>4</sup> Also, the Prologue speaks of the auditors,<sup>5</sup> and Hypocrisy in two instances and perhaps in three addresses himself directly to his audience.<sup>6</sup> On the <sup>1</sup> The facts that are known of the life of Nathaniel Wood or Woodes, as the name appears on the title-page of his play, are limited. The record of his matriculation as a sizar at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in Michaelmas term, 1567, constitutes the first definite information about his life. He graduated B.A. from Cambridge in the spring of 1572 and M.A. two years later. In the meantime he was ordained priest at Norwich in 1571, and in 1572 he became rector of South Walsham St. Mary's, a small parish about nine miles from Norwich. In 1583 this living was given to another, and nothing is known of Wood's whereabouts until 1594, when he was reappointed at Oxford. After that time no more information regarding him is to be found. See John Venn and J. A. Venn, Alumni Cantabrigieenses (Cambridge, 1922), iv, 45.

<sup>2</sup> William A. Jackson, "Woodes's Conflict of Conscience," LTLS (September 7, 1933), p. 592, points out the most important variations between the two issues. W. W. Greg in a later issue of LTLS (October 26, 1933), p. 732, corrects a bibliographical inaccuracy of Mr. Jackson's.

<sup>3</sup> The Conflict of Conscience, Sig. F i verso.—This reference and all references to the play, unless otherwise stated, are made to the facsimile reproduction of a British Museum copy of The Conflict of Conscience in the "Tudor Facsimile Texts."

<sup>4</sup> Two of these are on Sig. B ii verso, the remaining two are on Sig. C ii verso and Sig. D ii recto.

<sup>5</sup> Both issues, Sig. A ii verso.

<sup>6</sup> The unmistakable examples of this are in Act II, scene i (Sig. B ii verso) and in Act v, scene iii (Sig. H i verso), while the more doubtful example is at the beginning of Act iv, scene i (Sig. E i verso).

other hand, the numerous asides found in Act II, scenes ii and iii, and in Act III, scene iii, raise a question about the feasibility of acting the play. These asides are not incorporated into the stanza form, which is rhyme royal, nor does there, as a rule, seem to have been provision made for them by means of any pause in the stanza.<sup>7</sup> They simply appear in the margin parallel to the speeches about which they are comments. In spite of this curious arrangement, it seems a not unreasonable assumption that Wood intended his play for presentation. Whether or not it ever really was acted cannot be determined.

The date of composition cannot have been earlier than 1548, when the events upon which the plot of the play is based occurred, nor later than 1581, when the play was printed. The exact source of the play did not appear until after 1550.<sup>8</sup> It is, furthermore, very unlikely that Nathaniel Wood, who entered Cambridge in 1567, was old enough to have written such a work before 1553, since he probably was only a few years old then; and during Queen Mary's reign, 1553-58, it is improbable that any one would have written a work so definitely anti-Catholic. The work, then, was not written before Queen Elizabeth's accession to the throne. Nor were the events of the early years of Queen Elizabeth's reign likely to call forth such a play as The Conflict of Conscience, for during the first few years of that reign there was uncertainty as to the status of the Catholics. There was, moreover, a decline in English Catholicism between 1560 and 1570, because the Catholics were left so without leadership that they could not publicly make a definite stand.<sup>9</sup>

About 1570, however, the situation of the Catholics in England changed considerably. The Northern Rising of 1569, the excommunication of 1570, the coming of the first Catholic missionaries in 1574, the menace of Mary, Queen of Scots—all contributed to the rise of a pronounced opposition. This showed itself after a time not only in laws against the Catholics, but in anti-Catholic literature written and published during the seventies and the eighties. Many of the works were ballads which came out soon after 1570 in protest against the events of that year.<sup>10</sup> Besides the ballads a considerable number of tracts were <sup>7</sup> The difficulty of acting a play with asides arranged in this fashion was pointed out to me by Professor Charles Read Baskervill A. W. Ward, A History of English Dramatic Literature (London, 1899), I, 139, considers the use of the seven-line stanza to be evidence that the play was hardly intended for presentation. But a considerable number of the early plays were written in the seven-line stanza.

<sup>8</sup> See below pp. 670-672, where I have attempted to show that Wood used a specific version of the life of Spiera.

<sup>9</sup> A. O. Meyer, England and the Catholic Church under Queen Elizabeth, translated by J. R. McKee (London, 1916), pp. 68-70.

<sup>10</sup> Such a ballad is Thomas Knell, An Answer at large, to a most hereticall, trayterous, Papisticall Byll, . . . (London, 1570), reprinted in Northampton, 1881, by John Taylor.

written and published against the Catholics.<sup>11</sup> Furthermore, some of the dramas printed during this period are strongly anti-Catholic.<sup>12</sup> New translations were made of anti-Catholic works which had been published earlier in some language other than English,<sup>13</sup> and new editions were issued of earlier anti-Catholic works, as about 1570 the second edition of an English account of Francesco Spiera.<sup>14</sup>

It seems altogether likely that The Conflict of Conscience had its place in this stream of Elizabethan anti-Catholic literature which perhaps increased in volume after 1570. Nathaniel Wood was then at Cambridge, and may have written his play while still at the university—that is, sometime before 1574—or he may have written it afterward when he presumably was in the vicinity of Norwich. In either case, he probably was stirred to a consideration of the history of Spiera as a basis for the plot of a dramatic piece by the reappearance of the English account of the unfortunate Italian. He may also have been conscious of the time-likeness of a treatment of such a theme; consequently, using the life of the Italian lawyer as the source, he wrote his play, certainly not earlier than, and probably at least a few years later than, 1570.<sup>15</sup>

In view of the fact that Nathaniel Wood on the title-page and in the Prologue of the first issue of The Conflict of Conscience states that his play deals with the story of Francesco Spiera,<sup>16</sup> there can be no doubt concerning the general historical source. Spiera, who was born in 1502, was a lawyer in the small town of Citadella, near Padua, Italy. When in his middle forties, he became converted to Protestant doctrines, and was so zealous in his declaration of his new faith that complaints of his heresy came to the tribunal at Venice. He and his nephew, Girolamo

---

Other ballads of this type are reprinted by Joseph Lilly, A Collection of Seventy-Nine Black-Letter Ballads and Broad-sides (London, 1867), pp 30–32; 33–36; 224–227. H. E. Rollins, "An Analytical Index to the Ballad-Entries (1557–1709) in the Registers of the Company of Stationers of London," SP, xxi (1924), 14, 23, 84, 107, passim, has entries of ballads that obviously must have been of the type under discussion here.

<sup>11</sup> For example, Thomas Norton, A warning against the dangerous practices of Papistes, and specially the parteners of the late Rebellion (London, [ca. 1570]). Many of the earlier of the numerous works against the Catholics of the Puritan, William Fulke, fall in this period.

<sup>12</sup> A good example is New Custom, which was printed in 1573. This is reprinted in Robert Dodsley, A Select Collection of Old English Plays edited by W. C. Hazlitt (London, 1874–76), iii, 1–52.

<sup>13</sup> Barnaby Googe's translation of Thomas Kirchmeyer, The popish kingdome, or reigne of Antichrist (London, 1570) is an example. This work has been reprinted and edited by Robert Charles Hope (London, 1880).

<sup>14</sup> See below, p. 667.

<sup>15</sup> A feature of Wood's play that seems to point to the later date is the Scottish dialect chosen for the ignorant Catholic priest. This choice may have been influenced by the increasing uneasiness among English Protestants on account of Mary, Queen of Scots. See below, p. 677–678.

<sup>16</sup> This surname is sometimes spelled Spira or Spera.

Faccio, were summoned before that body. During the trial, which began May 25, 1548, Spiera's deviation from the Catholic teaching became apparent, for, among other things, it was proved that he had in his possession heretical writings. Spiera feared that he would lose his property and possibly even his life; therefore, in June he made a confession of his errors and begged for clemency. The papal legate at Venice at that time, Giovanni della Casa, Archbishop of Benevento, did not consider Spiera's confession sufficient evidence of his sincerity, but required that, besides the usual recantation in St. Mark's in Venice, he should make a public recantation in his native town. The same sentence was pronounced upon his nephew. In addition they both were required to pay a fine; Spiera paid his on July 1, while Faccio paid his in August. After this there is no more mention of Faccio.

On the way back to Citadella Spiera's conscience urged him to remain true to what he really believed, but he refused to be guided by it; and the following Sunday morning after mass, before a large group of people, he said that he formerly had erred in his beliefs and that he now was returning to the Roman church. Soon after he began to feel remorse for what he had done, and thought he heard a voice telling him that he had denied Christ and must therefore suffer eternal torture. From this time on Spiera sank into a state of despair from which he could not be aroused. After he had been in this condition some time, it was decided to remove him to Padua, where he might have the care of physicians as well as the aid of learned men. When he arrived in Padua the three foremost physicians in the town were called, but after a consultation they said that they could offer no advice since they considered his mental condition to be the cause of his physical disorders.

Thereafter every effort was made to arouse Spiera from his melancholy state of mind. Every day many people came to comfort him. Among the most noted of his visitors were Pietro Paola Vergerio, Matteo Gribaldi, Henry Scrymgeour or Scrimger, and Sigismund Gelous. These men were much impressed by the seriousness of Spiera's conflict, and they made strenuous attempts to inspire in him confidence in the mercy of God. But he seemed convinced that he was a reprobate and that his sin was unpardonable; consequently, he could find no consolation in the Scriptures or in prayer, since those things were for the elect. Spiera's condition daily grew worse. He longed to die, and actually tried to commit suicide by starving himself to death. He grew more and more weak, though forced to eat some food. In November, 1548, it was decided that he should be taken back to Citadella. The morning he was to leave Padua he attempted to kill himself with a knife, but was prevented from carrying out his intention by his two sons. He died in Citadella, December 27, 1548. The details of his death were not accurately known; it was thought that his despair had not been relieved.

Within approximately two years after Francesco Spiera's death there had been published descriptions of his apostasy and the despair that followed it by the four men already mentioned who came to see him while he was at Padua. Of these men Vergerio and Gribaldi were Italians, Scrymgeour was a Scotsman, and Gelous was a Hungarian.<sup>17</sup>

It seems to be impossible without actually comparing all the extant biographies of Francesco Spiera that were published near 1550 to form any accurate judgment as to their relationship. The most important of these works, however, was the one which bore the title:

Francisci Spierae, qui quod susceptam semel Evangelice ueritatis professionem abnegasset, damnassetque, in horrendam incidit desperationem, Historia, A quatuor summis uiris, summa fide conscripta: cum clariss uirorum Praefationibus, Caelii S. C. et Io. Calvini, et Petri Pauli Vergerii Apologia. . . . Accessit quoque Martini Borrhui, de usu, quem Spierae tum exemplum, tum doctrina afferat, iudicium . . .<sup>18</sup>

The importance of this work lay in its completeness. There were 181 pages in all, which contained: the preface by Celio Secondo Curione,<sup>19</sup> six letters written by an anonymous Paduan—really Pietro Paolo Vergerio—translated by Curione (pp. 1–32), the epistle of Matteo Gribaldi (pp. 33–56); a preface by John Calvin (pp. 57–61); a history by Henry Scrymgeour (pp. 62–95); a history by Sigismund Gelous (pp. 96–124), the apology of Pietro Paolo Vergerio relative to the case of Spiera, translated out of Italian by Francis Nigro Bassianate (pp. 125–144), the opinion of Martin Borrhau,<sup>20</sup> from which it appears that he was the editor of the whole collection; and finally an index to the volume.<sup>21</sup>

Some of the various accounts that made up this collected work were published separately just before and just after its publication. For example, there was an Italian history by Vergerio; there was a Latin version of Vergerio's history;<sup>22</sup> there was the Latin narrative written by <sup>17</sup> Brief accounts of these men may be found as follows The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (New York and London, 1912), xii, 164–165, Biographie universelle ancienne et moderne (Paris, 1817), xviii, 472–473; DNB (London, 1885–1900), LI, 150–151; Fortsetzung und Ergänzungen zu Christian Gottlieb Jöchers allgemeinem Gelehrten-Lexikon von Johann Christoph Adelung (Leipzig, 1787), II, 1389.

<sup>18</sup> Corpus Reformatorum (Brunswick, 1870), xxxvii, lxx, gives the title as above. Emilio Comba, I Nostri Protestanti (Florence, 1897) II, 260, note, gives the place and the date as Basel, 1550. The British Museum Catalogue, under C. S. Curio, lists a title very like this, but the place and the date supplied are [Geneva? 1550?].

<sup>19</sup> Curione (1503–69), an Italian Protestant, was professor of rhetoric in Basel.

<sup>20</sup> Borrhau (1499–1564), a German Protestant, was professor of theology in Basel.

<sup>21</sup> Corpus Reformatorum, xxxvii, lxx–lxxi.

<sup>22</sup> British Museum Catalogue under P. P. Vergerio.

Henry Scrymgeour; finally there was an anonymous Latin history of 1549.<sup>23</sup> Of the early German descriptions of Spiera's desperation one is based upon the last mentioned Latin work; the other one, like the first one, is dated 1549.<sup>24</sup> There also was an early English version of Matteo Gribaldi's description of Spiera's apostasy. This bore the title:

A notable and marvellous epistle of the famous Doctour Mathewe Gribalde, professor of law in the universitie of Padua cōcerning the terrible iudgement of God, upon hym that for feare of men denieth Christ, and the knowne veritie. with a Preface of Doctor Caluine. Translated out of Latin intoo English by E. A. Worcester [Printed by John Osmen.] 1550.<sup>25</sup>

That Edward Aglionby made the translation into English is clear from the acrostic in "An Epigram of the terrible example of one Francis Spera an Italian, of whom this book is compiled."<sup>26</sup> Aglionby was a recorder of Warwick and was a figure of some importance during the middle years of Queen Elizabeth's reign.<sup>27</sup>

These early accounts of the fate of Francesco Spiera by men of some prominence in the Protestant world must have been a considerable factor in producing the great vogue that the tale seems to have had all over Europe. At least two of the four men who wrote accounts of their experiences with Spiera attributed their final decisions in favor of Protestant doctrines to the impressions made upon them by Spiera's miserable condition. These two were Vergerio and Scrymgeour. The Protestants considered the story of Spiera a prime example of the fate likely to overtake a person who, having once had the truth of the Protestant doctrines revealed to him, turned his back on that truth because of worldly considerations. Spiera was soon reported to have committed suicide, although the early narratives did not give warrant for such a report. The vogue of the story was probably also enhanced by the appeal that the sin of despair resulting in suicide—really the unpardonable sin, the sin against the Holy Ghost, since hope of repentance and ultimate salvation were thereby cut off—had to the sixteenth-century mind.<sup>28</sup> The vogue of the story did not, however, end with the sixteenth century, but continued through the following centuries.

<sup>23</sup> British Museum Catalogue under F. Spira

<sup>24</sup> Ibid

<sup>25</sup> This title is taken from Mary Augusta Scott, Elizabethan Translations from the Italian (Boston and New York, 1916), p. 253. A copy of this edition of Gribaldi's work in English is to be found in the Bodleian Library. The Catalogus Librorum Impressorum Bibliothecae Bodleianae in Academia Oxoniensi (Oxford, 1843), II, 200, does not give the place where the work was printed nor the printer.

<sup>26</sup> Scott, Elizabethan Translations, p. 254.

<sup>27</sup> DNB, I, 176-177.

<sup>28</sup> F. I. Carpenter, "Spenser's Cave of Despair," MLN, XII (1897), 257-273. Literary treatments of the theme of despair occur in Spenser's Faerie Queen, Book I, canto ix, and in Marlowe's Doctor Faustus, notably scenes v, vi, xi, xiii, xiv.

Evidence for this great vogue is found, first of all, in the new editions that appeared of the early biographies of Spiera and in the new notices of him that also appeared.<sup>29</sup> Another edition of the early volume of collected writings regarding Spiera was brought out at Tübingen in 1558.<sup>30</sup> Comparatively brief notices were incorporated in such Latin works as Sleidan's Chronicle and Peter Martyr's Common Places. In addition there were at least two more sixteenth-century accounts in German, other than those already mentioned,<sup>31</sup> and there were later narrations of the story of Francesco Spiera in German.<sup>32</sup> The publication of a biography of him in French does not seem to have occurred very early as compared with the appearance of such works in other countries, but there was a brief notice in Simon Goulart's Histoires admirables et memorables de nostre temps, the first part of which was published in 1600, and there were at least two seventeenth-century accounts of Spiera.<sup>33</sup>

In England also there is ample evidence in the appearance of histories of Spiera's case for the vogue of the story there. The early translation of Gribaldi's story came out in a second edition; the title-page reads:

A notable and marueilous Epistle of the famous Doctour, Matthewe Gribalde, Professor of the Lawe, in the Vniuersitie of Padua: cōcernyng the terrible iudgement of God, vpon hym that for feare of men, denieth Christ and the knowne veritie: with a Preface of Doctor Caluine. Now newly imprinted, with a godly and wholesome preseruative against desperation, at all tymes necessarie for the soule: chiefly to be vsed when the deuill dooeth assaulte vs moste fiercely, and death approacheth nighest . . . Imprinted at London, By Henry Denham, for William Norton.<sup>34</sup>

The date usually given for this work is about 1570, a conjecture which is based on the fact that the work was entered in the Stationers' Register between July 22, 1569, and July 22, 1570.<sup>35</sup> The Godly and Wholesome Preservative against Desperation, printed with this second edition, had appeared independent of A notable and marueilous Epistle in two earlier editions, one in 1551, another in 1559.<sup>36</sup> The author of this tract is not known. Yet a third edition of A notable and marueilous Epistle has been <sup>29</sup> The following list of works that dealt with Spiera's life is by no means complete. It is drawn up chiefly as evidence of the widespread popularity of the story.

<sup>30</sup> Comba, I Nostri Protestanti, II, 261, note.

<sup>31</sup> Jean George Théodore Graesse, Trésor de Livres rares et précieux (Dresden, 1865), VI, 468; British Museum Catalogue under F. Spira.

<sup>32</sup> For example, C. L. Roth, Francesco Spiera's Lebensende (Nuremberg, 1829).

<sup>33</sup> British Museum Catalogue under F. Spira.

<sup>34</sup> This title is taken from a rotograph of the British Museum copy.

<sup>35</sup> Edward Arber, ed., A Transcript of the Registers of the Company of Stationers of London; 1554-1640 A.D. (London, 1875), I, 408.

<sup>36</sup> A Short-Title Catalogue of Books edited by A. W. Pollard and G. R. Redgrave (London, 1926), nos. 20204 and 20205.

recorded as having been printed at London "by Jhon Kyngston for Willyam Norton, 1582,"<sup>37</sup> but the present existence of this edition can not be very well substantiated.<sup>38</sup> Other sixteenth-century works in English which carried notices of Francesco Spiera were the translations of two Latin works already mentioned, Sleidan's Chronicle and Peter Martyr's Common Places, the dates of these translations being 1560 and 1583 respectively. Thomas Lanquet's Chronicle, 1565, also contained a brief notice. It is interesting to note that in no one of these versions of the story was Spiera said to have committed suicide.

An additional translation into English of a foreign work was that of Simon Goulart's work, the French title of which has been given, by Edward Grimestone. The English title of this work is Admirable and Memorable Histories containing the wonders of our times.<sup>39</sup> It has in it a section devoted to the description of various "Desperate Persons."<sup>40</sup> These persons are described as having become so desperate by thinking over their past sins that they come to doubt the efficacy of God's mercy. Among these stories appears that of Francesco Spiera. The source for the statements made about him is given as "a discourse published by Maister Henrie Scringer, a learned lawyer, who was then at Padoua, did see and many times talke with this poore Spiera."<sup>41</sup> In some places the narrative in Goulart's work is in the first person singular, as if it were a verbal translation of Scrymgeour's discourse.

By far the most important version in English of the circumstances attending Spiera's apostasy and death is that of Nathaniel Bacon, whose work came out in London, 1638, bearing the title, A Relation of the fearfull Estate of Francis Spira in the yeare 1548.<sup>42</sup> This work went through a number of editions, the last of which appeared in 1845. There was also a translation of the work into Welsh.<sup>43</sup> In Nathaniel Bacon's preface to his work he intimated that he had used as his sources all of the early narratives by eye-witnesses of Spiera's conflict. He apparently knew of the sixteenth-century translation of Gribaldi's sketch, for he wrote:

<sup>37</sup> W. T. Lowndes, The Bibliographer's Manual of English Literature, edited by H. G. Bohn (London, 1871), II, 945. It is also described in Joseph Ames, Typographical Antiquities edited by T. F. Dibdin (London, 1819), IV, 481-482. Dibdin notes that the description comes from Herbert's manuscript memoranda.

<sup>38</sup> There is no record of this third edition in the Short-Title Catalogue.

<sup>39</sup> The first edition, London, 1607, is the edition I have used.

<sup>40</sup> Pp. 185-198.

<sup>41</sup> Goulart, Admirable and Memorable Histories, p. 196.

<sup>42</sup> The British Museum Catalogue, under F. Spira, supplies the date 1637 in brackets. I have not seen a copy of the first edition but have used the second edition which has the title: A Relation of the Fearefull Estate of Francis Spira, in the yeare, 1548 (London, 1640).

<sup>43</sup> The dates of the various editions (British Museum Catalogue, under F. Spira) were: 1638 [1637], 1640, 1665, 1683, 1688, 1715, 1718, 1734, 1770, 1784, 1815, 1845. That of 1815 seems to have been an abridgement of Bacon's history. The title and approximate date of the Welsh translation are also given.

I acknowledge that there hath beene formerly a Booke published in our Mother tongue, concerning this subject, but as farre as I can learne (for I could never yet obtaine to see any of them) it was nothing so large and various as this present Treatise, and as I have heard, a translation of onely one of the Tractates, from whence I had gathered this present Discourse in part.<sup>44</sup>

The many editions of English works about Francesco Spiera attest the vogue of his story, but there is further proof of that vogue in the incidental references that were made to him in letters and in sermons, as well as in works of a more formal nature. Usually his story is held up as a warning against apostasy, as an illustration of a person who has committed the sin against the Holy Ghost. He is named in sermons along with other persons notorious for similar sins—such persons as Lot's wife, Pharaoh, Judas Iscariot, Nero, and Julian the Apostate.

The Conflict of Conscience was not the only literary treatment of the theme of Francesco Spiera's apostasy and despair. There were, notably, two other plays. The earlier was an obscure German play, written by an equally obscure Johannes Reinhard, bearing the title: Eine wunderliche Geschichte, Francisci Spierae, wie er inn Verzweyflung kommen, vnd in der selbigen gestorben sey. It was printed by Johannes Daubman at Königsberg in 1561.<sup>45</sup> This dramatic piece probably had no connection whatever with Wood's treatment of the same theme. Furthermore, the German work was even more mechanical and wooden than the English work. Reinhard made use of conventional dramatic motifs, one of which is the bringing of infernal spirits into the action. He assigned to the character of Spiera tedious speeches, whether he was discussing the theological problem of good works or giving expression to his repentance.<sup>46</sup> The second play was a French tragedy, Francois Spera, ou le Désespoir, printed in 1608.<sup>47</sup> The author is unknown, but the dedication is signed I.D.C.G. and is made to Claude Boucart, at one time professor of philosophy at Lausanne.<sup>48</sup> The tragedy is in verse and in five acts with choruses and no scene-division. Its plot seems to be a faithful reproduction of the story of Spiera in its essential features. Like the German play, this work seems to have no connection with The Conflict of Conscience, and to be of little merit, for it is described as a work "qui est des plus mauvais."<sup>49</sup>

<sup>44</sup> A Relation of Francis Spira, Sig. A 3 recto.

<sup>45</sup> I have relied upon Karl Goedeke, Grundriss zur Geschichte der deutschen Dichtung (Dresden, 1886), II, 393, for the title and the facts regarding the publication of this work.

<sup>46</sup> Wilhelm Creizenach, Geschichte des neuen Dramas (Halle a.S., 1923), III, 326-327, gives the best discussion of this play that I have found.

<sup>47</sup> There seems to be question regarding the place where this work was printed. The British Museum Catalogue, under G., I D.C., gives the place as [Paris?], while Jacques-Charles Brunet, Manuel du Libraire (Paris, 1865), VI, 899, gives it (Genève).

<sup>48</sup> Louis César de la Baume Le Blanc, duc de La Vallière, Bibliothèque du Théâtre français (Dresden, 1768), I, 418-419, gives the best description of this tragedy. <sup>49</sup> Ibid., p. 418.

In England there probably was a ballad which dealt with the story of Francesco Spiera, for in the Stationers' Register under the date of June 15, 1587, John Charlewood is listed as having paid four pence "for printinge A ballad of master FFRAUNCIS an Italian a Doctor of Lawe who denied the lord JESUS &c."<sup>50</sup> This ballad seems not to have survived.

The subject of Francesco Spiera's despair was still live enough to inspire a poetic treatment of it by a miscellaneous writer of the latter half of the nineteenth century, James Hain Friswell.<sup>51</sup> Among Friswell's many publications was a volume, printed in London, 1865, bearing the title Francis Spira, and other poems.

Obviously Wood could have got the outline of the story from many sources: he could have used Latin, Italian, and German tracts, he could have pieced his play together from all the various narratives concerning Spiera that were available to him. He seems, however, to have done the simplest thing he could, to have used one version of the history of Spiera; namely, the English translation of Gribaldi's work made by Aglionby and called A notable and marueilous Epistle. Two editions of this work, of 1550 and about 1570, had appeared before the publication of Wood's play in 1581. Although it cannot be definitely proved that Wood used the second edition of about 1570, he is more likely to have used that one, since it came out while he was a student at Cambridge.

That Wood did use A notable and marueilous Epistle can be seen from the verbal parallels between the two works. These are very close in spite of the fact that it is in prose, while The Conflict of Conscience is in rhyme royal. Two brief parallels will suffice.

The Conflict of Conscience

But it as easely may be done, as you may with one spoone,
At once take vp the water cleane, which in the seas abide:
And at one draught, then drink it vp,
this shall ye doe as soone,
As to my brest of true beleefe, one sparkle shall betide:

Tush, you which are in prosperous state, & my paines haue not tried Doe think it but an easy thing, a sinner to repent
Him of his sinnes, and by true faith, damnation to preuent.

A notable and marueilous Epistle

But this is euen as possible as to take the whole water of the sea, in one spoon, and to drinke it vppe at a draughte. . . .

You that are in blessed estate suppose thys an easie thing to be done, that a sinner reknowledging his fault, may lift vp himselfe to hope and faith towards God, and therefore ye exhort me, for as much as ye see me re-

<sup>50</sup> Arber, Stationers' Register, II, 472.

<sup>51</sup> DNB, XX, 277-278.

The healthfull neede not Phisicks art, and ye which are all haile,
 Can giue good counsell to the sick,
 their sicknesse to eschew;
 But here alas, confusion, and hell,
 doth mee assaile,
 And that all grace, from me is reft, I finde it to be true.
 My heart is steele, so that no faith,
 can from the same insue.
 I can conceiue no hope at all, of pardon or of grace,
 But out alas, Confusion is alway before my face. (Sig. I i recto)

I pray you answer me herein, where you by deepe dispaire,
 Say, you are worse here in this lyfe,
 then if you were in hell,
 And for because to haue death come,
 you alway make your prayer,
 As though your soule and body both,
 in torments great did dwell:
 If that a man should giue to you a sword, I pray you tell,
 Would you destroy your selfe there with? as doe the desperate,
 Which hange or kill, or into fouds, themselues precipitate.

Philologus.

Giue me a sworde, then shall you know, what is in mine intent.

Eusebius.

Not so my friend, I onely aske, what heerein were your will?

Philologus.

I cannot, neither will I tell, wherto I would be bent. (Sig. I iii recto) pentaunt and sorowful, that I would conceiue some hope and trust to rise againe: The helthfull hath no neede of a Phisition: and he that is whole, can soon giue counsell to the sicke. But herein an I tormented: this is my hel, this is my confusion and desperation, that I knowe all / grace to be taken from me, that I feele my heart hardened, that I can not beleue nor hope any thing at all of the atonement and mercie of God.

(Sig. B v recto-verso)

Maister Frauncis, I praye you aunswere me. for as much as through vtter desperation, ye saye, that in this lyfe ye are worse, than if ye were with the dāpned folke in hell: and for as much as I see you cōtinually to wish for death, that ye might go to hell, as though now, / bothe your body and soule were in more painefull torment, as yee doe opely wytnesse. I demaūd of you, if ye had a sworde in your hande: would ye kyll your selfe (as all desperate persones for the moste part doe) that haue sticked themselues with weapon, or strangled themselues by hanging. Then saide he, giue me a sworde, and ye shalt see what I will
 doe. Nay (sayde I) I doe but desire you to shewe vs your will: I can not tell (saide he) neyther can I saye what my will thē should be.

(Sig. C ii recto-verso)

There are many other passages in The Conflict of Conscience that can be shown to have been taken almost directly from this source.<sup>52</sup>

<sup>52</sup> Other parallels may be found as follows:

Conflict of Conscience

Sig. G ii recto-verso

Sig. H ii recto-verso

Sig. H ii verso-H iii recto

Sig. H iii verso

A notable and marueilous Epistle

Sig. A vi recto-verso

Sig. A vii verso

Sig. A viii recto-verso

Sig. B i

Although Nathaniel Wood used A notable and marueilous Epistle as the source of the main part of The Conflict of Conscience, more than half of the play seems not to have a definite source. Gribaldi's work has not even a suggestion in it for the entire first scene of Act I, and the mass of the material in the early part of the play is not found in the narratives concerning Spiera.

This material comes from what may be called conventional sources. The play teems with illustrations and passages taken from the Bible and with references to Biblical characters and incidents, sometimes retelling of some parable or scene,<sup>53</sup> sometimes mentioned in such a way as to suggest the details of the stories.<sup>54</sup> Often in this first part of the play there are woven into the text verses from the Bible, altered very little in order to fit the stanza.<sup>55</sup> There appear also fairly exact references to various books of the Bible, as sources either of statements made or of additional material on the subject being discussed.<sup>56</sup> It is quite probable that in many cases Wood did not go directly to the Bible; he merely used texts that had already been rephrased in discussions of various theological and ethical problems. Very probably he did not have any one discussion in mind; he merely made the usual explanations of perplexing questions, and for such he would not need an exact source.

That Wood's themes and treatment of them are the usual ones can be seen by a comparison of passages from his work with passages from

Sig. H iii verso—H iv recto
 Sig. H iv recto
 Sig. H iv verso
 Sig. H iv verso
 Sig. H iv verso—I i recto
 Sig. I i recto
 Sig. I i verso
 Sig. I i verso
 Sig. I ii recto
 Sig. I ii recto-verso
 Sig. I ii verso
 Sig. I ii verso
 Sig. I iii recto
 Sig. I iii verso
 Sig. I iii verso
 Sig. I iv recto

Sig. B i verso
 Sig. B ii recto
 Sig. B ii verso
 Sig. B iv recto
 Sig. B iv verso
 Sig. B iii verso
 Sig. B vi recto-verso
 Sig. B vi verso—B vii recto
 Sig. B vii recto-verso
 Sig. B vii verso—B viii recto
 Sig. B viii verso
 Sig. B viii verso—C i recto
 Sig. C i recto-verso
 Sig. C ii verso—C iii recto
 Sig. B ii verso
 Sig. B v verso

I have already briefly pointed out Wood's dependence upon A notable and marueilous Epistle in a letter in LTLS (November 23, 1933), p. 840.

<sup>53</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. A iii recto and Sig. B ii recto.

<sup>54</sup> Ibid., Sig. B i recto; the whole page is dotted with names of Biblical characters.

<sup>55</sup> Ibid., Sig. B ii recto, where Romans 5 · 3-4 is quoted, and Sig. F iii verso, where Matthew 10:28 is the verse that is quoted.

<sup>56</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. A iv recto, B i recto, and B ii verso.

other writings of the period. In The Conflict of Conscience, Act 1, scene ii, Mathetes asks Philologus to discuss

The cause why God doth such afflictions sende,
Into his Church.<sup>57</sup>

Of course the sixteenth century had no monopoly upon discussions of the question, why the righteous should suffer adversities. Interest in that problem is older than the Book of Job. But the people of the sixteenth century lived in troublous times, and many who attempted to exemplify in their lives what they thought to be truth and righteousness were called upon to suffer hardships on that account, so that it is not to be wondered at that frequent efforts were made to draw up reasonable explanations of God's affliction of the righteous. Sometimes these take the form of treatises dealing with it alone,<sup>58</sup> sometimes they take the form of chapters or sections of some longer work.<sup>59</sup> Philologus, in complying with the request of Mathetes, gives at least nine reasons why the righteous must suffer affliction, and then Mathetes summarizes these.<sup>60</sup> That the explanation of the question of God's purposes in afflicting the righteous which Philologus and Mathetes work out is made up of current ideas on the subject can be deduced from the fact that almost all of the reasons given in the play can be found in other works of the period. In the first place, some of the chapter headings of Coverdale's A Spiritual and Most Precious Pearl show that the lines of argument used are similar to those used in The Conflict of Conscience.<sup>61</sup> Furthermore, there are passages to be found in the literature of the time which present ideas parallel to those in Wood's play.<sup>62</sup> It is possible to multiply instances of parallel ideas between The Conflict of Conscience and contemporary treatises on theological subjects, particularly on the questions of the supremacy of the pope and of the sacrament.

A third source of conventional material that Wood used is made up of

<sup>57</sup> Sig. A iv verso

<sup>58</sup> Miles Coverdale, "A Spiritual and Most Precious Pearl" in the Writings and Translations of Myles Coverdale, edited for the Parker Society by George Pearson (Cambridge, 1844), pp. 84-194.

<sup>59</sup> Roger Hutchinson, "The Image of God," Chapter XI, in The Works of Roger Hutchinson, edited for the Parker Society by John Bruce (Cambridge, 1842), pp. 57-60; John Marbeck, A Booke of Notes and Commonplaces (London, 1581), pp. 18-20.

<sup>60</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. B i verso-B ii recto.

<sup>61</sup> Coverdale, Writings, pp. 95, 116, 123, 127, 129.

<sup>62</sup> Some passages which are notably like those in The Conflict of Conscience are as follows: Marbeck, A Booke of Notes and Commonplaces, p. 19; Pietro Martire Vermigli, The Common Places (London, 1583), II, 366 b; John Veron, A stronge battery against the Idolatrous inuocation of the dead Saintes (London, 1562), fol. 5 recto; Henry Bullinger, The tragedies of tyrants (London, 1575), fols. 115 verso and 117 verso.

anti-Catholic works of all kinds. The sections of The Conflict of Conscience which seem to draw most freely on anti-Catholic literature are Act I, scene i, and Act III, scene iv. The first is a monologue of about three pages in which Satan describes his present plight and lays plans for the future. Since his domination in the world is being threatened, he must introduce measures by which it can be maintained. Satan boasts of mischief he had perpetrated in times past, and claims the pope as his son. In conclusion Satan says this son, the pope, has two champions, Avarice and Tyranny, and now a third helper is to be Hypocrisy. This whole passage is full of echoes from anti-Catholic works. Satan's plans for the overthrow of Christ's kingdom, the description of the pope as a child of Satan, and the pope's alliance with tyranny, avarice, and hypocrisy are common features of anti-Catholic treatises as well as of other anti-Catholic dramas.<sup>63</sup> As is usual in such works, avarice is considered to be the especial vice of the clergy. The Catholic priest in The Conflict of Conscience is conceived of as being so bent upon increasing the commercial value of his position that he wishes the sacraments might be sold to the people who, he is sure, would gladly pay thirty pence for them.<sup>64</sup> This conception of the priest is not peculiar to Wood, for the character, Lucifer, in an earlier anti-Catholic work, predicts that the clergy will not be ashamed to sell the masses for money.<sup>65</sup>

The delineation of the Catholic priest in The Conflict of Conscience as an exceedingly ignorant person is also owing at least in part to the anti-Catholic literature of the time. In several of Bale's works the ignorance of the Catholic priests is stressed.<sup>66</sup> A passage in Pierre Boaistuau, Theatrum Mundi, the Theatre or rule of the world, a translation from French, presents a Protestant conception of the Catholic priest that is similar to the character of Caconos, the priest in Wood's play.<sup>67</sup> Furthermore, the Catholic priest is so often represented as a lover of ale<sup>68</sup> that it seems <sup>63</sup> See John Bale, A declaration of Edmonde Bonners articles (London, 1561), Sig. * ii recto, fols. 12 recto, 24 recto, 55 recto, 62 verso, passim; "A Comedy concerning Three Laws of Nature, Moses and Christ" and "A Tragedy of John, King of England" in The Dramatic Writings of John Bale, edited by J. S. Farmer (London, 1907), pp. 1-82 and 171-294; "Lusty Juventus" and "New Custom" in Hazlitt's Dodsley, II, 41-102 and III, 1-52; and the recently discovered Fable of Philargyrie, printed by Robert Crowley and probably written by him, which has been published in facsimile with a short introduction by W. A. Marsden (London, 1931).

<sup>64</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. D iii verso-D iv recto.

<sup>65</sup> Bernardine Ochino, A tragoedia, or Dialogue of the vniuste vsurped primacie of the Bishop of Rome (London, 1549), Sig. X i verso.

<sup>66</sup> A declaration, fol. 20; Three Laws, p. 41.

<sup>67</sup> Boaistuau's work was translated by John Alday, and the first edition was published about 1566, according to the Short-Title Catalogue, no. 3168. The edition I used was published in London, 1581. The passage referred to is to be found on p. 115.

<sup>68</sup> Kirchmeyer, The popish kingdome, fol. 18 verso; Luke Shepherd, "Doctour Double Ale" in Remains of Early Popular Poetry of England edited by W. C. Hazlitt (London, 1866), III, 307, 311, passim.

reasonable to conclude that Caconos' statement, "Ay had rather han a cup af nale than a Testament,"<sup>69</sup> is a conventional Protestant idea of the extent of the ignorance and corruption of a Catholic priest. When Caconos is enlarging upon the fact that he cannot read his breviary but must depend upon the pictures for his knowledge of what is in the book, he gives a lengthy speech in which some of the saints are mentioned together with their beneficent qualities. After this speech Tyranny says,

What? this Parson, seemeth connyng to be,
And as farre as I see, in a good vniformytie:
Yea, he is well red, in that golden Legend.<sup>70</sup>

Caconos then explains that he gives the Golden Legend more credence than he gives the New Testament, for the former is authorized by the pope, while the latter is in part forbidden. This attitude of Caconos toward the Golden Legend is in keeping with the attitude attributed to the Catholics toward that work in anti-Catholic works.<sup>71</sup>

Furthermore, this passage shows Wood's use of another conventional source of material, the Golden Legend. As in the case of the Bible, it is very possible that Wood did not go directly to the Golden Legend for his material, but that it is the ultimate source is obvious from Tyranny's quick recognition of Caconos' comments as coming from that source. Moreover, a study of the lives of the saints that appear in the Golden Legend does in a considerable number of cases show reasons for the attribution to them of the particular beneficent qualities which Caconos gives them. This is especially notable in regard to St. Sylvester, St. George, and St. Rocke.<sup>72</sup> Since, however, not all of Caconos' statements concerning the saints are to be found in the Golden Legend, Wood doubtless had some source other than it, but it is fairly obvious that some of the material is very close to the Golden Legend and has ultimately to be traced to that source.<sup>73</sup>

There seems to have been a tendency on the part of Protestants to consider Catholics as unduly devoted to astrology.<sup>74</sup> Wood makes use of this opinion when he has Hypocrisy, who is one of the pope's helpers, give a long monologue in Act II, scene i, in which he describes the influences

<sup>69</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. D iv recto.

<sup>70</sup> Ibid., verso.

<sup>71</sup> See Thomas Becon, Prayers and Other Pieces, edited for the Parker Society by John Ayre (Cambridge, 1844), pp. 234, 519, 535; John Jewel, Works, edited for the Parker Society by John Ayre (Cambridge, 1845-50), I, 265; IV, 816; James Pilkington, Works, edited for the Parker Society by James Scholefield (Cambridge, 1842), p. 18.

<sup>72</sup> Cf. Jacobus de Varagine, The Golden Legend or Lives of the Saints as Englished by William Caxton, edited by F. S. Ellis (London, [1900]), II, 199-201; III, 133; V, 3.

<sup>73</sup> In Bale's Three Laws, pp. 19-20, there is a similar list of saints and the benefits they bestow upon men; but Bale is very obviously letting his character ridicule such ideas, while Wood intends Caconos to be seriously stating his beliefs.

<sup>74</sup> Kirchmeyer, The popish kingdome, fol. 44 recto-verso.

of the various planets upon the natures of those born under their signs. He is particularly explicit in his description of his own nature.<sup>75</sup> Hypocrisy's entire monologue illustrates further Wood's dependence upon conventional material which can be traced to an ultimate source. The source in this case is the encyclopedic work on medieval science by Bartholomæus Anglicus which had been translated into English by John of Trevisa in 1397. Here again it is a question whether Wood ever used the actual text of Bartholomæus, or may not more probably have used some of its ideas that were current.<sup>76</sup>

Wood also makes a considerable use of another type of conventional material—proverbs. Sometimes he incorporates into the text of his play proverbs in complete and formal statements;<sup>77</sup> sometimes he gives proverbs in their exact Latin forms and then translates them more or less elaborately; and in at least one instance he uses a Latin proverb for which he gives no translation.<sup>78</sup> On the other hand, he sometimes merely alludes to familiar proverbs or uses proverbial ideas which seem not to have taken the fixed form of proverbs.<sup>79</sup> He also uses a considerable number of proverbial expressions which are often intended to be comic.

Wood's use of proverbial literature, of astrological ideas, of saints' lore, of anti-Catholic literature, of current treatments of theological and ethical problems, and of the Bible shows that, where he could not depend upon his chief source, A notable and marueilous Epistle, his work abounds in ideas that were the common stock of many Elizabethan writers.

The Conflict of Conscience, although called a comedy on the title-page, was clearly intended to be a moral play, and in general shows the structure and main features of that type. The author's statement in the Prologue that comedy must not touch particularly the vices of one private man and that the law of decorum must be observed in presenting scenes of mirth is, however, an indication of classical precedent.<sup>80</sup> Furthermore, the work is divided into acts and scenes, the latter usually according to the classical principle that the entrance or exit of an important character makes a new scene. Thus the drama, although a fairly late survival of the moral play, bears marks of the transition that was taking place.

On the whole Wood followed his principal source, A notable and marueilous Epistle, closely. His versification of it made necessary minor changes in the order of words as well as additions and omissions of words. But Wood also made some alterations not necessarily called for metri-

<sup>75</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. B iii recto.

<sup>76</sup> See Balman vppon Bartholome, his Booke De Proprietatibus Rerum (London, 1582), fol. 131 recto-verso (Book VIII, Chapter 27), fol. 352 verso (Book XVIII, Chapter 21).

<sup>77</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. A ii verso, C ii verso, C iv recto, D ii recto, verso, F iii verso, F iv recto, verso.

<sup>78</sup> Ibid., Sig. B iii verso, B iv recto, C iii recto, C iv recto.

<sup>79</sup> This is especially notable in the Prologue. <sup>80</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. A ii verso.

cally, but showing that he had a sense of discrimination. He omitted descriptive passages, tiresome repetitions, some theological discussions, some Biblical illustrations, and a few incidents, the most notable being the actual recantation of Philologus, which is narrated in the source.<sup>81</sup> If Wood omitted some parts of his source, he also added material even in the sections of the play that are close parallels to the source. Such additions are of Biblical material or are details about persons mentioned or subjects discussed. Finally he added a summary of what he considered the purpose of the whole play to be.<sup>82</sup> Occasionally he rearranged matter taken over from the source, the new order usually being more dramatic.

The most interesting use that Wood made of his source was his development of minor parts of it into larger aspects of the play. The scene in which Philologus teaches his friend Mathetes (Act I, scene ii), the trial scene (Act IV, scene i), and that which portrays the conflict between Conscience and Sensual Suggestion (Act IV, scene iii) all seem to have been developed from hints in A notable and marueilous Epistle.

Besides the characters Wood took over from his source, he also created characters from slight suggestions in it. Such are Mathetes, Caconos, Spirit, Conscience, Horror, and the sons of Philologus, Gisbertus and Paphinitius. Furthermore, the line which Wood followed in developing Philologus as a man fond of talk, fond of discussing serious questions, was probably prompted by John Calvin's description of Spiera in the preface to Gribaldi's narrative.<sup>83</sup> Thus Philologus is transformed from a particular Italian lawyer into a universal type. Wood also aimed to develop Theologus and Eusebius into such types, but less happily.

Most of the remaining figures in the drama are characterized conventionally. Caconos, however, is not a conventional figure, although the idea that the Catholic priests were ignorant and most of the matter of Caconos' talk have been shown to have been current in anti-Catholic literature. Nor is Caconos remarkable because he speaks in a dialect. There were earlier examples of characters who spoke in dialect, a well-known one being that of Hodge in Gammer Gurton's Needle. But Caconos is unusual in that he speaks a dialect that is intended to be Northern, presumably Scottish.<sup>84</sup> The appearance of this dialect used by a Catholic priest is the origin of the plausible idea that Wood is intending to ridicule

<sup>81</sup> A notable and marueilous Epistle, Sig. A vii recto

<sup>82</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. I iii verso-I iv recto.

<sup>83</sup> A notable and marueilous Epistle, Sig. A iii recto.

<sup>84</sup> Eduard Eckhardt, Die Dialekt- und Auslandertypen des alteren Englischen Dramas (Louvain, 1910), I, 94-97, has made a study of the dialect of Caconos. His conclusions are that Wood probably intended Caconos to speak Scottish, but that Wood must have known the dialect very imperfectly, for while Scottish and Northern forms predominate, there are also many Midland forms in Caconos' dialect, as well as many that are invented.

Mary Queen of Scots.<sup>85</sup> It is, however, also possible that Wood's conception of the character of Caconos may have been suggested or at least strengthened by events in the history of the diocese of Norwich, for in 1571 Bishop Parkhurst had considerable trouble with a clergyman in his diocese who was a Northern man and who gave ample evidence of great ignorance and of leanings toward the papacy.<sup>86</sup> These characteristics are also those of Caconos; thus it seems not unreasonable that Wood, who was ordained at Norwich in 1571 and received a living near there in 1572, may have known of Parkhurst's difficulties with this clergyman and may thus have found the prototype of his Catholic priest. However that may be, Caconos seems to be the most original of Wood's characters.

Since the facts of Nathaniel Wood's life are meager, and his only known work is The Conflict of Conscience, it is the only evidence upon which any estimate of his ability can be based. Apparently Wood was able to recognize a good story, for the biography of Francesco Spiera does have appeal even now, and that appeal must have been much greater in the sixteenth century. Wood then tried to fit the tale into the moral play. In the story of Spiera he saw possibilities for morality figures, and developed these with some adroitness. The form was a decadent one, but it was a suitable vehicle for the dramatist's purpose, to show "which is the truth of Christ," and to teach "the wauering fayth, on which side to persist."<sup>87</sup> Wood was not without some skill in molding his source material into a morality. He carefully welded together conventional morality features and characters with his original source. He effectively carried through the play his conception of the character of Philologus. He brought in some realistic touches which lent to the whole work a little glow of life, and succeeded in giving to a few of his episodes some of the "honest mirth" promised in the Prologue. Wood nevertheless failed to bring The Conflict of Conscience much above a level that could have been reached by any quick-witted university man of his day. He was hampered by his theological inclinations and by the controversial nature of his subject.

CELESTA WINE

Oak Park Junior College

<sup>85</sup> Ibid., p. 94, Louis B. Wright, "Social Aspects of some Related Moralities," Anglia, L.IV (1930), 114, note 1.

<sup>86</sup> John Strype, The Life and Acts of Matthew Parker (Oxford, 1821), II, 85-97.

<sup>87</sup> Conflict of Conscience, Sig. I iv recto.

THOMAS DELONEY'S EUPHUISTIC LEARNING AND THE FOREST

THOMAS DELONEY'S four novels are generally praised for their vigor of style and their realism. Indeed, his modern editor, Mr. F. O. Mann, in singling out for commendation "his faithful and sympathetic rendering of commonplace human life," insists that in Deloney is to be found "the highest achievement of the Elizabethan novel."<sup>1</sup> Not infrequently, however, Deloney's "commonplace human life" yields to high-flown and altogether improbable romances of earls and ladies, princes and princesses, kings and queens, just as his ordinary familiar prose style at times is embellished with all the euphuistic tricks he was capable of imitating. In particular his apparently casual references to strange birds, queer beasts, and other wonders of nature and to historical and mythological characters give a surprising air of learning; and the notes of his various editors suggest that he was acquainted with such authors as Boccaccio, Belleforest, Pliny, Sextus Empiricus, and Cornelius Nepos.<sup>2</sup>

Silk-weaver and ballad-writer, Deloney was presumably a man of meager education. His very occupation, not to mention the general inaccessibility of learned books to the laboring class, make it improbable that he was at all familiar with, say, many Latin and Italian works. But a ready and easy way to establish freely a reputation for erudition was available to all the Elizabethans, and the novelists without exception took advantage of it: by borrowing word for word from learned English compilations. The educational system and the taste of the age encouraged such borrowing, and evidently no novelist had any scruples in doing so. Batman vppon Bartholome (1582), not Pliny, was one of Deloney's chief guides through the jungles of natural history and euphuism (according to Nann); but another, not heretofore pointed out, was Fortescue's The Forest.

The Forest or Collection of Historyes no lesse profitable, then pleasant and necessary, doone out of Frenche into English, by Thomas Fortescue first appeared in 1571, but I have seen only the edition of 1576. Its popularity is attested by the translator's prefatory comment that it was composed "in the Spanish first, by Petrus Messia [or Pedro Mexia] a Gentleman of Siuile, and thence doon into the Italian, and last into the French by Claudius Gruget late Citizen of Paris." Somewhat amusingly, The Forest is listed in J. J. Jusserand's The English Novel in the Time of Shakespeare<sup>3</sup> and in The Cambridge History of English Literature<sup>4</sup> as a collection of short stories—as fiction. To be sure The Forest is largely fiction, but it is not a novel or a series of tales. The compiler and the translator no doubt believed everything in the book, no matter how remarkable, to be true; and on its bountiful examples of the unusual and wonderful the Elizabethan novelists fell with delight. From it Brian Melbancke, as I shall show elsewhere, took literally dozens of classical illustrations and wonders of nature to decorate his novel Philotimus (1583), changing scarcely a word. From it John Lyly lifted occasional passages.<sup>5</sup> That Deloney followed suit is only to be expected. Below I give illustrations of how The Forest supplied him with wise saws as well as ancient and modern instances.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The Works of Thomas Deloney (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1912), pp. xiv, xxx.

<sup>2</sup> For example, A. F. Lange, The Gentle Craft by Thomas Deloney, Palaestra, xviii (1903), xxxiii, explains a reference to Iphicrates as based upon a reading of Cornelius Nepos and Plutarch; and Mann (p. 517) and W. J. Halliday, Deloney's Gentle Craft (Oxford, 1928), p. 94, partially duplicate his note. For the real source used by Deloney see p. 000, below.

DELONEY

the Bel-weather of her flocke fancying one of the Eawes aboue the rest, and seeing Gratis the Shepheard abusing her in abominable sort (subuerting the law of Nature) . . . found the said Shepheard sleeping in the field, and suddenly ranne against him in such violent sort, that . . . he beat the braines out of the Shepheards head and slew him (7).

if there be a Lyon in the field, here is neuer a cocke to feare him (28).

like Herostratus the Shoomaker that burned the Temple of Diana, onely to get himself a name (30).

FORTESCUE

the Shepheard Cratis . . . who beeing a sleep on a mountain . . . was slain of a male Gote, ielous of his mate (with which Cratis moste abhominably had subuerted the lawes of Nature (E2).<sup>7</sup>

The mightie Lyon dreadeth and feareth the Cock (Aa3).<sup>8</sup> a lewde person considering of this so rich and so renowned a woork [i.e. Diana's Ephesian temple], desired still in hart (which he after did) to burn it, and beeing apprehended im-

<sup>3</sup> (London, 1903), p. 81.

<sup>4</sup> (New York, 1911), III, 605.

<sup>5</sup> Editing The Complete Works of John Lyly (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1902), R. W. Bond notes one instance (I, 249). Another is the reference to "the Vine [that] beareth three grapes" (II, 54, and see also I, 248), which came from Fortescue, sig. Dd2<sup>v</sup>. Lyly could, however, have learned about the three grapes in William Baldwin's A treatise of Morall philosophy (1555 [?] ed.), sig. E4, where also occur (sigs. G8<sup>v</sup>, D1<sup>v</sup>-D2) Deloney's "chast-hearted Xenocrates" (p. 78) and his philosopher Thales (p. 250).

<sup>6</sup> The references are to Mann's edition by pages, to Fortescue's book by signatures.

<sup>7</sup> In Philotimus (1583), sig. 03, Melbancke likewise borrows the story of "Eratis."

<sup>8</sup> So Melbancke, sig. D4, writes: "The Lion feares the little crowing cocke."

DELONEY

Marry . . . to see these maidens get their liuing as Bulls doe eate their meate. . . . By going still backward (33).

O . . . the huge Elephant was neuer more fearefull of the silly sheep . . . (40).

And as a certaine spring in Arcadia makes men to starue that drinke of it: so did poore Benedicke. . . . shee wisht them to rub him with the sweat of a Mule, to asswage his amorous passion, or to fetch him some of the water in Boetia, to coole & extinguish the heate of his affection (48).

FORTESCUE

mediatly vppon the fact, confest that he had for none other cause doone it, but that his fame might liue, him selfe eche where remembred, for euer of the posteritie. . . . Strabo and Solinus . . . call him Herostratus (Kk2<sup>v</sup>).<sup>9</sup>

This beast [the bull] feedeth contrary to all others, for in taking his repast he goeth alwaies backwardes all others of what soeuer kinde, marching stil on-wards (Q3).

The monstrous and huge Elephant . . . trembleth at the presence and sight of a Sheepe (Aa3<sup>v</sup>).

They [Solinus and others] again remember vs of an other [well] in Arcadia, of which who so drinketh, sterueth immediatly (S4).

Plinie saith that against this passion it shalbe good to take that dust or poulder, wheron a Mule hath in any place waltered or soyled her self, sprinckling or casting the same on y<sup>e</sup> amorous or as Cardanus wil in his book of sottleties, to rub him with y<sup>e</sup> sweat of a Mule hot & wel chafed (Dd2).

The said Authors . . . remember vs, of two other fountaines or Springs in Boetia. . . . Of two others also, th' one moouing and prouoking men to venery, the other drunck, cooleth and mortifieth these affections (s4).<sup>10</sup>

<sup>9</sup> At sig. L2<sup>v</sup> Melbancke likewise borrows this story of "Erastus." There is some reason to believe that Deloney took it from Thomas Bowes's translation of Pierre de la Primaudaye, The French Academie (1586), p. 196, since his reference (p. 50), "Artemisa being a Heathen Lady, loued her husband so well, that shee drunke vp his ashes, and buried him in her owne bowels," seems from its wording to come from Bowes, p. 519, "Artemisia Queene of Caria, for the great loue she bare to hir husband that was dead, dranke all the ashes of his bodie, meanyng thereby to be his sepulchre."

<sup>10</sup> Compare Melbancke, sig. 03<sup>v</sup>: "carrie the dust about thee, wherein a mule sweating hath wallowed, or annoint thy selfe with the stale of a mule, and this thy loue will turne to hate."

DELONEY

he . . . is now a starke foole, being by thy beauty bereft of wit, as if hee had drunk of the riuer Cea, & like bewitching Circes thou hast certainly transformed him from a man to an Asse.

There are stones in Pontus . . . that the deeper they be laid in the water, the fiercer they burn (48).

there is a mutuall loue in all things: the Doue and the Peacock loue intirely, so doth the Turtle and the Popiniay: the like affection the fish Musculus beareth vnto the huge Whale, insomuch that he leadeth him from all danger of stony rocks. . . . (95).

I would be as ready to guide thee from the dangerous rocks of my Fathers wrath, as the fish called Musculus is for the Whale (96).

Much more interesting is Chapter V of Jack of Newbery—"Of the pictures which Iacke of Newbery had in his house, whereby he encouraged his seruants to seeke for fame and dignitie"<sup>11</sup>—which is copied almost verbatim from Fortescue.<sup>12</sup> A study of the parallel passages below will show how through ignorance or intention Deloney made small changes. For example, he seems to have understood artificer to mean weaver—with disastrous results to his passage; and he resolves Mexia's doubts of the origin and occupation of Marcus Aurelius by making him a cloth-weaver. Pleasant and tactful changes both, since the novel was dedicated to the cloth-workers of England.

DELONEY

[40] In a faire large Parlour . . . Iacke of Newbery had fiteene faire Pic-

FORTESCUE

In the Isle of Cea, as recordeth Plinie, there was a Fountaine, of whiche, who so drank once, became foorthwith stupide and insensible, of no more feeling or wit then an Asse (T1v).

There is also in Pontus a riuer, in which are found certain stones that wil burn, whiche also then take o fire, when the winde is euermore greatest, and by how much the more they be couered in the Water, so much the better and sooner burne they (T1v).

many things, that secretly accorde well by the priuy instinct of nature, as of the Pecock and the Pigion, the Turtle and the Poppingaie. . . . The fish in latine called Talpamarina, is aboue all other fauoured and beloued of the Whale, which as witnesseth Plime, rolleth carefully before her, aduising her where to shun the whirling gulfs and deepe holes (Aa4v).<sup>10a</sup>

FORTESCUE

[V4v] Wherefore the better to animate men to aspire to great matters, I wil

<sup>10a</sup> Here Fortescue is a parallel, not Deloney's exact source as I shall point out in a subsequent article.

<sup>11</sup> Mann, pp. 40-43.

<sup>12</sup> Sigs. V4v-X3.

DELONEY

tures . . . which he would often shew to his friends and seruants.

In the first was the Picture of a shepheard, before whom kneeled a great King named Viriat, who sometime gouerned the people of Portugall. [41] See here (quoth Iacke) the father a shepheard, the sonne a Soueraigne. This man ruled in Portugall, and made great warres against the Romanes, and after that inuaded Spaine, yet in the end was traiterously slaine.

The next was the Portraiture of Agathocles, which for his surpassing wisdom and manhood, was created King of Sicilia, and maintained battell against the people of Carthage. His father was a poore Potter, before whom he also kneeled. And it was the vse of this King, that whensoever he made a banquet, he would haue as well vessels of earth as of gold set vpon the Table, to the intent he might alwayes beare in minde the place of his beginning, his Fathers house and family.

The third was the picture of Iphicrates an Athenian born, who vanquished the Lacedemonians in plaine and open battaile. This man was Captaine Generall to Artaxerxes, King of Persia, whose father was notwithstanding a Cobler, and there likewise pictured. Eumenes was also a famous Captaine to Alexander the great, whose father was no other than a Carter.

The fourth was the similitude of Aelius Pertinax, sometime Emperour of Rome, yet was his father but a Weauer: and remember the examples of some in perticuler issuing out of meane and simple parentage, which in the end excelled in honoure and vertue. And in the first place, Viriat a portugale. . . . This man was the sonne of a poore Shepherd, and in his youth aided his father in his charge . . . the Romaines inuading the Spaniards . . . he gaue battail to the Romaines, in defence of that Countrie: which warres or rather enmitie continued xliij. yeares . . . but in fine, vnkindely by treason [he] was slain. . . .

FORTESCUE

[X1] That excellent Captain Agathocles, which for his surpassing wisdom and manhood, was created king of Sicilia and maintained cruel battail against y<sup>e</sup> people of Carthage . . . his father was a Potter . . . as oftentimes as he banquetted, [he caused] his table to be furnished wth vessels aswel of clay as also of Golde or siluer, to th' intent he stil might haue in minde and remember the place of his beginning, his fathers house & family . . . .

Iphicrates an Athenian . . . he vanquished the Lacedemonians in plain and open battail . . . . The same he was whome Artaxerxes king of Persia, assigned Captain generall ouer all his whole armye. . . . Yet know we . . . that he was the sonne of none other then of a poore Cobler. I had almoste past ouer Eumenes one of the moste worthyest Capitains of Alexander . . . beeing the Sonne of a poore man, and as some deeme a Carter. . . .

[X1v] Elius Partinax Emperour of Rome, was y<sup>e</sup> sonne of a certain Artificer . . . and afterwarde to giue ex-afterward, to giue example to others of low condition to beare mindes of worthy men, he caused the shop to be beautified with Marble curiously cut, wherein his father before him was wont to get his liuing.

DELONEY

The fift was the picture of Dioclesian, that so much adorned Rome with his magnificall and triumphant victories. This was a famous Emperour, although no other than the sonne of a Booke-binder.

Valentinian stood the next, painted most artificially, who was also crowned Emperour, and was but the sonne of a poore Rope-maker: as in the same picture was expressed; where his father was painted by him, vsing his trade.

The seuenth was the Emperour Probus, whose father being a Gardener, was pictured by him holding a spade.

The eighth picture was of Marcus Aurelius, whom euery age honoureth, he was so wise and prudent an Emperour; yet was he but a Cloth-weauers son

The ninth was the Portraiture of the valiant Emperour Maximinus, the son of a Blacksmith, who was there painted as he was wont to worke at the Anuill.

In the tenth table was painted the Emperour Gabianus, who at the first was but a poore shepherd.

Next to this picture, was placed the pictures of two Popes of Rome, whose wisdomes and learning aduanced them to that dignite. The first was the liuely Counterfeit of Pope Iohn the 22 whose father was a Shoemaker: hee being elected Pope, encreased their rents and patrimonie greatly.

FORTESCUE

ample to others of lowe condition, he caused the Shop to be doone about with Marble curiously cut, where his father before him wrought to get his liuing . . .

Dioclecian that so much adorned Roome with his magnificall and triumphant victories, was the sonne of none other then a common Scribe or Notary, some say that his father was a Booke binder. . . .

Valentinian was also crowned Emperour, but was the Sonne notwithstanding of a Roper

The Emperour Probus had to Father a Gardiner.

The renowned Aurelius whome euery age honoureth, issued out of so obscure a family, that the Historiographers lesse agree among them selues, of his spring and beginning.

Maximinus also was the sonne of a Smith, or as others some wil, a Carter. . . .

Galerus also, in the beginning a Shepherd. From this hauty and supreme dignitie, let vs descend to the Sea of Rome, vnto which aspired men of like condition with the others. As Pope Iohn the xxij. which was the Sonne of a Shoemaker, a Frenchman borne, notwithstanding for his learning and wisdomes, elected Bishop which increased their rents and patrimony busily. . . .

DELONEY

The other was the Picture of Pope Sixtus the fourth of that name, being a poore Marriners son.

[42] The thirteenth Picture was of Lamusius King of Lombardie, who was no better than the son of a common Strumpet: being painted like a naked childe walking in the water, and taking hold of the poynt of a Launce, by the which hee held fast, and saued himselfe. The reason whereof, was this: After his lewde mother was deliuered of him,<sup>13</sup> shee vnnaturally threw him into a deepe stinking Ditch, wherein was some water. By hap king Agilmond passed that way, and found this childe almost drowned; who mouing him softly with the point of his Launce, the better to perceiue what hee was, the childe (though then newly borne) tooke hold thereof with one of his pretty hands, not suffering it to slide or slip away againe: which thing the King considering, being amazed at the strange force of this yongue little Infant, caused it to be taken vp, and carefully to be fostered. And because the place where hee found him was called Lama, hee named the childe Lamusius: who afterward grew to be so braue a man, and so much fauoured of Fortune, that in the end hee was crowned King of the Lombards, who liued there in honour, and in his succession after him, euen vntill the time of the vnfortunate King Albouina, when all came to ruine, subuersion and destruction.

In the fourteenth picture Primislas King of Bohemia was most artificially drawne; before whom there stood an

FORTESCUE

Pope Sixtus the iiij . . . had to father a poore Sea man or mariner. . . .

[X2] The third of which [kings of "Lumberdy"] hauing to name Lamusius, was the Sonne of a beggerly and common Strumpet, which also beeing deliuered at the same time of two other children threw them into a deep and stinking ditch, in which also was some kinde of water: by hap King Agelmonde passing that way, found this Childe almoste drowned in the water, and mouing him softly with the end of his launce . . . to the end he more perfectly might feele what it was, but this Childe euen then newly borne, feeling it self touched, taketh holde of the launce with one of his handes not letting it slip or slide from him againe, whiche thing the Prince considering, all amased at the straunge force of this yung little creature, caused it to be taken thence and carefully to be fostred: and for that the place where he founde it, was called Lama, he did him thence to be named Lamusius: whiche afterwards was such a one, and so fauoured of fortune, that in the end he was crowned King of the Lumbards, who liued [X2<sup>v</sup>] there in honoure, and his succession after him, euen vntill the time of the vnfortunate King Albouine, when all came to ruine, subuertion, and destruction.

An other matter like straunge to this, happened in Bohemia, where as one Primislas the Sonne of a Ploughman, <sup>13</sup> Edward Fenton, Certaine Secrete wonders of Nature (1569), sig. Ee 1, telling this story, remarks: "there was a certain common Woman brought forth.vij. boyes at one tyme, who for the horroure of hir sinne, cast them into the water," and so forth.

DELONEY

Horse without Bridle or Saddle, in a field where Husband-men were at plough. The cause why this King was thus painted (quoth Iacke) was this. At that time the King of the Bohemians died without issue, and great strife being amongst the Nobility for a new king, at length they all consented that a horse should bee let into the field, without bridle or saddle, hauing all determined with the most assured purpose to make him their king, before whom this horse rested: At what time it came to passe, that the horse first stayed himselfe before this Primislas, being a simple creature, who was then busie driuing the plough, they presently made him their Souereigne, who ordered himselfe and his kingdome very wisely. Hee ordained many good lawes, hee compassed the Citie of Prague with strong walles, besides many other things, meriting perpetuall laud and commendations.

The fifteenth was the Picture of Theophrastus, a Philosopher, a counsellor of Kings, and companion of Nobles, who was but sonne of a Taylor. . . .

FORTESCUE

was then chosen king when he moste busily was labouring y<sup>e</sup> soil in the feeld. For at that time the Bohemians not knowing whome they might chuse for their king, did to passe out a horse vnbridled into the feelds, letting him go whether it best liked him, hauing all determined with moste assured purpose to make him their king, before whome this horse arrested, so came it then to passe that the Horse first stayed him before this Primislas, busied then in turning the gleabe, a simple Carter: so beeing forthwith confirmed (as is before) their souerain, he ordered him self and his kingdome very wisely. He ordained many good and profitable lawes, he compassed the Citie of Prague with walles besides many other things, meriting perpetuall laude and commendation. . . .

[X3] Theophrastus the philosopher, had to father a Tailor or botcher.

The foregoing examples once again show how hazardous pronouncements on the learning and the style of Elizabethan writers may be. Chapter v of Jack of Newbury has attracted considerable attention from scholars, but any deductions that they have based on it regarding Deloney's style or his knowledge of Plutarch, Cornelius Nepos, and Pliny actually apply to Thomas Fortescue or Pedro Mexia—not at all to the "author."

HYDER E. ROLLINS

Harvard University

ELIZABETHAN AND SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY
PLAY MANUSCRIPTS

ON SEVERAL occasions the present writer would have found a list of play manuscripts dating from 1558 to 1700 a convenience while working in the field. These manuscripts, impressive in number and in the possibilities for study which they offer, have never been catalogued with the care which has been lavished upon play publications. The manuscripts listed in Appendix N of E. K. Chambers' Elizabethan Stage are limited to those of plays provedly composed before 1616; and the notes concerning manuscripts interspersed in W. C. Hazlitt's Manual for the Collector and Amateur of Old English Plays are incomplete and frequently vague. The list of manuscripts which follows has been compiled after a reëxamination of the catalogues of museums and university libraries, and application by mail to the curators of such collections as those at the Folger Shakespeare Library and the Huntington Library and Art Gallery. Exhaustiveness is not claimed; but the lists already existing are considerably supplemented, and in a number of instances it has been possible to supply the precise location of manuscripts which were known but unlocated by Chambers or which have changed ownership since the time of Hazlitt.

As an instance of how a list of play manuscripts may prove useful to editors, the case of Dryden's State of Innocence may be cited. In the edition of Dryden by Montague Summers (Nonesuch Press, 1931-32) three manuscripts of this play are collated, but a fourth, that at the Huntington Library, is not even mentioned, doubtless because its existence was unknown to the editor. However, it is to the more obscure plays that one might wish the list to call attention. Some of these certainly have never been read since their own time, and offer the attraction of an adventure. After examining photostatic copies of about twenty-five such plays, the present writer is convinced that our early book-sellers were, after all, men of considerable perspicacity. But although literary gems are not discoverable here, few of these plays lack facets of historical interest; many of them might now be edited more profitably than plays which are better in quality but which are already accessible in an adequate form.

Many of the manuscripts listed are of printed plays. Some are no more than copies of early editions, but these are not always the least interesting, for at times they represent versions of stage revivals. Some of the manuscripts, such as those of Sir Thomas More and the Parnassus plays, are quite famous and have been reproduced in facsimile and extensively studied. To have included comments on such plays would have consumed much space, and would have been foreign to the nature of the present contribution, which pretends to be no more than a catalogue. In the interest of brevity also the numerous manuscripts of Latin plays have been omitted from the list. Such descriptions as "autograph" and "holograph" have been added when supplied in the catalogues from which the list has been compiled, but these should not be taken as final either in their inclusion or omission. Most of the anonymous manuscripts and most of those by authors of single plays are probably holograph, although not so indicated. When more than one manuscript of a particular play is extant, each is numbered; but these numbers indicate no priority in age or interest.

BACON, FRANCIS

Essex Entertainment 1595. Fragments appear in Lambeth MS. v. 118; ibid. viii, 274; Northumberland MS. ff. 47-53 (Burgoyne, 55); S. P. D. Eliz. ccliv, 67, 68.

Gesta Grayorum. 1594. Fragments by Bacon (?) and Francis Davison appear in Brit. Mus. MS. Harleian 541, f. 138; Inner Temple Petyt MS. 583.43, f. 294.

BARNES, JOSHUA.

The Academy. Emmanuel Coll., Camb., MS. iii. 1. 4.

Englebert. Ibid., MS. iii. 1. 4.

Landgartha. Ibid., MS. iii. 1. 2.

"English play without title." Ibid. MS. 3. 1. 4.

BAYLIE, SIMON.

The Wizard. (1) MS. in Durham Cathedral Library. (2) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 10, 306.

BEARD, THOMAS.

An Evangelicall Tragaedie, or A Harmonie of the passion of our Lord Jesus Christe. (Ded. to James I.) Brit. Mus. Royal MS. 17 D. xvii.

BEAUMONT, FRANCIS, JOHN FLETCHER, et al.

Beggar's Bush. Folger Shakespeare Library, Lombarde Volume (bound c. 1700), MS. 1487. 2.

Bonduca. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 36, 758.

The Elder Brother. Brit. Mus., Egerton MS. 1994, ff. 2-30.

The Faithful Friends. Victoria and Albert Museum, Dyce MS. 10.

The Honest Man's Fortune. Ibid., MS. 9.

The Humorous Lieutenant. (Printed by Dyce from MS. as Demetrius and Evanthe.)

The Woman's Prize. Folger Shakespeare Library, Lombarde Volume (bound c. 1700), MS. 1487.2.

BEAUMONT, SIR JOHN.

Theatre of Apollo (c. 1624). Brit. Mus., Royal MS. 18A. lxx.

BEHN, APHRA.

The Younger Brother. Bodleian Library, MS. Rawlinson, poet 195.

BERKELEY, SIR WM.

The Lost Lady. Folger Shakespeare Library, Lombard Volume (bound c. 1700), MS. 1487.2.

BIRKHEAD, or BURKHEAD, HENRY.

The Female Rebellion (1) Bodleian, MS. Tanner 466, f. 174 seq. (2) Univ. of Glasgow, MS. Hunterian 635.

BLOW, DR.

Venus and Adonis. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 22, 100. (See also Bodleian, MS. Mus. Sch. c 212, and c. 120.)

BOYLE, ROGER, EARL OF ORRERY.

The General (Altemera). (1) Oxford, Worcester College MS (2) A MS, present location unknown, printed by Halliwell in 1853. (Cf. W. S. Clark, MLN, XLIV, 1-6).

Henry the Fifth. (1) Huntington Library, MS. EL 11, 642. (This and the Huntington copy of Mustapha, cf. infra, are probably from the Bunbury collection, cf. Hist. MSS. Comm., Third Report, p. 241.) (2) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 2. (Contains list of actors) (3) Ibid., MS. Rawlinson, poet. 180.

Mustapha. (1) Huntington Library, MS. EL 11, 641. (2) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 29, 280. (3) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 5. (4) Ibid., MS. Rawlinson, poet. 27.

Tryphon. (1) Bodleian, MS. Malone 11. (2) Ibid., MS. Rawlinson, poet. 39.
Zoroastres. Brit. Mus., MS. Sloane 1828, ff. 46-79.

BROME, RICHARD

The English Moor. MS. at Lichfield Cathedral.

BROWNE, WM.

Ulysses and Circe. (1) Emmanuel Coll., Camb., MS. 68 (2) MS. in the collection of H. C. Pole-Gell. (Cf. E. K. Chambers, E.S., iv, 406.)

CARLETON, R.

The Concealed Royalty, or The May Queen (a pastoral, 1674). Bodleian, MS. Eng. poet. d 2.

The Martial Queen. (1) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 126. (2) Bodleian, MS. Eng. poet. d. 2. (Dated 1675, when privately performed.)

CARLELL, LODOWICK.

Arviragus and Philicia. Bodleian, MS. Eng. Misc. d. 11. ("Independent of the printed edition.") This copy is probably identical with that mentioned in Hist. MSS. Comm., Sixth Report, p. 312.

CARTWRIGHT, WM.

The Royal Slave. (1) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 41, 616. (2) MS. at Petworth House, Sussex. Cf. Hist. MSS. Comm., Sixth Report, p. 307. For possible other copies cf. Hazlitt's Manual, p. 200.

CAVENDISH, JANE, and ELIZABETH BRACKLEY.

The Concealed Fancies. Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 16.
A Pastoral. Ibid.

CAVENDISH, WM., DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.

The Country Captain. Brit. Mus., MS. Harleian 7650.

The Humorous Lovers. Brit. Mus., MS. Harleian 7367, Art. 1.

CAMPION, THOMAS.

The first Antimasque of Mountebanks (Gray's Inn masque of 1618, conjecturally by Campion). (1) Huntington Library, MS. H M 21. (2) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 5956, f. 76. (3) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson D 1021.

CAYWORTH, JOHN.

Enchiridion Christiados (A masque, 1636). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 10, 311.

DABORNE, ROBERT.

The Poor Man's Comfort. Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 1994, ff. 268-293.

DANIEL, SAMUEL.

Hymen's Triumph. Edinburgh Univ. Lib., Drummond MS. (partly holograph).

DAY, JOHN.

The Parliament of Bees. Brit. Mus., MS. Lansdowne 725 (autograph).

DENNY, SIR WM.

The Sheepheard's Holiday. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 34, 065 (holograph).

DRYDEN, JOHN.

The Fall of Angels, and Man in Innocence (The State of Innocence). (1) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 37, 158. (2) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson C. 146. (3) MS at Harvard College Library. (4) Huntington Library, MS. EL 11,640 (two almost identical early copies; see G. W. Whiting, TLS, Jan. 14, 1932, p. 28).

The Indian Emperor. Trinity Coll., Camb., MS. R. 3. 10.

The Indian Queen (Altered as an Opera. In score by H. Purcell). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 31,449.

DURFEY, T.

The Fond Husband. Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 52.

ELIZABETH, QUEEN OF ENGLAND.

Hercules Aetaeus (Fragment of pseudo-Senecan translation). Bodleian, MS. e Museo 55, f. 48.

FANE, MILDMAY, EARL OF WESTMORELAND.

Candy Restored. (1) Huntington Library, MS. H M 771. (2) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 34, 221, ff. 1-19b.

The Change. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 34, 221, ff. 50-70.

Don Phoebe's Triumph. Huntington Library, MS. H M 770.

Ladrones, or The Robber's Island (Drake, Cavendish, and Magellan figure in the dramatis personae). A MS. of this description, present whereabouts unknown, was on sale at Sotheby's, July 17, 1888.

De Pugna Animi. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 34, 221, ff. 125-147.

Raguaillo D'Oceano. Ibid., ff. 107b-125.

Time's Trick upon the Cards. Ibid., ff. 19b-50.

Virtue's Triumph. Ibid., ff. 70-107b.

FANSHAWE, SIR RICHARD.

To Love only to Love (Tr. of Mendoza's Queror por solo Queror). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 32, 133.

FLETCHER, PHINEAS.

Sicelides. (1) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet., 214. (2) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 4,453.

FORD, JOHN.

Perkin Warbeck. Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet., 122. (Stage adaptation of 1634 ed.)

FREEMAN, SIR RALPH.

Imperiale. Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 2948.

GASCOIGNE, GEORGE, and FRANCIS KYNWELMERSHE.

Jocasta. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 34,063.

GLAPTHORNE, HENRY.

The Lady Mother. Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 1994, ff. 212-245.

GREENE, ROBERT.

Orlando Furioso. Dulwich MS. 1. 138. (An actor's part.)

GREVILLE, FULKE.

Alaham. MS at Warwick Castle (holograph).

Mustapha. (1) MS. at Warwick Castle (holograph). (2) Cambridge Univ. MS. f. 2. 35.

HEYWOOD, THOMAS.

The Captives, or The Lost Recovered. Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 1994, ff. 52-74.

Dick of Devonshire (conjecturally by Heywood). Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 1994, ff. 30-52.

"Escapes of Jupiter" or "Calisto." (episodes from Heywood's Golden Age and Silver Age). Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 1994, ff. 74-96.

HORNE, JOHN.

Fortune's Task, or The Fickle Fair One (A pastoral, 1684). Huntington library, MS. H M 11.

JAQUES, FRANCIS.

The Queen of Corsica (1642). Brit. Mus., MS. Lansdowne 807, ff. 1-28.

JAMES I, KING OF ENGLAND.

"Wedding Masque" (fragment). Bodleian, MS. Bodl. 165, ff. 60-65.

JEFFERE, JOHN.

The Bugbears. Brit. Mus., MS. Lansdowne 807, ff. 57 seq. (Possibly by Jeffere.)

JOHNSON, LAWRENCE.

Misogonus. Huntington Library, MS. H M 452 (contemporary copy).

JONSON, BEN.

Christmas his Showe (1615). Folger Shakespeare Library Commonplace Book (probably written before 1625), MS. 2203.1.

Entertainment at the Earl of Newcastle's in Blackfriars (conjecturally ascribed to Jonson). Brit. Mus., Harley MS. 4955, ff. 48-52.

The Gypsie's Changed (Gipsies' Metamorphosis). Huntington Library, MS. H M 741 (contemporary copy).

Masque at Coleoverton (conjecturally ascribed to Jonson). Victoria and Albert Museum, Dyce MS. 36.

Masque of Queens. Brit. Mus., Royal MS. 18A. XLV (holograph).

- The Twelfth Nights Reuells* (Masque of Blackness) Brit. Mus., Royal MS 17B. xxxi (autograph)
- Volpone*. J. S. Farmer in Int. to Believe as you List states that a holograph MS. is extant, but cf. E. K. Chambers, E.S., III, 368.
- JORDAN, THOMAS.
Cupid his Coronation (1654). Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson B. 165, ff. 107-114.
- JOYNER, WILLIAM.
The Roman Empress. MS. at Worcester Coll., Oxford.
- KEIGWIN, JOHN.
The Creation of the World (1693, Tr. of Wm. Gordon's Cornish play of 1611).
 (1) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 28, 554. (2) Bodleian, MS. Corn. e. 2-3.
- KILLIGREW, SIR WM.
The Siege of Urbin. Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 29 (holograph?).
- K[IRKHAM], R.
Alfred, or Right Reinthron'd (1659). Bodleian. MS. Rawlinson, poet. 80.
- LEE, ANNE.
Love's Martyr, or Wit above Crowns. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 28,693.
- LISTER, M.
Eunuchus (Tr. Terence). Bodleian, MS. Lister 23.
- LOWER, SIR WM.
Don Japhet of Armenia (Tr. from Scarron). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 28,723.
The Three Dorotheies, or Jodelet Box'd (Tr. from Scarron). A MS, whereabouts unknown, was in the collection at Skeffington Hall.
- LUMLEY, LADY JANE.
Iphigenia (Tr. from Euripedes). Brit. Mus., Reg. 15. A. ix.
- MABBE, JAMES.
Spanish Bawd. J. M.'s Celestine, or the tragi-comedy of Calisto and Melibea, MS. at Alnwick Castle (cf. Hist. MSS. Comm., Third Report, p. 119) is probably Mabbe's play.
- MARMION, SHAKERLEY.
The Soldered Citizen. MS. extant in private hands. Cf. W. W. Greg, "Review of G. M. Sibley's Lost Plays and Masques," M L R, xxix (1934).
- MANUCHE, COSMO.
The Banish'd Shepheardess (c. 1652). Huntington Library, MS. E L 8395 (holograph).
The Feast. MS. at Worcester College, Oxford.
The Feast, The Mandrake, Agammemnon, Leontius—King of Cyprus, The Captives, Mariamne, and The Banish'd Shepheardess, and several additional manuscript plays by Manuche were discovered at Ashby by Bishop Percy. DNB., First Supp., III, 138-39, implies that they are still there, but the Index and Epitome, p. 837, states that only one is now there. However B. M. Wagner ("Manuscript Plays of the 17th Century," TLS, Oct. 4, 1934) implies that the plays are still at Ashby, and quotes from The Feast.
- MARSTON, JOHN.
Ashby Entertainment. (1) MS. at Bridgewater House, London. (2) Brit. Mus., MS. Sloane 848, f. 9 (speech of Enchantress only). (3) Huntington Library, MS. E L 34. B. 9 (partly holograph).

MASSINGER, PHILIP.

Believe as you List. Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 2828 (autograph).

The Cure of Pride, or Every one in their Way (1632. Adapt. of The City Madam?).

Huntington Library, MS. H M 95.

Sir John Van Olden Barnaveldt. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 18,653.

Parliament of Love. Victoria and Albert Museum, Dyce MS.

MAY, THOMAS.

The Tragedy of Cleopatra. Brit. Mus., Royal MS. 18 C. vii.

MERBURY, FRANCIS.

A Marriage between Wit and Wisdom. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 26, 782.

MIDDLETON, THOMAS.

A Game at Chess. (1) Bodleian, MS. Malone 25 (early draught?). (2) Trinity

Coll., Camb., MS. O. 2. 66. (written in "current hand"). (3) Brit. Mus.,

MS. Lansdowne 690. (4) MS. at Bridgewater House, London (imperfect).

(5) Huntington Library, MS. E L 34. B. 17 (partly in author's handwriting).

Hengist King of Kent (The Mayor of Quinborough). Folger Shakespeare Library, The Lombarde Volume (bound c. 1700), MS. 1487.2.

The Witch. Bodleian, MS. Malone. 12.

MILTON, JOHN.

Comus. (1) MS. at Bridgewater House, London. (2) MS. at Trinity Coll., Camb. (holograph).

MONTAGUE, WALTER.

The Shepherd's Paradise. (1) Brit. Mus., MS. Sloane 3649. (2) Brit. Mus., MS. Stowe 976.

MONTGOMERY, ALEXANDER.

Flying with Polwart (1582-83). Huntington Library, MS. H M 105.

MOTTEAU, P.

The Island Princess. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 15,318 (libretto with original music).

MOUNTFORT, W.

The Launching of the Mary, or the Seaman's Honest Wife. Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 1994, ff. 318 seq.

MUNDAY, ANTHONY.

John a Kent and John a Cumber. Huntington Library, MS. H M 500 (holograph).

NEALE, THOMAS.

The Ward. Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet, 79.

PARKHURST, FERDINANDO.

Ignoramus. (Two copies of close, one of paraphractical translation of Ruggles' play, for acting at Cockpit in Drury Lane, 1662.) MS. of Marquis of Westminster, Eaton Hall, Chester. Cf. Hist. MSS. Comm., Third Report, p. 215.

PERCY, WILLIAM.

The Faery Pastorall, or Forrest of Elves.

Aphrodysial, or Sea Feast.

Arabia Sitiens, or A Dream of a Dry Year.

Cuck-Queans and Cuckolds Errant, or The Bearing Down the Inne.

Cupid's Sarcifice, or a Country's Tragedy in Vacuniam.

Necromantes, or the Two Supposed Heads.

All in Comoedyes and Pastoralls with their Songs. Huntington Library, MS. H M 4 (holograph).

PITCAIRNE, ARCHIBALD.

The Assembly. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 11,503 (transcript of ed. of 1691).

POPPLE, W.

The Cid (Tr. from Corneille). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 8888.

Tamerlane the Beneficent. Brit. Mus., MS. Add. 8888. (These two pieces are said by Hazlitt to be in the handwriting of Popple, nephew of Andrew Marvell.)

RANDOLPH, T.

Aristippus, and The Conceited Pedler. (1) Brit. Mus., MS. Sloane 2531, ff. 124-140b. (2) University of Edinburgh, MS. Laing, III, 493.

RANT, HUMPHREY.

Phormio (c. 1674, Tr. from Terence). Brit. Mus., MS. Sloane 1145, ff. 41-84.

RAYMES, WM.

Selfe Interest, or The Belly Wager. c. 1680-90 (tr. from Secchi). Folger Shakespeare Library, MS. 1008.1.

SALISBURY, SIR THOMAS.

Masque at Knowsley. MS. in National Library of Wales.

SANSBURY, JOHN.

Periander (part of The Christmas Prince). Folger Shakespeare Library, Commonplace Book (prob. before 1625), MS. 2203.1.

SCHONAEUS, CORNELIUS.

Translation into English prose, for the use of scholars at Haarlem, of the plays published by the master in Terentius Christianus, 1592, being biblical histories and redactions of Euripides and Plautus; viz., Naamen, Tobit, Nehemiah, Saul, Joseph, Judith, Jephthes, The Baptist, Medea (Euripides), Alcestis (Euripides), The Bacchides (Plautus), Mostellaria (Plautus), Menaechmi (Plautus), Hectoring Soldier (Plautus), The Merchant (Plautus), Pseudolus (Plautus). Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson D. 1388-1391 (3 vols.).

SETTLE, ELKANAH.

Love and Revenge. Brit. Mus., MS. Harleian 6903, Art. i.

Pastor Fido (Tr. of Guarini, based on Fanshaw's). Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 8.

SHAKESPEARE, WM.

Henry IV (The two parts combined into one play, 1610-20). Folger Shakespeare Library, MS. 5. 2.

Julius Caesar (probably a transcript of a printed edition, c. 1660-80). Folger Shakespeare Library, MS. 3. 4.

Merry Wives of Windsor. (1) (A transcript from the third folio), Folger Shakespeare Library, MS. 1. 49. (2) (A transcript from the third folio of a portion of Acts III and IV), Folger Shakespeare Library, MS. 617.1.

Twelfth Night, As You Like It, The Comedy of Errors, Romeo and Juliet, Julius

Caesar, and Macbeth appear in MS. 787 in the Public Library of Douai. The MS. also contains Lee's Mithradates, Dryden's Indian Emperor, and Davenant's Siege of Rhodes. The volume is dated 1694-1695, and appears to have originated in the English convent. (See B. M. Wagner, TLS, Oct. 4, 1934, p. 675.) No doubt all the plays were simply copied from printed editions.

SHIRLEY, JAMES.

The Court Secret. MS. in Worcester College, Oxford.

Cupid and Death (text or Lock's music only?). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 17,799.

Masque of the Four Inns of Court (1633, The Triumph of Peace?). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 6308, p. 1.

SIDNAM, J.

Il Pastor Fido (Tr. from Guarini). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 29,493.

SUCKLING, SIR JOHN.

Aglaure (with three prologues, and original tragic ending). Brit. Mus., Royal MS. 18 C. xxv.

TALBOT, SIR GEORGE

Fillis of Sciros (Tr. from Bonarelli). (1) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 130 (autograph). (2) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 12, 128. (Autograph with author's corrections).

TOMKIS, THOMAS.

Pathomachia, or Love's Loadstone (Pathomachia, or The Battle of the Affections, conjecturally by Tomkis, pub. 1630). (1) Brit. Mus., MS. Harleian, 6869, Art. i. (2) Bodleian, MS. Eng. Misc. e. 5.

VERNEY, FRANCIS.

The Tragedy of Antipoe. Bodleian, MS. Eng. poet. e. 5.

WILD, ROBERT.

The Benefice (fragment beginning Act III, Sc. 4). Brit. Mus., MS. Lansdowne 807, Art. 4. (autograph).

WILDE, GEORGE.

The Converted Robber. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 14,047.

Love's Hospital. (1) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 14,047. (2) Small fragment, Folger Shakespeare Library, Lombard Volume (bound c. 1700), MS. 1487.2.

WILMOT, JOHN, EARL OF ROCHESTER.

One scene, written by Wilmot, of The Conquest of China. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 28,692, f. 70.

Lucina's Rape, or the Tragedy of Vallentinian. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 28,692.

Sodom. (1) Bibliothèque National. Cf. Nouvelles Acquisitions du Département des Manuscrits, 1891-1916, Manuscrits Anglais, 1884-1910. (2) Brit. Mus., Harley MS. 7312.

WILMOT, ROBERT.

Gismond of Salerne. (1) Brit. Mus., MS. Hargrave 205. (2) Brit. Mus., MS. Lansdowne 786.

WILSON, ARTHUR.

The Corporal. (An early 18th cent. fragment of Wilson's lost play, ending in Act II, Sc. I.). Bodleian, MS. Douce C. 2. A few leaves of this play are preserved at the Victoria and Albert Museum, Forster Coll., MS. 638.

The Inconstant Lady. (1) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 9 (contains also list of characters for The Corporal). (2) Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson, poet. 128. (3) Folger Shakespeare Library, The Lombarde Volume (bound c. 1700), MS. 1487.2.

The Swisser. Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 36,759 (autograph, and with original cast).

WILSON, JOHN.

The Cheats. MS. at Worcester Coll., Oxford.

Belphegor, or Marriage of the Devil. Folger Shakespeare Library, MS. 827.1 (apparently autograph, prepared for use as a prompt book).

ZOUCH, RICHARD.

Fallacy, or The Troubles of Hermenia. Brit. Mus., MS. Harleian 6869, Art. 2.

AUTHORS UNKNOWN.

Alice and Alexis (fragment). 1604. Bodleian, MS. Douce 171, f. 48v.

Tragedy of Amurath. Oxford, 1618. Cf. "MSS. at Tabley House, Cheshire," H.M.C., I, 49.

Band, Cuffe, and Ruffe. (1) Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 23, 723. (2) Oxford, 1646. MS. at Ashton Hall, York. Cf. Hist. MSS. Comm., Third Report, p. 295.

Birth of Hercules (Ad. from Amphitryon of Plautus). Brit. Mus., Add. MS. 28,722.

Christmas Messe (1619). Folger Shakespeare Library, Commonplace Book (written c. 1625), MS. 2203.1.

The Christmas Prince. MS. at St. John's College, Oxford. (Cf. Sansburye's Periander, supra.)

Cinna (Tr. from Corneille). Oxford, MS. Exoniensis, sec. xvii.

Charlemagne, or The Distracted Emperor (c. 1600). Brit. Mus., MS. Egerton 1994, ff. 119-136.

Club Law. St. John's Coll., Camb., MS. S. 62.

The Cyprian Conqueror, or Faithless Relict (17th century version of Petronius Arbiter's story of the Roman matron). Brit. Mus., MS. Sloane 3709.

Devices to be shown before the Queen at Nottingham Castle after the Meeting of the Queen of Scots (1562). Brit. Mus., MS. Lansdowne 5, item 38.

Disloyal Favourite, or The Tragedy of Metellus. Bodleian, MS. Rawlinson D. 1361, ff. 285-306.

Drinking Academy, or The Cheater's Holy Day. c. 1600. Huntington Library, MS. H M 91. (Possibly by T. Randolph.)

